1879.—The Indian newspaper's "typical official rises to a late breakfast—probably on herrings and soda-water—and dresses tastefully for his round of morning calls, the last on a grass-widow, with whom he has a l'été-à-l'été tiffin, where 'pegs' alternate with champagne."—Simla Letter in Times, Aug. 16.

1880.—"The Grass-widow in Nephelococcylia."—Sir Ali Baba, 169.

"Pleasant times have these Indian grass-widows!"—The World, Jan. 21, 13.

GRASSIA, s. Grās (said to mean 'a mouthful') is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Rās Mālā (p. 186) to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevalent sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains' families. Afterwards the term grās was also used for the black-mail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. "Thus the title of grassia, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber" (Ibid. Bk. iv. ch. 3); [ed. 1878, p. 568].

c. 1665.—"Nous nous trouvâmes au Village de Bilpar, dont les Habitans qu'on nomme Gratiates, sont presque tous Voleurs."—Thevenot, v. 42.

1803.—"The Grāsias have been shewn to be of different Sects, Casts, or families, viz., 1st, Colees and their Collaterals; 2nd, Rajpoots; 3rd, Syed Mussulmans; 4th, Molelams or modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom . . . to be called Grassias."—Drummond, Illustrations.

1813.—"I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Gracia machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence, than expression."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 393; [conf. 2nd ed. ii. 357].

1819.—"Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying 'a mouthful.' This word is understood in some parts of Mekran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hindostan than Jaypoor."—Macmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Do. i. 270. [On the use in Central India, see Tod, Annals, i. 175; Malcolm, Central India, i. 508.]

GRAVE-DIGGER. (See BEEJOO.)

GREEN-PIGEON. A variety of species belonging to the sub.-fam. Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Oriopus, Osmotreron, and Sphenocercus, bear this name. The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancients.

c. 180.—"Daimachus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India."—Athenaeus, ix. 51.

c. A.D. 250.—"They bring also greenish (ὀχρὰς) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xv. 14.

"There are produced among the Indians . . . pigeons of a pale green colour (χλωρόπτεροι); any one seeing them for the first time, and not having any knowledge of ornithology, would say the bird was a parrot and not a pigeon. They have legs and bill in colour like the partridges of the Greeks."—Ibid. xvi. 2.

1673.—"Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Pidgeons, Spotted Deer, Sabre, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows."—Fryer, 176.

1825.—"I saw a great number of peafowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country . . ."—Heber, ii. 19.

GREY PARTRIDGE. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind. titar, common over a great part of India, Orygornis Ponticeriana, Gmelin. "Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Pateela-pateela-pateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call."—Jerdon, ii. 566.

GRIBLEE, s. A graplin or grapnel. Lascars' language (Roebuck).

GRIFFIN, GRIFF, s.; GRIFFISH, adj. One newly arrived in India, and unaccustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome. The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov. 1746 to June 1748, and was not very fortunate. Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below). [But also see the quotation from Beaumont & Fletcher, below.] Three references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, by the Dutch in the Archipelago, and by the English in Ceylon.

1791.—"As I am little better than an unledged Griffin, according to the fashionable phrase here" (Madras)—Hugh Boyd, 177.

1807.—"It seems really strange to a griffin—the cant word for a European just arrived."—Ed. Minto, in India, 17.

1808.—"At the Inn I was tormented to death by the impudent persevering of the black people; for every one is a beggar, as long as you are reckoned a griffin, or a new-comer."—Lyle of Leyden, 167.

1836.—"I often tire myself . . . rather than wait for their dwindling; but Mrs. Staunton laughs at me and calls me a 'Griffin,' and says I must learn to have patience and save my strength."—Letters from Madras, 34.

" . . . he was living with bad men, and saw that they thought him no better than themselves, but only more griffinish . . ."—Ibid., 53.

1853.—"There were three more cadets on the same steamer, going up to that great griff depot, Oudjipoor."—Outfield, i. 88.

" 'Like drill!'
" 'I don't dislike it much now; the goose-step was not lively.'
" 'Ah, they don't give griffs half enough of it now-a-days; by Jove, Sir, when I was a griff'—and thereupon . . ."—Ibid. i. 62.

[1900.—"Ten Rangoon sportsmen have joined to import ponies from Australia on the griffin system, and have submitted a proposal to the Stewards to frame their events to be confined to griffins at the forthcoming autumn meeting."—Pioneer Mail, May 18.]

The griffin at Goa also in the old days was called by a peculiar name. (See REINOL.)

1631.—"Hæc exanthemata (prickly heat-spots) magis afficiunt recentior advenientes ut Mosquiturum puncturæ . . . ita ut deridiculum ergo hic inter nostrates dictiorum enatum sit, cum qui hoc modo affectus sit, esse Orang Baron, quod novitium hominem significat."—Jac. Bontii, Hist. Nat., &c., ii. cap. xviii. p. 33.

Here orang barou is Malay orang-baharu, i.e. 'new man'; whilst Orang-lama, 'man of long since,' is applied to old colonials. In connection with these terms we extract the following:—

c. 1790.—"Si je n'avois pas été un corlam, et si un long séjour dans l'Inde ne m'avoit pas accoutumé à cette espèce de fleuve, j'aurois certainement souffert l'impossible durant cette nuit."—Haafner, ii. 26-27.

On this his editor notes:

"Corlam est un mot Malais corrompu; il faut dire Orang-lama, ce qui signifie une personne qui a déjà été long-temps dans un endroit, ou dans un pays, et c'est par ce nom qu'on désigne les Européens qui ont habité depuis un certain temps dans l'Inde. Ceux qui ne l'ont qu'y arriver, sont appelés flour; dénomination qui vient du mot Malais Orang-Baru . . . un homme nouvellement arrivé."

[1891.—"In the Standard, Jan. 1, there appears a letter entitled 'Ceylon Tea-Planting—a Warning,' and signed 'An Excreeper.' The correspondent sends a cutting from a recent issue of a Ceylon daily paper—a paragraph headed 'Creepers (diabolical).' From this extract it appears that Creepers is the name given in Ceylon to paying pupils who go out there to learn tea-planting."—Mr. A. L. Mayler, in 8 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 121.]

GROUND, s. A measure of land used in the neighbourhood of Madras. [Also called Munny, Tam. manati.] (See under CAWNY.)

GRUFF, adj. Applied to bulky goods. Probably the Dutch grof, 'coarse.'

[1682-3.—" . . . that for every Tunne of Saltpetre and all other Grosse goods I am to receive nineteen pounds."—Pring's Diary, Pt. 84, Gen. 1st ser. vol. ii. 3-4.]

1750.—" . . . all which could be called Curtains, and some of the Bastions at Madras, had Warehouses under them for the Reception of Naval Stores, and other gruff Goods from Europe, as well as Salt Petre from Beahval."—Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co., p. 52.

1759.—"Which by causing a great export of rice enhances the price of labour, and consequently of all other gruff, piece-goods and raw silk."—In Long, 141.

1765.—" . . . also foote nigar, lump jaggere, ginger, long pepper, and piply-mal . . . articles that usually compose the gruff cargoes of our outward-bound shipping."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 191.

1783.—"What in India is called a gruff (bulky) cargo."—Forrest, Voyage to Mergui, 42.

GEUNTH, s. Panjābī Granth, from Skt. grantha, lit. 'a knot,' leaves tied together by a string. 'The Book,' i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs, containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nānak (1469-1539) onwards. The Granth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1770.—"As the young man (Nānak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Mussulmen . . . he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pendjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses. . . . His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Grenth."—Scir Mutaqherin, i. 89.

1798.—"A book entitled the Grunth . . . is the only typical object which the Sikques have admitted into their places of worship."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 255.

1817.—"The fame of Nannak's book was diffused. He gave it a new name, Kirrant."—Mill's Hist. ii. 377.

c. 1831.—". . . Au centre du quel est le temple d'or où est gardé le Grant ou livre sacré des Sikhs."—Jaquermon, Correspondance, ii. 166.

[1838.—"There was a large collection of priests, sitting in a circle, with the Grooth, their holy book, in the centre . . ."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, ii. 7.]

GRUNTHEE, s. Panj. granthi from granth (see GEUNTH). A sort of native chaplain attached to Sikh regiments. [The name Granthi appears among the Hindi mendicant castes of the Panjab in Mr. MacLagan's Census Rep., 1891, p. 300.]

GRUNTHUM, s. This (grantham) is a name, from the same Skt. word as the last, given in various odd forms to the Sanskrit language by various Europeans writing in S. India during the 16th and 17th centuries. The term properly applied to the character in which the Sanskrit books were written.

1600.—"In these verses is written, in a particular language, called Gorodam, their Philosophy and Theology, which the Bramens study and read in Universities all over India."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 95.

1646.—"Cette langue correspond à la nostre Latine, parceque les soules Lettrés l'apprennent; il se nomment Gutirindans."—Barretto, Rel. de la Prov. de la Malabar, 257.

1727.—". . . their four law-books, Sama Vedam, Uruklu Vedam, Edirvarna Vedam, and Adir Vedam, which are all written in the Girandams, and are held in high esteem by the Bramins."—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 399.

"Girandam (by others called Kerondum, and also Sanskrits) is the language of the Bramins and the learned."—Ibid. 386.

1753.—"Les Indiens du pays se donnent le nom de Tamules, et on sait que la langue vulgaire différente du Sanskret, et du Grendam, qui sont les langues sacrées, porte le même nom."—D'Anville, 117.

GUANA, IGUANA, s. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called guanas in India, are apparently monitors. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name guana is often applied in India, is really called in Hindi goh (Skt. godhā), Singalese goyd. The true iguana of America is described by Oviedo in the first quotation under the name of iuana. [The word is Span. iguana, from Carib icuan, written in early writers hiuana, igoana, iuama or yuana. See N.E.D. and Stanf. Dict.]

c. 1535.—"There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphibious (neutrale), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well. . . . It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length. . . . And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at." &c.—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156r, 157.

c. 1550.—"We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iguane, resembling our lizards in shape. . . the females are most delicate food."—Girolami Benzoni, p. 140.

1631.—"De Lacertao quādam specie, Incolis Liguana. Est . . . genus venenosissimum," &c.—Jar. Bonili, Lib. v. cap. 5. p. 57. (See GECKO.)

1678.—"Guiana, a Creature like a Crocodile, which Robbers use to lay hold on by their Tails, when they clamber Houses."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called Kobera guion, 5 or 6 feet long, and not eatable; the other called tolla guion, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat . . . and I suppose it is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana" (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobheraguion may be Cobra-guana.

1704.—"The Guano is a sort of Creature some of which are found on the land, some in the water . . . stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Funnel, in Dampier, iv. 51.

1711.—"Here are Monkeys, Gaunas, Lissards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780.—"They have here an amphibious animal called the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most loathsome of animals, not less so than the toad."—Munro's Narrative, 36.

c. 1830.—"Had I known I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-lizard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1863), 178.

1879.—"Captain Shaw asked the Imaum of one of the mosques of Malacca about alligator's eggs, a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those that came up the river became *iguana*s."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881.—"The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonslá family. . . . The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Ghorpade, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a ghorpad or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, vi. 437.

1883.—"Who can look on that anachronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano!) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 36.

1885.—"One of my moonshis, José Prethoo, a Concani of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's converts, gravely informed me that in the old days *iguana*s were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, saub, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, 56.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE, n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so called by them as meaning, 'Take you heed!' (Gardez-vous, in fact.) But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahía. Bruce, again (see below), gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded. We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancients, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafūn, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Opōnē. This name Hafūn was applied to a town, no doubt the true Opōnē, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afūni, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Rās Hafūn (the Chersonesus of the Periplus, the Zingis of Ptolemy, the Cape d'Afūi and d'Orfui of old maps and nautical directories), and the cape of Jard-Hafūn (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gard-Hafūn), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of jard that we can find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.' Sir R. Burton (Commentary on Camōens, iv. 489) interprets jard as=Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a lighthouse." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. [There is still no lighthouse, and shipowners differ as to its advantage; see answer by Secretary of State, in House of Commons, Times, March 14, 1902.] We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of jard.

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafūn with the Arabic af'a, 'pleasant odours.' It would then, be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbarice (or eastern Africa), towards the Orient (τὸ τῶν Ἀρωματῶν ἐμπόριον καὶ ἀκρωτήριον τελευταῖον τῆς βαρβαρικῆς ἡπείρου πρὸς ἀνατολὴν ἀκρόστον).

According to C. Muller our Guardafui is called by the natives Rās Aser; their Rās Jardafūn being a point some 12

m. to the south, which on some charts is called Rds Shenarif, and which is also the Tāḡai of the Periplus (Geog. Gr. Minores, i. 263).

1516.—“And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Coulam’s) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guardafui, nor go to Adem, except when employed in our obedience and service . . . and if any vessel or Zambue is found inwards of the Cape of Guardafui it shall be taken as good prize of war.”—Treaty between Lopo Soares and the K. of Coulam, in Dotelho, Tombo, 33.

“After passing this place (Afendi) the next after it is Cape Guardafui, where the coast ends, and trends so as to double towards the Red Sea.”—Darbois, 16.

c. 1530.—“This province, called of into Arabia, but which the ancients called Trogloditica, begins at the Red Sea and the country of the Abissines, and finishes at Magadasso . . . others say it extends only to the Cape of Guardafui.”—Sommario de’ Regni, in Ramusio, i. f. 325.

1553.—“Vicente Sodre, being despatched by the King, touched at the Island of Cocotora, where he took in water, and thence passed to the Cape of Guardafui, which is the most easterly land of Africa.”—De Barros, I. vii. cap. 2.

1554.—“If you leave Dābul at the end of the season, you direct yourselves W.S.W. till the pole is four inches and an eighth, from thence true west to Kardaḡūn.”—Sidi ‘Alī Kapudān, The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 464.

Cambes, x. 97.

Englished by Burton :

“The Cape which Antients ‘Aromatic’ claps behold, cyclopt by Moderns Guardafu; where opens the Red Sea mouth, so wide and deep, the Sea whose ruddy bed lends blushing hue.”

1602.—“Eitor da Silveira set out, and without any mishap arrived at the Cape of Gardafui.”—Conto, IV. i. 4.

1727.—“And having now travell’d along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Guardafoy, I’ll survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sen.”—A. Hamilton, i. 15; [ed. 1744].

1790.—“The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardafui, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardafan and means the Straits of Burtal, the reason of which will be seen afterwards.”—Bruce’s Travels, i. 315.

[1823.—“ . . . we soon obtained sight of Cape Gardafui. . . . It is called by the natives Ras Assere, and the high mountain immediately to its south is named Gibel Jordafoon. . . . Keeping about nine miles off shore we rounded the peninsula of Hafoon. . . . Hafoon appears like an island, and belongs to a native Somaui prince. . . .”
—Owen, Narr. i. 353.]

GUAVA, s. This fruit (Psidium Guayava, L., Ord. Myrtaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goyavier, [from Brazilian guayaba, Stanf. Dict.]), Guayabo pomifera Indica of Caspar Bauhin, Guayava of Joh. Bauhin, strangely appears by name in Elliot’s translation from Amīr Khosrū, who flourished in the 13th century: “He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube” (iii. 556). This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guaiabo of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Ramusio, iii. f. 141v). There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Amrūd, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly ‘a pear’; but the fruit is often called safari ām, ‘journey mango’ (respecting which see under ANANAS). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into supārī ām (areca-mango!). In the Deccan (according to Moodeen Sheriff) and all over Guzerat and the Central Provinces (as we are informed by M.-Gen. Keatinge), the fruit is called jām, Mahr. jamba, which is in Bengal the name of Syzygium jambolanum (see JAMON), and in Guzerati jāmṛūd, which seems to be a factitious word in imitation of āmṛūd.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pine-apple (indeed except to stew, or make jelly, it is nobis judicibus, an utter impostor), [Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: “You never ate good ones!”] must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann’s transl. of the Ain (i. 64) as served at Akbar’s table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Tūrān, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, amrūd, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Achin, and in Cochin China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

c. 1550.—“The guaiava is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured.”—J. Bot. Denon, p. 88.

1658.—There is a good cut of the guava, as guavaba, in Pwo, pp. 162-3.

1673.—“ . . . flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocos, Gulavas, a kind of Pear.”—Fryer, 40.

1676.—“The N.W. part is full of Guaver Trees of the greatest variety, and their Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with.”—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685.—“The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear.”—Ibid. i. 222.

c. 1750-80.—“Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plumb-trees.”—Grise, i. 20.

1764.—
“A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Boast of the housewife.”

Grainger, Bk. i.

1843.—“On some of these extensive plains (on the Mohur R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire.”—Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travel, ii. 271.

GUBBER, s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says ‘a Dutch ducat.’ It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have held it at the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gabr (dindār-i-gabr), implying its being of infidel origin.

c. 1590.—“Mirza Jani Beg Sultan made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy's head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 miris . . . of which 72 went to one tanka.”—Tārīkh-i-Tāhīrī, in Elliot, i. 287.

1711.—“Rupees are the most current Coin; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Mugerbees, and Pagodas.”—Lockyer, 201.

“When a Parcel of Venetian Ducats are mixt with others the whole goes by the name of Chequeens at Surat, but when they are separated, one sort is called Venetians, and all the others Gubbers indifferently.”—Ibid. 242.

1762.—“Gold and Silver Weights:

	oz.	dwt.	grs.
100 Venetian Ducats	.11	0	5
10 (100) Gubbers	.10	17	12

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

GUBBROW, v. To bully, to dumbfound, and perturb a person. Made from ghabrū, the imperative of ghabrīnd. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, ‘to be dumbfounded and perturbed.’

GUDDA, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gadhū: [Skt. gardabha, ‘the roarer’]. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from H. through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cutlibert), like the English Neddy, similarly applied. [So the N.E.D. with hesitation.] A Punjab proverbial phrase is gadūn khurki, “Donkeys’ rubbing” their sides together, a sort of ‘claw me and I’ll claw thee.’

GUDDY, GUDDEE, s. H. gaddī, Mahr. gādī. ‘The Throne.’ Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, “a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines” (Wilson). “To be placed on the guddee” is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant’s back.

GUDGE, s. P.—H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hath, or natural cubit, to the English yard. In the Āin [ed. Jarrett, ii. 58 seqq.] Abul Fazl details numerous gaz which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by

J. Prinsep) to 52½. The Nāhi gaz of Akbar was intended to supersede all these as a standard; and as it was the basis of all records of land-measurements and rents in Upper India, the determination of its value was a subject of much importance when the revenue surveys were undertaken about 1824. The results of enquiry were very discrepant, however, and finally an arbitrary value of 33 inches was assumed. The bigha (see BEEGAH), based on this, and containing 3600 square gaz = $\frac{1}{4}$ of an acre, is the standard in the N.W.P., but statistics are now always rendered in acres. See Gladwin's Ayeen (1800) i. 302, seqq.; Prinsep's Useful Tables, ed. Thomas, 122; [Madras Administration Manual, ii. 505.]

[1532.—“... and if in quantity the measure and the weight, and whether ells, rods or gazes.”—Archiv. Port. Orient. i. 5, p. 1562.]

1754.—“Some of the townsmen again demanded of me to open my bales, and sell them some pieces of cloth; but... I rather chose to make several of them presents of 2½ gaz of cloth, which is the measure they usually take for a coat.”—Hanway, i. 125.

1768-71.—“A gess or goss is 2 cobitos, being at Chinsurah 2 feet and 10 inches Rhineland measure.”—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 463.

1814.—“They have no measures but the gudge, which is from their elbow to the end of the middle finger, for measuring length.” Pearce, Acc. of the Ways of the Abyssinians, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. ii. 56.

GUICOWAR, n.p. Gāekwār, the title of the Mahratta kings of Guzerat, descended from Dāmījī and Pilājī Gāekwār, who rose to distinction among Mahratta warriors in the second quarter of the 18th century. The word means ‘Cowherd.’

[1818.—“These princes were all styled, Guickwar, in addition to their family name... the word literally means a cow-keeper, which, although a low employment in general, has, in this noble family among the Hindoos, who venerate that animal, become a title of great importance.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 375.]

GUINEA-CLOTHS, GUINEA-STUFFS, s. Apparently these were piece-goods bought in India to be used in the West African trade. [On the other hand, Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with gunny (Report on old Recs., 224). The manufacture still goes on at Pondicherry.] These are presumably the Negros-tücher of Baldaeus (1672), p. 154.

1726.—We find in a list of cloths purchased by the Dutch Factory at Porto Novo, Guinees Lywaat, and Negros-Klederen (“Guinea linens and Negro’s clothing”).—See Valentijn, Chorom. 9.

1813.—“The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe... and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced... Guinea stuffs, 4½ yards each (per ton) 1200 (pieces).”—Milburn, i. 289.

GUINEA DEER, s. An old name for some species of Chevrotain, in the quotation probably the Tragulus meminna or Mouse Deer (Blanford, Mammalia, 555).

[1765.—“Common deer they have here (in Ceylon) in great abundance, and also Guinea Deer.”—Jes. 57.]

GUINEA-FOWL. There seems to have been, in the 16th century, some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under TURKEY. The Guinea-fowl is the Meleagris of Aristotle and others, the Afra avis of Horace.

GUINEA-PIG, s. This was a nickname given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indiamen in the 18th century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his Sailor's Handbook, 1867, defines: ‘The younger midshipmen of an Indiaman.’

[1779.—“I promise you, to me it was no slight penance to be exposed during the whole voyage to the half sneering, satirical looks of the mates and guinea-pigs.”—Macintosh, Travels, quoted in Carey, Old Days, i. 73.]

GUINEA-WORM, s. A parasitic worm (Filaria Medinensis) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length, and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c. It is found in some parts of W. India. "I have known," writes M.-Gen. Keatinge, "villages where half the people were maimed by it after the rains. Matunga, the Head Quarters of the Bombay Artillery, was abandoned, in great measure, on account of this pest." [It is the disease most common in the Damoh District (C. P. Gazetteer, 176, Sleeman, Rambles, &c., ed. V. A. Smith, i. 94). It is the rāshta, reshta of Central Asia (Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 147; Wolff, Travels, ii. 407).] The reason of the name is shown by the quotation from Purchas respecting its prevalence in Guinea. The disease is graphically described by Agatharchides in the first quotation.

n.c. c. 113.—"Those about the Red Sea who are stricken with a certain malady, as Agatharchides relates, besides being afflicted with other novel and unheard-of symptoms, of which one is that small snake-like worms (δρακόντια μικρά) eat through the legs and arms, and peep out, but when touched instantly shrink back again, and winding among the muscles produce intolerable burning pains."—In Dubner's ed. of Plutarch, iv. 372, viz. Table Discussions, Bk. VIII. Qnest. ix. 3.

1600.—"The worms in the legges and bodies trouble not every one that goeth to those Countreys, but some are troubled with them and some are not"—[a full account of the disease follows].—Descn. of Guinea, in Purchas, ii. 963.

c. 1630.—"But for their water . . . I may call it Aqua Mortis . . . it ingenders small long worms in the legges of such as use to drink it . . . by no potion, no unguent to be remedied: they have no other way to destroy them, save by rowling them about a pin or peg, not unlike the treble of Theorbo."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 123.

1664.—". . . nor obliged to drink of those naughty waters . . . full of nastiness of so many people and beasts . . . that do cause such fevers, which are very hard to cure, and which breed also certain very dangerous worms in the legs . . . they are commonly of the bigness and length of a small Vial-string . . . and they must be drawn out little by little, from day to day, gently winding them about a little twig about the bigness of a needle, for fear of breaking them."—Bernier, E. T. 114; [ed. Constable, 355].

1676.—"Guinea Worms are very frequent in some Places of the West Indies . . . I rather judge that they are generated by drinking bad water."—Dampier, ii. 89-90.

1712.—"Hæc vita est Ormusiensium, imò civium totius littoris Persici, ut perpetuus in corpore calamitates ferant ex coeli intemperie: modo sudore diffuunt; modo vexantur furunculis; nunc cibi sunt, mox aquæ inopes; sæpè ventis trentibus, sem-

per solo torrente, squalent et quis omnia recalescat? Unum ex aerumnis gravioribus induco: nimirum Lumbricorum singularo genus, quod non in intestinis, sed in musculis per corporis ambitum natales invenit. Latini medici vermem illum nomine donant rod δρακοντιον, s. Dracunculi. . . . Guineenses nigritæ lingua sua . . . vermes illos vocant Icdon, ut produnt reducas ex auriferis illo Africæ littore. . . ."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot., 524-5. Kaempfer speculates as to why the old physicians called it dracunculus; but the name was evidently taken from the δρακοντιον of Agatharchides, quoted above.

1768.—"The less dangerous diseases which attack Europeans in Guinea are, the dry belly-ache, and a worm which breeds in the flesh. . . . Dr. Rouppe observes that the disease of the Guinea-worm is infectious."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, pp. 53, 54.

1774.—"See an account of this pest under the name of 'le ver des nerfs [Vena Medinensis]," in Niduhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 117. The name given by Niebuhr is, as we learn from Kaempfer's remarks, ʿaruk Medini, the Medina nerve (rather than vein).

[1821.—"The doctor himself is just going off to the Cape, half-dead from the Kotah fever; and, as if that were not enough, the narrow, or guinea-worm, has blanched his cheek and made him a cripple."—Tod, Annals, ed. 1834, ii. 749.]

GUJPUTTY, n.p. (See COSPETIR.)

GUM-GUM, s. We had supposed this word to be an invention of the late Charles Dickens, but it seems to be a real Indian, or Anglo-Indian, word. The nearest approximation in Shakespear's Dict. is gamak, 'sound of the kettledrum.' But the word is perhaps a Malay plural of gong originally; see the quotation from Osbeck. [The quotations from Bowdich and Medley (from Scott, Malay Words, p. 53) perhaps indicate an African origin.]

[1659.—". . . The roar of great guns, the sounding of trumpets, the beating of drums, and the noise of the gonggommen of the Indians."—From the account of the Dutch attack (1659) on a village in Ceram, given in Wouter Schouten, Reistogt nadr en door Oost-Indiën, 4th ed. 1775, i. 56. In the Dutch version, "en het gerans van de gonggommen der Indianen." The French of 1707 (i. 92) has "au bruit du canon, des trompettes, des tambour et des gonggomes Indiennes."

[1731.—"One of the Hottentot Instruments of Musick is common to several Negro Nations, and is called both by Negroes and Hottentots, gong-gom . . . is a Bow of Iron, or Olive Wood, strung with twisted Sheep-Gut or Sinews."—Medley, tr. Kolben's Cape of Good Hope, i. 271.]

c. 1760-60.—“A music far from delightful, consisting of little drums they call Gum-gums, cymbals, and a sort of fife.”—Gros, i. 139.

1768-71.—“They have a certain kind of musical instruments called gom-goms, consisting in hollow iron bowls, of various sizes and tones, upon which a man strikes with an iron or wooden stick . . . not unlike a set of bells.”—Storarius, E.T. i. 215. See also p. 65.

1771.—“At night we heard a sort of music, partly made by insects, and partly by the noise of the Gungung.”—Orbeck, i. 185.

[1819.—“The gong-gongs and drums were beat all around us.”—Bowdich, Mission to Ashantee, i. 7, 136.]

1836.—“‘Did you ever hear a tom-tom, Sir?’ sternly enquired the Captain . . . ‘A what?’ asked Hardy, rather taken aback.

‘Never!’

‘Nor a gum-gum?’

‘Never!’

[1853.—“The term Gunge signifies a range of buildings at a place of traffic, for the accommodation of merchants and all persons engaged in the purchase and sale of goods, and for that of their goods and of the shopkeepers who supply them.”—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, i. 278.]

GUNJA, s. Hind. gānjhā, gānjā. The flowering or fruiting shoots of the female plant of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, L., formerly distinguished as C. indica), used as an intoxicant. (See BANG.)

[c. 1813.—“The natives have two proper names for the hemp (Cannabis sativa), and call it Gangja when young, and Siādhi when the flowers have fully expanded.”—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 865.]

1874.—“In odour and the absence of taste, ganjā resembles bhāng. It is said that after the leaves which constitute bhāng have been gathered, little shoots sprout from the stem, and that these, picked off and dried, form what is called ganjā.”—Hanbury & Pluecker, 493.

GUNNY, GUNNY-BAG, s. From Skt. gori, ‘a sack’; Hind. and Mahr. gor, gori, ‘a sack, sacking.’ The popular and trading name of the coarse sacking and sacks made from the fibre of jute, much used in all Indian trade. Tūt is a common Hind. name for the stuff. [With this word Sir G. Birdwood identifies the forms found in the old records—“Guiny Stuffles (1671),” “Guyniestuffis,” “Guinea stuffs,” “Gunnys” (Rep. on Old Records, 26, 38, 39, 224); but see under GUINEA-CLOTHS.]

c. 1590.—“Sircar Ghoraghat produces raw silk, gunneys, and plenty of Tanghion horses.”—Gladwin’s Ayeen, ed. 1800, ii. 9; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 123]. (But here, in the original, the term is pārshuk-i-afband.)

1693.—“Besides the aforementioned articles Goeny-sacks are collected at Palicol.”—Havart (3), 14.

1711.—“Whon Sugar is pack’d in double Goneyes, the outer Bag is always valued in Contract at 1 or 1½ Shahre.”—Lockyer, 244.

1726.—In a list of goods procurable at Danzerom: “Goeni-zakken (Gunny bags).”—Valentijn, Chor, 40.

1727.—“Sheldon . . . put on board some rotten long Pepper, that he could dispose of in no other Way, and some damaged Gunnies, which are much used in Persia for embalming Goods, when they are good in their kind.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 15; [ed. 1744].

1764.—“Baskots, Gunny bags, and dubbers . . . Rs. 24.”—In Long, 334.

1785.—“We enclose two parvanchs . . . directing them each to despatch 1000 goonies of grain to that person of mighty degree.”—Tippoo’s Letters, 171.

1885.—“The land was so covered with them (plover) that the hunters shot them with all kind of arms. We counted 80 birds in the gunny-sack that three of the soldiers brought in.”—Boots and Saddles, by Mrs. Custer, p. 37. (American work.)

GUNTA, s. Hind. ghanṭa, ‘a bell or gong.’ This is the common term for expressing an European hour in modern Hindūstāni. [See PANDY.]

GUP, s. Idle gossip. P.—H. gap, ‘prattle, tattle.’ The word is perhaps an importation from Türān. Vāmbéry gives Orient. Turki gep, geb, ‘word, saying, talk’; which, however, Pavet de Courteille suggests to be a corruption from the Pers. gufan, ‘to say’; of which, indeed, there is a form guptan. [So Platts, who also compares Skt. jāpa, which is the Bengali gōpo, ‘babble.’] See quotation from Schuyler showing the use in Turkistan. The word is perhaps best known in England through an unamiable account of society in S.

India, published under the name of "Gup," in 1868.

1809-10.—"They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no other . . . amusement than hearing the 'gup-gup,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1876.—"The first day of mourning goes by the name of gup, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Terlistan, i. 151.

GUREEBPURWUR, GURREEB-NUWAUZ, ss. Ar.—P. Gharibpur-wur, Gharibnawd; used in Hind. as respectful terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor!' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1726.—"Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grab-anemoas, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Chor. 109, who copies from Van Twist (1648), p. 55.

1821.—"I was appealed to loudly by both parties, the soldiers calling on me as 'Ghureeb purwur,' the Goomashta, not to be outdone, exclaiming 'Donai, Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'" (Read Dohai and see DOAI).—Heber, i. 266. See also p. 278.

1867.—" 'Protector of the poor' he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave! An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her gold bangles. Great is my misfortune!'"—Lt-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 99.

GURJAUT, n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhjāt, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhjats, which is like 'fortises.' [In the quotation below, the writer seems to think it a name of a class of people.] This manner of denominating such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts seems to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplus Dosarēnē or Dēsarēnē, apparently representing Skt. Daśārjṇa, quasi dakan riya, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Bṛhat Saṁhitā shew us in this part of India (J.R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J.A.S.B. xxxiii. 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattigarh, '36 Forts.'

[1820.—"At present nearly one half of this extensive region is under the immediate jurisdiction of the British Government; the other possessed by tributary zemindars called Ghurjauts, or hill chiefs. . . ."—Hamilton, Description of Hindostan, ii. 32.]

a. A little fort; Hind. garhi. Also Gurr, i.e. garhi, 'a fort.'

1693.—" . . . many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurrs, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains. . . ."—Fryer, 165.

1786.—" . . . The Zemindars in 4 pergunnahs are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurrries, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 59.

[1835.—"A shot was at once fired upon them from a high Ghurree."—Forbes, Ras Mula, ed. 1878, p. 621.]

GUTTA PERCHA, s. This is the Malay name Gatah Perti, i.e. 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopsis Gutta, Benth. (Isonandra Gutta, Hooker; N.O. Sapotaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (J. Ind. Archip. i. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the tuban. [Mr. Maxwell (Ind. Ant. xvii. 358) points out that the proper reading is taban.] The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct. The history of G. P. is, however, far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixed together. [Mr. Scott (Malay Words, 65 seqq.) writes the word getah percha, or getah perchah, 'gum of percha,' and remarks that it has been otherwise explained as meaning 'gum of Sumatra,' "there being another word percha, a name of Sumatra, as well as a third word percha, 'a rag, a remnant,'" Mr. Maxwell (loc. cit.) writes: "It is still uncertain whether there is a gutta-producing tree called Percha by the Malays. My experience is that they give the name of Perchah to that kind of getah taban which hardens into strips in boiling. These are stuck together and made into balls for export.*]

[1847.—“Gutta Percha is a remarkable example of the rapidity with which a really useful invention becomes of importance to the English public. A year ago it was almost unknown, but now its peculiar properties are daily being made more available in some new branch of the useful or ornamental arts.”—Mundy, Journal, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, ii. 312 seq. (quoted by Scott, loc. cit.).]

1868.—“The late Mr. d’Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Isanandra Gutta was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees. . . . Mr. d’Almeida . . . acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away unopened for. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged. . . . The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island.”—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 268-9.

GUZZY, s. Pers. and Hind. gazi; perhaps from its having been woven of a gaz (see GUDGE) in breadth. A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701.—In a price list for Persia we find: “Geajes Bengaals.”—Valentijn, v. 303.

1781.—“It is suggested that the following articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet): . . . Guzzle, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterskins. . . .”—Seton-Karr, i. 4.

[1866.—“ . . . common unbleached fabrics . . . used for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead. . . . These fabrics in Bengal pass under the names of Garrha and Guzee.”—Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 83.]

GWALIOR, n.p. Hind. Gwalidr. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 m. south of Agra, in lat. 26° 13'. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham’s opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindu dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahomedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. Early in the 18th century it fell into the possession of the Mahratta family of Sindhia, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms: (1) escaladed by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat; * (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June 1858, by a party of the 25th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindhia family. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but in December 1885 it was formally restored to the Maharaja Sindhia.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archæol. Surrey, ii. 336), is derived from a small Hindû shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gudli or Gwâli-pa, after whom the fortress received the name of Gwâli-dwar, contracted into Gwalidr.

c. 1020.—“From Kanauj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jajjhoti, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kanjuria. In that country are the two forts of Gwalidr and Kalinjir. . . .”—Al-Birûni, in Elliot, i. 57-8.

1196.—The royal army marched “towards Gâlewâr, and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade. . . .”—Hasan Nizâmî, in Elliot, ii. 227.

c. 1310.—“The castle of Gâlyûr, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so to speak, as if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs

* The two companies which escaladed were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. “It is said that the spot was pointed out to Popham by a cowherd, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass-shoes was deducted from Popham’s pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards.”—Cunningham, Arch. Surv. ii. 340.

of water, and some 20 walls walled round are attached to it; on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road, traversed by elephants and horses. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses alike; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Un Natuta, ii. 163.

1626.—"I entered Guallâr by the Hâtî-pâl gate. . . . They call an elephant kdt, and a gate pâl. On the out-side of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. . . ."—Naber, p. 383.

[c. 1590.—"Gualiar is a famous fort, in which are many stately buildings, and there is a stone elephant over the gate. The air and water of this place are both esteemed good. It has always been celebrated for fine singers and beautiful women. . . ."—Ayem, Gladen, ed. 1600, ii. 33; ed. Jarrell, ii. 181.]

1610.—"The 31 to Gwalere, 6 c., a pleasant Citie with a Castle. . . . On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliffe of 6 c. compasso at least (divers say eleven). . . . From hence to the top, leads a narrow stone cawsey, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mighty Elephant of stone very curiously wrought. . . ."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 426-7.

1616.—"23. Gwalier, the chief City so called, where the Mogol hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 356.

["Kualiar," in Sir T. Roe's List, Hak. Soc. ii. 539.]

c. 1665.—"For to shut them up in Goualeor, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impregnable, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Garrison; that was not an easie thing."—Bernier E.T. 5; [ed. Constable, 14].

c. 1670.—"Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Countrey, this Fortress of Goualeor is the place where they secure Princes and great Noblemen. Chatahan coming to the Empire by foul-play, caus'd all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seiz'd one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Goualeor; but he suffer'd them all to live and enjoy their estates. Aurangzeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not exclaim against him for a bloody Prince."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 35; [ed. Ball, i. 63].

GYAUL (properly GAYĀL), [Skt. go, 'an ox'], s. A large animal (Gatneus frontalis, Jerd., Bos f. Blanford, Alam-ul-in, 487) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mishmis of the Aessam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Aessam it is called Mithan.

[c. 1590.—In Arakan, "cows and buffaloes there are none, but there is an animal which has somewhat of the characteristics of both, piebald and particoloured whose milk the people drink."—Lin, ed. Jarrell, ii. 119.]

1824.—"In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghyal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. . . ."—Naber, i. 34.

1866-67.—"I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Fuzlah and I were looking to our arms when Adupah said, 'It is only the gyal calling; Sahib! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.'

"These gyal were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spreading horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais. . . ."—Lt.-Col. T. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 303.

GYELONG, s. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tib. dGe-sLong, i.e. 'beggar of virtue,' i.e. a bhikshu or mendicant friar (see under BUXEE); but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jacschke, p. 86.

1781.—"He was dressed in the festival habit of a gylong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Doble, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

GYM-KHANA, s. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 40 years ago. The first use that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rürki in 1861, when a gymkhana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khāna ('ball-house'), the name usually given in Hind. to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of sorts are provided, including (when that was in fashion) a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The gym may have been simply a corruption of gend shaped by gymnastics, [of which the English public school short form gym passed into Anglo-Indian jargon]. The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has travelled already as far as Malta, and has since become common among Englishmen abroad. [The suggestion that the word originated in the P.—H. jama'at-khana, 'a place of assemblage,' is not probable.]

1877.—"Their proposals are that the Cricket Club should include in their programme the games, &c., proposed by the promoters of a gymkhana Club, so far as not to interfere with cricket, and should join in making a rink and lawn-tennis, and badminton courts, within the cricket-ground enclosure."—Pioneer Mail, Nov. 3.

1879.—"Mr. A—F— can always be depended on for epigram, but not for accuracy. In his letters from Burma he talks of the Gymkhana at Rangoon as a sort of etablissement [sic] where people have pleasant little dinners. In the 'Oriental Arcadia,' which Mr. F— tells us is flavoured with naughtiness, people may do strange things, but they do not dine at Gymkhanas."—Ibid. July 2.

1881.—"R. E. Gymkhana at Malta, for Polo and other Ponies, 20th June, 1881."—Heading in Royal Engineer Journal, Aug. 1, p. 169.

1883.—"I am not speaking of Bombay people with their clubs and gymkhanas and other devices for oiling the wheels of existence. . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 9.

GYNEE, s. H. gaini. A very diminutive kind of cow bred in Bengal. It is, when well cared for, a beautiful creature, is not more than 3 feet high, and affords excellent meat. It is mentioned by Aelian:

c. 250.—"There are other bullocks in India, which to look at are no bigger than the largest goats; these also are yoked, and run very swiftly."—De Nat. Anim., xv. 21.

c. 1590.—"There is also a species of oxen called gaini, small like gāt (see GOONT) horses, but very beautiful."—Atn., i. 149.

[1829.—". . . I found that the said tiger had feasted on a more delicious morsel,—a nice little Ghinea, a small cow."—Mem. of John Shipp, iii. 132.]

1832.—"We have become great farmers, having sown our crop of oats, and are building outhouses to receive some 34 dwarf cows and oxen (gynees) which are to be fed up for the table."—F. Parkes, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 251.

H

HACKERY, s. In the Bengal Presidency this word is now applied only to the common native bullock-cart used in the slow draught of goods and materials. But formerly in Bengal, as still in Western India and Ceylon, the word was applied to lighter carriages (drawn by bullocks) for personal transport. In Broughton's Letters from a Mahratta Camp (p. 168; [ed. 1892, p. 117]) the word is used for what in Upper India is commonly called an ekka (q.v.), or light native pony-carriage; but this is an exceptional application. Though the word is used by Englishmen almost universally in India, it is unknown to natives, or if known is regarded as an English term; and its origin is exceedingly obscure. The word seems to have originated on the west side of India, where we find it in our earliest quotations. It is probably one of those numerous words which were long in use, and undergoing corruption by illiterate soldiers and sailors, before they appeared in any kind of literature. Wilson suggests a probable Portuguese origin, e.g. from acarretar, 'to convey in a cart.' It is possible that the mere Portuguese article and noun 'a carreta' might have produced the Anglo-Indian hackery. Thus in Correa, under 1613, we have a description of the Surat hackeries; "and the carriages (as carretas) in which he and the Portuguese travelled, were elaborately wrought, and furnished with silk hangings, covering them from the sun; and these carriages (as carretas) run so smoothly (the country consisting of level plains) that the people travelling in them sleep as tranquilly as on the ground" (ii. 369).

But it is almost certain that the origin of the word is the H. chhakra, 'a two-wheeled cart'; and it may be noted that in old Singhalese chakka,

'a cart-wheel,' takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On Oldest Aryan Elements of Singhalese, translated by D. Ferguson in Indian Ant. xii. 64). [But this can have no connection with chhakra, which represents Skt. śakata, 'a waggon.']

1673.—"The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 83. [For these swift oxen, see quot. from Forbes below, and from Aelian under GYNEE.]

1690.—"Their Hackeries likewise, which are a kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Ovington, 251.

1711.—"The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackeries, which are very common, would be an inconvenience. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 253.

1742.—"The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackeries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 202.

1760.—"The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundoo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a hackery."—Holtrell, in Wheeler's Early Records, 218.

c. 1760.—"The hackrees are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve . . . they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grise, i. 155-156.

1780.—"A hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels drawn by bullocks, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hedges, Travels, 5.

c. 1790.—"Quant aux palankins et hackeries (voitures à deux roues), on les passe sur une double sangarie" (see JANGAR).—Hausner, ii. 173.

1793.—"To be sold by Public Auction . . . a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13.

1793.—"At half-past six o'clock we each got into a hackery."—Storvins, tr. by Wilecks, iii. 295.

1811.—Solym's draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengal sense.

"Il y a cependant quelques endroits où l'on se sert de charottes converties à deux roues, appelées hickeries, devant lesquelles on attèle des bœufs, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Hausner, Voyages, ii. 3.

1813.—"Travelling in a light hackaree, at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 376; [2nd ed. ii. 352; in i. 150, hackeries, ii. 253, hackarees]. Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a bauli (see BYLEE).

1829.—"The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of woo tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gilding, and pinced upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Memo. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 81.

1860.—"Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hastened home from it."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 140.

[HADDY, s. A grade of troops in the Mogul service. According to Prof. Blochmann (Ann. i. 20, note) they corresponded to our "Warranted officers." Most clerks of the Imperial offices, the painters of the Court, the foremen in Akbar's workshops, &c., belonged to this corps. They were called Ahadi, or single men, because they stood under Akbar's immediate orders." And Mr. Irvine writes: "Midway between the nobles or leaders (mansabdars) with the horsemen under them (utbindan) on the one hand, and the Ashdam (see EYSHAM), or infantry, artillery, and artificers on the other, stood the Ahadi, or gentleman trooper. The word is literally 'single' or 'alone' (A. aḥad, 'one'). It is easy to see why this name was applied to them; they offered their services singly, they did not attach themselves to any chief, thus forming a class apart from the utbindan; but as they were horsemen, they stood equally apart from the specialised services included under the remaining head of Ashdam." (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 545.)

[c. 1590.—"Some soldiers are placed under the care and guidance of one commander. They are called Ahadi, because they are fit for a harmonious unity."—Ann. ed. Blochmann, i. 231.

[c. 1625.—"The day after, one of the King's Haddys finding the same."—Corynt, in Purchas, i. 600.]

HADGEE, s. Ar. Ḥajj, a pilgrim to Mecca; from hajj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Hajji and Haji used colloquially in Persian and Turkish. Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "There is current confusion about the word hajj. It is originally the participle of hajj, 'he went on the hajj.' But in modern use hajij is used as part., and hajj is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say 'el-Hajje Soleimān,' or the like. The incorrect form Hajji is however used by Turks and Persians."

[1609.—"Upon your order, if Hoghee Careen so please, I purpose to deliver him 25 pigs of lead."—Dancers, Letters, i. 20.

[c. 1610.—"Those who have been to Arabia . . . are called Agy."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 165.

[c. 1665.—"Avreag-Zebe once observed perhaps by way of joke, that Sultan Sepah was become at last an Agy or pilgrim."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 113.

[1683.—"Hodges Sophee Caun." See under FIRMAUN.]

1765.—"Hodgee acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Hodge (or the tomb of Mahommed at Mecca)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.

[c. 1833.—"The very word in Hebrew Klog, which means 'festival,' originally meant 'pilgrimage,' and corresponds with what the Arabs call hatch. . . ."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 155.]

HĀKIM, s. H. from Ar. hākim, 'a judge, a ruler, a master'; 'the authority.' The same Ar. root hakm, 'bridling, restraining, judging,' supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz. Hakim (as here); Halim (see HUCKEEM); Hukm (see HOOK-UD); Hikmat (see HICKMAT).

[1611.—"Not standing with his greatness to answer every Haccam, which is as a Governor or petty King."—Dancers, Letters, i. 165. In ibid. i. 175, Hackum is used in the same way.]

c. 1861.—

"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed—

I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first I boiled the seed. . . ."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

HALĀLCORE, s. Lit. Ar.—P. halāl-khor, 'one who eats what is lawful,' [halāl being the technical Mahomedan phrase for the slaying of an animal to be used for food according to the proper ritual], applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, implying 'to whom all is lawful food.'

Generally used as synonymous with bungy (q.v.). [According to Prof. Blochmann, "Halālkhār, i.e. one who eats that which the ceremonial law allows, is a euphemism for hārdmkhār, one who eats forbidden things, as pork, &c. The word halālkhār is still in use among educated Muhammadans; but it is doubtful whether (as stated in the Āin) it was Akbar's invention." (Āin, i. 130 note.)]

1623.—"Schiah Selim nel principio . . . si sdegnò tanto, che poco mancò che per dispetto non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della razza che chiamano halal chor, quasi dica 'mangia lecito,' cioè che ha per lecito di mangiare ogni cosa. . . ." (See other quotation under HAREN).—P. della Valle, ii. 525; [Hak. Soc. i. 53].

1638.—". . . sont obligez de se purifier depuis la teste jusqu'aux pieds si quelqu'un de ces gens qu'ils appellent Alehores, leur a touché."—Andréole, Paris, 1659, 219.

1695.—"Ceux qui ne parlent que Persan dans les Indes, les appellent Halalcour, c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plaît, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qu'il a légitimement gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'autrefois Halalcours s'appellent Haramours, mangours de viande défendue."—Therouel, v. 190.

1673.—"That they should be accounted the Offence of the People, and as base as the Holencores (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating anything)."—Fryer, 28; [and see under BOY, b].

1690.—"The Halalchors . . . are another Sort of Indians at Surat, the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Orington, 382.

1763.—"And now I must mention the Hallachores, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unhappy wretches, destined to misery from their birth. . . ."—Reflections, &c., by Luke Scrivston, Esq., 7-8. It was probably in this passage that Burns (see below) picked up the word.

1783.—"That no Hollocore, Derrah, or Chaudah caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoos in the streets."—Mahratta Proclamation at Burach, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 252.

1786.—"When all my schoolfellows and youthful compeers (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gentoos phrase, the hallachores of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of a busy life, I was standing idle in the market-place."—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 63.

1788.—The Indian Vocabulary also gives Hallachore.

1810.—"For the meaner officers we have a Hallalcor or Chundola (one of the most wretched Pariahs)."—Maria Graham, 31.

HALÁLLOUR. V. used in the imperative for infinitive, as is common in the Anglo-Indian use of H. verbs, being Ar.—H. halál-kar, 'make lawful,' i.e. put (an animal) to death in the manner prescribed to Mahomedans, when it is to be used for food.

[1855.—"Before breakfast I bought a moderately sized sheep for a dollar. Shaykh Hamid 'halaled' (butchered) it according to rule. . . ."—Burton, Pilgrimage, ed. 1883, i. 255.]

1883.—"The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted. . . I have only . . . to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and dividing the webs of its feet."—Tribes on My Frontier, 167.

HALF-CASTE. s. A person of mixed European and Indian blood. (See MUSTEES; EURASIAN.)

1789.—"Mulattoes, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-caste."—Munro's Narrative, 51.

1793.—"They (the Mahratta Infantry) are commanded by half-cast people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of antiquated lace bestowed on their own."—Dixon, Narrative, ii.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentia, i. 329.

1828.—"An invalid sergeant . . . came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1876.—"Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts of Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fechter makes him a half-caste."—G. H. Lewis, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

HANGER. s. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch ichinger, Old Eng. ichingard, Fr. cangiar, &c., other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab. khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cunjur) is the Indian form. [According to the N.E.D. though 'hanger' has sometimes been employed to translate khanjar (probably with a notion of etymological identity) there is no connection between the words.] The khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve. [See drawings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. X. Nos. 504, 503, &c.]

1574.—"Patrick Spreull . . . being perswaid be Johnne Boill Chepman . . . in invading of him, and stryking him with ano quhinger . . . through the quhilk the said Johnne nei wes woundit to the effusion of his blinde."—Lets. from Record of the Burgh of Glasgow (1876), p. 2.

1601.—"The other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremptory beautiful and gentlemanlike. . . ."—J. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 4.

1681.—"The Souldiers do not wear Hangers or Scimitars like the Persians, but broad Swords like the Switzers. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 65; [ed. Ball, i. 157].

1712.—"His Excy . . . was presented by the Emperor with a Hindoostany Candjer, or dagger, set with fine stones."—Valentin, iv. (Suratte), 286.

1781.—"I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 56.

"Lost out of a buggy on the Road between Barnagur and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."—Hicky's Denyal Gazette, June 30.

1883.—". . . by farrashes, the carpet-spreader class, a large canjar, or curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as a badge of office."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

HANSALERI, s. Table-servant's Hind. for 'horse-radish'! "A curious corruption, and apparently influenced by saleri, 'celery'"; (Mr. M. L. Dames, in Panjab N. and Q. ii. 184).

HANSIL, s. A hawser, from the English (Roebeck).

HANSPEEK, USPUCK, &c., s. Sea Hind. Aspak. A handspike, from the English.

HARAKIRI, s. This, the native name of the Japanese rite of suicide committed as a point of honour or substitute for judicial execution, has long been interpreted as "happy despatch," but what the origin of this curious error is we do not know. [The N.E.D. s.v. dispatch, says that it is humorous.] The real meaning is realistic in the extreme, viz., hara, 'belly,' kiri, 'to cut.'

[1593.—"And it is often seene that they rip their own bellies open."—Linschoten, Itak. Soc. i. 163.

1616.—"Here we had news how Gaba Same was to passe this way to morrow to goe to a church near Misco, called Coyo; som say to cut his bellie, others say to be shaved a prist and to remean theare the rest of his daies."—Cocks's Diary, i. 161.

1617.—"The King demanded 800 taits from Shooque Dono, or else to cut his belly, whee, not having it to pay, did it."—Ibid. 337, see also ii. 202.

[1874.—See the elaborate account of the rite in Milford, Tales of Old Japan, 2nd ed. 329 seqq. For a similar custom among the Karens, see M'Mahon, Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 201.]

HARAMZADA, s. A scoundrel; literally 'misbegotten'; a common term of abuse. It is Ar.—P. hardm-zada, 'son of the unlawful.' Harām is from a root signifying sacer (see under HAREM), and which appears as Hebrew in the sense of 'devoting to destruction,' and of 'a ban.' Thus in Numbers xxi. 3: "They utterly destroyed them and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah." [See Encycl. Bibl. i. 468; ii. 2110.]

[1857.—"I am no advocate for slaying Shakhzadas or any such-like Haramzadas without trial."—Boscworth Smith, L. of Ind. Lawrence, ii. 251.]

HAREM, s. Ar. haram, harīm, i.e. sacer, applied to the women of the family and their apartment. This word is not now commonly used in India, zenana (q.v.) being the common word for 'the women of the family,' or their apartments.

1623.—"Non so como scial Selim olho notizia di loi o s'innamorò. Vollo condurla nol suo haram o gynaceo, o tenerla quivi appresso di ed como una dello altro concubine; ma questa donna (Nurmah) cho era sopra modo astuta . . . riuscì."—P. della Valle, ii. 525; [Itak. Soc. i. 53].

1630.—"This Duke hero and in other seralios (or Harams as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines."—Herbert, 139.

1676.—"In the midst of the large Gallery is a Nish in the Wall, into which the King descends out of his Haram by a private pair of Stairs."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 40; [ed. Bull. i. 101].

1726.—"On the Ganges also lies a noble fortress, with the Palace of the old Emperor of Hindostan, with his Hharam or women's apartment. . . ."—Valentin, v. 169.

[1727.—"The King . . . took his Wife into his own Harran or Seraglio. . . ."—J. Hamilton, ed. 1711, i. 171.

[1812.—"Adjoining to the Chel Sitoon is the Harem; the term in Persia is applied to the establishments of the great, zenana is confined to those of inferior people."—Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 166.]

HARRY, s. This word is quite obsolete. Wilson gives Harī as Beng. 'A servant of the lowest class, a sweeper.' [The word means 'a collector of bones,' Skt. hadda, 'a bone'; for the caste, see Risley, Tribes of Bengal, i. 314 seqq.] M.-Gen. Keatinge remarks that they are the goldsmiths of Assam; they are village watchmen in Bengal. (See under PYKE.) In two of the quotations below, Harry is applied to a roman, in one case employed to carry water. A female servant of this description is not now known among English families in Bengal.

HATTY, s. Hind. hath, the most common word for an elephant; from Skt. hate, 'the hand,' and hath, 'the elephant,' come the Hind. words hath and hathi, with the same meaning. The analogy of the elephant's trunk to the hand presents itself to Piny.

"Maadant ero, aghant et bant et a-antique I and inprogre apposty manu" —vol. 10

and to Tennyson:

" . . . eat elephants

To make her smile, her golden ankle bells."
Melina and Fines.

c. 1823.—"As for the animals peculiar to Hindustan, one is the elephant, as the Hindustanis call it Hathi, which inhabits the district of Kaly, the more do the wild elephants increase in number. That is the tract in which the elephant is chiefly taken."—Dalry, 315. This notice of Dalry's shows how remarkably things have changed. No elephants now exist anywhere near the region indicated. [On elephants in Hindustan, see Hindostan's Atlas, i. 615.]

[1825.—"You are of course aware that we usually call elephants Hotties, a name that might be easily applied to every other animal in India, but I suppose the elephants lost the first choice of names and took the next agreeable."—Miss Edm. P. B. Clarke, i. 256.]

HATTYCHOOK, s. Hind. hath, plant, servant's and gardeners' Hindi for the globe artichoke; [the Jerusalem artichoke is hathichok] This is worth producing, because our word (artichoke) is itself the corruption of an Oriental word that curled back to the East in a multiplied form.

a Hind. hath, (the hand, but forearm, and thence) 'a cubit,' from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; a measure of 18 inches, and sometimes more.

[1815.—"The Hath is a large market day (festival) when the buyers and sellers assemble, a meeting in a open place, but in general in market places."—Wood, Hindostan, i. 151.]

HAVILDAR, s. Hind. havladdar.

A copy, non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a serjeant, and wearing the chevrons of a serjeant. The dating from about the middle of the 18th century is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. havladdar, or havladdar, 'one holding an office of trust'; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Marhattas the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in Eastern Bengal the term was, and perhaps still is, applied to the holder of a hawalla, an intermediate tenure between those of zemindar and ryot.

1672.—Regarding the Cowle obtained from the Nabob of Golcondah for the Fort and Town of Chinapatnam. 11,000 Pagodas to be paid in full of all demands for the past, and in future Pagodas 1200 per annum rent, "and so to hold the Fort and Town free from any Avildar or Divan's People, or any other imposition for ever."—Fort St. George Consol., April 11, in Notes and Exts., No. 1. 25.

1673.—"We landed at about Nine in the Morning, and were civilly treated by the Customer in his Choultry, till the Havildar could be acquainted of my arrival."—Fryer, 123.

1821.—"Curcom Musseeh was, I believe, a havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a not unpleasant vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist."—Heber, i. 149.

HAVIDLAR'S GUARD, s. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

HAZREE, s. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. [The earlier sense was religious, as below.] It is properly haziri, 'muster,' from the Ar. hazir, 'ready or present.' (See CHOTA-HAZRY.)

[1832.—"The Sheeah prepare hazree (breakfast) in the name of his holiness Abba's Allee Ullum-burda, Hovein's step-brother; i.e. they cook polao, roti, curries, &c., and distribute them."—Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 183.]

HENDRY KENDRY, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolāba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khaneri; in the Admy. chart they are Oonari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hundry, Ondera, Hunarcy, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundry, Cunarey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Underi and Khanderi. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of the 19th century. Khanderi passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Underi lapsed in 1840. (Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Records, 83), describing the "Consultations" of 1679, writes: "At page 60, notice of 'Savages' fortifying 'Hendry Kendry,' the twin islets, now called Henery (i.e. Pondari, 'Mouse-like,' Kenery (i.e. Khandari), i.e. 'Sacred to Khandaroo.' The former is thus derived from Skt. undaru, unduru, 'a rat'; the latter from Mahr. Khandarēr, 'Lord of the Sword,' a form of Siva.)

1673.—"These islands are in number seven; viz. Bombaim, Canoren, Trumbay, Elephanta, the Pulachora, Munchurchay, and Keranjau, with the Rock of Hony Kenry. . . ."—Fryer, 61.

1681.—"Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hondry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often inculcate to you our aversion thereto."—Court of Directors to Surat, quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727.—"... four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands Undra, and Cundra. The first has a Fortress belonging to the Sader, and the other is fortified by the Srajee, and is now in the Hands of Connajeer Angria."—J. Humblot, i. 213; [ed. 1711].

c. 1760.—"At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Henara and Canara. . . These were formerly in the hands of Angrin, and the Sadder, or Moors, which last have long been dispossessed of them."—Groar, i. 58.

HERBED, s. A Parsee priest, not specially engaged in priestly duties. Pers. hirbad, from Pahlavi ahrpat.

HICKMAT, s. Ar.—H. hikmat; an ingenious device or contrivance. (See under HAKIM.)

1838.—"The house has been roofed in, and my relative has come up from Meerut, to have the states put on after some peculiar hikmat of his own."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 210.

HIDGELEE, n.p. The tract so called was under native rule a challa, or district, of Orissa, and under our rule formerly a zilla of Bengal; but now it is a part of the Midnapur Zilla, of which it constitutes the S.E. portion, viz. the low coast lands on the west side of the Hoogly estuary, and below the junction of the Rupaiaayan. The name is properly Hijili; but it has gone through many strange phases in European records.

1533.—"The first of these rivers (from the E. side of the Ghauts) rises from two sources to the east of Chaul, about 15 leagues distant, and in an altitude of 18 to 19 degrees. The river from the most northerly of these sources is called Crona, and the more southerly Bakera, and when they combine they are called Gangri, and this river discharges into the illustrious stream of the Ganges between the two places called Angell and Picholda in about 22 degrees."—Burrow, i. ix. 1.

1586.—"An haven which is called Angell in the Country of Oriza."—Pitch, in Hall, ii. 389.

1686.—"Chanch, on the 15th December (1686) . . . burned and destroyed all the magazines of salt, and granaries of rice, which he found in the way between Hughley and the island of Ingelee."—Orise (reprint), ii. 12.

1726.—"Hingeli."—Valentyn, v. 153.

1727.—" . . . inhabited by Fishery, as are also Ingellee and Kidgerie (see KEDGE-REE), two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, i. 275, [ed. 1711, ii. 2].

1758.—In apprehension of a French Fleet the Select Committee at Fort William recommend: "That the pagoda at Ingellee should be washed black, the great tree at the place cut down, and the moys removed."—In Long, 153.

1781.—"Ships laying at Kedgerree. Ingellee, or any other parts of the great river."—In Stan-karr, i. 37.

HILSA, s. Hind. hilat, Skt. ilisa, ilisa; a rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Clupea ilisha, Day), called in books the 'sable-fish' (a name, from the Port. savel, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus pulla (galla). The large shad which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hilsa, but not so rich. The hilsa is a son-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Delhi on the Jumna, as high as Mandalay on the Irrawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which it seems to be excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of palla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on the Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Acct. of Bombay Fisheries, 1843).

1539.—" . . . A little Island, called Apo-fagua (Apo-Fragos) . . . inhabited by poor people who live by the fishing of peixes (poisson de la poisson des savelles)."—Pinto (orig. cap. xviii.), Cogez, p. 22.

1810.—"The hilsah (or sable-fish) seems to be midway between a prickel and a salmon."—Williamson, v. M. ii. 151-5.

1813.—Forbes calls it the sal or sal-sal fish, and says "It a little resembles the European fish (salmon) from which it is name'd."—O. Merri, i. 53; [2nd ed. i. 53].

1821.—"The fishery, we were told by these people, was of the 'Hilsa' or 'Sable-fish.'"—Herd, ed. 1811, i. 81.

HIMALAYA, n.p. This is the common pronunciation of the name of the great range

"Where snowy ridges the roving Tartar bounds," properly Himadaya, 'the Abode of Snow'; also called Himavat, 'the Snowy'; Himageri and Himadula; Himudri, Himadita, &c. from various forms of which the ancients made Imaus, Emodus, &c. Pliny had got somewhere the true meaning of the name: " . . . a montibus Hemodis, quorum promontorium Imaus vocatur nivosum significante . . ." (vi. 17). We do not know how far back the use of the modern name is to be found. [The references in early Hindu literature are collected by Atkinson (Hima- ayan Gazetteer, ii. 273 seqq.)] We do not find it in Baber, who gives Siwalak as the Indian name of the mountains (see SIWALIK). The oldest occurrence we know of is in the Āin, which gives in the Geographical Tables, under the Third Climate, Koh-i-Himālah (orig. ii. 36); [ed. Jarrett, iii. 69]. This is disguised in Gladwin's version by a wrong reading into Kerdehmalch (ed. 1800, ii. 367).^{*} This form (Himmaleh) is used by Major Rennell, but hardly as if it was yet a familiar term. In Elphinstone's Letters Himāleh or some other spelling of that form is always used (see below). When we get to Bishop Heber we find Himalaya, the established English form.

1822.—"What pleases me most is the contrast between your present enjoyment, and your former sickness and dependency. Depend upon it England will turn out as well as Hemmaleh."—Elphinstone to Major Close, in Life, ii. 139; see also i. 336, where it is written Himāleh.

HINDEE, s. This is the Pers. adjective form from Hind, 'India,' and illustration of its use for a native of India will be found under HINDOO. By Europeans it is most commonly used for those dialects of Hindustani speech which are less modified by P. vocables than the usual Hindustani, and which are spoken by the rural population of the N.W. Provinces and its outskirts. The earliest literary work in Hindi is the great poem of Chand Bardai (c. 1200), which records the deeds of Prithvirāja, the last Hindu sovereign of Delhi. [On this literature see Dr. G. A. Grierson, The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustan, in J.A.S.B. Part I., 1888.] The term Hinduī appears to have been formerly used, in the Madras Presidency, for the Marāṭhī language. (See a note in Sir A. Arbuthnot's ed. of Munro's Minutes, i. 133.)

^{*} Hemāchal and Hemāhūt also occur in the Āin (see Gladwin, ii. 342, 343; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 30, 31]). Karāchal is the name used by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century, and by Al-Birūnī 200 years earlier. 17th century writers often call the Himālaya the "Mountains of Naggur-Cote" (q.v.). [Mr. Tassery writes: "We have in Rig Veda (x. 121) imhīmānta jaratāh, 'these snowy mountains,' spoken of as abiding by the might of Prajāpati. In the Bhagavadgītā, an episode of the Mahābhārata, Krishna says that he is 'the Himālaya among stable things,' and the word Himālaya is found in the Kumāra Sambhava of Kālidāsa, about the date of which opinions differ. Perhaps the Greek Ἰμαρος is hīmārent; ἱμῶδες, hīmōdri."]

HINDKĪ, HINDEKĪ, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

[1812.—"The inhabitants of Peshawar are of Indian origin, but speak Pushtoo as well as Hindkee."—Elphinstone, Cambul, i. 74.]

HINDOO, n.p. P. Hindū. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahommedan conquerors (see under INDIA). The word in this form is Persian; Hindī is that used in Arabic, c.g.

c. 910.—"An inhabitant of Mansūra in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city . . . had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindī aw Sindī)."—Maṣ'ūdī, vi. 261.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindū and Hindī:

c. 1290.—"Whatever live Hindū fell into the King's hands was pounded into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musal-māns, who were Hindīs (country born), had their lives spared."—Amir Khosrū, in Āinot, iii. 539.

1563.—" . . . moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentooes, they ask in these words: 'Art thou Mosalmān or Indū?'"—Garcia, i. 1376.

Hindu is often used on the Peshawar frontier as synonymous with bunya (see under BANYAN). A soldier (of the tribes) will say: 'I am going to the Hindu,' i.e. to the bunya of the company.

HINDOO KOOSH, n.p. Hindū-Kāsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and recrossed it somewhere not far from the longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known; [the most plausible explanation is perhaps that it is a corruption of Indicus Caucasus]. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is factitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

c. 1371.—"Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindû-Kûsh, i.e. 'the Hindu-Killer,' because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die in the passage of this mountain, owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 81.

1501.—"The country of Kâbul is very strong, and of difficult access. . . . Between Balkh, Kunder, and Badakshân on the one side, and Kâbul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindû-Kûsh, the passes over which are seven in number."—Baber, p. 139.

1518.—"From this place marched, and entered the mountains called Hindû-Kush."—Mem. of Emp. Humayun, 89.

"It was therefore determined to invade Badakshân. . . . The Emperor, passing over the heel of the Hindû-Kush, encamped at Shergardu."—Tabakhat-i-Albani, in Elliot, v. 223.

1753.—"Les montagnes qui donnent naissance à l'Indus, et à plusieurs de ses rivières qu'il reçoit, se nomment Hendon Kesh, et c'est l'histoire de Timur qui m'instruit de cette denomination. Elle est composée du nom d'Hindou ou Hind, qui désigne l'Inde . . . et de kush ou kesh . . . que je remarque être propre à diverses montagnes."—D'Ancill's, p. 16.

1783.—"The term Hindoo-Kho, or Hindoo-Kush, is not applied to the ridge throughout its full extent; but seems confined to that part of it which forms the N.W. boundary of Cabul; and this is the INDIAN CAUCASUS of Alexander."—Rennell, Mem. 3rd ed. 160.

1817.—" . . . those Who dwell beyond the everlasting snows Of Hindoo Koosh, in stormy freedom bred."—Molanna.

HINDOSTAN, n.p. Pers. Hindû-stân, (a) 'The country of the Hindûs,' India. In modern native parlance this word indicates distinctively (b) India north of the Nerbudda, and exclusive of Bengal and Behar. The latter provinces are regarded as parb (see POORUB), and all south of the Nerbudda as Dakhan (see DECCAN). But the word is used in older Mahom-edan authors just as it is used in English school-books and atlases, viz. as (a) the equivalent of India Proper. Thus Baber says of Hindustân: "On the East, the South, and the West it is bounded by the Ocean" (310).

1553.—" . . . and so the Persian nation adjacent to it give it as at present its proper name that of Indostân."—Baber, I. iv. 7.

1567.—" . . . and common usage in Persia, and Choragone, and Arakla, and Turkey, calls this country Industam . . . for indam is as much as to say 'region,' and istam 'India.'"—Garcia, f. 137b.

1663.—"And thus it came to pass that the Persians called it Indostan."—Faria y Sonar, i. 33.

1665.—"La dernière parti est la plus connue: c'est celle que l'on appelle Indostan, et dont les bornes naturelles au Couchant et au Levant, sont le Gange et l'Indus."—Therriot, v. 9.

1672.—"It has been from old time divided into two parts, i.e. the Eastern, which is India beyond the Gange, and the Western India within the Ganges, now called Indostan."—Babbar, 1.

1770.—"By Indostan is properly meant a country lying between two celebrated rivers, the Indus and the Ganges. . . . A ridge of mountains runs across this long tract from north to south, and dividing it into two equal parts, extends as far as Cape Comorin."—Haynal (tr.), i. 31.

1783.—"In Malabar Indostan is called Seeger Telings."—Forsk., 1. to Mergui, 82.

1803.—"I feared that the dawk direct through Hindostan would have been stopped."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 209.

1821.—"One of my servants called out to them,—"Aha! dandee folk, take care! You are now in Hindostan! The people of this country know well how to fight, and are not afraid."—Heber, i. 121. See also pp. 268, 269.

In the following stanza of the good bishop's the application is apparently the same; but the accentuation is ex-cruciating—"Hindostan," as if rhyming to 'Boston.'

1821.—

"Then on! then on! where duty leads,
My course be onward still,
O'er broad Hindostan's sultry meads,
Or bleak Almora's hill."—Ibid. 113.

1831.—"It may be as well to state that Mr. H. G. Keene's forthcoming History of Hindustan . . . will be limited in its scope to the strict meaning of the word 'Hindustan'—India north of the Deccan."—Academy, April 26, p. 291.

HINDOSTANEE, s. Hindustānī, properly an adjective, but used substantively in two senses, viz. (a) a native of Hindustān, and (b) (Hindūstānī zabān) 'the language of that country,' but in fact the language of the Mahommedans of Upper India, and eventually of the Mahommedans of the Deccan, developed out of the Hindi dialect of the Doab chiefly, and of the territory round Agra and Delhi, with a mixture of Persian vocables and phrases, and a readiness to adopt other foreign words. It is also called Oordoo, i.e. the language of the Urdū ('Horde') or Camp. This language was for a long time a kind of Mahommedan lingua franca over all India, and still possesses that character over a large part of the country, and among certain classes. Even in Madras, where it least prevails, it is still recognised in native regiments as the language of intercourse between officers and men. Old-fashioned Anglo-Indians used to call it the Moors (q.v.).

1616.—"After this he (Tom Coryate) got a great mastery in the Indostan, or more vulgar language; there was a woman, a landress, belonging to my Lord Embassador's house, who had such a freedom and liberty of speech, that she would sometimes scould, brawl, and rail from the sun-rising to the sun-set; one day he undertook her in her own language. And by eight of the clock he so silenced her, that she had not one word more to speak."—Terry, Extracts relating to T. C.

1673.—"The Language at Court is Persian, that commonly spoke is Indostan (for which they have no proper Character, the written Language being called Banyan), which is a mixture of Persian and Sclavonian, as are all the dialects of India."—Fryer, 201. This intelligent traveller's reference to Sclavonian is remarkable, and shows a notable perspicacity, which would have delighted the late Lord Strangford, had he noticed the passage.

1677.—In Court's letter of 12th Dec. to Ft. St. Geo. they renew the offer of a reward of £20, for proficiency in the Gentoo or Indostan languages, and sanction a reward of £10 each for proficiency in the Persian language, "and that fit persons to teach the said language be entertained."—Notes and Eccts., No. i. 22.

1685.—" . . . so applied myself to a Portuguese mariner who spoke Indostan (ye current language of all these Islands)" [Maldives].—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 191].

1697.—"Questions addressed to Khodja Movaad, Ambassador from Abyssinia."

4.—"What language he, in his audience made use of!"

"The Hindustani language (Hindoestanee taal), which the late Hon. Paulus de Roo, then Secretary of their Excellencies the High Government of Batavia, interpreted."—Valentijn, iv. 327.

[1699.—"He is expert in the Hindorstand or Moores Language."—In Fule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxvii.]

1726.—"The language here is Hindustans or Moors (so 'tis called there), though he who can't speak any Arabic and Persian passes for an ignoramus."—Valentijn, Chor. i. 37.

1727.—"This Persian . . . and I, were discoursing one Day of my Affairs in the Industan Language, which is the established Language spoken in the Mogul's large Dominions."—A. Hamilton, ii. 183; [ed. 1744, ii. 182]

1745.—"Benjamini Schulzii Missionarii Evangelici, Grammatica Hindostanica . . . Edidit, et de suscipienda barbaricarum linguarum culturâ præfatus est D. Jo. Henr. Callenberg, Halæ Saxoniæ."—Title from Catalogue of M. Garcin de Tassy's Books, 1879. This is the earliest we have heard of.

1763.—"Two of the Council of Pondicherry went to the camp, one of them was well versed in the Indostan and Persic languages, which are the only tongues used in the Courts of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, i. 144 (ed. 1803).

1772.—"Manuscripts have indeed been handed about, ill spelt, with a confused mixture of Persian, Indostane, and Bengals."—Preface to Hadley's Grammar, xi. (See under MOORS.)

1777.—"Alphabetum Brammanicum seu Indostanum."—Romæ.

1778.—"Grammatica Indostana—A mais Vulgar—Quo se practica no Imperio do gram Mogol—Offeroide—Aos murtos Reverendos—Padres Missionarios—Do dito Imperio. Em Roma MDCCLXXVIII.—Na Estamperia da Sagrada Congregação—de Propaganda Fide."—(Title transcribed.) There is a reprint of this (apparently) of 1865, in the Catalogue of Garcin de Tassy's books.

c. 1830.—"Cet ignoble patois d'Hindoustani, qui ne servira jamais à rien quand je serai retourné en Europe, est difficile."—V. Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 95.

1844.—"Hd. Quarters, Kurrachee, 12th February, 1844. The Governor unfortunately does not understand Hindoostanee, nor Persian, nor Maharrati, nor any other eastern dialect. He therefore will feel particularly obliged to Collectors, sub-

Collectors, and officers writing the proceedings of Courts-Martial, and all Staff Officers, to indite their various papers in English, larded with as small a portion of the to him unknown tongues as they conveniently can, instead of those he generally receives—namely, papers written in Hindostanee larded with occasional words in English.

"Any Indent made for English Dictionaries shall be duly attended to, if such be in the stores at Kurrachee; if not, gentlemen who have forgotten the vulgar tongue are requested to procure the requisite assistance from England."—GG. OO., by Sir Charles Napier, 85.

HING, s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingū, Hind. hing, Dakh. hingū. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindu condiment, and is used also by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See POPPER-CAKE). This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty which sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Fluckiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthea Asafoetida (Ferula Narthea, Boiss.) and Scorodosma foetidum, Bunge; (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and drawn by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Lāristān (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellew has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the σάφρον or laserpitium of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaeschkei ana, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkistan. The hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 328 seqq.]

c. 645.—"This kingdom of Tsao-kü-teha (Tsiuküta?) has about 7000 li of compass,—the compass of the capital called Ho-si-na (Ghazna) is 30 li. . . . The soil is favourable to the plant Y'o-kün (Curcuma, or turmeric) and to that called Hing-kü."—Peterins Doudd., iii. 187.

1563.—"A Portuguese in Bisnagar had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of flatulency, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this ymgu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with ymgu, the King replied: 'Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods' (or, as the poets say, nectar). Whereupon the Portuguese made answer sotto voce and in Portuguese: 'Better call it the food of the devils!'"—Garcia, f. 21b. The Germans do worse than this Portuguese, for they call the drug Teufels druck, i.e. diaboli non edibus sed stercus!

1586.—"I went from Agra to Satagam (see CHITTAGONG) in Bengale in the companie of one hundred and four score Boates, laden with Salt, Opium, Hinge, Lead, Carpets, and divers other commodities down the River Jemena."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 386.

1611.—"In the Kingdom of Gujarat and Cambaya, the natives put in all their food Ingu, which is Asafoetida."—Teixeira, Relaciones, 29.

1631.—"... ut totas aedas foetore repleant, qui inusuetis vix tolerandus esset. Quod Javani et Malaii et caeteri Indiarum incolae negabant se quicquam odoratius naribus unquam percipisse. Apud hos Hin hic succus nominatur."—Jac. Pontii, lib. iv. p. 41.

1638.—"Le Hingh, que nos droguistes et apotecaires appellent Asa foetida, vient en plus part de Perse, mais celle que la Province d'Vitrad (?) produit dans les Indes est bien meilleur."—Mandelslo, 230.

1673.—"In this Country Asa Foetida is gathered at a place called Deecoon; some deliver it to be the Juice of a Cane or Reed insapissated; others, of a Tree wounded: It differs much from the stinking Stuff called Hing, it being of the Province of Carmania; this latter is that the Indians perfume themselves with, mixing it in all their Pulse, and make it up in Waters to correct the Windiness of their Food."—Fryer, 239.

1689.—"The Natives at Saratt are much taken with Asa Foetida, which they call Hin, and mix a little with the Cakes that they eat."—Orington, 397.

1712.—"... substantiam obtinet ponderoam, instar rapae solidam candidissimamque, plenam succi pinguis, albisimi, foetidissim, porraceo odore nares horridé ferientis; qui ex ea collectus, Persis Indisque Hingh, Europais Asa foetida appellatur."—Eng. Kæmpfer Amoen. Exotic. 637.

1726.—"Hing or Asa Foetida, otherwise called Devil's-dung (Duivelsdrek)."—Valentijn, iv. 146.

1857.—"Whilst riding in the plain to the N.E. of the city (Candahar) we noticed several assafœtida plants. The assafœtida, called hang or hing by the natives, grows wild in the sandy or gravelly plains that form the western part of Afghanistan. It is never cultivated, but its peculiar gum-resin is collected from the plants on the deserts where they grow. The produce is for the most part exported to Hindustan."—Bellw, Journal of a Pol. Mission, &c., p. 270.

HIRAVA, n.p. Malayâl. Iraya. The name of a very low caste in Malabar. [The Iraya form one section of the Cherumar, and are of slightly higher social standing than the Pulayar (see POLEA). "Their name is derived from the fact that they are allowed to come only as far as the eaves (ira) of their employers' houses." (Logan, Malabar, i. 148.)]

1510.—"La sexta sorte (do' Gentili) se chiamô Hirava, e questi seminano e racoglieno il riso."—Varthema (ed. 1517, f. 43v).

[HIRRAWEN, s. The Musulman pilgrim dress; a corruption of the Ar. ihram. Burton writes: "Al-Ihram, literally meaning 'prohibition' or 'making unlawful,' equivalent to our 'mortification,' is applied to the ceremony of the toilette, and also to the dress itself. The vulgar pronounce the word 'heram,' or 'vehram.' It is opposed to ihlal, 'making lawful,' or 'returning to laical life.' The further from Mecca it is assumed, provided that it be during the three months of Hajj, the greater is the religious merit of the pilgrim; consequently some come from India and Egypt in the dangerous attire" (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, ii. 138, note).

[1813. — ". . . the ceremonies and penances mentioned by Pitts, when the hajes, or pilgrims, enter into Hirrawen, a ceremony from which the females are exempted; but the men, taking off all their clothes, cover themselves with two hirrawens or large white wrappers. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 101, 2nd ed.]

HOBSON-JOBSON, s. A native festal excitement; a tamasha (see TUMASHA); but especially the Moharram ceremonies. This phrase may be taken as a typical one of the most highly assimilated class of Anglo-Indian argot, and we have ventured to borrow from it a concise alternative title for this Glossary. It is peculiar to the British soldier and his surroundings, with whom it probably originated, and with whom it is by no means obsolete, as we once supposed. My friend Major John Trotter tells me that he has repeatedly heard it used by British soldiers in the Punjab; and has heard it also from a regimental Moonshee. It is in fact an Anglo-Saxon version of the wailings of the Mahommedans as they beat their breasts in the procession of the Moharram—"Yâ Hasan! Yâ Hosain!" It is to be remembered that these observances are in India by no means confined to Shi'as. Except at Lucknow and Murshidâbâd, the great majority of Mahommedans in that country are professed Sunnis. Yet here is a statement of the facts from an unexceptionable authority:

"The commonalty of the Mussalmans, and especially the women, have more regard for the memory of Hasan and Hussein, than for that of Muhammad and his khalifs. The heresy of making Th'ziyas (see TAZEEA) on the anniversary of the two latter imams, is most common throughout India: so much so that opposition to it is ascribed by the ignorant to blasphemy. This example is followed by many of the Hindus, especially the Mahrattas. The Muharram is celebrated throughout the Dekhan and Malwa, with greater enthusiasm than in other parts of India. Grand preparations are made in every town on the occasion, as if for a festival of rejoicing, rather than of observing the rites of mourning, as they ought. The observance of this custom has so strong a hold on the mind of the commonalty of the Mussulmans that they believe Muhammadanism to depend merely on keeping the memory of the imams in the above manner."—Mir Shahâmat 'Ali, in J.R. As. Soc. xiii. 369.

We find no literary quotation to exemplify the phrase as it stands. [But see those from the Orient. Sporting Mag. and Nineteenth Century below.] Those which follow show it in the process of evolution:

1618.—". . . e particolarmente delle donne che, battendosi il petto e facendo gesti di grandissima compassione replicano spesso con gran dolore quegli ultimi versi di certi loro cantici: Vah Hussein! sciah Hussein!"—P. della Valle, i. 552.

c. 1630.—"Nine dayes they wander up and downe (pharing all that while neither head nor beard, nor seeming joyfull), incessantly calling out Hussan, Hussan! in a melancholy note, so long, so fiercely, that many can neither howle longer, nor for a month's space recover their voice."—Sir T. Herbert, 201.

c. 1665.—". . . ainsi j'eus tout le loisir dont j'eus besoin pour y voir celebrer la Fête de Hussein Fils d'Ally. . . . Les Mores du Golconde le celebrent avec encore beaucoup plus de folies qu'en Perse. . . d'autres font des dances en rond, tenant des Epées nues la pointe en haut, qu'ils touchent les unes contre les autres, en criant du toute leur force Hussein."—Theriot, v. 320.

1673.—"About this time the Moors solemnize the Exequies of Hossein Gossien, a time of ten days Mourning for two Unfortunate Champions of theirs."—Fryer, p. 108.

"On the Days of their Feasts and Jubilees, Gladiators were approved and licensed; but feeling afterwards the Evils that attended that Liberty, which was chiefly used in their Hossy Gossy, any private Grudge being then openly revenged: it never was forbid, but it passed into an Edict by the following King, that it should be lawful to Kill any found with Naked Swords in that Solemnity."—Ibid. 357.

1720.—"Under these promising circumstances the time came round for the Mussulman feast called Hossein Jossen. . . . better known as the Mohurram."—In Heller, ii. 317.

1726.—"In their month Moharram they have a season of mourning for the two brothers Hassan and Hussein. . . . They name this mourning-time in Arabic As'ur, or the 10 days; but the Hollanders call it Jaksom Baksom."—Valentyn, Choro, 107.

1763.—"It was the 14th of November, and the festival which commemorates the murder of the brothers Hassan and Hussein happened to fall out at this time."—Orme, i. 163.

[1773.—"The Moors likewise are not without their feasts and processions. . . . particularly of their Hassan Hassan. . . ."—Ives, 28.

[1829.—"Them paper boxes are purty looking concerns, but then the folks makes sich a noise, firing and troompeting and shouting Hobson Jobson, Hobson Jobson."—Oriental Sporting Mag., reprint 1873, i. 129.

1832.—". . . they kindle fires in these pits every evening during the festival; and the ignorant, old as well as young, amuse themselves in fencing across them with sticks or swords; or only in running and playing round them, calling out, Ya Allah! Ya Allah! . . . Shah Hussan! Shah Hussan! . . . Shah Hosein! Shah Hosein! . . . Doolha! Doolha! (bridegroom! . . .); Haredo! Haredo! (alas, friend! . . .); Ruhro! Ruhro! (Stay! Stay!). Every two of these words are repeated probably a hundred times over as loud as they can bawl out."—Jaffier Shereef, Qanoon-e-Islam, tr. by Hertford, p. 173.

[1902.—"The Hobson-Jobson." By Nicolas Goodrich-Freer, in The Nineteenth Century and After, April 1902.]

HODGETT, s. This is used among the English in Turkey and Egypt for a title-deed of land. It is Arabic hujjat, 'evidence.' Hajat, perhaps a corruption of the same word, is used in Western India for an account current between landlord and tenant. [Molesworth, Mahr. Dict., gives "Hujjat, Ar., a Government acknowledgment or receipt."]

[1871.—". . . the Kadso attends, and writes a document (hogget-el-lahr) to attest the fact of the river's having risen to the height sufficient for the opening of the Canal. . . ."—Lane, Mod. Egypt, 5th ed. ii. 233.]

[1895.—"Between the tree-stems he heard a hog-bear digging hard in the moist warm earth."—R. Kipling, The Jungle Book, 171.]

HOG-DEER, s. The Anglo-Indian popular name of the Axis porcinus, Jerd.; [Cervus porcinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 519)], the Pard of Hindustan. The name is nearly the same as that which Coymas (c. 545) applies to an animal (Χοιροδελος) which he draws (see under BABI-ROUSSA), but the two have no other relation. The Hog-deer is abundant in the grassy openings of forests throughout the Gangetic valley and further east. "It runs with its head low, and in a somewhat ungainly manner; hence its popular appellation."—Jerdon, Mammals, 263.

[1885.—"Two hog-deer were brought forward, very curious-shaped animals that I had never seen before."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 146.]

HOG-PLUM, s. The austere fruit of the amra (Hind.), Spondias mangifera, Pers. (Ord. Tercbinthaceae), is sometimes so called; also called the wild mango. It is used in curries, pickles, and tarts. It is a native of various parts of India, and is cultivated in many tropical climates.

1852.—"The Karens have a tradition that in those golden days when God dwelt with men, all nations came before him on a certain day, each with an offering from the fruits of their lands, and the Karens selected the hog's plum for this oblation; which gave such offence that God cursed the Karen nation and placed it lowest. . . ."—Mason's Burma, ed. 1860, p. 461.

HOKCHEW, HOKSIEU, AU-OHEO, etc., n.p. These are forms which the names of the great Chinese port of Fuh-chau, the capital of Fuh-kien, takes in many old works. They, in fact, imitate the pronunciation in the Fuh-kien dialect, which is Hok-chiu; Fuh-kien similarly being called Hoh-kien.

1535.—"After they had travelled more than halfe a league in the suburbs of the citie of Aucheo, they met with a post that came from the vizroy."—Mendoza, ii. 78.

1616.—"Also this day arrived a small China bark or soma from Hochchew, laden with silk and stufes."—Cocks, i. 219.

HOME. In Anglo-Indian and colonial speech this means England.

1837.—"Home always means England; nobody calls India home—not even those who have been here thirty years or more, and are never likely to return to Europe."—Letters from Madras, 92.

1865.—"You may perhaps remember how often in times past we debated, with a seriousness becoming the gravity of the subject, what article of food we should each of us respectively indulge in, on our first arrival at home."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 154.

So also in the West Indies :

c. 1830.—". . . 'Oh, your cousin Mary, I forgot—fine girl, Tom—may do for you at home yonder' [all Creoles speak of England as home, although they may never have seen it]."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 238.

HONG, s. The Chinese word is hang, meaning 'a row or rank'; a house of business; at Canton a warehouse, a factory, and particularly applied to the establishments of the European nations ("Foreign Hongs"), and to those of the so-called "Hong-Merchants." These were a body of merchants who had the monopoly of trade with foreigners, in return for which privilege they became security for the good behaviour of the foreigners, and for their payment of dues. The guild of these merchants was called 'The Hong.' The monopoly seems to have been first established about 1720-30, and it was terminated under the Treaty of Nanking, in 1842. The Hong merchants are of course not mentioned in Lockyer (1711), nor by A. Hamilton (in China previous to and after 1700, pubd. 1727). The latter uses the word, however, and the rudiments of the institution may be traced not only in this narrative, but in that of Ibn Batuta.

c. 1346.—"When a Musulman trader arrives in a Chinese city, he is allowed to choose whether he will take up his quarters with one of the merchants of his own faith settled in the country, or will go to an inn. If he prefers to go and lodge with a merchant, they count all his money and confide it to the merchant of his choice; the latter then takes charge of all expenditure on account of the stranger's wants, but acts with perfect integrity. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265-6.

1727.—"When I arrived at Canton the Hapoa (see HOPPO) ordered me lodgings for myself, my Men, and Cargo, in (a) Haung or Inn belonging to one of his Merchants . . . and when I went abroad, I had always some Servants belonging to the Haung to follow me at a Distance."—A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744].

1782.—". . . L'Opron (see HOPPO) . . . s'embarque en grande cerémonie dans un galéro paroisé, emmenant ordinairement avec lui trois ou quatre Hanistes."—Sonnerat, ii. 236.

" . . . Les loges Européennes s'appellent hams."—Ibid. 245.

1783.—"It is stated indeed that a monopolizing Company in Canton, called the Cohong, had reduced commerce there to a desperate state."—Report of Com. on Affairs of India, Burke, vi. 461.

1797.—"A Society of Hong, or united merchants, who are answerable for one another, both to the Government and the foreign nations."—Sir G. Staunton, Embassy to China, ii. 565.

1882.—"The Hong merchants (collectively the Co-hong) of a body corporate, date from 1720."—The Panksee at Canton, p. 31.

Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong. [Mr. G. T. Gardner confirms this explanation, and writes: "The term used in Canton itself is invariable: 'The Thirteen Hong,' or 'The Thirteen Firms'; and as these thirteen firms formed an association that had at one time the monopoly of the foreign trade, and as they were collectively responsible to the Chinese Government for the conduct of the trade, and to the foreign merchants for goods supplied to any one of the firms, some collective expression was required to denote the co-operation of the Thirteen Firms, and the word Cohang, I presume, was found most expressive."]

HONG-BOAT, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. "A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically 'vessel,' and hang is perhaps used in the sense of 'plying regularly.' Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hong-boat to those used by our countrymen at Canton" (Note by Bp. Moule).

[1878.—"The Koong-Sze Teng, or Hong-Mee-Teng, or hong boats are from thirty to forty feet in length, and are somewhat like the gondolas of Venice. They are in many instances carved and gilded, and the saloon is so spacious as to afford sitting room for eight or ten persons. Aft the saloon there is a cabin for the boatmen. The boats are propelled by a large scull, which works on a pivot made fast in the stern post."—Gray, China, ii. 273.]

HONG KONG, n.p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hiang-kiang, 'fragrant waterway' (Bp. Moule).

HONORE, ONORE, n.p. Hondrar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). [A place of the same name in the Bellary District is said to be Can. Honnāru, honnū, 'gold,' āru, 'village.'] Vincent has supposed it to be the Nôropa of the Periplus, "the first part of the pepper-country Διουπύχη,"—for which read Διουπύχη, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 6000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Nôropa must have been Cannanore, or Pudopatana, a little south of the last. [The Madras Gloss. explains Nôropa as the country of the Nairs.] The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tippee, in 1783-1784, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109 seq.; [2nd ed. ii. 455 seq.].)

c. 1343.—"Next day we arrived at the city of Hinnar, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinnar are beautiful and chaste . . . they all know the Kurān al-'Asm by heart. I saw at Hinnar 19 schools for the instruction of girls and 23 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Maleilār pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 65-67.

1616.—". . . there is another river on which stand a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Ponwararam (or Ponwaru, in Ramusio); here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoo corsairs patronised by the Lord of the Land, one called Timoja and the other Rangy, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews."—Barbous, Lisbon, ed. 221.

1553.—"This port (Onor) and that of Batalakā . . . belonged to the King of Bhānaga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandise for the kingdom of Bhānaga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia. . . ."—Barros, l. viii. cap. x. [And see P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 292; Comm. Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 145.]

HOOGLY, HOOGHLEY, n.p. Properly Hogly, [and said to take its name from Beng. hogli, 'the elephant grass' (Typha angustifolia)]: a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that which has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied by Europeans in the interior of Bengal; first by the Portuguese in the first half of the 16th century. An English factory was established here in 1640; and it was for some time their chief settlement in Bengal. In 1638 a quarrel with the Nawab led to armed action, and the English abandoned Hoogly; but on the arrangement of peace they settled at Chatānati (Chuttanutt), now Calcutta.

[c. 1590.—"In the Sarkār of Satgāon, there are two ports at a distance of half a ka from each other; the one is Satgāon, the other Hūglī: the latter the chief; both are in possession of the Europeans."—Atn, ed. Jarrell, ii. 125.]

1616.—"After the force of dom Francisco de Menezes arrived at Sundivā as we have related, there came a few days later to the same island 3 sanguicela, right well equipped with arms and soldiers, at the charge of Manuel Viegas, a householder and resident of Gogolim, or Porto Pequeno, where dwelt in Bengala many Portuguese, 50 leagues up the Ganges, in the territory of the Mogor, under his ill faith that every hour threatened their destruction."—Docurro, Decada, 476.

c. 1532.—"Under the rule of the Bengālīs a party of Frank merchants . . . came trading to Satgāon (see PORTO PEQUENO); one ka above that place they occupied some ground on the bank of the estuary. . . . In course of time, through the ignorance and negligence of the rulers of Bengal, these Europeans increased in number, and erected substantial buildings, which they fortified. . . . In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of the Port of Hūglī. . . . These proceedings had come to the notice of the Emperor (Shāh Jahan), and he resolved to put an end to them, &c.—Abdul Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vii. 31-32.

1611.—"The other important voyage which used to be made from Cochim was that to Bengala, when the port and town of Ugolā were still standing, and much more when we had the Porto Grando (q.v.) and the town of Diangā; this used to be made by so many ships that often in one monsoon there came 30 or more from Bengala to Cochim, all laden with rice, sugar, lac, iron, salt-petre, and many kinds of cloths both of grass and cotton, ghee (mantegga), long pepper, a great quantity of wax, besides wheat and many things besides, such as quilts and rich bedding; so that ever ship brought a capital of more than 20,000 corasins. But since these two possessions were lost, and the two ports were closed, therefore barely one or two vessels to Oriza."—Docurro, MS., f. 315.

c. 1660.—"The rest they kept for their service to make Towers of them; and such Christians as they were themselves, bringing them up to robbing and killing; or else they sold them to the Portuguese of Goa, Ceilan, St. Thomas, and others, and even to those that were remaining in Bengall at Ogooll, who were come thither to settle themselves there by favour of Jehan-Guyre, the Grandfather of Aurang-Zebe. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 64; [ed. Constable, 176].

1727.—"Hughly is a Town of large Extent, but ill built. It reaches about 2 Miles along the River's Side, from the Chinchura before mentioned to the Bandel, a Colony formerly settled by the Portuguese, but the Mogul's Fouzdār governs both at present."—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744].

1753.—"Ugl est une forteresse des Maures. . . . Ce lieu étant le plus considérable de la contrée, des Européens qui remontent le Gange, lui ont donné le nom de rivière d'Ugl dans sa partie inférieure. . . ."—D'Anville, p. 61.

HOOGLY RIVER, n.p. See preceding. The stream to which we give this name is formed by the combination of the delta branches of the Ganges, viz., the Baugheruttee, Jalinglee, and Matabanga (Bhagirathi, Jalangi, and Matābhānga), known as the Nuddeea (Nadiyā) Rivers.

HOOKA, s. Hind. from Arab. huklah, properly 'a round casket.' The Indian pipe for smoking through water, the elaborated bubble-bubble (q.v.). That which is smoked in the hooka is a curious compound of tobacco, spice, molasses, fruit, &c. [See Baden-Powell, Panjab Products, i. 290.] In 1840 the hooka was still very common at Calcutta dinner-tables, as well as regimental mess-tables, and its bubble-bubble was heard from various quarters before the cloth was removed—as was customary in those days. Going back further some twelve or fifteen years it was not very uncommon to see the use of the hooka kept up by old Indians after their return to Europe; one such at least, in the recollection of the elder of the present writers in his childhood, being a lady who continued its use in Scotland for several years. When the second of the present writers landed first at Madras, in 1860, there were perhaps half-a-dozen Europeans at the Presidency who still used the hooka; there is not one now (c. 1878). A few gentlemen at Hyderabad are said still to keep it up. [Mrs. Mackenzie writing in 1850 says: "There was a dinner party in the evening (at Agra), mostly civilians, as I quickly discovered by their hugas. I have never seen the huga smoked save at Delhi and Agra, except by a very old general officer at Calcutta." (Life in the Mission, ii. 196). In 1837 Miss Eden says: "the aides-de-camp and doctor get their newspapers and hookahs in a cluster on their side of the street." (Up the Country, i. 70). The rules for the Calcutta Subscription Dances in 1792 provide: "That hookers be not admitted to the ball room during any part of the night. But hookers might be admitted to the supper rooms, to the card rooms, to the boxes in the theatre, and to each side of the assembly room, between the large pillars and the walls."—Carey, Good Old Days, i. 98.] "In former days it was a dire offence to step over another person's hooka-carpet and hooka-snake. Men who did so intentionally were called out." (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1768.—"This last Season I have been without Company (except that of my Pipe or Hooker), and when employed in the innocent diversion of smoking it, have often thought of you, and Old England."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, July 1.

1782.—"When he observes that the gentlemen introduce their hookas and smook in the company of ladies, why did he not add that the mixture of sweet-scented Persian tobacco, sweet herbs, coarse sugar, spice, etc., which they inhale . . . comes through clean water, and is so very pleasant, that many ladies take the tube, and draw a little of the smook into their mouths."—Prior's Tracts, vol. i. p. 78.

1783.—"For my part, in thirty years' residence, I never could find out one single luxury of the East, so much talked of here, except sitting in an arm-chair, smooking a hooka, drinking cool water (when I could get it), and wearing clean linen."—(Jos. Price), Some Observations on a late Publication, &c., 79.

1789.—"When the cloth is removed, all the servants except the hookerbedar retire, and make way for the sea breeze to circulate, which is very refreshing to the Company, whilst they drink their wine, and smoke the hooker, a machine not easily described. . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 53.

1828.—"Every one was hushed, but the noise of that wind . . . and the occasional bubbling of my own hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Kuzilbash, i. 2.

c. 1858.—

"Son houka bigarré d'arabesques flouries."
Leconte de Lisle, Poèmes Barbares.

1872.—". . . in the background the carcass of a bear with a cluster of villagers sitting by it, passing a hookah of primitive form round, for each to take a pull in turn."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1874.—". . . des houkas d'argent émaillé et ciselé. . . ."—Franz, Souvenir d'une Cosaque, ch. iv.

HOOKA-BURDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. hukka-bardār, 'hooka-bearer'; the servant whose duty it was to attend to his master's hooka, and who considered that duty sufficient to occupy his time. See Williamson, V.M. i. 220.

[1779.—"Mr. and Mrs. Hastings present their compliments to Mr. — and request the favour of his company to a concert, and supper on Thursday next. Mr. — is requested to bring no servants except his Houccaburdar."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 71.]

1789.—"Hookerbedar." (See under HOOKA.)

1801.—"The Resident . . . tells a strange story how his hookah-burdar, after eating and robbing him, proceeded to England, and set up as the Prince of Sylhet, took in everybody, was waited upon by Pitt, and with the Duke of York, and was presented to the King."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 31.

HOOKUM, s. An order; Ar. H. hukm. (See under HAKIM.)

[1678.—"The King's hookim is of as small value as an ordinary Governor's."—In Fule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xlv.]

[1880.—"Of course Raja Joe Hokham will preside."—Ali Baba, 106.]

HOOLUCK, s. Beng. hulak. The word is not in the Diets, [but it is possibly connected with ulak, Skt. ulāka, 'an owl,' both bird and animal taking their name from their wailing note]. The black gibbon (Hylobates hoolook, Jerd.; [Blanford, Mammalia, 55]), not unfrequently tamed or our } E. frontier, and from its gentlemanly ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet. In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could wake a clamour in response from the hoolucks, as if hunted had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

c. 1809.—"The Hoolucks live in considerable herds; and although exceedingly noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, ii. 563.

1868.—“Our only captive this time was a huluq monkey, a shy little beast, and very rarely seen or caught. They have black fur with white breasts, and go about usually in pairs, swinging from branch to branch with incredible agility, and making the forest resound with their strange cacchinatory cry. . . .”—T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 374.

1881.—“He then . . . describes a gibbon he had (not an historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hylobates hooluck) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ('which,' says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, 'cannot be said of all the monkey tribe'), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, as a pet has one weakness, that of 'howling in a piercing and somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted.'—Saty. Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

HOOLY, s. Hind. holi (Skt. holdā), [perhaps from the sound made in singing]. The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month Phalgunā. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Krishna and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and pelted with red powder, or drenched with yellow liquids from squirts. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Krishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jatra, or 'Swing-cradle festival.' [On the idea underlying the rite, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 306 seq.]

c. 1590.—“Here is also a place called Choramutty, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner.”—Gladwin's Lycen Albery, ii. 34; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 173].

[1671.—“In Feb. or March they have a feast the Romanists call Carnival, the Indians Whoolye.”—In Fule, Hedg's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxiv.]

1673.—“... their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time.”—Fryer, 180.

1727.—“One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expanse; and this they called the Feast of Wooly, who was . . . a fierce fellow in a War with some Giants that infested Sindy. . . .”—A. Hamilton, i. 128; [ed. 1744, i. 129].

1808.—“I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the learned to place the Hooly as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manufacture. . . .”—Letter from Mrs. Halked to W. Hastings, in Cal. Review, xxvi. 93.

1809.—“... We paid the Muha Raj (Sindhia) the customary visit at the Hohlee. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hohlee consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called aberr; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the dak (see DHAWK) tree.”—Broughton's Letters, p. 87; [ed. 1892, p. 65 seq.].

HOON, s. A gold Pagoda (coin), q.v. Hind. hūn, “perhaps from Cunar. honnu (gold)”—Wilson. [See Rice, Myore, i. 801.]

1617.—“A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golkonda had fallen into the hands of Kutub-Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court; when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two lacs of huns which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute.”—Indragh Khan, in Elliot, vii. 81.

1870.—“In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five hons (=Rs. 20) to Vithoba, besides paying the Government assessment.”—Bombay High Court Judgment, Jan. 27, p. 121.

HOONDY, s. Hind. hundi, hundari; Mahr. and Guj. hundi. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810.—“Hoondies (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them.”—Williamson, l. M. ii. 530.

HOONIMAUN, s. The great ape; also called Lungoor.

1653.—“Hemand est un singe que les Indou tiennent pour Sainet.”—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, p. 541.

HOOWA. A peculiar call (hūwa) used by the Singhalese, and thence applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian roo-ee.

HOPPER, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. It is the Tamil appam, [from appu, ‘to clap with the hand.’ In Bombay the form used is ap.]

1682.—“Thus having talked a while, he gave him very good entertainment, and commanded to give him certain cakes, made of the flower of Wheate, which the Malabars do call Apes, and with the same bonnie."—Castañeda (by N.L.), f. 38.

1606.—"Great dishes of apas."—Gouvea, f. 48r.

c. 1690.—"Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in sola siccatis farinam, ex eaque placentas, apas dictas, conficiunt."—Rherde, iii.

1707.—"Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Thestaleme (Tamil Laws of Jaffna), 700.

[1826.—"He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown apas."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 81.]

1860.—"Appas (called hoppers by the English) . . . supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

HOPPO, s. The Chinese Superintendent of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo poo, the Board of Revenue, with which office the Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction. [The N.E.D. accepts the account given in the quotation from Williams.]

1711.—"The Hoppoos, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair words imaginable."—Lockyer, 101.

1727.—"I have staid about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some underhand dealings between the Hapos and his Chaps, to my Prejudice."—A. Hamilton, ii. 228; [ed. 1744, ii. 227]. (See also under HONG.)

1743.—". . . just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Alacao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1766, p. 355.

1750-52.—"The hoppo, happa, or first inspector of customs . . . came to see us to-day."—Osbeck, i. 359.

1782.—"La charge d'Opeou répond à celle d'Intendant de province."—Sonnarot, ii. 236.

1797.—". . . the Hoppo or mandarine more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Staunton, i. 239.

1842 (?).—"The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term hoi-po-sho, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wells Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 221.

[1878.—"The second board or tribunal is named hoopoo, and to it is entrusted the care and keeping of the imperial revenue."—Gray, China, i. 19.]

1882.—"It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton. . . . The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misapplied to the officer in question."—The Farquhar at Canton, p. 36.

HORSE-KEEPER, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India, syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghorwadda (see GORAWALLAH).

1555.—"There in the reste of the Cophine made for the nones thei bewrie one of his diereest lemmans, a waiting manne, a Cooke, a Horse-keeper, a Lacque, a Butler, and a Horse, whiche thei al at first strangle, and thruste in."—W. Watreman, Fardle of Facious, N. 1.

1609.—"Watermen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hackins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673.—"On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honourable Gerald Aungier . . . to embarque on a Bombaim Boat . . . waited on by two of the Governor's servants . . . an Horsekeeper. . . ."—Fryer, 123.

1698.—". . . followed by his boy . . . and his horsekeeper."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1829.—"In my English buggy, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horse-keeper alongside of me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 87.

1837.—"Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper . . . to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

HORSE-RADISH TREE, s. This is a common name, in both N. and S. India, for the tree called in Hind. sa-hajna; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hyperanthera Moringa, Vahl. (N. O. Moringaceae), in Skt. sobhanjana. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle

"most nauseous to Europeans" (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopœia. [See MYROBALAN.]

HOSBOLHOOKUM, &c. Properly (Ar. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hukm, literally 'according to order'; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of State on royal authority, and thence applied as the title of such a document.

"... the other given in the 10th year of Oranzech, for the English to pay 2 per cent. at Surat, which the Mogul interpreted by his order, and Husbul Hookum (id est, a word of command by word of mouth) to his Devan in Bengall, that the English were to pay 2 per cent. custom at Surat, and in all other his dominions to be custom free."—Fl. St. Gro. Conna., 17th Dec., in Notes and Exts., Pt. I. pp. 97-98.

1702.—"The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had ever a hearty respect for the English... saying, here is the Hosbulhookum, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects."—In Wheeler, i. 357.

1727.—"The Phirmaund is presented (by the Goosberdaar (Goorzburdar), or Hosbulhookum, or, in English, the King's Messenger) and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech."—A. Hamilton, i. 230; [ed. 1744, i. 233].

1757.—"This Treaty was conceived in the following Terms. I. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Husbulhookums (sic), sent from Dolly, shall not be disputed."—Mem. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1759.—"Hosbul-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Vicer, Ulmah Malek, Nizam al Muluck Bahadour. Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer...")—In Cambridge's Act. of the War, &c., 229.

1761.—"A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (Jarmān). By the Mogul's Son, a Nushawn (nishān). By the Nabob a Perwanna (parwana). By the Vizier, a Hosbul-hookum."—Ibid. 226.

1769.—"Besides it is obvious, that as great a sum might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property... or running into his golden dream of cockets on the Ganges, or visions of Stamp duties, Perwannas, Duticks, Kinbundes and Husbulhookums."—Burk., Obs. on a late

Publication called "The Present State of the Nation."

HOT-WINDS, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the hot dry westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermantidote (q.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1801.—"Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan."—Wellington, iii. 180.

1873.—"It's no use thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that's getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon."—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

HOWDAH, vulg. HOWDER, &c., s. Hind. modified from Ar. haudaj. A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word haudaj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1663.—"At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Mil-dember or Hauze... the Mil-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood, is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise."—Hemier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 370].

c. 1785.—"Colonel Smith... reviewed his troops from the houder of his elephant."—Curraetoli's L. of Clive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings' escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson's retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

"Ghor par hauda, hūthi par jān Jaldi bhāg-gaya { Warren Hastin' Kornal Munshin!"

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression:

"Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled Off holtor skoltor the Sahibs skedaddled."

1831.—

"And when they talked of Elephants,
And riding in my Howder,
(So it was called by all my aunts)
I prouder grow and prouder."

H. M. Parker, in Bengal Annual, 119.

1856.—
 "But she, the gallant lady, holding fast With one soft arm the jewelled howdah's side,
 Still with the other circles tight the babe Sore smitten by a cruel shaft . . ."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1863.—"Elephants are also liable to be disabled . . . ulcers arise from neglect or carelessness in fitting on the howdah."—Sat. Review, Sept. 6, 312.

HUBBA, s. A grain; a jot or tittle.
Ar. habba.

1786—"For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tunkaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In Art. agst. Hastings, Hurk, vii. 141.

[1836.—"The habbeh (or grain of barley) is the 48th part of dirhem, or third of a keerat . . . or in commerce fully equal to an English grain."—Lane, Mod. Egypt, ii. 326.]

HUBBLE-BUBBLE, s. An onomatopoeia applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco amongst other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a coconut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Gorinda Samanta, i. 29 (1872).

1616.—". . . they have little Earthen Pots . . . having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water: then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastened a very small strait hollow Cane or Reed . . . within that spout . . . the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smoke into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discolours it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholesome."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 363.

c. 1830.—"Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weak and lenise; sucked out of long canes call'd hubble-bubbles . . ."—Sir. T. Herbert, 28.

1873.—"Coming back I found my troublesome Comrade very merry, and packing up his Household Stuff, his Bang bowl, and Hubble-bubble, to go along with me."—Fryer, 127.

1673.—". . . bolstered up with embroidered Cushions, smoking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Fryer, 131.

1697.—". . . Yesterday the King's Down, and this day the King's Buxee . . . arrived . . . to each of whom sent two bottles of Rose-water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler, i. 318.

c. 1700.—See Gros, i. 146.

1811.—"Cetto maniere de fumer est extrêmement commune . . . on la nomme Hubbel de Bubbel."—Solyma, tom. iii.

1868.—"His (the Dyak's) favourite pipe is a huge Hubble-bubble."—Wallace, Mal. Archip., ed. 1880, p. 80.

HUBSHEE, n.p. Ar. Habashi, P. Habshi, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jinjira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1208.—"There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 423.

[c. 1316.—"Habshia." See under COLOMBO.]

1553.—"At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abeshis (Abesjis) of the country of the Prester John . . ."—Barros, I. iv. 4.

[1612.—"Sent away the Thomas towards the Habash coast."—Danvers, Letters, i. 166; "The Habesh shore."—Ibid. i. 131.

[c. 1661.—". . . on my way to Gonder, the capital of Habesh, or Kingdom of Ethiopia."—Bernier, ed. Constant, 2.]

1673.—"Conis Cawn, an Hobsy or Arabian Coffery (Caffer)."—Fryer, 147.

1681.—"Habessin . . . nunc passim nominantur; vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quibus Habeshi colluvem vel mixturam gentium denotat."—Ludolphi, Hist. Aethiop. lib. i. c. i.

1750-60.—"The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves known in India by the name of Hobsy Coffere."—Gros, i. 148.

1789.—"In India Negroes, Habissinians, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promiscuously called Habashes or Habissians, although the two latter are no negroes; and the Nobies and Habashes differ greatly from one another."—Note to Sir Mutasherin, iii. 36.

[1813.—". . . the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Hafshee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 473.]

1884.—"One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, 'a Eubashee.'

"I understood that the name was specific for that description of pony amongst the traders."—Note by Sir Joseph Hooker.

HUCK. Properly Ar. hakḥ. A just right; a lawful claim; a perquisite claimable by established usage.

[1866.—"The difference between the bazar price, and the amount price of the article sold, is the hug of the Dullal (Deloll)."—Confessions of an Orderly, 50.]

HUCKEEM, s. Ar.—H. hakim; a physician. (See note under HAKIM.)

1622.—"I, who was thinking little or nothing about myself, was forthwith put by them into the hands of an excellent physician, a native of Shiraz, who then happened to be at Lar, and whose name was Hekim Abul fetah. The word hekim signifies 'wise'; it is a title which it is the custom to give to all those learned in medical matters."—P. della Valle, ii. 318.

1673.—"My Attendance is engaged, and a Million of Promises, could I restore him to his Health, laid down from his Wives, Children, and Relations, who all (with the Citizens, as I could hear going along) pray to God that the Hackin Fringi, the Frank Doctor, might kill him . . ."—Fryer, 312.

1837.—"I had the native works on Materia Medica collated by competent Hakeems and Moonshers."—Royle, Hindoo Medicine, 25.

HULLIA, s. Canarese Holeyā; the same as Polea (pulayan) (q.v.), equivalent to Pariah (q.v.). ["Holeyā field-labourers and agrestic serfs of S. Canara; Pulayan being the Malayālam and Paraiyan the Tamil form of the same word. Brahmins derive it from hole, 'pollution'; others from hola, 'land' or 'soil,' as being thought to be autochthones" (Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 173). The last derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss. For an illustration of these people, see Richter, Man. of Coorg, 112.]

1817.—". . . a Hullia or Paria King."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 151.

1874.—"At Melkotta, the chief seat of the followers of Rāmānya [Rāmānuja] Achārya, and at the Brāhman temple at Baihur, the Hōlēyars or Paroyars have the right of entering the temple on three days in the year, especially set apart for them."—M. J. Walpole, in Ind. Antiq. iii. 191.

HULWA, s. Ar. hālwa and haldwa is generic for sweetmeat, and the word is in use from Constantinople to Calcutta. In II. the word represents a particular class, of which the ingredients are milk, sugar, almond paste, and ghee flavoured with cardamom. "The best at Bombay is imported from Muskat" (Birāwood).

1672.—"Ce qui estoit plus lo plaisant, c'estoit un homme qui précédoit le corps des constitutions, lequel avoit une chemise qui luy descendoit aux talons, toute convertie d'alva, c'est à dire, de confiture."—Journ. d'Ant. Galland, i. 118.

1673.—". . . the Widow once a Moon (to) go to the Grave with her Acquaintance to repeat the doleful Dirge, after which she bestows Holway, a kind of Sacramental Wafer; and entreates their Prayers for the Soul of the Departed."—Fryer, 91.

1836.—"A curious cry of the seller of a kind of sweetmeat ('halāwah'), composed of treacle fried with some other ingredients, is 'For a nail! O sweetmeat! . . . children and servants often steal implements of iron, &c., from the house . . . and give them to him in exchange. . . ."—Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, ii. 15.

HUMMAUL, s. Ar. hammāl, a porter. The use of the word in India is confined to the west, and there now commonly indicates a palankin-bearer. The word still survives in parts of Sicily in the form camallu=It. 'facchino,' a relic of the Saracenic occupation. In Andalusia alhamel now means a man who lets out a baggage horse; and the word is also used in Morocco in the same way (Dozy).

c. 1350.—"Those rustics whom they call camalls (camallus), whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in litters, such as are mentioned in Canticles: 'Ferulum sicut sibi Solomon de lignis Libani,' whereby is meant a portable litter such as I used to be carried in at Zayton, and in India."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 366.

1551.—"To the Xabandar (see SHABUNDER) (at Ormuz) for the vessels employed in discharging stores, and for the amals who serve in the custom-house."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 103.

1691.—"His honour was carried by the Amals, i.e. the Palankin bearers 12 in number, sitting in his Palankyn."—Valdetijn, v. 256.

1711.—"Hammalage, or Cooloy-hire, at 1 oz (see GOSBECK) for every maund Tubrees."—Tariff in Lockyer, 213.

1750-60.—"The Hamauls or porters, who make a livelihood of carrying goods to and from the warehouses."—Grose, i. 120.

1809.—"The palankeen-bearers are here called hamauls (a word signifying carrier) . . . these people come chiefly from the Mahratta country, and are of the coombie or agricultural caste."—Maria Graham, 2.

1810.—"The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges" (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith's Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877.—"The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was beset by a motley crowd. . . . Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semicircular avenues."—Letter from Constantinople, in Times, May 7.

HUMMING-BIRD, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectariniinae).

HUMP, s. 'Calcutta humps' are the salted humps of Indian oxen exported from that city. (See under BUFFALO.)

HURGARRA, HIRCARRA, &c., s. Hind. harkārī, 'a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy' (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is har, 'every,' kār, 'business.' The word became very familiar in the Gilchristian spelling Hurkaru, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title (Bengal Hurkaru, generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hurkēros), for the first 60 years of last century, or thereabouts.

1747.—"Given to the Ircaras for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag.) 4 3 0."—Fort St David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office.

1748.—"The city of Dacca is in the utmost confusion on account of . . . advices of a large force of Mahrattas coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sundra Col, when first derided by their Hurecarras."—In Long, 4.

1757.—"I beg you to send me a good alcara who understands the Portuguese language."—Letter in Feb, 169.

"Hircars or Spies."—Ibid. 161; [and comp. 67].

1761.—"The head Hircar returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum."—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 260.

[1772.—"Hercarras." (See under DALO-YET.)]

1780.—"One day upon the march a Hircarra came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803.—"The hircarras reported the enomy to be at Bokerdun."—Letter of A. Wellesley, ibid. 318.

c. 1810.—"We were met at the entrance of Tippoo's dominions by four hircarrahs, or soldiers, whom the Sultan sent as a guard to conduct us safely."—Mis: Edgeworth, Lame Jerras. Miss Edgeworth has oddly misused the word here.

1813.—"The contrivances of the native hircarrahs and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 129; [compare 2nd ed. i. 64; ii. 201].

HURTAUL, s. Hind. from Skt. hari-talaka, haritāl, haritāl, yellow arsenic, orpiment.

c. 1317.—Ibn Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor. "The best (camphor) called in the country itself al-hardāla, is that which attains the highest degree of cold."—iv. 241.

c. 1750.—". . . hartaal and Coteh, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil. . . ."—List of Burmese Products, in Dalrymple's Or. Reper. i. 109.

HUZĀRA, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazāra. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language. The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland of a century and a half ago they spoke of "the clans." It appears to be merely from the Pers. hazār, 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors were called hazāras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazāras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol people of Wakhān, &c., must have been a later transfer. [See the discussion by Bellew, who points out that "amongst themselves this people never use the term Hazārah as their national appellation, and yet they have no name for their people as a nation.

They are only known amongst themselves by the names of their principal tribes and the clans subordinate to them respectively." (Races of Afghanistan, 114.)]

c. 1480.—"The Hazāra, Takdari, and all the other tribes having seen this, quietly submitted to his authority."—Tarikh-i-Nāma, in Elliot, i. 303. For Takdari we should probably read Nakudari; and see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 18, notes on Nigudaris.

c. 1605.—Kabul "on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Karnūd and Ghār. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hazāra and Nukderi tribes."—Baber, p. 136.

1508.—"Mirza Ababeker, the ruler and tyrant of Kāshghar, had seized all the Upper Hazāras of Badakhshān."—Erskine's Baber and Humāyun, i. 237. "Hazārājāt bādāest. The upper districts in Badakhshān were called Hazāras." Erskine's note. He is using the Tarikh Rashīdī. But is not the word Hazāras here, 'the clans,' used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?

[c. 1590.—"The Hazārahs are the descendants of the Chaghatai army, sent by Manku Khān to the assistance of Hulāku Khān. . . . They possess horses, sheep and goats. They are divided into factions, each covetous of what they can obtain, deceptive in their common intercourse and their conventions of amity savour of the wolf."—Atin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 402.]

(b.) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottābād, called after its founder, General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hazāras in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Abhisāra, and figuring in Ptolemy, Arrian and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abisārēs. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 69.]

HUZOOR, s. Ar. huzūr, 'the presence'; used by natives as a respectful way of talking of or to exalted personages, or to their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European. [The allied words hazrat and huzūrī are used in kindred senses as in the examples.]

[1787.—"You will send to the Huzoor an account particular of the assessment payable by each ryot."—Parwana of Tippoo, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 125.

[1813.—"The Mahratta cavalry are divided into several classes: the Hasserat, or household troops called the kassey-pagah, are reckoned very superior to the ordinary horse. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 344.

[1824.—"The employment of that singular description of officers called Huzooriah, or servants of the presence, by the Mahratta princes of Central India, has been borrowed from the usages of the Poona court. Huzooriahs are personal attendants of the chief, generally of his own tribe, and are usually of respectable parentage; a great proportion are hereditary followers of the family of the prince they serve. . . . They are the usual envoys to subjects on occasions of importance. . . . Their appearance supersedes all other authority, and disobedience to the orders they convey is termed an act of rebellion."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 536 seq.

[1826.—"These men of authority being aware that I was a Hoogorie, or one attached to the suite of a great man, received me with due respect."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 40.]

HYSON. (See under TEA.)

I

IDALCAN, HIDALCAN, and sometimes IDALXA, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese distinguished the kings of the Mahomedan dynasty of Bījapūr which rose at the end of the 15th century on the dissolution of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. These names represented 'Adil Khān, the title of the founder before he became king, more generally called by the Portuguese the Sabaio (q.v.), and 'Adil Shāh, the distinctive style of all the kings of the dynasty. The Portuguese commonly called their kingdom Balaghaut (q.v.).

1510.—"The Hidalcan entered the city (Goa) with great festivity and rejoicings, and went to the castle to see what the ships were doing, and there, inside and out, he found the dead Moors, whom Timoja had slain; and round about them the brothers and parents and wives, raising great wailings and lamentations, thus the festivity of the Hidalcan was celebrated by weepings and wailings . . . so that he sent João Machado to the Governor to speak about terms of peace. . . . The Governor replied that Goa belonged to his lord the K. of Portugal, and that he would hold no peace with him (Hidalcan) unless he delivered up the city with all its territories. . . . With which reply back went João Machado, and the Hidalcan on hearing it was left amazed, saying that our people were sons of the devil. . . ."—Correa, ii. 98.

1563.—"And as those Governors grow weary of obeying the King of Daquem (Deccan), they conspired among themselves that each should appropriate his own lands . . . and the great-grandfather of this Adolham who now reigns was one of those captains who revolted; he was a Turk by nation and died in the year 1535; a very powerful man he was always, but it was from him that we twice took by force of arms this city of Goa. . . ."—Garcia, l. 35r. [And comp. Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 199.] N.B.—It was the second of the dynasty who died in 1535; the original 'Adil Khān (or Sabaio) died in 1510, just before the attack of Goa by the Portuguese.

1594-5.—"There are three distinct States in the Dakhin. The Nizām-ul-Mulkīya, 'Adil Khāniya, and Kutbu-l-Mulkīya. The settled rule among them was, that if a foreign army entered their country, they united their forces and fought, notwithstanding the dissensions and quarrels they had among themselves. It was also the rule, that when their forces were united, Nizām-ul-Mulk commanded the centre, 'Adil Khān the right, and Kutbu-l-Mulk the left. This rule was now observed, and an immense force had been collected."—Akbar-Nāma, in Elliot, vi. 131.

IMAUM, s. Ar. Imām, 'an exemplar, a leader' (from a root signifying 'to aim at, to follow after'), a title technically applied to the Caliph (Khalīfa) or 'Vicegerent,' or Successor, who is the head of Islām. The title "is also given—in its religious import only—to the heads of the four orthodox sects . . . and in a more restricted sense still, to the ordinary functionary of a mosque who leads in the daily prayers of the congregation" (Dr. Badger, Omām, App. A.). The title has been perhaps most familiar to Anglo-Indians as that of the Princes of 'Omān, or "Imaums of Muscat," as they were commonly termed. This title they derived from being the heads of a sect (Ibādhiya) holding peculiar doctrine as to the Imamate, and rejecting the Caliphate of Ali or his successors. It has not been assumed by the Princes themselves since Sa'īd bin Ahmad who died in the early part of last century, but was always applied by the English to Saiyid Sa'īd, who reigned for 52 years, dying in 1856. Since then, and since the separation of the dominions of the dynasty in Omān and in Africa, the title Imām has no longer been used.

It is a singular thing that in an article on Zanzibar in the J. R. Geog. Soc. vol. xxiii. by the late Col. Sykes, the Sultan is always called the Imaun, [of which other examples will be found below].

1673.—"At night we saw Muschat, whose vast and horrid Mountains no Shade but Heaven does hide. . . . The Prince of this country is called Imaun, who is guardian at Mahomet's Tomb, and on whom is devolved the right of Caliphship according to the Ottoman belief."—Fryer, 220.

[1753.—"These people are Mahomedans of a particular sect . . . they are subject to an Iman, who has absolute authority over them."—Harcourt, iii. 67.

[1801.—Of the Bombay Kojas, "there were only 12 Imams, the last of the number . . . having disappeared without issue."—Times, April 12.]

IMAUMBARRA, s. This is a hybrid word Imām-bārā, in which the last part is the Hindi bārā, 'an enclosure,' &c. It is applied to a building maintained by Shi'a communities in India for the express purpose of celebrating the mohurrum ceremonies (see HOBSON-JOBSON). The sepulchre of the Founder and his family is often combined with this object. The Im-āmbārā of the Nawāb Asaf-ud-daula at Lucknow is, or was till the siege of 1858, probably the most magnificent modern Oriental structure in India. It united with the objects already mentioned a mosque, a college, and apartments for the members of the religious establishment. The great hall is "conceived on so grand a scale," says Ferguson, "as to entitle it to rank with the buildings of an earlier age." The central part of it forms a vaulted apartment of 162 feet long by 53½ wide.

IMPALE, v. It is startling to find an injunction to impale criminals given by an English governor (Vansittart, apparently) little more than a century ago. [See CALUETE.]

1764.—"I request that you will give orders to the Naib of Dacca to send some of the Factory Sepoys along with some of his own people, to apprehend the said murderers and to impale them, which will be very serviceable to traders."—The Governor of Fort William to the Nawab; in Long, 389.

1768-71.—"The punishments inflicted at Batavia are excessively severe, especially such as fall upon the Indians. Impalement is the chief and most terrible."—Stavorinus, i. 238. This writer proceeds to give a description of the horrible process, which he witnessed.

INAUM, ENAUM, s. Ar. in'dm, 'a gift' (from a superior), 'a favour', but especially in India a gift of rent-free land; also land so held. In'āmdār, the holder of such lands. A full detail of the different kinds of in'dm, especially among the Mahrattas, will be found in Wilson, s.v. The word is also used in Western India for bucksheesh (q.v.). This use is said to have given rise to a little mistake on the part of an English political traveller some 30 or 40 years ago, when there had been some agitation regarding the in'am lands and the alleged harshness of the Government in dealing with such claims. The traveller reported that the public feeling in the west of India was so strong on this subject that his very palankin-bearers at the end of their stage invariably joined their hands in supplication, shouting, "In'am! In'am! Sahib!"

INDIA, INDIES, n.p. A book might be written on this name. We can only notice a few points in connection with it.

It is not easy, if it be possible, to find a truly native (i.e. Hindu) name for the whole country which we call India; but the conception certainly existed from an early date. Bhāratavarsha is used apparently in the Purāṇas with something like this conception. Jambudvīpa, a term belonging to the mythical cosmography, is used in the Buddhist books, and sometimes, by the natives of the south, even now. The accuracy of the definitions of India in some of the Greek and Roman authors shows the existence of the same conception of the country that we have now; a conception also obvious in the modes of speech of Hwen Tsang and the other Chinese pilgrims. The Aśoka inscriptions, c. B.C. 250, had enumerated Indian kingdoms covering a considerable part of the conception, and in the great inscription at Tanjore, of the 11th century A.D., which incidentally mentions the conquest (real or imaginary) of a great part of India, by the king of Tanjore, Virā-Chōla, the same system is followed. In a copperplate of the 11th century, by the Chalukya dynasty of Kalyāna, we find the expression "from the Hīmālaya to the Bridge" (Ind. Antiq. i. 81), i.e. the Bridge of Rāma, or 'Adam's Bridge,' as our maps have it. And Mahommedan definitions as old, and with the name, will be found below. Under the Hindu kings of Vijayanagara also (from the 14th century) inscriptions indicate all India by like expressions.

The origin of the name is without doubt (Skt.) Sindhu, 'the sea,' and thence the Great River on the West, and the country on its banks, which we still call Sindh.* By a change common in many parts of the world, and in various parts of India itself, this name exchanged the initial sibilant for an aspirate, and became (eventually) in Persia Hindū, and so passed on to the Greeks and Latins, viz. Ἰνδός for the people, Ἰνδός for the river, Ἰνδική and India for the country on its banks. Given this name for the western tract, and the conception of the country as a whole to which we have alluded, the name in the mouths of foreigners naturally but gradually spread to the whole.

Some have imagined that the name of the land of Nod ('wandering'), to which Cain is said to have migrated, and which has the same consonants, is but a form of this; which is worth noting, as this idea may have had to do with the curious statement in some medieval writers (e.g. John Marignolli) that certain eastern races were "the descendants of Cain." In the form Hidhu [Hindus, see Encycl. Bibl. ii. 2169] India appears in the great cuneiform inscription on the tomb of Darius Hystaspes near Persepolis, coupled with Gadāra (i.e. Gandhara, or the Peshawar country), and no doubt still in some degree restricted in its application. In the Hebrew of Esther i. 1, and viii. 9, the form is Hod(d)ā, or perhaps rather Hiddā (see also Perissol below). The first Greek writers to speak of India and the Indians were Hecataeus of Miletus, Herodotus, and Ctesias (n.c. c. 500, c.

* In most of the important Asiatic languages the same word indicates the Sea or a River of the first class; e.g. Sindhu as here; in Western Tibet Gyantsa and Samandrang (corr. of Skt. sanudra) 'the Sea,' which are applied to the Indus and Sutlej (see J. R. Geog. Soc. xxiii. 34-35); Hebrew yam, applied both to the sea and to the Nile; Ar. bahr; Pers. daryā; Mongol. dalai, &c. Compare the Homeric Ἰνκαρπός.

Before going further, we ought to point out that India itself is a Latin form, and does not appear in a Greek writer, we believe, before Lucian and Polyænus, both writers of the middle of the 2nd century. The Greek form is $\frac{1}{2}$ Ἰνδία, or else 'The Land of the Indians.'

The name of 'India' spread not only from its original application, as denoting the country on the banks of the Indus, to the whole peninsula between (and including) the valleys of Indus and Ganges; but also in a vaguer way to all the regions beyond. The compromise between the vaguer and the more precise use of the term is seen in Ptolemy, where the boundaries of the true India are defined, on the whole, with surprising exactness, as 'India within the Ganges,' whilst the darker regions beyond appear as 'India beyond the Ganges.' And this double conception of India, as 'India Proper' (as we may call it), and India in the vaguer sense, has descended to our own time.

So vague became the conception in the 'dark ages' that the name is sometimes found to be used as synonymous with Asia, 'Europe, Africa, and India,' forming the three parts of the world. Earlier than this, however, we find a tendency to discriminate different Indias, in a form distinct from Ptolemy's Intra et extra Gangem; and the terms India Major, India Minor can be traced back to the 4th century. As was natural where there was so little knowledge, the application of these terms was various and oscillating, but they continued to hold their ground for 1000 years, and in the later centuries of that period we generally find a third India also, and a tendency (of which the roots go back as far at least as Virgil's time) to place one of the three in Africa.

It is this conception of a twofold or threefold India that has given us and the other nations of Europe the vernacular expressions in plural form which hold their ground to this day: the Indies, les Indes, (It.) le Indie, &c.

And we may add further, that China is called by Friar Odoric Upper India (India Superior), whilst Marignolli calls it India Magna and Maxima, and calls Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an Oriental, application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obillah in that region with the Havila of Genesis. (See Cathay, &c., 55, note.)

In the work of the Chinese traveller Hwen Tsang again we find that by him and his co-religionists a plurality of Indias was recognised, i.e. five, viz. North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here. On this and on the medieval plurality of Indias reference may be made to two notes on Marco Polo, 2nd ed. vol. ii. pp. 419 and 425.

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of 'Indies.' India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West Coast, and Mogor, the dominions of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman India means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manila. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chander-nagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the 'Indians' by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West-Indies.

Indian is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South.

This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as 'an Indian.' Forrest, in his Poyage to Mergui, uses the inelegant word Indo-laners; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts. Among the Greeks 'an Indian' (Ἰνδός) acquired a notable specific application, viz. to an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

n.c. c. 486.—"Says Darius the King: By the grace of Ormazd these (are) the countries which I have acquired besides Persia. I have established my power over them. They have brought tribute to me. That which has been said to them by me they have done. They have obeyed my law. Medea . . . Arachotia (Harauratsh), Sattagydia (Thatagush), Gandaria (Radaria), India (Hidush). . . .—On the Tomb of Darius at Nakhsh-e-Rustam, see Rawlinson's Hered. iv. 250.

n.c. c. 410.—"Eastward of India lies a tract which is entirely sand. Indeed, of all the inhabitants of Asia, concerning whom anything is known, the Indians dwell nearest to the east, and the rising of the Sun."—Herodotus, iii. c. 98 (Rawlinson).

n.c. c. 300.—"India then (ἡ τοῖς Ἰνδοῖς) being four-sided in plan, the side which looks to the Orient and that to the South, the Great Sea compasseth; and towards the Arctic is divided by the mountain chain of Hæmodus from Scythia, inhabited by that tribe of Scythians who are called Sakai; and on the fourth side, turned towards the West, the Indus marks the boundary, the biggest or nearly so of all rivers after the Nile."

—Megasthenes, in Diodorus, ii. 35. (From Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., ii. 402.)

A.D. c. 140.—"Τὰ δὲ ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰνδοῦ πρὸς ἑω, τοῦτό μοι ἔστω ἡ γῶν Ἰνδῶν γῆ, καὶ Ἰνδὸν οὖτοι ἑστῶσαν."—Arrian, Indica, ch. ii.

c. 690.—"As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Islām, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire. . . . The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokran, the country of Manyāra and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannūj and thence passest on to Toblat (see TIBET), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannūj about three months."—Istakhrī, pp. 6 and 11.

c. 650.—"The name of Tien-chu (India) has gone through various and confused forms. . . . Anciently they said Shin-tu; whilst some authors called it Hien-tou. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say In-tu."—Huen Tsang, in Pil. Buddh., ii. 67.

c. 611.—"For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind. . . ."—May'adī, i. 351.

c. 1020.—"India (Al-Hind) is one of those plains bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lofty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Moreover, if thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones that are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig,—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the debris washed down by the torrents hath filled up. . . ."—Al-Birānī, in Reinard's Extracts, Journ. As. ser. 4. 1814.

"Hind is surrounded on the East by Chin and Māchin, on the West by Sind and Kābul, and on the South by the Sea."—Ibid. in Elliot, i. 15.

1205.—"The whole country of Hind, from Peshawar to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Bixitā to the hills of Chin. . . ."—Mosā Nizāmī, in Elliot, ii. 239. That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Schwan (on the west bank of the Indus) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

c. 1500.—"Hodu quao est India extra et intra Gangem."—Itinera Mundi (in Holbroow), by Abu. Perizot, in Hyde, Syntagma Dissert., Oxon, 1707, l. 74.

1563.—"And had Vasco da Gama belonged to a nation so glorious as the Romans he would perchance have added to the style of his family, noble as that is, the surname 'Of India,' since we know that those symbols of honour that a man wins are more glorious than those that he inherits, and that Scipio gloried more in the achievement which gave him the surname of 'Africanus,' than in the name of Cornelius, which was that of his family."—Barros, l. iv. 12.

1572.—Defined, without being named, by Camoens:

"Alem do Indo faz, e aquem do Gango Hu torreno muy grido, e assaz famoso, Que pela parto Austral o mar abrango, E para o Norte o Emodio cavernoso."
Lusiadas, vii. 17.

Englished by Burton:

"Outside of Indus, inside Ganges, lies a wide-spread country, famed enough of yore;
northward the peaks of caved Emódus rise, and southward Ocean doth confine the shore."

1577.—"India is properly called that great Province of Asia, in the which great Alexander kept his warres, and was so named of the ryuer Indus."—Eden, Hist. of Trauayle, f. 3r.

The distinct Indias.

c. 650.—"The circumference of the Five Indias is about 90,000 li; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon."—Huen T'sang, in Pel. Boudh., li. 53.

1298.—"India the Greater is that which extends from Maabar to Kesmacoran (i.e. from Coromandel to Mekran), and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champa to Mufli (i.e. from Cochinchina to the Kistna Delta), and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Abash (Abyssinia) is a very great province, and you must know that it constitutes the Middle India."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 84, 35.

c. 1328.—"What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tertia I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvels, not having been there. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

India Minor, in Clavijs, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:

1404.—"And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Tenmit (Tormedh), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Tamurbec."—Clavijs, § ciii. (Markham, 119).

Indies.

c. 1601.—"He does smile his face into more lines than are in the new map with the augmentation of the Indies."—Twelfth Night, Act iii. sc. 2.

1653.—"I was thirteen times captive and seventeen times sold in the Indies."—Trans. of Pinto, by H. Cogan, p. 1.

1826.—" . . . Like a French lady of my acquaintance, who had so general a notion of the East, that upon taking leave of her, she enjoined me to get acquainted with a friend of hers, living as she said quelque part dans les Indes, and whom, to my astonishment, I found residing at the Cape of Good Hope."—Hajji Baba, Introd. Epistle, ed. 1835, p. ix.

c. 1567.—"Di qui (Colan) a Cao Comeri si fanno settanta due miglia, e qui si finisce la costa dell' India."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, lii. 390.

1593.—"At the ende of the countrey of Cambaia beginneth India and the landes of Decam and Cuncam . . . from the island called Das Vagus (read Vagus) . . . which is the righte coast that in all the East Countreys is called India. . . . Now you must vnderstande that this coast of India beginneth at Daman, or the Island Das Vagus, and stretched South and by East, to the Cape of Comorin, where it endeth."—Linschoten, ch. ix.-x.; [Hak. Soc. i. 62. See also under ABADA].

c. 1610.—"Il y a grand nombre des Portugais qui demeurent es ports du cotto coste do Bengale . . . ils n'osient retourner on l'Inde, pour quelques fautes qu'ils y ont commis."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 239; [Hak. Soc. i. 331].

1615.—"Sociorum litoris, qui Mogoris Regiam incolunt auditum est in India de celeberrimo Regno illo quod Saraceni Catalogum vocant."—Trigautius, De Christiana Expeditione apud Sinas, p. 544.

1644.—(Speaking of the Daman district above Bombay.)—"The fruits are nearly all the same as those that you get in India, and especially many Mangas and Cussaras (†), which are like chestnuts."—Boerhaave, MS.

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E.I.C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670.—They desire that dungeares may be supplied thence if possible, as "they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Soujaes."—Notes and Exts., Pt. i. 2.

1673.—"The Portugals . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the first Blow at Ormuz . . . they have added some Christians to those formerly converted by St. Thomas, but it is a loud Report to say all India."—Fryer, 137.

1381.—In a correspondence with Sir R. Morier, we observe the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs calls their Gov. Viceroy "The Governor General of India."

1876.—The Dorian "is common throughout all India."—Filet, Plant-Kundung Woordenboek, 196.

Indies applied to America.

1663.—"And please to tell me . . . which is better, this (Radix Chinæ) or the guaiacæ of our Indies as we call them. . . ."—Garcia, f. 177.

INDIAN. This word in English first occurs, according to Dr. Guest, in the following passage:—

A.D. 433-440.

"Mid israelum ic waes Mid obreum and indeum, and mid egyptum."

In Guest's English Rhythms, ii. 86-87.

But it may be queried whether indrum is not here an error for indrum; the converse error to that supposed to have been made in the printing of Othello's death-speech—

"Of one whose hand

Like the base Judean threw a pearl away."

Indian used for Mahout.

B.C. ? 116-105.—"And upon the beasts (the elephants) there were strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and wore girt fast unto them with devices: there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled them."—J. Macabees, vi. 37.

B.C. c. 150.—"Of Beasts (i.e. elephants) taken with all their Indians there were ten; and of all the rest, which had thrown their Indians, he got possession after the battle by driving them together."—Polybius, Bk. i. ch. 40; see also iii. 46, and xi. 1. It is very curious to see the drivers of Carthaginian elephants thus called Indians, though it may be presumed that this is only a Greek application of the term, not a Carthaginian use.

B.C. c. 20.—"Tertio die . . . ad Thabusion castellum imminens fluvio Indo ventum est; cui fecerat nomen Indus ab elephanto dejectus."—Livy, Bk. xxxviii. 14. This Indus or "Indian" river, named after the Mahout thrown into it by his elephant, was somewhere on the borders of Phrygia.

A.D. c. 210.—"Along with this elephant was brought up a female one called Nikala. And the wife of their Indian being near death placed her child of 30 days old beside this one. And when the woman died a certain marvellous attachment grew up of the Beast towards the child. . . ."—Athenæus, xiii. ch. 8.

Indian, for Anglo-Indian.

1816.—" . . . our best Indians. In the idleness and obscurity of home they look back with fondness to the country where they have been useful and distinguished, like the ghosts of Homer's heroes, who prefer the exertions of a labourer on the earth to all the listless enjoyments of Elysium."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 367.

INDIGO, s. The plant Indigofera tinctoria, L. (N.O. Leguminosæ), and the dark blue dye made from it. Greek Ἰνδικόν. This word appears from Hippocrates to have been applied in his time to pepper. It is also applied by Dioscorides to the mineral substance (a variety of the red oxide of iron) called Indian red (F. Adams, Appendix to Dunbar's Lexicon). [Liddell & Scott call it "a dark-blue dye, indigo." The dye was used in Egyptian mummy-cloths (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ed. 1878, ii. 163).]

A.D. c. 60.—"Of that which is called Ἰνδικόν one kind is produced spontaneously, being as it were a scum thrown out by the Indian reeds; but that used for dyeing is a purple efflorescence which floats on the brazen cauldrons, which the craftsmen skim off and dry. That is deemed best which is blue in colour, succulent, and smooth to the touch."—Dioscorides, v. cap. 107.

c. 70.—"After this . . . Indico (Indicum) is a colour most esteemed; out of India it cometh; wherupon it took the name; and it is nothing els but a slimie mud cleaving to the foame that gathereth about canes and reeds: while it is panned or ground, it looketh blacke, but being dissolved it yeildeth a wonderfull lovely mixture of purple and azur . . . Indico is valued at 20 denarii the pound. In physicks there is use of this Indico; for it doth assuage swellings that doe stretch the skin."—Plinie, by Ph. Holland, ii. 631.

c. 80-90.—"This river (Sinthus, i.e. Indus) has 7 mouths . . . and it has none of them navigable except the middle one only, on which there is a coast mart called Barbaricon. . . . The articles imported into this mart are. . . . On the other hand there are exported Cotius, Indellum . . . and Indian Black (Ἰνδικόν μέλαρ, i.e. Indigo)."—Periplus, 38, 39.

1298.—(At Collum) "They have also abundance of very fine indigo (yndæ). This is made of a certain herb which is gathered and [after the roots have been removed] is put into great vessels upon which they pour water, and then leave it till the whole of the plant is decomposed. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.

[1605-6.—". . . for all which we shall buis Ryse, Indico, Lapes Bezar which theare in abundances are to be hadd."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 77.

[1609.—". . . to buy such Comodities as they shall finde there as Indico, of Laher (Lahore), here worth viij^s the pounce Serchis and the best Belondri. . . ."—Ibid. 237. Serchis is Sarkhaj, the Seraze of Forbes (Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 204) near Ahmadabad; Sir G. Birdwood with some hesitation identifies Belondri with Valabhi, 20 m. N.W. of Bhavnagar.

1610.—"In the country thereabouts is made some Indigo."—Sir H. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 259.

[1616.—"Indigo is made thus. In the prime June they sow it, which the rains bring up about the prime September: thus they cut and it is called the Neoty (H. naudha, 'a young plant'), formerly mentioned, and is a good sort. Next year it sprouts again in the prime August, which they cut and is the best Indigo, called Jerry (Il. Jari, 'growing from the root Jar')."—Foster, Letters, iv. 241.]

c. 1670.—Tavernier gives a detailed account of the manufacture as it was in his time. "They that sift this Indigo must be careful to keep a Linnen-cloth before their faces, and that their nostrils be well stoppt. . . . Yet . . . they that have sifted Indigo for 9 or 10 days shall spit nothing but blew for a good while together. Once I laid an egg in the morning among the sifters, and when I came to break it in the evening it was all blew within."—E.T. ii. 123-9; [ed. Ball, ii. 11].

We have no conception what is meant by the following singular (apparently sarcastic) entry in the Indian Vocabulary:—

1783.—"Indergo—a drug of no estimation that grows wild in the woods." [This is Il. indaryan, Skt. indra-yava, 'barley of Indra,' the Wrightia tinctoria, from the leaves of which a sort of indigo is made. See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 316. "Indergo of the species of warm bitters."—Halked, Code, ed. 1781, p. 9.]

1881.—"Découvertes et Inventions.—Décidément le cabinet Gladstone est poursuivi par la malchance. Voici un savant chimiste de Munich qui vient de trouver le moyen de préparer artificiellement et à très bon marché le bleu Indigo. Cette découverte peut amener la ruine du gouvernement des Indes anglaises, qui est déjà menacé de la banque-roule. L'Indigo, en effet, est le principal article de commerce des Indes (!); dans l'Allemagne, seulement, on en importe par an pour plus de cent cinquante millions de francs."—Havre Commercial Paper, quoted in Pioneer Mail, Feb. 3.

INGLEES, s. Hind. Inglis and Inglis. Wilson gives as the explanation of this: "Invalid soldiers and sipahis, to whom allotments of land were assigned as pensions; the lands so granted." But the word is now used as the equivalent of (sepoys') pension simply. Mr. Carnegie, [who is followed by Platts], says the word is "probably a corruption of English, as pensions were unknown among native Governments, whose rewards invariably took the shape of land assignments." This, however, is quite unsatisfactory; and Sir H. Elliot's suggestion (mentioned by Wilson) that the word was a corruption of invalid (which the sepoys may have confounded in some way with English) is most probable.

INTERLOPER, s. One in former days who traded without the license, or outside the service, of a company (such as the E.I.C.) which had a charter of monopoly. The etymology of the word remains obscure. It looks like Dutch, but intelligent Dutch friends have sought in vain for a Dutch original. Underloopen, the nearest word we can find, means 'to be inundated.' The hybrid etymology given by Bailey, though allowed by Skeat, seems hardly possible. Perhaps it is an English corruption from out-loopen, 'to evade, escape, run away from.' [The N.E.D. without hesitation gives interlope, a form of leap. Skeat, in his Concise Dict., 2nd ed., agrees, and quotes Low Germ. and Dutch enterloper, 'a runner between.']

1680.—"The commissions relating to the Interloper, or private trader, being considered, it is resolved that a notice be fixed up warning all the Inhabitants of the Towne, not, directly or indirectly, to trade, negotiate, aid, assist, countenance, or hold any correspondence, with Captain William Alley or any person belonging to him or his ship without the license of the Honorable Company. Whoever shall offend herein shall answer it at their Perill."—Notes and Exts., Pt. iii. 29.

1681.—"The Shippe EXPECTATION, Capt. Ally Comand^r, an Interloper, arrived in yo Downes from Porto Novo."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 15].

[1682.—"The Agent having notice of an Interloper lying in Titicorin Bay, immediately sent for ye Council to consult about it. . . ."—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 69.]

"The Spirit of Commerce, which sees its drifts with eagle's eyes, formed associations at the risque of trying the consequence at law . . . since the statutes did not authorize the Company to seize or stop the ships of these adventurers, whom they called Interlopers."—Orme's Fragments, 127.

1683.—"If God gives me life to get this Phirmaund into my possession, ye Honble. Compy. shall never more be much troubled with Interlopers."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 62].

"May 28. About 9 this morning Mr. Littleton, Mr. Nedham, and Mr. Douglass came to y^e factory, and being sent for, were asked Whether they did now, or over intended, directly or indirectly, to trade with any Interlopers that shall arrive in the Bay of Bengall?"

"Mr. Littleton answered that, 'he did not, nor over intended to trade with any Interloper.'

"Mr. Nedham answered, 'that at present he did not, and that he came to gett money, and if any such offer should happen, he would not refuse it.'

"Mr. Douglass answered, he did not, nor over intended to trade with them; but he said 'what Estate he should gett here he would not scruple to send it home upon any Interloper.'

"And having given their respective answers they were dismiss."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 90-91.

1691.—"Whether y^e souldiers lately sent up hath created any jealousy in y^e Interlopers: or their own Actions or guilt I know not, but they are so cautious y^e every 2 or 3 bales y^e are packt they immediately send on board."—MS. Letter from Edward Hearn at Hugley to the Rt. Worship^l Charles Eyre Esq. Agent for Affaires of the Honble. East India Compy. in Bengall, &c. (9th Sept.). MS. Record in India Office.

1719.—" . . . their business in the South Sea was to sweep those coasts clear of the French Interlopers, which they did very effectually."—Shelcocke's Voyage, 29.

"I wish you would explain yourself; I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no Interloper."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1730.—"To Interlope [of inter, I. between, and loppen, Du. to run, q. d. to run in between, and intercept the Commerce of others], to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce."—Bailey's English Dict. s.v.

1760.—"Enterloper. Terme de Commerce de Mer, fort en usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. Il signifie un vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et fréquente les Côtes, et les Havres ou Ports de Mer éloignés, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au préjudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules à le faire dans ces mêmes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il étoit écrit Eintrelopre. Il est emprunté de l'Anglois, de enter qui signifie entrer et entreprendre, et de Looper, Courreur."—Savary des Bruslons, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed., Copenhague, s.v.

c. 1812.—"The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon."—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D., 1881, p. 165.

IPECACUANHA (WILD), s. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curassavica, L.) naturalised in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

IRON-WOOD. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Mesua ferrea, L. (N.O. Clusiaceae), Hind. nagkesar; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylia dolabriformis, Benth.

I-SAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Isays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deedong, i.e. the dites-donc people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Tea Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 175.)

[1863.—"The Sopos were . . . invariably called 'Achas.' Acha or good is the constantly recurring answer of a Sopo when spoken to. . . ."—Fisher, Three Years in China, 146.]

ISKAT, s. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escada (Roebuck).

[ISLAM, s. Infn. of Ar. salm, 'to be or become safe'; the word generally used by Mahomedans for their religion.

[1616.—"Dated at Achon 1625 according to the rate of Siam."—Foster, Letters, iv. 125.

[1617.—"I demanded the debts . . . one [of the debtors] for the value of 110 r[ials] is termed Siam."—Letter of E. Young, from Jacatra, Oct. 3, I.O. Records: O.C. No. 541.]

ISTOOP, s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebeck).

ISTUBBUL, s. This usual Hind. word for 'stable' may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Ar. istabl, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZEBOO, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. Itsi-bu, 'one drachm.' [The N.E.D. gives itsa, itche, 'one,' bu, 'division, part, quarter']. Present value about 1s. Marsden says: "Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0·8 inch long, and 0·3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 3 gra. only" (Numism. Orient., 814-5). See Cocks's Diary, i. 176, ii. 77. [The coin does not appear in the last currency list; see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 99.]

[1616.—"Ichibos." (See under KO-BANG.)]

[1639.—"We found the greatest difficulty in obtaining specimens of the currency of the country, and I came away at last the possessor of a solitary Itzibu. These are either of gold or silver: the gold Itzibu is a small oblong piece of money, intrinsically worth about seven and sixpence. The intrinsic value of the gold half-Itzibu, which is not too large to convert into a shirt-stud, is about one and tenpence."—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Mission, ii. 232.]

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Correa, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J

JACK, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853.—" . . . he should be leading the Jacks."—Oakfeld, ii. 66.

JACK, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is "a corruption of the Skt. word Tchackka, which means the fruit of the tree" (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malay. chakka is from the Skt. chakra, 'round.'] Rheede rightly gives Tajaka (chukka) as the Malayalam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. "They call it," says Garcia Orta, "in Malabar jacas, in Canarese and Guzerati panas" (f. 111). "The Tamil form is sakkei, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is 'the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.'" (Letter from Bp. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: "Major alia pomo et suavitatis præcellentior; quo sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitatur longitudine trium cubitorum, latitudine duum). Fructum e cortice mittit admirabilem succi dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen palae, pomo arienae; plurima est in Sydraci, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta" (Hist. Nat. xii. 12). Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: "Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds' wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderful pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree's name is Pala, and the fruit is called Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable than this Ariena, albeit the guts in a man's belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie flux" (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that (we presume) the Linnaean name of the plantain Musa sapientum, was founded upon the interpretation of this passage. (It was, I find, the excellent Rumphius who originated the erroneous identification of the ariena with the plantain). Lassen, at first hesitatingly (i. 262), and then more positively (ii. 678), adopts this interpretation, and seeks ariena in the Skt. vāraṇa. The shrewder Gilde-meister does the like, for he, sans phrase, uses ariene as Latin for 'plantains.' Ritter, too, accepts it, and is not staggered even by the uno quaternos satiet. Humboldt, quoth he, often saw Indians make their meal with a very little manioc and three bananas of the big kind (Platano-arten). Still less sufficed the Indian Brahmins (sapientes), when one fruit was enough for four of them (v. 876, 877). Bless the venerable Prince of Geographers! Would one Kartoffel, even "of the big kind," make a dinner for four German Professors? Just as little would one plantain suffice four Indian Sages.

The words which we have italicised in the passage from Pliny are quite enough to show that the jack is intended; the fruit growing e cortice (i.e. piercing the bark of the stem, not pendent from twigs like other fruit), the sweetness, the monstrous size, are in combination infallible. And as regards its being the fruit of the sages, we may observe that the jack fruit is at this day in Travancore one of the staples of life. But that Pliny, after his manner, has jumbled things, is also manifest. The first two clauses of his description (Major alia, &c.; Folium alas, &c.) are found in Theophrastus, but apply to two different trees. Hence we get rid of the puzzle about the big leaves, which led scholars astray after plantains, and originated Musa sapientum. And it is clear from Theophrastus that the fruit which caused dysentery in the Macedonian army was yet another. So Pliny has rolled three plants into one. Here are the passages of Theophrastus:—

"(1) And there is another tree which is both itself a tree of great size, and produces a fruit that is wonderfully big and sweet. This is used for food by the Indian Sages, who wear no clothes. (2) And there is yet another which has the leaf of a very long shape, and resembling the wings of birds, and this they set upon helmets; the length is about two cubits. . . . (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("Ἄλλο τέ ἐστιν οὗ ὁ καρπὸς μακρὸς καὶ οὐκ εὐθεὶς ἀλλὰ σκολιός, ἐσθλὸς μένος δὲ γλυκός. Οὗτος ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ διγμὸν ποιεῖ καὶ δυσεντήριαν . . .") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it."—(Hist. Plant. iv. 4-6).

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds' wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the jack; the third was, we suspect, the mango (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the uno quaternos satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below, on the jack: "Sufficiet circiter pro quinque personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar's account is worth comparing with Pliny's. Pliny says that it took four men to eat a jack, Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry!

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Skt. phalasa, or panasa. Or it may be merely phala, 'a fruit,' and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, 'What on earth is that?' as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: 'Phal hai khudāvand!'—'It is a fruit, my lord!' Ariena looks like hiranya, 'golden,' which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the jack that we find is that by Hwen T'sang, who met with it in Bengal:—

c. A.D. 650.—“Although the fruit of the pan-va-so (panasa) is gathered in great quantities, it is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the fo-ling (Radix Chinæ), which is found under the ground.”—Julien, iii. 75.

c. 1328.—“There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chagui; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bloqui [a corruption of Malayal. varikka, ‘superior fruit’], quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself, down to the very roots.”—Friar Jordanus, 13-14.

c. 1330.—“And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth; they are of a fragrant odour and very savoury; the fruit is called chabassi.” The name is probably corrupt (perhaps chacassi). But the passage about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Baber's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavet de Courteille, which quite omits the “haggises.”

c. 1335.—“The Shaki and Barli. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows direct out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the barli; they are sweeter and better-flavoured than the Shaki . . .” etc. (much to the same effect as before).—Ibn Batuta, iii. 127; see also iv. 228.

c. 1350.—“There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Barut, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something marvellous to see, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are

c. 1440.—“There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 pippins, as big as figs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate membranes. These have each a kernel within, of a windy quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, wherefore they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cachi” (i.e. Çachi or Tzacchi).—Nicolo de Conti.

The description of the leaves . . . “foliis da modum palmi intercis”—is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congener the bread-fruit (Artocarpus incisa or incisifolia). We have translated from Poggio's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVth Century is far from accurate.

1530.—“Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odour?). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a haggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a filbert. . . . The fruit is very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk, but from its root. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!”—Leyden and Erskine's Baber, 325. Here kadhil represents the Hind. name kāḥal. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the “adhesive quality” (or as modern mortals would call it, ‘stickiness’) of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the cause of a proverb on premature precautions: Gāḥ'k meṇ Kāḥal, honth meṇ tel! “You have oiled your lips while the jack still hangs on the tree!” We may observe that the call of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gangetic districts rendered by the natives as Kāḥal pākā! Kāḥal pākā! i.e. “Jack's ripo,” the bird appearing at that season.

[1547.—“I consider it right to make over to them in perpetuity . . . one palm grove and an area for planting certain mango trees and jack trees (mangoirns or jacqueras) situate in the village of Calanguta. . . .”—Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, No. 88.]

c. 1590.—“In Sircar Hajypoor there are plenty of the fruits called Kathul and Budhul; some of the first are so large as to be too heavy for one man to carry."—Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 25. In Blochmann's ed. of the Persian text he reads barhal, [and so in Jarrott's trans. (ii. 152),] which is a Hind. name for the Artocarpus Lakoocha of Roxb.

1563.—"R. What fruit is that which is as big as the largest (coco) nuts?

"O. You just now ate the chestnuts from inside of it, and you said that roasted they were like real chestnuts. Now you shall eat the envelopes of these . . .

"R. They taste like a melon; but not so good as the better melons.

"O. True. And owing to their viscous nature they are ill to digest; or say rather they are not digested at all, and often issue from the body quite unchanged. I don't much use them. They are called in Malabar jacans; in Canara and Guzerat pande. . . . The tree is a great and tall one; and the fruit grows from the wood of the stem, right up to it, and not on the branches like other fruits."—Garcia, l. 111.

[1598.—"A certain fruit that in Malabar is called inca, in Canara and Guzerat Panar and Panara, by the Arabians Panax, by the Persians Panax."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 20.

[c. 1610.—"The Jaques is a tree of the height of a chestnut."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 366.

[1623.—"We had Ziacche, a fruit very rare at this time."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 261.]

1673.—"Without the town (Madras) grows their Rice . . . Jawke, a Coat of Armour over it, like an Hodge-hog's, guards its weighty Fruit."—Fryer, 40.

1810.—"The jack-wood . . . at first yellow, becomes on exposure to the air of the colour of mahogany, and is of as fine a grain."—Maria Graham, 101.

1878.—"The monstrous jack that in its eccentric bulk contains a whole magazine of tastes and smells."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

It will be observed that the older authorities mention two varieties of the fruit by the names of shakl and barhl, or modifications of these, different kinds according to Jordanus, only from different parts of the tree according to Ibn Batuta. P. Vincenzo Maria (1672) also distinguishes two kinds, one of which he calls Giacha Barca, the other Giacha papa or girazole. And Rheede, the great authority on Malabar plants, says (iii. 19):

"Of this tree, however, they reckon more than 30 varieties, distinguished by the quality of their fruit, but all may be reduced to two kinds; the fruit of one kind distinguished by plump and succulent pulp of delicious honey flavour, being the varaka; that of the other, filled with softer and more flabby pulp of inferior flavour, being the Tajakapa."

More modern writers seem to have less perception in such matters than the old travellers, who entered more fully and sympathetically into native tastes. Drury says, however, "There are several varieties, but what is called the Honey-jack is by far the sweetest and best."

"He that desireth to see more hereof let him reade Ludovicus Romanus, in his fifth Booke and fiftene Chapter of his Navigaciouns, and Christopherus a Costa in his cap. of Iaca, and Gracia al Horto, in the Second Booke and fourth Chapter," saith the learned Paludanus . . . And if there be anybody so unreasonable, so say we too—by all means let him do so! [A part of this article is derived from the notes to Jordanus by one of the present writers. We may also add, in aid of such further investigation, that Paludanus is the Latinised name of v.d. Broecke, the commentator on Linschoten. "Ludovicus Romanus" is our old friend Varthema, and "Gracia al Horto" is Garcia De Orta.]

JACKAL, s. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the newcomer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish chakal. But the Pers. shaghul is close, and Skt. friddla, 'the howler,' is probably the first form. The common Hind. word is gidar, ['the greedy one,' Skt. grah]. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting 'meets' in India; the indigenous fox being too small for sport.

1651.—"Non procul inde audio magnam clamorem et velut hominum irridendum insultantiumque voces. Interrogo quid sit; . . . narrant mihi alulatum esse bestiarum, quas Turcae Ciacales vocant. . . ."—Bushop. Epist. i. p. 78.

1616.—"The inhabitants do nightly house their goats and sheepe for feare of Iacalls (in my opinion no other than Foxes), whereof an infinite number do lurke in the obscure vaults."—Sandys, Relation, &c., 205.

1616.—" . . . these jackalls seem to be wild Dogges, who in great companies run up and down in the silent night, much disquieting the peace thereof, by their most hideous noise."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 371.

1673.—"An Hellish concert of Jackals (a kind of Fox)."—Fryer, 53.

1681.—"For here are many Jackalls, which catch their Hennes, some Tigra that destroy their Cattle; but the greatest of all is the King; whose endeavour is to keep them poor and in want."—Knox, Ceylon, 87. On p. 20 he writes Jacols.

1711.—"Jackcalls are remarkable for Howling in the Night; one alone making as much noise as three or four Cur Dogs, and in different Notes, as if there were half a Dozen of them got together."—Lockyer, 332.

1810.—Colebrook (Esauy, ii. 100, [Life, 155]) spelt shakal. But Jackal was already English.

Siege of Corinth, xxxiii.

1830.—"The mention of Jackal-hunting in one of the letters (of Lord Minto) may remind some Anglo-Indians still living, of the days when the Calcutta hounds used to throw off at gun-fire."—Sat. Rev. Feb. 11.

JACK-SNIPE of English sportsmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linn., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacina, Bonap.

JACKASS COPAL. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Jobson. It is, according to Sir R. Burton, [Zanzibar, i. 357], a corruption of chakazi. There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sandarusi m'ti, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered directly from the tree which exudes it (Trachylobium Mossambicense). 2. Chakazi or chaka-z, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sandarusi, or true Copal (the Animé of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 and 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. (Botany) for 1871). Of the meaning of chakazi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Kutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jahdzi, and = 'ship-copal.'

JACQUETE, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kāthiawār Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. (See quotation from Camoens under DIUL-SIND.) The last important map which gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrow-smith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Juggut.

1725.—In Valentyn's map we find Jaquete marked as a town (at the west point of Kāthiawār) and Encada da Jaquete for the Gulf of Cutch.

1727.—"The next sea-port town to Dart, is Jigat. It stands on a Point of low Land, called Cape Jigat. The City makes a good Figure from the Sea, showing 4 or 5 high Steeples."—A. Hamilton, i. 133; [ed. 1741].

1813.—"Jigat Point . . . on it is a pagoda; the place where it stands was formerly called Jigat Mow, but now by the Hindoos Dorecur (i.e. Dwarka, q.v.). At a distance the pagoda has very much the appearance of a ship under sail. . . . Great numbers of pilgrims from the interior visit Jigat pagoda. . . ."—Milburn, i. 150.

1811.—"Jigat Point called also Dwarka, from the large temple of Dwarka standing near the coast."—Morshburgh, Directory, 6th ed., i. 480.

JADE, s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yashm of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tash, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyacinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schiefner, a bezoar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tabakāt-i-Nāsirī, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukhārīstān and Bāmīān, has the following: "That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejādah [jade], and other [precious] things" (p. 421). On bejādah his note runs: "The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant." This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejāda, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Müller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards pedra de ijada, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. yada); for like reasons to which it was called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skent, s.v. says: "It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yedā a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyāvadāna; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit." Prof. Müller's etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind. [Prof. Max Müller's etymology is now accepted by the N.E.D. and by Prof. Skent in the new edition of his Concise Diet. The latter adds that ijada is connected with the Latin ilia.]

[1595.—"A kinde of greene stones, which the Spaniards call Piedras hijadas, and we use for spleene stones."—Raleigh, Discov. Guiana, 24 (quoted in N.E.D.).]

1730.—"Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtues by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it; and said to be a preservative against the nephritick Colick."—Bailey's Eng. Dict. s.v.

JADOO, s. Hind. from Pers. jādā, Skt. yātū, conjuring, magic, hocus-pocus.

[1826.—" 'Pray, sir,' said the barber, 'is that Sanscrit, or what language?' 'May be it is Jadoo,' I replied, in a solemn and deep voice."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 127.]

JADOOGUR, s. Properly Hind. jādūghar, 'conjuring-house' (see the last). The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemasons' Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitān khāna (see Burton's Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend's opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Talai-veṭṭa-Kovil, 'Cut-head Temple,' because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate's head being cut off and put on again.

JAFNA, JAFNAPATĀM, n.p. The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northernmost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Yalpannan, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Gulaba (Prom.) of Ptolemy. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tamil name as Yāzhppānam, from yāzh-pānan, 'a lute-player'; 'called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singalese king obtained possession of Jafna, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people.'] 1553.—" . . . the Kingdom Triquinamale, which at the upper end of its coast adjoins another called Jafanapatam, which stands at the northern part of the island."—Barros, III. ii. cap. i.

c. 1566.—In Cosmo de' Medici it is written Gianfanpatan.—Ramusio, iii. 390r.

[JAFFRY, s. A screen or lattice-work, made generally of bamboo, used for various purposes, such as a fence, a support for climbing plants, &c. The ordinary Pers. ja'fari is derived from a person of the name of Ja'far; but Mr. Platts suggests that in the sense under consideration it may be a corr. of Ar. ṣaṣirat, ṣaṣir, 'a braided lock.'

[1832.—"Of vines, the branches must also be equally spread over the jaffry, so that light and heat may have access to the whole."—Trans. Agri. Hort. Soc. Ind. ii. 202.]

JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. kajūr, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the caryota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevely and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kitul of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevely, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corr. of the Skt. śarkarā, Konkani saklārā, [Malayäl. chakkārā, whence it passed into Port. jagarrā, jagrá].

1516.—"Sugar of palms, which they call xagara."—Barbosa, 69.

1553.—Exports from the Maldives "also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jägara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1561.—"Jagro, which is sugar of palm-trees."—Corrae, London, i. 2, 592.

1563.—"And after they have drawn this pot of ṭura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra."—Garcia, i. 67.

c. 1567.—"There come every yeere from Cochin and from Cananor tenne or fiftene great Shippes (to Chaul) laden with great nuts . . . and with sugar made of the selfe same nuts called Glagra."—Cæsar I'ndolite, in Hall, ii. 311.

1598.—"Of the aforesaid sura they likewise make sugar, which is called Jagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereof it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour."—Lincolnton, 102; [Hak. Soc. ii. 19].

1616.—"Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raal (see ABRACK), distilled from Sugar, and a spicy rinde of a tree called Jagra."—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 365.

1727.—"The Produce of the Samorin's Country is . . . Cocoa-Nut, and that tree produceth Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copra (see COBRAH), or the kernels of the Nut dried."—A. Hamilton, i. 306; [ed. 1741, i. 308].

c. 1750-60.—"Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegar are also extracted from it" (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 47.

1807.—"The Turi or fermented juice, and the Jagory or inspissated juice of the Palmyra tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese."—F. Buchanan, Nyagore, &c., i. 5.

1860.—"In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound."—Tennant's Ceylon, iii. 521.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jāgīr, lit. 'place-holding.' A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[c. 1590.—"Furman-i-salibi are issued for . . . appointments to jāgirs, without military service."—Fin, i. 261.]

[1617.—"Heo quatte diuers small Jaggers to the King."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.]

c. 1666.—". . . Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horseman, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-gihirs, that is, good lands for their Pensions."—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 213].

1673.—"It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jagee, or diocese of another."—Fryer, 120.

"Jageah, an Annuity."—Ibid. Index, vi.

1768.—"I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them."—Mr. Lofly, in The Good-Natured Man, Act ii.

1778.—"Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jagghire.

"Sir John.—A Jagghire?

"Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Foots, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to Quag Mire): and this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—" . . . Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Orme, ed. 1808, ii. 52.

1809.—"He was nominally in possession of a larger jagghire."—Ld. Valentia, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jagghire, or the Company's Jagghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chingleput and present Collectorate of Madras.

[In the following the reference is to the Jirgah or tribal council of the Pathan tribes on the N.W. frontier.

[1800.—"No doubt upon the occasion of Lord Curzon's introduction to the Waziris and the Mohmunds, he will inform their Jagirs that he has long since written a book about them."—Contemporary Rev. Aug. p. 282.]

JAGHEERDAR, s. P.—H. jāgīr-dār, the holder of a jagheer.

[1813.—" . . . in the Mahratta empire the principal Jaghiredars, or nobles, appear in the field. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.]

1826.—"The Resident, many officers, men of rank . . . jagheerdars, Brahmins, and Pundits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 389; [ed. 1873, ii. 259].

1883.—"The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerdars, and paid them by their jagheers: the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 378.

JAIL-KHANA, s. A hybrid word for 'a gaol,' commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

JAIN, s. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 378 seq.; [Lassen, in Ind. Antig. ii. 193 seqq., 258 seqq.]). The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhas. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgrantha, 'without bond,' properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis), [and in particular of the Digambaras or 'sky-clad,' naked branch]. (Burnell, S. Indian Palaeography, p. 47, note.)

[c. 1590.—"Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhant."—Asin, ed. Jarrett, iii. 188.]

JALEEBOTE, s. Jālībōt. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Roe-buck). (See GALLEVAT.)

a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kāthiāwār, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). The title is probably Bilūch originally. There are several Jāms in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jām of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: "I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sindh. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Rājput or Jat origin, now, of course, all Musulmans. The Jām of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jāmhat. In the Dera Ghāzī Khān District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udhāna. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghāzī Khān town."]]

[c. 1590.—"On the Gujarat side towards the south is a Zamindār of note whom they call Jām. . . ."—Atn, ed. Jarrett, ii. 250.

[1843.—See under DAWK.]

b. A nautical measure, Ar. zām, pl. azwām. It occurs in the form gème in a quotation of 1614 under JASK. It is repeatedly used in the Mohit of Sidi 'Alī, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep's remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: "Concerning the measure of azwām the first section of the IIII. chapter explains as follows: 'The zām is either the practical one ('arfi), or the rhetorical (isfilāhī—but this the acute Prinsep suggests should be asfaridbī, 'pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe'). The practical is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the astrolabie) is the 8th part of an inch (isāba) in the ascension and descension of the stars; . . . an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a zām, in the reckoning of a ship's course." Prinsep then elucidates this: The zām in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see FUHUR). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, zām is possibly a corruption. Again, the isāba or inch, and the zām or $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi 'Alī's book that the isāba was very nearly equal to 96' and the zām to 12'. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term zām was still well known to nautical people as $\frac{1}{8}$ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

1013.—"J'ai déjà parlé de Séria (read Sarbaza) qui est située à l'extrémité de l'île de Lameri, à cent-vingt zāmā de Kala."—Ajaib-al-Hind, ed. Van der Lith et Marcel Deric, 176.

"Un marin m'a rapporté qu'il avait fait la traversée de Séria (Sarbaza) à la Chine dans un Sambou (see SAMBOOK). 'Nous avions parcouru,' dit-il, 'un espace de cinquante zāmā, lorsqu'une tempête fondit sur notre embarcation. . . . Ayant fait de l'eau, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Senf, suivant ses instructions, et nous y abordâmes sains et saufs, après un voyage de quinze zāmā."—Ibid. pp. 190-91.

1554.—"26th VOYAGE from Calicut to Kardaſun" (see GUARDAFUI).

" . . . you run from Calicut to Kolfaint (i.e. Kalpent, one of the Laccadive Ids.) two zāms in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zāms W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degree channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fāi, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardaſun."

"27th VOYAGE, from Diū to Malacca.

"Leaving Diū you go first S.S.E. till the pole is 5 inches, and side then towards the land, till the distance between it and the ship is six zāms; from thence you steer S.S.E. . . . you must not side all at once but by degrees, first till the farkadain (β and γ in the Little Bear) are made by a quarter less than 8 inches, from thence to S.E. till the farkadain are $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches, from thence true east at a rate of 18 zāms, then you have passed Ceylon."—The Mohit, in J.A.S.B. v. 465.

The meaning of this last rouler is: "Steer S.S.E. till you are in 8° N. Lat. (lat. of Cape Comorin); make then a little more easting, but keep 72 miles between you and the coast of Ceylon till you find the β and γ of Ursa Minor have an altitude of only 12° 24' (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5°), and then steer due east. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon."

1625.—"We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 giam. Giam is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every giam is equal to 3 leagues; inasmuch that from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 leagues."—P. della Valle, ii. 816.

JAMBOO, JUMBOO, s. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L. Jambosa vulgaris, Decand.; Skt. jambū, Hind. jam, jambā, jamrāl, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambū is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q.v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jāmun (see JAMOON), with which the rose-apple is often confounded in books. They are very different fruits, though they have both been classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under JAMOON). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is applied by the Malays both to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambū is applied.]

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambos, and says (1563) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malāka Jamrūi, and in Tamil Māldkū maram i.e. 'Malacca tree.' The Skt. name jambū is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

[1593.—"The trees whereon the Iambos do grow are as great as Plumtrees."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 31.]

1672. — P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Giambo d'India with great precision, and also the Giambo di China—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1727.—"Their Jambo Malacca (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—J. Hamilton, i. 255; [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1810.—"The jumboo, a species of rose-apple, with its flower like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hoogly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jal marī, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chittanuttlee, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, s. P.—H. jāma, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom-jama, wax-cloth. ["The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.)

[1813.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear . . . a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered sash."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 52].

JAMOON, s. Hind. jāmūn, jāman, jāmīl, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptanthus jambolana of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden's Baber which Mr. Erskine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jāmī as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jāmīl appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

c. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jāmūn, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write tehoumōn (iii. 128, iv. 114, 229), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1530.—"Another is the jaman. . . . It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 325. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jamba.—D.W.). The jaman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong aloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1553.—"I will eat of those olives, —, at least they look like such; but they are very astringent (poncticus) as if binding, —, and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives.

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbutus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111y.

1859.—“The Indian Jamli. . . It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the coast villages and plantations, and it produces a damson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour.”—Burton, in J.R.G.S. ix. 36.

JANCADA, s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhūts of Guzerat. The word is Malayāl. channidam (i.e. changngādam, [the Madras Gloss. writes channidam, and derives it from Skt. sanghata, ‘union’]), with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, ‘a raft.’ These jancadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1543.—“This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangadas because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodes, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others.”—Corrae, iv. 323.

c. 1610.—“I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him these Jangal, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs.”—Pyrrard de Laval, ch. xxv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray’s note in loco].

1672.—“The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Glançadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Glançadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 127.

See also Chungathum, in Burton’s Goa, p. 193.

JANGAR, s. A raft. Port. jangada. [“A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards across two boats, with a bamboo railing.” (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayāl. shangidam, channidam (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin], preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 60-99.—“The vessels belonging to these places (Cumara, Poleet, and Syntrira on the east coast) which hug the shore to Lamyrië (Daryneë), and others also called Sāyypa, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Tinger, and are called Kolaridlopora.”—Periplus, in Müller’s Geog. Gr. Min., i. “The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. lulinda = hollowed: the lat. clava = boat.”—Bernell, S.I. Palaeography, 612.

c. 1501.—“He held in readiness many jangadas of timber.”—Corrae, Lendas, I. i. 476.

c. 1510.—“. . . and to that purpose had already commanded two great lafts (jāgadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.), in Cogan, p. 66.

1553.—“. . . the fleet . . . which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men.”—Barnes, II. i. 5.

1598.—“Such as stayed in the ship, some took boards, deals, and other pieces of wood, and bound them together (which y^e Portugals call jangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore.”—Linschoten, p. 117; [Hak. Soc. ii. 181; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 53 seq.].

1602.—“For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and cars.”—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—“. . . having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh.”—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple’s Or. Rep. i. 189.

c. 1780.—“Sangarie.” See quotation under HACKERY.

c. 1793.—“Nous nous remîmes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d’un palmier creusé.”—Hausner, ii. 77.

JANGOMAY, ZANGOMAY, JAMAHEY, &c., n.p. The town and state of Siamese Laos, called by the Burmese Zimmet, by the Siamese Xieng-

mai or Kiang-mai, &c., is so called in narratives of the 17th century. Serious efforts to establish trade with this place were made by the E.I. Company in the early part of the 17th century, of which notice will be found in Purchas, Pilgrimage, and Sainsbury, c.g. in vol. i. (1614), pp. 311, 325; (1615) p. 425; (1617) ii. p. 90. The place has again become the scene of commercial and political interest; an English Vice-Consulate has been established; and a railway survey undertaken. [See Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 74 seqq.]

c. 1544.—“Out of this Lake of Singapamor . . . do four very large and deep rivers proceed, wherof the first . . . runneth Eastward through all the Kingdoms of Sornau and Siam . . . ; the Second, Jangumaa . . . disimboking into the Sea by the Bar of Martabano in the Kingdom of Pegu . . .”—Pinto (in Cogan, 165).

1653.—(Barros illustrates the position of the different kingdoms of India by the figure of a (left) hand, laid with the palm downwards) “And as regards the western part, following always the sinew of the forefinger, it will correspond with the ranges of mountains running from north to south along which lie the kingdom of Avá, and Bremá, and Jangomá.”—III. ii. 5.

c. 1587.—“I went from Pegu to Iamayhey, which is in the Countrey of the Langeiannes, whom we call Jangomes; it is five and twentie dayes journey to Northeast from Pegu . . . Hither to Iamayhey come many Merchants out of China, and bring great store of Muske, Gold, Silver, and many things of China worke.”—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1606.—“But the people, or most part of them, fled to the territories of the King of Jangoma, where they were met by the Padre Friar Francisco, of the Annunciation, who was there negotiating . . .”—Bocarro, 136.

1612.—“The Siamese go out with their heads shaven, and leave long mustachioes on their faces; their garb is much like that of the Peguans. The same may be said of the Jangomas and the Laojoes” (see LAN JOHN).—Couto, V. vi. 1.

c. 1615.—“The King (of Pegu) which now reigneth . . . hath in his time recovered from the King of Syam . . . the town and kingdom of Zangomay, and therein an Englishman called Thomas Samuel, who not long before had been sent from Syam by Master Lucas Anthonion, to discover the Trade of that country by the sale of certaine goods sent along with him for that purpose.”—W. Methold, in Purchas, v. 1006.

JAPAN, n.p. Mr. Giles says: “Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Ni-pon.” What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see. [“Our word ‘Japan’ and the Japanese Nihon or Nippon, are alike corruptions of Jih-pen, the Chinese pronunciation of the characters (meaning) literally ‘sun-origin.’” (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 221).] A form closely resembling Japán, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chi-pan-gu or Jipan-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-pán-Kue (‘Sun-origin-Kingdom’), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Nippon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation. But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawford gives as Jápung and Jápang.

1605.—“. . . and not far off they took a ship belonging to the King of Calicut; out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; including Meccese pearls worth 8,000 ducats; also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrologers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Calicut had sent the said ship to an island called Saponin to obtain the said instruments. . . .”—Letter from the K. of Portugal (Dom Manuel) to the K. of Castille (Ferdinand). Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881, p. 8.

1521.—“In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands; one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Cipangu.”—Pigafetta, Magellan's Voyage, Hak. Soc., 67. Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Cipangu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

1545.—“Now as for us three Portuguese, having nothing to sell, we employed our time either in fishing, hunting, or seeing the Temples of these Gentiles, which were very sumptuous and rich, whereinto the Bonces, who are their priests, received us very courteously, for indeed it is the custom of those of Jappon (do Japão) to be exceedingly kind and courteous."—Pinto (orig. cap. cxxiv.), in Cogan, E.T. p. 173.

1553.—"After leaving to the eastward the isles of the Leguicos (see LEW CHEW) and of the Jappons (dos Japões), and the great province of Meaco, which for its great size we know not whether to call it Island or Continent, the coast of China still runs on, and those parts pass beyond the antipodes of the meridian of Lisbon."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON, &c.

The name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be a little obscurity. The English Encyclopaedia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866), identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barbosa (who mentions the stone several times under the form jagonza and jagonza), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with corundum. This is probably an error. Jagonza looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Haüy's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyacinth is applied to these stones, consisting of a silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless, and has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3rd ed., 1850, 379-380; [Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xiv. 789 seq.]).

The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. a- zarcon, a word of which there is a curious history in Dozy and Engelmann. Two Spanish words and their distinct Arabic originals have been confounded in the Span. Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) and others following him. Sp. zarca is 'a woman with blue eyes,' and this comes from Ar. zarkā, fem. of azrak, 'blue.' This has led the lexicographers above referred to astray, and azarcon has been by them defined as a 'blue earth, made of burnt lead.' But azarcon really applies to 'red-lead,' or vermillion, as does the Port. azarcão, azarcão, and its proper sense is as the Dict. of the Sp. Academy says (after repeating the inconsistent explanation and etymology of Cobarruvias), "an intense orange-colour, Lat. color aureus." This is from the Ar. zarkūn, which in Ibn Baithar is explained as synonymous with salikūn, and asranj, "which the Greeks call sandix," i.e. cinnabar or vermillion (see Sontheimer's Ebn Baithar, i. 44, 530). And the word, as Dozy shows, occurs in Pliny under the form syricum (see quotations below). The eventual etymology is almost certainly Persian, either zargūn, 'gold colour,' as Marcel Devic suggests, or azargūn (perhaps more properly ā-zargūn, from āzar, 'fire'), 'flame-colour,' as Dozy thinks.

colours."—Fra Paolino, Eng. ed. 1800, 393.
(This is a very loose translation. Fra Paolino evidently thought Jargon was a figurative name applied to this mixture of stones, as it is to a mixture of languages).

1813.—"The colour of Jargons is grey, with tinges of green, blue, red, and yellow."
—I. Maive, [A Treatise on Diamonds, &c. 119.

1860.—"The 'Mature Diamonds,' which

JAROOI, s. The Lagerstroemia reginae, Roxb. H.—Beng. jarāl, jīral. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceeding glorious tree of the Concan jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Mos reginae."—Sir G. Birdwood, MS.

1850.—"Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell Jarool, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Mtn. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 313.

1855.—"Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the Jarool, covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood's Mag., May 1856, 533.

JASK, JASQUES, CAPE-. n.p. Ar. Rās Jāshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Omān, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1622) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. Jask appears in Yākūt as "a large island between the land of Omān and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse, p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

JAUN, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. [Mr. H. Beveridge points out that it is derived from H.—Beng. yān, defined by Sir G. Haughton: "a vehicle, any means of conveyance, a horse, a carriage, a palkee." It is Skt. yāna, with the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja. The root is yā, 'to go.' It is, or was, applied to a small palankin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His 'Iasādlav represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-dvīpa (see under DIU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Rāmāyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Koṭi, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jāva, Jāvi were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms "Golden and Silver Islands" (Suvarṇa dvīpa and Rāpya dvīpa), which occur in the quotation from the Rāmāyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysē and Argyrē, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:—(1.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa and Yava-dvīpa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2.) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Java; (4.) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5.) By Yava-koṭi was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Rāmāyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production. [Mr. Skeat notes as an interesting fact that the standard Malay name Jawā and the Javanese Jāva preserve the original form of the word.]

* The Teutonic word Corn affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Corn in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'maize.'

(Ancient).—"Search carefully Yava dvīpa, adorned by seven Kingdoms, the Gold and Silver Island, rich in mines of gold. Beyond Yava dvīpa is the Mountain called Sisira, whose top touches the sky, and which is visited by gods and demons."—Rāmāyana, IV. xl. 80 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 150.—"Iabadiu ('Iapadlov), which means 'Island of Barley,' most fruitful the island is said to be, and also to produce much gold; also the metropolis is said to have the name Argyrē (Silver), and to stand at the western end of the island."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 29.

992.—"Djava is situated in the Southern Ocean. . . . In the 12th month of the year (992) their King Maradja sent an embassy . . . to go to court and bring tribute."—Groeneveldt's Notes from Chinese Sources, pp. 15-17.

1298.—"When you sail from Zlamba (Chamba) 1500 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest Island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 3000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king. . . . Pepper, nutmegs, spike, galanga, cubeb, cloves, and all the other good spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandise from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell it."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, ii. 61.

c. 1330.—"In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist. . . . The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous. . . . Now the great Khan of Cathay many a time engaged in war with this King; but this King always vanquished and got the better of him."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 87-88.

c. 1444.—"Sunt insulae duae in interiori India, e pone extremis orbis finibus, ambae Java nomine, quarum altera tribus, altera duobus millibus milliarum protenditur orientem versus; sed Majoris, Minorisque cognomine discernuntur."—N. Conti, in Poggins, De Var. Fortunae.

1503.—The Syrian Bishops Thomas, Jaballah, Jacob, and Donha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian) Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go "to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN)."—Assemani, III. Pt. 1. 592. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zābaj of the Relation, of Ma'sūdī, and of Al-bīrūnī.

1516.—"Further on . . . there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great. . . . They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world. . . . There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboos, cubeb, and gold. . . ."—Barbosa, 197.

1224.—"Ma'bar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sin), the first part of which is Jāwa, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Yāqūt, i. 516.

"This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without vouching for its truth . . . for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to wit the country known as Jāwa on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloeswood ('ūd), camphor, and nard (senbul), and clove, and mace (basāsa), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Ibid. iii. 445.

Kazwini speaks in almost the same words of Jāwa. He often copies Yākut, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jāwa) on account of the distance and difference of religion"—ii. 18.

1298.—"When you leave this Island of Pontam and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java. The Less. For all its name 'tis none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more. . . ." &c.—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

c. 1300.—". . . In the mountains of Jāwa scented woods grow. . . . The mountains of Jāwa are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashid-uddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

1323.—"There is also another exceeding great island, which is called Jawa, which is in circuit more than seven (thousand ?) miles as I have heard, and where are many world's wonders. Among which, besides the finest aromatic spices, this is one, to wit, that there be found pygmy men. . . . There are also trees producing cloves, which when they are in flower emit an odour so pungent that they kill every man who cometh among them, unless he shut his mouth and nostrils. . . . In a certain part of that island they delight to eat white and fat men when they can get them. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, 30-31.

c. 1330.—"Parmi les îles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djāwah, grande île célèbre par l'abondance de ses drogues . . . au sud de l'île de Djāwah on remarque la ville de Fansour, d'où le camphre Fansotri tire son nom."—Géog. d'Aboulfeda, II. pt. n. 127. [See CAMPHOR.]

c. 1346.—"After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jāwa, which gives its name to the lubān jāwī (see BENJAMIN). . . . We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 223-230.

1553.—"And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Jawis (Jatija), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Jāos) were formerly lords of this great Island. . . ."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555.—"Beyond the Island of Iaua they sailed along by another called Bali; and then came also vnto other called Anjaue, Cambaba, Solor. . . . The course by these "Islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name Iauos; but late experience hath found the names to be very diuers as you see."—Antonio Galeano, old E.T. in Hall. iv. 423.

1856.—

"It is a saying in Goozerat,—

'Who goes to Java

Never returns.

Ras Mida, ii. 82; [ed. 1878, p. 418].

JAVA-RADISH, s. A singular variety (Raphanus caudatus, L.) of the common radish (R. sativus, L.), of which the pods, which attain a foot in length, are eaten and not the root. It is much cultivated in Western India, under the name of mugra [see Baden-Powell, Punjab Products, i. 260]. It is curious that the Hind. name of the common radish is māli, from māl, 'root,' exactly analogous to radish from radix.

[JAVA-WIND, s. In the Straits Settlements an unhealthy south wind blowing from the direction of Java is so called. (Compare SUMATRA, h.)]

JAWAUB, s. Hind. from Ar. jawāb, 'an answer.' In India it has, besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawaub'd.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times 'jawaub'd'.]

1830.—"'The Jawawb'd Club,' asked Elsmere, with surprise, 'what is that?'

"'Tis a fanciful association of those melancholy candidates for wedlock who have fallen in their pursuit, and are smarting under the sting of rejection."—Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 424.]

Jawāb among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where

"Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

"In the houses of many chiefs every picture on the walls has its jawāb (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawāb (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the original in the Darbar room" (M.-Gen. Keatinge). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawāb) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Taj. This last is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer, Monumental Antiquities, N.W.P., p. 64.]

JAY, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias Indica, Linn., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1878.—"They are the commonality of birddom, who furnish forth the mobs which bower the drunken-flighted jay when he jerks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphen-flashes through the air. . . ."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 3.]

JEEL, s. Hind. jhil. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remanent inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.).

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootoo jeel."—Holwell's Letter of Feb. 23, in Wheeler, Early Records, 250.]

The Jhils of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:—

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Sylhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 166.

1824.—"At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Heber, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 285.

1885.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . ."—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

JEETUL, s. Hind. jital. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms ceitils and zoitiles. It is doubtful, however, if ceitil is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called ceitil and ceptil (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciencias de Lisboa, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jital of the Delhi coinage of Alā-ud-dīn (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations, $\frac{1}{16}$ of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pie. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193-4.—"According to Kutb-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mohammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dihli; and Malik Kutb-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jitals."—Raverty, Zabañuf-i-Nāṣiri, p. 603.

c. 1290.—"In the same year . . . there was dearth in Dohli, and grain rose to a jital per sir (see SEER)."—Ẓihād-ud-dīn Darni, in Elliot, iii. 146.

* Afterwards M.-Gen. G. Hutchinson, C.B., C.S.I., Sec. to the Ch. Misay. Society.

c. 1340.—“The dirhem sultāni is worth 4 of the dirhem shashūni . . . and is worth 3 fals, whilst the jital is worth 4 fals; and the dirhem hashikāni, which is exactly the silver dirhem of Egypt and Syria, is worth 32 fals.”—Shihābuddin, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 212.

1554.—In Sunda. “The cash (caizas) here go 120 to the tanga of silver; the which caizas are a copper money larger than ceitils, and pierced in the middle, which they say have come from China for many years, and the whole place is full of them.”—A. Nunes, 42.

c. 1590.—“For the purpose of calculation the dam is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jétal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.”—Atin, ed. Blochmann, i. 31.

c. 1750-60.—“At Carwar 6 pices make the juttal, and 48 juttals a Pagoda.”—Grose, i. 282.

JEHAUD, s. Ar. jihad, [‘an effort, a striving’]; then a sacred war of Musulmans against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, ‘a crescentade.’

[c. 630 A.D.—“Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have been given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth, until they pay tribute (jizyah) out of hand, and they be humbled.”—Korān, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.—“When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and roused the people in a sort of Jihad, or holy war, for her defence.”—Sat. Review, July 17, 84b.

[1901.—“The matter has now assumed the aspect of a ‘Schad,’ or holy war against Christianity.”—Times, April 4.]

JELAUBEE, s. Hind. jalebi, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zalābiya, P. zālībīya]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—“The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees.”—Chevers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

JELLY, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss. gives it as a synonym for kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of

C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zalli, Tam. shalli, which means properly ‘shivers, bits, pieces.’

[1868.—“ . . . ancients in some instances coated over the crown with jelly in chunam.”—Nelson, Man. of Madura, Pt. v. 53.]

JELUM, n.p. The most westerly of the “Five Rivers” that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jailam or Jilam, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jhilam is the Tódarmys of Alexander’s historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vitastā, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy’s Bódarmys. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behat (see BEHUT).

1037.—“Here ho (Mahmūd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply . . . into the Jailam . . .”—Bahakī, in Elliot, ii. 139.

c. 1204.—“ . . . in the height of the conflict, Shams-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam . . . and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell . . .”—Tabakāt, by Rawerty, 604-5.

“Hydaspes! often have thy waves run tuned
To battle music, since the soldier King,
The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque
And swam thy swollen flood, until the time When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclassing her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O’er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chillian’s bloody field.”
The Banyan Tree.

JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jama’dar, jama’ meaning ‘an aggregate,’ the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jama’dat, ‘an assemblage.’] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoys, the Sūbadār (see SOUBADAR) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the reorganisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dārogha), of the customs, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemadâr, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables, camp service and orderlies. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bihishtî (see BHEESTY).

1752.—“The English battalion no sooner quitted Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishing his scheme of surprising the City, and . . . endeavoured to gain 600 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemautdars, or captains of these troops, received his bribes and promised to join.”—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 257.

1817.—“ . . . Calliaud had commenced an intrigue with some of the jemautdars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly.”—Mill, iii. 176.

1821.—“‘Abdullah’ was a Mussulman convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was returning . . . when the Bishop took him into his service as a ‘jemautdar,’ or head officer of the peons.”—Editor's note to Heber, ed. 1844, i. 65.

[1825.—“The principal officers are called Jummahdars, some of whom command five thousand horse.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 56.]

JENNYE, n.p. Hind. Janai. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see BURRAM-POOTER), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago: “In Rennell's time, the Burrampooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burrampooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jenai, and uniting with the Ganges near Pabna (about 150 miles N.E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers under the name of Pudda (Padda) flow on in mighty union to the sea.” (Blackwood's Mag., March 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burrampooter in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. C) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his Memoir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of the last century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: “The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Nator.” (Eastern India, iii. 304; see also 377.) Nator or Nattore was the territory now called Rajshahi District. The real direction of the change has been further south. The Janai is also called the Jamuna (see under JUMNA). Hooker calls it Jummal (?) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burrampooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 259).

JENNYRICKSHAW, s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-ri-ki-sha, signifying ‘Man—Strength—Cart.’ The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of “Pull-man-Car!” The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla and other hill-stations. [The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as “Public-spirited Smith” (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1868-70, or to an American named Goble, “half-cobbler and half-missionary.” See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.]

1876.—“A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle.”—H. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 163.

1880.—“The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a wall for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends.”—Miss Bird, Japan, i. 18.

[1885.—“We . . . got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent to the theatre."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 89.]

JEZYA, s. Ar. jizya. The poll-tax which the Musulman law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

[c. 630 A.D. See under JEHAUD.]

c. 1300.—"The Kāzi replied . . . 'No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jizya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but "Death or Islam."'—Zia-ud-din Barni, in Elliot, iii. 181.

1633—"Understand what customs ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking customs and Jidgea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement."—Vizier's Letter to Nabob, in Hedges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1686.—"Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Jidgea lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch. . . . Among the orders issued to Pattana Cosum-bazar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Jidgea or Poll-tax, if demanded."—Fr. St. Geo. Consuls. (on Tour) Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 49.

1765.—"When the Hindoo Rajahs . . . submitted to Tamarlane; it was on these capital stipulations: That . . . the emperors should never impose the jesserah (or poll-tax) upon the *Hindoo*s."—Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 37.

JHAUMP, s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhānp, Mahr. jhānpa; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. jhānp-nā, jhāpnā, dhānpnā, 'to cover.' See jhoprā, s.v. ak; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOOM, s. jhīm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kumari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the taung-gyan of Burma [Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dahya of North India (Skt. dah, 'to burn'), ponam (Tam. pun, 'inferior'), or ponacaud (Mal. punak- kātu, pun, 'inferior,' kātu, 'forest') of Malabar]. In the Philippine Islands it is known as gaingees; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svedjunde (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

[1800.—"In this hilly tract are a number of people . . . who use a kind of cultivation called the Cotucadu, which a good deal resembles that which in the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jamea."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 177.]

1833.—"It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice. . . . The people jumed as before, regardless of orders."—Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1835.—"Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. . . ." (Here follows an account of the process).—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seqq.

JIGGY-JIGGY, adv. Japanese equivalent for 'make haste!' The Chinese syllables chih-chih, given as the origin, mean 'straight, straight!' Qu. 'right ahead?' (Bp. Moule).

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word 'jhilmilā' seems to mean 'sparkling,' and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platts in his H. Dict.] Or it may have been an onomatopoeia, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as janella, 'a window.' All this is conjecture.

[1832.—"Besides the purdahs, the openings between the pillars have blinds neatly made of bamboo strips, wove together with coloured cords: these are called jhilmuns or cheeks" (see CHICK, s.).—Mrs. Mer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.]

1874.—"The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jillmilled windows."—Calc. Review, No. cxvii. 207.

JOCOLE, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps 'toys'? [Mr.

W. Foster writes: "On looking up the I.O. copy of the Ft. St. George Consultations for Nov. 22, 1703, from which Wheeler took the passage, I found that the word is plainly not jocolles, but jocollet, which is a not unusual form of chocolate." The N.E.D. s.v. Chocolate, gives as other forms jocolatte, jocolatt, jocolat.]

1703.—". . . sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocolles, oil, and wines."—In Wheeler, ii. 32.

JOGEE, s. Hind. jogi. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjurer.' From Skt. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1343.—"We cast anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . . We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a buddhana or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442.—"The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent., 17.

1510.—"The King of the Joghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear . . ."—Varthema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Garakhnatha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle's notice below.

1516.—"And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world . . . they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes. . . . These people are commonly called jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zoame (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God. . . . These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idoltry."—Barbosa, 99-100.

1553.—"Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Goutoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the strictest sort of their Religion . . . saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."—De Barros, Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 3.

"For this reason the place (Adam's Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile- dom of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jógues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."—Ibid. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563.—". . . to make them fight, like the cobras de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also. . . ."—Garcia, f. 156r, 157.

[c. 1610.—"The Gentiles have also their Abedalles (Abd-Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 343.]

1621.—"Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gioghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage, and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman . . . they told me his name was Batinata, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)."—P. della Valle, ii. 721; [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75].

[1667.—"I allude particularly to the people called Jauguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'"—Berter, ed. Constable, 316.]

1673.—"Near the Gate in a Choultry sat more than Forty naked Jogues, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and plaited Turbats of their own Hair."—Fryer, 160.

1727.—"There is another sort called Jogues, who . . . go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loyns, and some dony themselves even that, delighting in Nastiness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great shafts of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawford's Malay Dict. "Jampana (Jav. Jampona), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz (1876) gives: "Djem-pānā—dragstool (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." [Klinkert has jempāna, djempana, sempana as a State sedan-chair, and he connects sempana with Skt. sam-panna, 'that which has turned out well, fortunate.' Wilkinson has: "jempāna, Skt.? a kind of State carriage or sedan for ladies of the court."] The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811-15), for its use is much older in the Himalaya, as may be seen from the quotation from P. Desideri.

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dp̄yān means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

Wilson, however, has the following: "Jhāmpān, Bengali. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himalaya, written Jāmpāun (?)." [Both Platts and Fallon give the word jhappān as Hind.; the former does not attempt a derivation; the latter gives Hind. jhānp, 'a cover,' and this on the whole seems to be the most probable etymology. It may have been originally in India, as it is now in the Straits, a closed litter for ladies of rank, and the word may have become appropriated to the open conveyance in which European ladies are carried.]

1716.—"The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampan, a sort of palankin."—Letter of P. Ipólito Desideri, dated April 10, in Lettres Édif. xv. 181.

1783.—(After a description) "... by these central poles the litter, or as it is here called, the Sampan, is supported on the shoulders of four men."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1803, ii. 3.

[1822.—"The Chumpāun, or as it is more frequently called, the Chumpāla, is the usual vehicle in which persons of distinction, especially females, are carried. . . ."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 105.

[1842.—"... a conveyance called a Jampan, which is like a short palankoon, with an arched top, slung on three poles (like what is called a Tonjon in India). . . ."—Elphinstone, Caubul, ed. 1842, i. 137.

[1849.—"A Jhappan is a kind of arm chair with a canopy and curtains; the canopy, &c., can be taken off."—Mrs. MacKenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 103.]

1879.—"The gondola of Simla is the 'jampan' or 'jampot,' as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle . . . as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. . . . Every lady on the hills keeps her jampan and jampaneas . . . just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17.

JOOL, JHOOL, s. Hind. jhāl, supposed by Shakespear (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Ar. jull, having much the same meaning; [but Platts takes it from jhālnā, 'to dangle'. Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plur. jūlūl as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine plus ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval" (exactly the Indian jhāl)—also "ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

1880.—"Horse Jhools, &c., at shortest notice."—Advt. in Madras Mail, Feb. 13.

JOOLA, s. Hind. jhūla. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himalaya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

[1812.—"There are several kinds of bridges constructed for the passage of strong currents and rivers, but the most common are the Sāngha and Jhūla" (a description of both follows).—Asiat. Res. xi. 475.]

1890.—"Our chief object in descending to the Sutlej was to swing on a Joolah bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given, and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

JOSS, s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deos, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Pidgin' language of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word. [See CHIN-CHIN.]

1659.—"But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly called Joosse) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World."—Walter Schult, 17.

"In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image . . . this they call Josin."—Siar, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677.—"All the Sineses keep a limning of the Devil in their houses. . . . They paint him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Joosje)."—Gerrit Verreulen, Oost Indische Voyagie, 23.

1711.—"I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joss or God in his own House."—Lockyer, 181.

1727.—"Their Josses or Demi-gods some of human shape, some of monstrous Figure."—A. Hamilton, in 293; [ed. 1711, in 235].

c. 1790.—

"Down with dukes, earls, and lords, those pagan Josses, False gods! away with stars and strings and crosses."

Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

1793.—"The images which the Chinese worship are called Joostje by the Dutch, and Joss by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them."—Schrieverius, f.T. i. 173.
This is of course quite wrong.

JOSS-HOUSE, s. An idol temple in China or Japan. From joss, as explained in the last article.

1750-52.—"The sailors, and even some books of voyages . . . call the pagodas Yoss houses, for on enquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Gran Dieu."—Oluf. Torrey, 232.

1760-1810.—"On the 8th, 18th, and 25th day of the Moon those foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Houran Joss-house, but not in droves of over ten at a time."—"8 Regulations" at Canton, from The Funckae at Canton (1832), p. 23.

1810.—"Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 186.

1876.—" . . . the fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large Joss-house, or temple."—Fortnightly Review, No. cliii. 222.

1876:—

"One Tim Wang he makeo-thavel, Makeo stop one night in Joss-house."
Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house man or Joss pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

JOSTICK, JOSS-STICK, s. "A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered cactus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. (See POTCHOCK.)

1876.—"Burnes joss stick, talkee plitty."—Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 43.

1879.—"There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the Joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense."—Miss Bird, Golden Plover, 49.

JOW, s. Hind. jhān. The name is applied to various species of the shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket-making and the like. It is the usual material for gabions and fascines in Indian siege-operations.

[c. 1803.—" . . . by the natives it is called jhau; but this name is generic, and is applied not only to another species of Tamarisk, but to the Casuarina of Bengal, and to the cone-bearing plants that have been introduced by Europeans."—Buckland-Harvillan, Eastern India, iii. 597.

[1840.—" . . . on the opposite Jow, or bastard tamarisk jungle . . . a native . . . had been attacked by a tiger. . . ."—Durbin, Travels, ii. 326.]

JOWAULLA MOOKHEE, n.p. Skt.—Hind. Jwālā-mukhi, 'flame-mouthed'; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Bias River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devi, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himalaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwālā-mukhi. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

c. 1360.—"Sultan Firuz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot (see NUGURCOTE) . . . the idol Jwālā-mukhi, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot. . . . Some of the infidels have reported that Sultán Firoz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But . . . the infidels slandered the Sultán. . . . Other infidels said that Sultán Muhammad Sháh bin Tughlák Sháh held an umbrella over this same idol, but this 'also is a lie. . . .'"—Shams-i-Siráj Afif, in Elliot, iii. 318.

1616.—". . . a place called Ialla mokee, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467.

[c. 1617.—In Sir T. Roe's Map, "Jallamakee, the Pilgrimage of the Banians."—Hak. Soc. ii. 535.]

1783.—"At Taullah Mhokee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Panjab."—G. Förster's Journey, ed. 1798, i. 308.

1799.—"Prason Poory afterwards travelled . . . to the Maha or Bureo (i.e. larger) Jowalla Mookhi or Jualla Múchi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bakee (Baku) on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea . . . whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOWAUR, JOWARREE, s. Hind. jawár, juár, [Skt. yava-prakāra or akāra, 'of the nature of barley';] Sorghum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorghum, L.) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unflooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the cholam of the Tamil regions. The stalks are Kirbee. The Ar. dura or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as jawár; for the old Semitic name is dokn, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an odd instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Guzerattee, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls "Jocar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

[c. 1590.—In Khandesh "Jowári is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit."—Atin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 223.]

1760.—"En suite mauvais chemin sur des levées faites de boue dans des quarrés de Jouari et des champs de Nelis (see NELLY) remplis d'eau."—Anquetil du Perron, i. cccclxxxiii.

1800.—". . . My industrious followers must live either upon Jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves."—Wellington, i. 175.

1813.—Forbes calls it "juarree or cush-cush" (†). [See CUSCUS.]—Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. ii. 35, and i. 23].

1819.—"In 1797-8 Jowaree sold in the Muchoo Kaunta at six rupees per culse (see CULSEY) of 24 maunds."—Macmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. B. i. 287.

[1828.—"And the sabre began to cut away upon them as if they were a field of Joannee (standing corn)."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873 i. 66.]

JOY, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jewel (Port. joia).

1810.—"The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation . . . to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Maria Graham, 3.

JUTTEE, JUPTEE, &c., s. Guz. japṭī, &c. Corrupt forms of zabtī. ["Watan-zabtī, or -japṭī, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment" (Wilson).] (See ZUBT.)

1808.—"The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Mooj-moodars and Desoys (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 58,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—R. Drummond. [Majmūdār "in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todar Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages." (Wilson).]

JUDEA, ODIS, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Rāma, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANGCOK.]

1522.—"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zacenbedora, and who inhabits Iudia."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 1560.

c. 1546.—"The capitall City of all this Empire is Odian, whereof I haue spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, foure hundred thousand fires, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of diuers countries."—Pinto, in Cogan's E.T. p. 235; orig. cap. clxxxix.

1553.—"For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Hudia alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Sido), and the residence of the King, furnishes 60,000 men of its own."—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614.—"As regards the size of the City of Odia . . . it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that . . . he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues."—Couto, VI. vii. 8.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangama (see JANGOMAY) arrived at 'the city of Judea' before Eaton's coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

"1 (letter) from Mr. Bonjamyn Farry in Judea, at Syam."—Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 272.

[1639.—"The chief of the Kingdom is India by some called Odia . . . the city of India, the ordinary Residence of the Court is seated on the Menam."—Mandelstol, Travels, E.T. ii. 122.

[1693.—"As for the City of Siam, the Siamese do call it Si-yo-thi-ya, the o of the syllable yo being closer than our (French) Diphthong au."—La Loubère, Siam, E.T. i. 7.]

1727.—". . . all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King's Use. . . . The City stands on an Island in the River Menam, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the distance from the Bar about 60 Leagues."—A. Hamilton, ii. 160; [ed. 1744].

[1774.—"Ayuttaya with its districts Dvaravati, Yodaya and Kamanpak."—Ins. in Ind. Antig. xxii. 4.

[1827.—"The powerful Lord . . . who dwells over every head in the city of the sacred and great kingdom of Si-a-yoo-tha-ya."—Treaty between E.I.C. and King of Siam, in Wilson, Documents of the Burmese War, App. lxxvii.]

JUGBOOLAK, s. Marine Hind.
for jack-black (Roebuck).

JUGGURNAUT, n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannātha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Pūri in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggernaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggernaut festival.

c. 1321.—"Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music . . . and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c. i. 83.

c. 1430. — "In Bizonegalia (see BIS-NAGAR) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots . . . accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death, — a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god." — N. Conti, in India in XVth Cent., 28.

c. 1581. — "All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people . . . and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Nepanpatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the cars, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said cars." — Gasparo Balbi, f. 84. The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590. — "In the town of Purvotem on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagannat, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 1,000 years old. . . . The Brahmins . . . at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindoo language is called Rakth (see RUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins." — Gladrin's Ayeen, ii. 13-15; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 127].

1632. — "Vnto this Pagod or house of Sathen . . . doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe daily offer sacrifice vnto their great God Jaggarnat, from which Idoll the City is so called. . . . And when it (the chariot of Jaggarnat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariott wheelles may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legges, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this meanes they thinke to merit Heauen." — W. Branton, in Hakl. v. 57.

1667. — "In the town of Jagannat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengala, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast. . . . The first day that they show this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowd is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come as far off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there; all the people blessing them for having been so happy. . . . And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death. . . ." — Bernier, a Letter to Mr. Chapelain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed. Constable, 301 seq.].

[1669-79. — "In that great and Sumptuous Diabolicall Pagod, there Standeth theore gretest God Jn^o. Gernact, whence ye Pagod receued that name alsoe." — MS. Asia, &c., by T. B. f. 12. Col. Temple add: "Throughout the whole MS. Jagannath is repeatedly called Jn^o. Gernact, which obviously stands for the common transposition Jagannath.]

1682. — ". . . We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, yo Captain being desirous to see yo Jagernot Pagodas for his better satisfaction. . . ." — Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 30].

1727. — "His (Jagarynat's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach four stories high . . . they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels." — A. Hamilton, i. 337; [ed. 1741].

1800. —

"A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,

To drag that sacred wain,

And scarce can draw along the enormous load.

Prono fall the frantic votaries on the road,

And calling on the God

Their self-devoted bodies there they lay

To pave his chariot way.

On Jaga-Naut they call,

The ponderous car roll on, and crushes
all,

Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.

Groans rise unheard; the dying cry.

And death, and agony

Are trodden under foot by yon mad throng,

Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehama, xiv. 5.

1814. — "The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggernaut made some progress on the 18th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear. One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was. Another also intended to devote herself, miswed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd." — In Asiatic Journal — quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 51, without exacter reference.

c. 1816. — "That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of Jagannāth has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the others the victims had long been suffering from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burthen of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—J. Stirling, in As. Res. xv. 321.

1827.—March 23th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1700 no fewer than 25 Hindus were crushed to death at Isahon on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. 702.

[1861.—"On the 7th July 1861, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Serampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rath Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Cherrier, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.]

1871.—"... poor Johnny Tetterby staggering under his Moloch of an infant, the Juggernaut that crushed all his enjoyments."—Foster's Life of Dickens, ii. 416.

1876.—"Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de souci de ce qu'il écrase que le char de l'idole de Jagannāth."—E. Revue, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 3^e Série, xviii. p. 501.

JULIBDAR, s. Pers. jilaudār, from jilau, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called jani-bahddr, jani-bahkash. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590.—"For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a khadāh horse, a rupee should be given, viz., one dām to the Atbegi, two to the Jilaudār. . . ."—Ain, ed. Blehrmann, i. 142. (And see under PYKE.)]

1673.—"In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Golabdar, or Master Multheer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Cuphalā."—Fryer, 311.

1683.—"Your Jylibdar, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Gonā, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 112].

"We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cosses on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 25; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

1751.—"109 Gllodār; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hanray's Travels, i. 171; 252.

[1412.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelowdars or groom throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 63 seq.]

1850.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of camels, horses, donkeys, and men. . . . Piceel and Remise cooking for me; the Jelladars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kullids, amid the half-light of fast fading day. . . ."—U.S. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gull, &c.

JUMBEEA, s. Ar. jambiya, probably from jamb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger, worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Cambré, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial vol. i. 236], though the jambiya is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 317, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Jambwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Ain (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it janbreah we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng. s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

c. 1328.—"Takt-ul-din refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (Ukhanjir) such as is called in that country jambiya, and gave him a mortal wound."—Isa Barata, i. 634.

1408.—"The Moors had erected palisades of great thickness, with thick planking, and fastened so that we could not see them within. And their people paraded the shore with targets, arrows, agomias, and bows and slings from which they slung stones at us."—Relatório do Touro da Gama, 32.

1516.—"They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloth drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are sword, bucklers, and daggers (gomios)."—Barboza, p. 80.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, au milieu duquel sur le devant ils passent un couteau large recourbé, et pointu (jambea), dont la pointe est tournée du côté droit."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 54.

JUMDUD, s. H. jamdad, jamdhar. A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katir (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar katir is given in Egerton's Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5).] F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of jaub-dar, 'flank-render.' But in the Āin the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardai (see Ind. Antig. i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of Yama-dant 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jamdhar or jamdhar in the Āin illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, 'death-bearer.']

c. 1526.—"Jamdher." See quotation under KUTTAUR.

[1813.—". . . visited the jamdar lhana, or treasury containing his jewels. . . curious arms. . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 463.]

JUMMA, s. Hind. from Ar. jama'. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total' or 'aggregate.'

1781.—"An increase of more than 26 lack of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind. from P.—Ar. jama'bandi. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

[1814.—"Jummabundec." See under PATEL.]

JUMNA, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamunā, Hind. Jamunā and Jamna, the Ἀμμόνιος of Ptolemy, the Ἰωσάφης of Arrian, the Jomanes of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamunā. The name Jamunā is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNYE.) Jamunā is the name of several other rivers of less note.

[1616-17.—"I proposed for a water works, wh^{ch} might give the Chief City of the Mogors content . . . wh^{ch} is to be done vpon the River Jeminy wh^{ch} passeth by Agra. . ."—Burdewood, First Letter Book, 460.

[1619.—"The river Gemini was vnsit to set a Myll vpon."—Sir T. Roe, Hist. Soc. ii. 477.

[1663.—". . . the Gemna, a river which may be compared to the Loire. . ."—Bernier, Letter to M. De la Mothe le Vayer, ed. Constable, 241.]

JUMNA MUSJID, n.p. A common corruption of the Ar. jāme' masjid, 'the cathedral or congregational mosque,' Ar. jama', 'to collect.' The common form is supposed to represent some great mosque on the Jumna R.

[1785.—"The Jumna-musjid is of great antiquity. . ."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 448.

[1849.—"In passing we got out to see the Jama Masjid, a very fine building now used as a magazine."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 170.

[1865.—". . . the great mosque or Djamia . . . this word Djamia means literally 'collecting' or 'uniting,' because here attends the great concourse of Friday worshippers. . ."—Pulgrave, Central and E. Arabia, ed. 1863, 266.]

JUNGEERA, n.p., i.e. Sanjird. The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Rajpuri inlet, to which the name Sanjird properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. ja'zira, 'island.' The State is also called Habsin, meaning 'Hubshee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habshi' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Kāthiāwār.

Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair." The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. João de Castro in Primeiro Rolcio, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jāngal, from Skt. jāṅgala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in Fryer, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

c. 1200.—". . . Now the land is humid, jungle (jāṅgala), or of the ordinary kind."—Susruta, i. ch. 35.

c. 1370.—"Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Rā's dwelling."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450.—"The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (Jāṅgal)."—Abdurrazāk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 61.

1474.—". . . Bicheneger. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful Jungle."—Ath. Nikūn, in India in Xth Cent., 29.

1776.—"Land waste for five years . . . is called Jungle."—Halke's Gentoos Code, 180.

1809.—"The air of Calcutta is much affected by the closeness of the jungle around it."—Ld. Valentia, i. 207.

1809.—
"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long
Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain;
Lithe creepers then the wicker sides supply,
And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky."

Curse of Kehama, xiii. 7.

c. 1830.—"C'est là que jo rencontraï les jungles . . . j'avoue quo jo fus très désappointé."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 134.

c. 1833-38.—
"L'Hippotame au large ventre Habite aux Jungles de Java, Où grondent, au fond de chaque anstre
Plus de monstres qu'on ne rêva."

Theoph. Gautier, in Poésies Complètes, ed. 1876, i. 325.

1848.—"But he was as lonely here as in his jungle at Boggleywala."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

"Was there ever a battle won like Salamanca? Hey, Dobbin? But where was it he learnt his art? In India, my boy. The jungle is the school for a general, mark me that."—Ibid., ed. 1863, i. 312.

c. 1858.—
"La bête formidable, habitante des jungles S'endort, le ventre en l'air, et dilate ses ongles."—Leconte de Lisle.

"Des djungles du Pendj-Ab

1865.—"To an eye accustomed for years to the wild wastes of the jungle, the whole country presents the appearance of one continuous well-ordered garden."—Waring, Tropical Resident at Home, 7.

1867.—". . . here are no cobwebs of plea and counterplea, no jungles of argument and brakes of analysis."—Scrinburne, Essays and Studies, 133.

1873.—"Jungle, derived to us, through the living language of India, from the Sanskrit, may now be regarded as good English."—Fitz-Eduard Hall, Modern English, 306.

1878.—"Cet animal est commun dans les forêts, et dans les djungles."—Marre, Kata-Kata-Malayou, 83.

1879.—"The owls of metaphysics hooted from the gloom of their various jungles."—Fortnightly Rev. No. clxiv, N.S., 19.

JUNGLE-FEVER, s. A dangerous remittent fever arising from the malaria of forest or jungle tracts.

1803.—"I was one day sent to a great distance, to take charge of an officer who had been seized by jungle-fever."—Letter in Morton's L. of Leyden, 43.

JUNGLE-FOWL, s. The popular name of more than one species of those birds from which our domestic poultry are supposed to be descended; especially Gallus Sonneratii, Temminck, the Grey Jungle-fowl, and Gallus ferrugineus, Gmelin, the Red Jungle-fowl. The former belongs only to Southern India; the latter from the Himalaya, south to the N. Circars on the east, and to the Rājpipla Hills south of the Nerbudda on the west.

1800.—“... the thickets bordered on the village, and I was told abounded in jungle-fowl.”—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 98.

1863.—“The common jungle-cock... was also obtained here. It is almost exactly like a common game-cock, but the voice is different.”—Wallace, Malay Archip., 103.

The word jungle is habitually used adjectively, as in this instance, to denote wild species, e.g. jungle-cat, jungle-dog, jungle-fruit, &c.

JUNGLE-MAHALS, n.p. Hind. Jangal-Mahal. This, originally a vague name of sundry tracts and chieftainships lying between the settled districts of Bengal and the hill country of Chutiā Nāgpur, was constituted a regular district in 1805, but again broken up and redistributed among adjoining districts in 1833 (see Imperial Gazetteer, s.v.).

JUNGLE-TERRY, n.p. Hind. Jangal-tarī (see TERAI). A name formerly applied to a border-tract between Bengal and Behar, including the inland parts of Monghyr and Bhāgalpūr, and what are now termed the Santal Parganas. Hodges, below, calls it to the “westward” of Bhāgalpūr; but Barkope, which he describes as near the centre of the tract, lies, according to Rennell’s map, about 35 m. S.E. of Bhāgalpūr town; and the Cleveland inscription shows that the term included the tract occupied by the Rājmahāl hill-people. The Map No. 2 in Rennell’s Bengal Atlas (1779) is entitled “the Jungleterry District, with the adjacent provinces of Birbhoom, Rajemal, Bogli-pour, &c., comprehending the countries situated between Moorshedabad and Bahār.” But the map itself does not show the name Jungle Terry anywhere.

1781.—“Early in February we set out on a tour through a part of the country called the Jungle-Terry, to the westward of Baugleporo... after leaving the village of Barkope, which is nearly in the centre of the Jungle Terry, we entered the hills... In the great famine which raged through Indostan in the year 1770... the Jungle Terry is said to have suffered greatly.”—Hodges, pp. 80-85.

1784.—“To be sold... that capital collection of Paintings, late the property of A. Cleveland, Esq., deceased, consisting of the most capital views in the districts of Monghyr, Rajemahal, Bogli-poor, and the Jungleterry, by Mr. Hodges...”—In Selon-Karr, i. 64.

c. 1788.—“To the Memory of AUGUSTUS CLEVELAND, Esq., Late Collector of the Districts of Bhaugulpore and Rajamahall, Who without Bloodshed or the Terror of Authority, Employing only the Means of Conciliation, Confidence, and Benevolence, Attempted and Accomplished The entire Subjection of the Lawless and Savage Inhabitants of the Jungleterry of Rajamahall... ” (etc.)

Inscription on the Monument erected by Government in Cleveland, who died in 1784.

1817.—“These hills are principally covered with wood, excepting where it has been cleared away for the natives to build their villages, and cultivate janama (Jowara), plantains and yams, which together with some of the small grains mentioned in the account of the Jungleterry, constitute almost the whole of the productions of these hills.”—Sutherland’s Report on the Hill People (in App. to Long, 660).

1821.—“This part, I find (he is writing at Monghyr), is not reckoned either in Bengal or Bahar, having been, under the name of the Jungleterry district, always regarded, till its pacification and settlement, as a sort of border or debateable land.”—Heber, i. 131.

JUNGLO, s. Guz. Janglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of the 19th century), by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans; “wild men of the woods,” that is, who did not understand Guzerati!

1808.—“Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Topcewallas... was actually mobbed, on the first circuit of 1808, in the town of Pitlaud, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazing upon him put the question, Arē Jungla, too munne pīrnēeh? ‘O wild one, wilt thou marry me!’ He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereupon they declared that he was indeed a very Jungla, and it required all the address of Kripmani (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdote to the writer, uncontradicted in the presence of the said Sonhor) to draw off the dames and damsels from the astonished Joseph.”—R. Drummond, Illus. (s.v.).

JUNK, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the Europeo-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odorico, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de' Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them Enchi, no doubt a clerical error for Eücht. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncia testis) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home.

The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese schouen (schuen), and Littré gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lintang jong, 'The Constellation Junk,' [which is in Malay Bintang Jong. The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 59 seq.]

c. 1300.—"Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandise and cloths from Chin and Máchin, and the countries of Hind and Smd."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1331.—"And when we were there in harbour at Polumbum, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (aliam namin nomine Zuncum). . . . Now on board that ship were good 700 souls, what with sailors and with merchants. . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 73.

c. 1343.—"They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . .

of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural junk. . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 91. The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonok). Ibn Batuta really indicates *chun*k (and *chun*k); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 356.

1459.—"About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrocho, which egg was as big as a butt. . . ."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . . ."—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetis (see CHETTY), who are natives of Cholemdel; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungos."—Barbosa, 191.

[1554.—" . . . in the many ships and junks (Jugos) which certainly passed that way."—Castanheda, ii. c. 20.]

1563.—"Juncos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, f. 58b.

1591.—"By this Negro we were advertised of a small Barke of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Iunco)."—Barler's Acc. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hall, ii. 589.

1616.—"And doubtless they had made havock of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill built ships are named. . . .)"—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

[1625.—"An hundred Prawes and Iunkes."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, i. 2, 43.

[1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Junks and Canoes, abounded then in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.]

1630.—"So repairing to Jasques (see JASK), a place in the Persian Gulph, they obtained a fleet of Seven Junks, to convey them and theirs as Merchantmen bound for the Shoares of India."—Lord, Religion of the Persees, 3.

1673.—Fryer also speaks of "Portugal Junka." The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker's use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncaneer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell's latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

"Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—'Jonkamir.' It is 'a collector of customs.'

"(1745).—Notre Supérieur qui s'avoit qu'à moitié chemin certains Jonquaniens* mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux fanons (see FANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu'ils l'exigeassent de nous."—P. Norbert, Mémoires, pp. 159-160.

"The original word is in Malayalam chungkaran, and so, in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (= 'Customs') does.

"I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert's note."

My friend's letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1882. —[H.Y.] (See JUNKEON.)

1680.—"The Didwan (see DEWAUN) returned with Lingayas Ruccas (see ROOCKA) upon the Aruldar (see HAVILDAR) at St. Thoma, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Nov. 22, Notes and Exts., iii. 39.

1746.—"Given to the Governor's Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores (see SALEMPOORY) 16Ps. P. 13."—Acct. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. M.S. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, 'Cape') Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujung) Ujung Salang, 'Salang Headland.' [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. "There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jong salung, in which jong means 'a junk,' and salung, when applied to vessels, 'heavily tossing' (see Klinkert, Dict. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is 'to transfix a person with a dagger,' and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parles in the first quotation is now known as Pertis."]

1639.—"There we crost over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Juncalan (Juncaldo) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Queda. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogan, p. 22.

1692.—"We departed thence to a Baie in the Kingdom of Junsalaom, which is between Malacca and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward."—Barker, in Hall, ii. 591.

1727.—"The North End of Jonk Ceyloan lies within a mile of the Continent."—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67].

JUNKEON, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under JUNKAMEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Orissa, where Bruton was. [Shungum (Mal. chungkam) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logan, Malabar, vol. iii.]

1638.—"Any Junkeon or Custome."—Bruton's Narrative, in Hall, v. 53.

1676.—"These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governour for relief, and chosen rather to pay Juncan than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid."—Major Puck's Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 16. Notes and Exts., i. 39.

[1727.—" . . . at every ten or twelve Miles and, a Fellow to demand Junkaun or Poll-Money for me and my Servants. . . ."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 392.]

JURIBASSO, s. This word, meaning 'an interpreter,' occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the

* "Ce sont des Maures qui exigent de l'argent sur les grands chemins, de ceux qui passent avec quelques marchandises; souvent l'en demandent à ceux mêmes qui n'en portent point. On regarde ces gens-là à peu près comme des voleurs."

English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahāsa, lit. 'language-master,' juru being an expert, 'a master of a craft,' and bahāsa the Skt. bhāṣā, 'speech.' [Wilkinson, Dict., writes Juru-bhāsa; Mr. Skeat prefers juru-bhāsa.]

1603.—At Patani the Hollanders having arrived, and sent presents—"ils furent pris par un officier nommé Orankaca (see ORANKAY) Jurebassa, qui en fit trois portions."—In Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1703, ii. 667. See also pp. 672, 675.

1613.—"(Said the Mandarin of Ancão) . . . 'Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and Jerubacas, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Alfião.' . . .

"These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macau, before the Vereadores, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrão da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words ' . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Vereadores, the Padres, and the Jurubaca, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God. . . .'"—Becarro, pp. 725-729.

"The foureteenth, I sent M. Cockes, and my Jurebasso to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen."—Capt. Sarris, in Purchas, 378.

1615.—" . . . his desire was that, for his sake, I would gove over the pursute of this matter against the sea bongesa, for that yf it were followed, of force the said bongesa must cut his bellie, and then my jurebasso must do the lyke. Unto which his request I was content to agree. . . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 33.

[. . . "This night we had a conference with our Jurybassa."—Foster, Letters, iii. 167].

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. "At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jāta, a less usual form of jata, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance" (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jāta are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre "called jute by the natives." [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhūtā, but jhūtā is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Babu Hemchandra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, s. From Dak.—Hind. jhātā, 'quick.' The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramshackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta cranchees (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings).

JUZAIL, s. This word jazāil is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazā'il, the plural of jazil, 'big,' used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINGALL.) Hence jazā'ilchi, one armed with such a weapon.

[1812.—"The jezaerchi also, the men who use blunderbusses, were to wear the new Russian dress."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 30.

[1893.—"All night the cressets glimmered pale On Ulwar sabbre and Tonk jezail." R. Kipling, Barack-room Ballad, 84.

[1900.—"Two companies of Khyber Jezail-chies."—Warburton, Eighteen Years in the Khyber, 78.]

JYEDAD, s. P.—H. jāidād. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

[1824.—"Rampoorra on the Chumbul . . . had been granted to Dudermaic, as Jaidad, or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 223.]

* This remark is from a letter of Dr. Durnell's dd. Tanjore, March 16, 1880.

JYSHE, s. This term, Ar. jaish, 'an army, a legion,' was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaish Kachari (see under CUTCHERRY).

c. 1782.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutchori, were called the Jyah Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tippu Sultan, by Hussein Ali Khan Kermāni, p. 32.

1786.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Piadehs are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kuchurry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 256.

K

KAJEE, s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepal and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Kājī is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

[KALA JUGGAH, s. Anglo-H. kālā jagah for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

[1835.—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Jagah (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 91.

KALINGA, n.p. (See KLING.)

KALLA-NIMMACK, s. Hind. kālā-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is murrate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL, s. Kāpal, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. kappal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts" (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57).

KARBAREE, s. Hind. kārbārī, 'an agent, a manager.' Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[c. 1857.—"The Foujdar's report stated that a police Carbarae was sleeping in his own house."—Cheema, Ind. Med. Jurisp. 467.]

1867.—"The Lushni Karbaris (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 293.

KARCANNA, s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

[1663.—"Large halls are seen in many places, called Kar-Kanays or workshops for the artizans."—Bernier, ed. Constatle, 258 seq. Also see CARCANA.]

KARDAR, s. P.—H. kārdār, an agent (of the Government) in Sindh.

[1812.—"I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine."—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Scinde, 149.]

KAREETA, s. Hind. from Ar. khariṭa, and in India also khalīṭa. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is khariṭ; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crispings-pins' is khariṭim, rather 'purses.'

c. 1350.—"The Sheriff Ibrahim, surnamed the Khariṭadār, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pens, was governor of the territory of Hānsi and Sarṣāl."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 337.

1838.—"Her Highness the Baiza Bāi did me the honour to send me a Khariṭā, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kim-lhazh (see KINCOB), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin: the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—"... Je Visir prenant un anchet de beau brocard d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aune et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec une inscription qui y étoit attachée, et disant que c'étoit une lettre du Grand Seigneur. . . .—Journal d'Ant. Gaultier, ii. 91.

KAUL, s. Hind. Kāl, properly 'Time,' then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read:

1808.—"Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahatta nation in A.D. 1801, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Mahattas in the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country."—J. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

KAUNTA, CAUNTA, s. This word, Maḥr, and Gur. kânḥā, 'coast or margin,' [Skt. kaṇṭha, 'immediate proximity,' kaṇṭhi, 'the neck,'] is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Mahī Kānḥā, for a group of small States on the banks of the Mahī River; Ravā Kānḥā, south of the above; Sindhu Kānḥā, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kachh, Kāśā akāzoi. Kānḥi-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kānḥi was the name of the southern coast district (see Ritter, vi. 1038).

KEBULEE. (See MYROBOLANS.)

KEDDAH, s. Hind. Khedā (Kheda, 'to chase,' from Skt. akṣeta, 'hunting'). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants. [The system of hunting elephants by making a trench round a space and enticing the wild animals by means of tame decoys is described by Arrian, Indika, 13.] (See CORRAL.)

[c. 1500.—"There are several modes of hunting elephants. 1. Khedah" (then follows a description).—Āin, i. 281.]

1780-90.—"The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Keddah or enclosure."—Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 191.

1810.—"A trap called a Keddah."—Williamson, F. M. ii. 430.

1800.—"The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Keddah) in the heart of the forest."—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 312.

KEDGEREE, KITCHERY, s.

Hind. Khichrī, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shred onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgerree, but is no part of it. ["Fish Kitcherie" is an old Anglo-Indian dish, see the recipe in Riddell's Indian Domestic Economy, p. 437.]

c. 1310.—"The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kichrī, and on this dish they breakfast every day."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 131.

c. 1113.—"The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kichrī."—Al-Burrakān, in India in Xth Cent. 27.

c. 1175.—"Horses are fed on pease; also on Kichrī, boiled with sugar and oil; and early in the morning they get Khichrao (l).—Al-Bīrūnī, Nihāya, in du, p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgerree is by Abul Fazl:—

c. 1500.—"Khichrī, Rice, split dāl, and ght. 5 arr of each; $\frac{1}{2}$ arr salt; this gives 7 dishes."—Āin, i. 59.

1618.—"Their daily gains are very small, . . . and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kitcherye."—Van Twist, 57.

1653.—"Kicheri est une sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairement."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 515.

1672.—Baldacius has Kitzery, Tavernier Quicheri (ed. Bull. i. 282, 291).

1673.—"The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfulest Food being only Cutcherry a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat."—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says: "Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians."—Ibid. 320.

1727.—“Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR).”—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744; i. 162].

1750-60.—“Kitcheree is only rice stewed, with a certain pulp which they call Dhol, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar.”—Oror, i. 150.

[1813.—“He was always a welcome guest . . . and ate as much of their rice and Cutcheree as he chose.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.]

1880.—“A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: “There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots. . . . After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty.”—Pioneer Mail, July 8. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Rice, Hak. Soc. ii. 314, and a full account in Rajputana Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE, n.p. Khijiri or Kijari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indianmen.

1683.—“This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1684.—“Signr Nicolò Pareres, a Portuguese Merchant, assured me their whole community had writ y^e Vice King of Goa . . . to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with . . . Soldiers to possess themselves of y^e Islands of Kegeria and Ingellee.”—Ibid., Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—“It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingeltie and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGELEE.)

1753.—“Do l'autre côté de l'entré, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Ingeli (see HIDGELEE), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipli et celle de Balasor (see BALASORE), sont avec Tombali (see TUMLOOK), rivière mentionnée plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom du Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange. . . . Une carte du Golfe du Bengale insérée dans Blaeu, sert même à distinguer les rivières d'Ingeli et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Ganga.”—D'Anville, p. 66.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVERY. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W. just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand fleuve here spoken of. The name Gunga or Old Gunga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: “About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Ganga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower.”—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KEDGEREE-POT, s. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHURRA.)

1811.—“As a memorial of such misfortune, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cudgeri, or earthen pot.”—Soltyks, Les Hindous, iii.

1830.—“Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgerree-pots, on which the palkee was to be ferried over.”—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 110.

KENNERBY, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kāpheri.

1602.—“Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Pedro Fr. Antonio do Porto, . . . one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Flos Sanctorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Josafat the Prince, whom Burlanm converted to the Faith of Christ. . . .”—Couto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673.—“Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the anciently fam'd, but now ruin'd City of Canorein . . . all cut out of a Rock,” &c.—Fryer, 71-72.

1825.—“The principal curiosities of Salsette . . . are the cave temples of Kennerby. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddh and his religion.”—Heber, ii. 130.

KERSEYMERE, s. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-

Indian. But it is through forms like cashmere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minshew (2nd ed. 1827), without definition, thus: "Persic cloth, G. (i.e. French) carize." The only word like the last given by Littré is "Carisil, sorte de canevas." . . . This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by Creseau—Terme de Commerce: étoffe de laine croi-see à deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carre. Planché indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kersey-mere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!) Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey: [and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kersey-mere, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey"].

1583.—"I think cloth, Kersays and tinno have never bene here at so lowe prices as they are now."—Mr. John Newton, from Babylon (i.e. Bagdad) July 20, in Hail 378.

1603.—"I had as lief be a list of an English kersey, as be pill'd as thou art pill'd, for a French volnot."—Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1625.—"Ordanet the thesauror to tak aff to ilk one of the officers and to the drummer and pyper, ilk one of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairise elaithe."—Acts from Records of Glasgow, 1870, p. 317.

1626.—In a contract between the Factor of the King of Persia and a Dutch "Oppor Koopman" for goods we find: "2000 Persian olls of Caresay at 1 eeri (!) the ell."—Valentijn, v. 205.

1781.—"For sale—superfino cambrics and edgings . . . scarlet and blue Kassimeres."—In Seton-Harr, i. 47.

c. 1850.—(no date given) "Kersey-mere. Cassimere. A finer description of korney . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planché). . . . It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweeled (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth."—Drayr's Dict. s.v.

KHADIR, s. II. khaddar; the recent alluvial bordering a large river. (See under BANGUR).

[1823.—"The river . . . meanders fantastically . . . through a Khader, or valley between two ranges of hills."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1853, p. 130.

KHAKEE, vulgarly KHARKI, KHARKEE, s. or adj. Hind. khaki, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khak, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296) describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldier the name of "Lal Coortee Wallahs."]]

[1853.—A book appeared called "Service and Adventure with the Khakee Ressalah, or Meerut Volunteer Horse during the Mutinies in 1857-8," by R. H. W. Dundas.

[1859.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the tunic, but as the native ungreekah (angarkhah), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee."—Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rev. ciii. 407.

[1862.—"Khakee does not catch in brambles so much as other stuffs."—Brinkman, Rifle in Cashmere, 136.]

1878.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap."—Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 683.

[1899.—"The batteries to be painted with the Kirkee colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible."—Times, July 12.

[1890-91.—The newspapers have constant references to a khaki election, that is an election started on a war policy, and the War Loan for the Transval Campaign has been known as "khakia."]

Recent military operations have led to the general introduction of khaki as the service uniform. Something like this has been used in the East for clothing from a very early time :—

[1611.—"See if you can get me a piece of very fine brown calico to make me clothes."—Danvers, Letters, i. 109.]

KHALSA, s. and adj. Hind. from Ar. khālṣa (properly khālṣa) 'pure, genuine.' It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783.—"The Sikques salute each other by the expression Wah Gooro, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalsajee."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1803, i. 307.

1881.—

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father's name was known In the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half-grown."

Atlar Singh loquitur, by Sowar, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN, s. a. Turki through Pers. Khān. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like "Esq.," whilst in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustānis out of every rank, properly, however of those claiming a Pathān descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khān had sunk, a new form, Khān-Khānān (Khān of Khāns) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

[c. 1610.—The "Assant Caounna" of Pymard do Laval, which Mr. Gray fails to identify, is probably Haasan-Khan, Hak. Soc. i. 63.

[1676.—"Cawn." See under GINGI.]

b. Pers. khān. A public building for the accommodation of travellers, a caravanserai. [The word appears in English as early as about 1400; see Stanf. Dict. s.v.]

1827.—"He lost all hope, being informed by his late fellow-traveller, whom he found at the Khan, that the Nussrah was absent on a secret expedition."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

KHANNA, CONNAH, &c. s. This term (Pers. khāna, 'a house, a compartment, apartment, department, receptacle,' &c.) is used almost ad libitum in India in composition, sometimes with most incongruous words, as bobadice (for betrarchi) connah, 'cook-house,' buggy-connah, 'buggy, or coach-house,' bottle-khanna, toshakhana (q.v.), &c. &c.

1781.—"The house, cook-room, bottle-connah, godown, &c., are all pukka built."—In Selon-Kurr, i. 41.

KHANSAMA. See CONSUMAH.

KHANUM, s. Turki, through Pers. khānum and khānim, a lady of rank; the feminine of the title Khān, a (q.v.)

1401.—". . . la mayor dellez avia nōbro Caño, que quiero dezir Reyna, o Señora grande."—Clarifo, f. 52c.

"The great wall and tents were for the use of the chief wife of the Lord, who was called Caño, and the other was for the second wife, called Quinehi Caño, which means 'the little lady.'"—Markham's Clarifo, 145.

1505.—"The greatest of the Begs of the Sagharichi was then Shih Hagi Beg, whose daughter, Ais-doulet Begum, Yunis Khan married. . . . The Khan had three daughters by Ais-doulet Begum. . . . The second daughter, Kullak Nigar Khānum, was my mother. . . . Five months after the taking of Kabul she departed to God's mercy, in the year 911" (1505).—Haber, p. 12.

1610.—"The King's ladies, when they are not married to him . . . and not near relations of his house, but only concubines or girls of the Palace, are not called begum, which is a title of queens and princesses, but only canum, a title given in Persia to all noble ladies."—P. della Valle, ii. 13.

KHASS, KAUSSE, &c., adj. Hind. from Ar. khāss, 'special, particular, Royal.' It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of Government, which are said to be held khāss. The khāss-mahāl again, in a native house, is the women's apartment. Many years ago a white-bearded khānsamān (see CONSUMAH), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake's camp, in the beginning of the last century, extolled the adhibs of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani): "In those days I think the Sahibs all came from London khāss; now a great lot of Liverpoolwālds come to the country!"

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahomedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbar, the Devān-i-'Ām, or Hall of the Public, and the Devān-i-Khāss, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1788, the word is written Coss.

KHĀSYA, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cis-Tibetan Himalaya, between Nepal and the Ganges, &c. in the British Districts of Kumāun and Garhwāl. The Khāsya are Hindu in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hindu also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see COSEYA) in the mountains south of Assam.

[1526.—"About these hills are other tribes of men. With all the investigation and enquiry I could make. . . All that I could learn was that the men of these hills were called Kas. It struck me that as the Hindustanis frequently confound shin and sin and as Kashmir is the chief . . . city in those hills, it may have taken its name from that circumstance."—Leyden's Baber, 313.]

1799.—"The Vakeel of the raja of Comank (i.e. Kumāun) of Almora, who is a learned Pandit, informs me that the greater part of the zemindars of that country are C'hassas. . . They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of Manu; and their great ancestor O'HASSA or C'HASSYA is mentioned by Sanchoniathon, under the name of Cassius. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon."—Wilford (Wilfordizing I), in As. Res. vi. 456.

1824.—"The Khāsya nation pretend to be all Rajpoots of the highest caste . . . they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger. . . They are a modest, gentle, respectful people, honest in their dealings."—Heber, i. 264.

KHELĀT, n.p. The capital of the Bilūch State upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kaṭa, 'a fort.' (See under KILLADĀL.) The terminal t of the Ar. word (written kaṭat) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning 'Castle of —.' No doubt this was the case with the Bilūch capital, though in its case the second part has been completely dropt out of use. Khelāt (Kaṭat)-i-Ghilji is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropt.

KHIRĀJ, s. Ar. kharaḥ (usually pron. in India khirāj), is properly a tribute levied by a Musulman lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Ar.) la khirāj, treated as one word, lākhirāj, 'rent-free.'

[c. 1590.—"In ancient times a capitation tax was imposed, called khirāj."—Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55. "Some call the whole produce of the revenue khirāj."—Ibid. ii. 57.]

1784.—". . . 136 beegahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent."—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

KHOA, s. Hind. and Beng. khod, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terraces.

KHOT, s. This is a Mahrāṭi word, khōt, in use in some parts of the Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khōṭi, and coming under the class legally defined as, 'superior holders.'

The position and claims of the *khot*s have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwari is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zemindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching *khot*s have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the 'Adil Shāhi (see IDALCAN) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khot has long been a hereditary zemindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khot to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patli.* This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been" (Candy, pp. 20-21). See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxxiv., N.S., viz., Selections with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Govt. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

KHOTI, s. The holder of the peculiar khot tenure in the Bombay Presidency.

KHUDD, KUDD, s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himālaya, khadd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. khāt, 'a pit,' Dakh. —Hind. khaddā. [Platt, gives Hind. khād. This is from Skt. khayda, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khāt comes from Skt. khāta, 'an excavation.'] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalayan stations.

1837.—"The steep about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder." —Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1839.—"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud." —Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 210.

1866.—"When the men of the 43d Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) throw them down a Khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called. . . ." —Nihatan and the H. of the Dogar War, by Surgeon Rennie, M.D. p. 199.

1879.—"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud" (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 16.

* Patli is used here in the Mahattai sense of a 'contribution' or extra cess. It is the regular Mahattai equivalent of the abzū of Bengal, on which see Wilson, &c.

KHURREEF, s. Ar. khariḥ, 'autumn'; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesamum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1809.—"Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajra (see BAJRA), Jowar (see JOWAR), several smaller kinds of grain, and cotton, was cleared from off the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed . . . and sown for the great Rubbee crop of wheat, barley and chuan (see GRAM)."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahattru Camp, ed. 1892, p. 215.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khutput in Hind. and Mahr. is rather 'wrangling' and 'worry,' but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram's struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—"Khutput, or court intrigue, rule-moro or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilized nations of Europe."—Eraser, Records of Sport, 201.]

KHUTTRY, KHETTRY, OUTTRY, s. Hind. Khattri, Khatrī, Sht. Kshatriya. The second, or military caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Kshatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crooke, Tribes and Castes of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Sarpasat whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rājputānā are probably Kshatriyas.

[1623.—"They told me Clautra was a title of honour."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 312.

1630.—"And because Cuttery was of a martial temper God gave him power to sway Kingdoms with the scepter."—Lord, Baniāns, 5.

1638.—"Les habitants . . . sont la plupart Baniyas et Kettaris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ouvrieres on coton."—Mandaleto, ed. 1659, 130, [1671.—"There are also Cuttarees, another Sect Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Baniān Gentoo's hero."—In Ynter, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxii.]

1673.—"Opium is frequently eaten in great quantities by the Raspoos, Queteries, and Patana."—Fryer, 193.

1726.—"The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settre-as."—Valentijn, Chorum, 87.

1782.—"The Chittrey occasionally betake himself to traffic, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of principalities."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1805, i. 63.

1836.—"The Baniāns are the mercantile caste of the original Hindoos. . . . They call themselves Shudderies, which signifies innocent or harmless (!)"—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS, n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Ain (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: "Khaybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D'Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems." (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 316, note.)] 1519.—"Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Kheiber-Khal had been extremely licentious in his conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement."—Baber, p. 277.

"On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground.

"On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at 'All Musjid."—Jahāngir, in Elliot, vi. 314.

1783.—"The stage from Timrood (read Jimrood) to Dickah, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which much danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to . . . march early on the next morning. . . . Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshawar . . . never passed through the territory of the Hybers, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard."—Forster's Travels, ed. 1803, ii. 63-66.

" . . . See the booted Moguls, like a pack Of hungry wolves, burst from their desert lair.

And crowding through the Khyber's rocky strait, Sweep like a bloody harrow o'er the land."—The Banyan Tree, p. 6.

KIDDERPORE, n.p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hoogly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dockyard. This establishment was formed in the 18th century by Gen. Kyd, "after whom," says the Imperial Gazetteer, "the village is named." This is the general belief, and was mine [H.Y.] till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the same chart Kitherepore) then occupied the same position, i.e. immediately below "Gobarnapore" and that immediately below "Chittanutt" (i.e. Govindpūr and Chāṭānālī (see CHUTTANUTTY)).

1711.—". . . then keep Rounding Chitti Poe (Chitpore) Bito down to Chitty Nutty Point (see CHUTTANUTTY). . . . The Bito below Gover Napore (Gorindpur) is Shoal, and below the Shoal is an Eddy; therefore from Gover Napore, you must stand over to the Starboard-Shore, and keep it aboard till you come up almost with the Point opposite to Kidderpore, but no longer. . . ."—The English Pilot, p. 65.

KIL, s. Pitch or bitumen. Tam. and Mal. kil, Ar. kīr, Pers. kīr and kīl.

c. 1330.—"In Persia are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kic (read kīr) (piz dico su pagna), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordanus, p. 10.

c. 1560.—"These are pitched with a bitumen which they call gull, which is like pitch."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 210.

KILLADAR, s. P.—H. kīlādār, from Ar. kaḥa, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Ar. kaḥa is always in India pronounced kīḥa. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misinterpreted an Indian title; taking it as from Pers. kīlīd, 'a key.' It may be noted with reference to kaḥa that this Ar. word is generally represented in Spanish names by Alcala, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnstone's Index Geographicus; and in Sicilian ones by Calata, e.g. Calatafimi, Caltanissetta, Callagiron.

c. 1310.—". . . Kādhi Khān, Sadr-al-Jihān, who became the chief of the Amīrs, and had the title of Kālīl-dār, i.e. Keeper of the keys of the Palace. This officer was accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the bodyguard."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

1757.—"The fugitive garrison . . . returned with 500 more, sent by the Kellidar of Vandiwash."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 217.

1817.—"The following were the terms . . . that Arni should be restored to its former governor or Killedar."—Mill, iii. 310.

1829.—"Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattrass, search was made by us for the Keeledar."—Mém. of John Skipp, ii. 210.

KILLA-KOTE, s. pl. A combination of Ar.—P. and Hind. words for a fort (kīḥa for kaḥa, and kōṭ), used in Western India to imply the whole fortifications of a territory (R. Drummond).

KILLUT, KILLAUT, &c., s. Ar.—H. khiḥūt. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. khiḥ-aḥ properly means 'what a man strips from his person.' "There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of khiḥāt, those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." (See for further details Mr. Irvine in J.R.A.S., N.S., July 1896, p. 533.) The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkistan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafrock). See Frachn, Wolga Bulgaren, p. 43.

1411.—"Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khiḥāts and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abdurazāḥ, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 209.

1673.—"Sir George Oxenden held it. . . . He defended himself and the Merchants so bravely, that he had a Collar or Serpaw, (q.v.) a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1676.—"This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calaut, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 46; [ed. Bull, ii. 98].

1774.—"A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khiḥāt."—Doyle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786.—"And he the said Warren Hastings did send kellants, or robes of honour (the most public and distinguished mode of acknowledging merit known in India) to the said ministers in testimony of his approbation of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burle's Works, vii. 25.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a khelant, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Ld. Valentia, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the khelauts . . . from the great Maharajah Madafee Sindia, the serpeych (see SIRPECH) . . . presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 50; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOB, s. Gold brocade. P.—H. kamkhāb, kamkhvāb, vulgarly kimkhvāb. The English is perhaps from the Gujarātī, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the mediæval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammocca. This was taken from the mediæval Persian and Arabic forms kamkhā or kimkhvā, 'damasked silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century. F. Johnson's Dict. distinguishes between kamkhā, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kimkhā, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kha; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word; qu. lim-hoa, 'gold-flower'? We have seen kimkhvāb derived from Pers. kam-khvāb, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. [The ordinary derivation of the word supposes that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (kam, 'little,' khvāb, 'dream') (Yusuf Ali, Mono. on Silk, 86). Platts and the Madras Gloss. take it from kam, 'little,' khvāb, 'nap.'] Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French mocade (or moquette); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dict. mockado, the form of which has suggested a sham stuff.)

c. 1300.—"Παιδὸς γὰρ εὐδαιμονούντος, καὶ τὸν πᾶτερα δεῖ συνευδαιμονεῖν κατὰ τὴν ὑμνομένην ἀντιπελάργωσιν. Ἐσθῆτα πηνούφῃ πεπομφῆς ἢν καμχᾶν ἢ Περσῶν φησι γλῶττα, δρᾶσιν εὐ ἰσθί, οὐ διαλακα μὲν οὐδὲ μαρμαρέην οἶαν Ἑλένη ἐξόφαινε, ἀλλ' ἡπεσιδῇ καὶ ποικίλῃ."—Letter of Theodorus the Hyrtacian to Lucites, Protonotary and Protovestiary of the Trapezuntians. In Notices et Extraits, vi. 33.

1330.—"Their clothes are of Tartary cloth, and camocas, and other rich stuffs ofttimes adorned with gold and silver and precious stones."—Book of the Estate of the Great Kaan, in Cathay, 246.

c. 1340.—"You may reckon also that in Cathay you get three or three and a half pieces of damasked silk (cammocca) for a sommo."—Pegolotti, ibid. 295.

1342.—"The King of China had sent to the Sultan 100 slaves of both sexes for 500 pieces of kamkhā, of which 100 were made in the City of Zaitūn. . . ."—In Batuta, iv. 1.

c. 1375.—"Thei setten this Ydole upon a Chare with gret reverence, wel arrayed with Clothes of Gold, of riche Clothes of Tartarye, of Camacaa, and other precious Clothes."—Sir John Maundeirill, ed. 1860, p. 175.

c. 1400.—"In kyrtille of Cammaka kynge am I cladde."—Coventry Mystery, 163.

1404.—" . . . é quando se del quisieron partir los Embajadores, fizo vestir al dicho Ruy Gonzalez una ropa de camocan, e dióle un sombrero, e dixole, que aquello tomase en señal del amor que el Tamurbec tenia al Señor Rey."—Clarijo, § lxxviii.

1411.—"We have sent an ambassador who carries you from us kimkhā."—Letter from Emp. of Chian to Shah Rukh, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 214.

1474.—"And the King gave a signe to him that wayted, comaunding him to give to the dauncer a peece of Camocato. And he taking this peece threwe it about the heade of the dauncer, and of the men and women: and using certain wordes in praising the King, throwe it before the mynstrells."—Josafa Barbaro, Travels in Persia, E.T. Hak. Soc. p. 62.

1712.—In the Spectator under this year see an advertisement of an 'Isabolla-coloured Kincoeb gown flowered with green and gold.'—Cited in Malcolm's Anecdotes of Manners, &c., 1800, p. 428.

1733.—"Dieser mal waren von Seiten des Brautigams ein Stück rother Kamka . . . und eine rothe Pferdehaut; von Seiten der Braut aber ein Stück violet Kamka."—u. s. w.—Gmelin, Reise durch Sibirien, i. 137-138.

1781.—"My holiday suit, consisting of a flowered Velvet Coat of the Carpet Pattern, with two rows of broad Gold Lace, a rich Kincoeb Waistcoat, and Crimson Velvet Breeches with Gold Garters, is now a butt to the shafts of Macaroni ridicule."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 21.

1786—"... but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000... and that she would ransom the annanah... for Kincobs, muslins, cloths, &c. &c. &c."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, 1832, vii. 23.

1809—"Twenty trays of shawls, kheenkaubs... were tendered to me."—Ld. Valentia, i. 117.

1829—"Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, kheemkaubs, money, &c."—Mem. of John Shipp, i. 121.

KING-CROW, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocerus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills" (Jerdon).

1883—"... the King-crow... leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character. . . . He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on... drops, beak foremost, on the back of the kite... spies a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 113.

KIOSQUE, s. From the Turki and Pers. kūshk or kushk, 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1350—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as those people call it a kuashk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghaupūr."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 212.

1623—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiossek, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 535; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

KIRBEE, KURBEE, s. Hind. karbi, kirbi, Skt. kāṇḍamba, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of jūd (see JOWAUR), used as food for cattle.

[1809.—"We also fell in with large ricks of kurbee, the dried stalks of Bajirs and Jecor, two inferior kinds of grain; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 41.

[1823.—"Ordinary price of the straw (kirba) at harvest-time Rs. 1½ per hundred sheaves. . . ."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 213.]

KISHM, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queixome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jazīrat-al-fāwila, in Pers. Jaz. dard, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baffin the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokht, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

n.c. 325.—"And setting sail (from Hormozeia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Gerna, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS); and the one at which they anchored Odapara, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn."—Arrian, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxvii.

1533.—"... so I hastened with him in the company of divers merchants to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Calxem, whence he carried me to Ormuz. . . ."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cogan, p. 9).

1553.—"Finally, like a timorous and despairing man . . . he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Quelxome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."—Jarrois, iii. vii. 4.

1551.—"Then we departed to the Isle of Kai or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhta, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Süfi 'Alī, 67.

[1600.—"Quelxome." See under RESHIRE.

[1623.—"They say likewise that Ormuz and Keachlome are extremely well fortified by the Moors."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 188; in i. 2, Kesom.

[1652.—"Keelmlshe." See under CONGO BUNDEL.]

1673.—"The next morning we had brought Loft on the left hand of the Island of Kishmash, leaving a woody Island uninhabited between Kishmash and the Main."—Fryer, 320.

1682.—"The Island Quelxome, or Quelxume, or Quizome, otherwise called by travellers and geographers Kechmiche, and by the natives Brokt. . . ."—Nieuhof, Zee en Land-Reize, ii. 103.

1817.—"Vases filled with Kishmee's golden wine
And the red weepings of the Shiraz vine."—Moore, Mokanna.

1821.—"We are to keep a small force at Kishmi, to make descents and destroy boats and other means of maritime war, whenever any symptoms of piracy reappear."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 121.

KISHMISH, s. Pers. Small stoneless raisins originally imported from Persia. Perhaps so called from the island Kishm. Its vines are mentioned by Arrian, and by T. Moore! (See under KISHM.) [For the manufacture of Kishmish in Afghanistan, see Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 284.]

[c. 1665.—"Usbec being the country which principally supplies Delhi with these fruits. . . . Kichmiches, or raisins, apparently without stones. . . ."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 118.]

1673.—"We refreshed ourselves an entire Day at Gerom, where a small White Grape, without any Stone, was an excellent Cordial. . . . they are called Kismas Grapes, and the Wine is known by the same Name farther than where they grow."—Fryer, 242.

1711.—"I could never meet with any of the Kishmishes before they were turned. These are Raisins, a size less than our Malagas, of the same Colour, and without Stones."—Lockyer, 233.

1883.—"Kishmish, a delicious grape, of white elongated shape, also small and very sweet, both eaten and used for wine-making. When dried this is the Sultana raisin. . . ."—Willis, Modern Persia, 171.

KISSMISS, s. Native servant's word for Christmas. But that festival is usually called Barū dīn, 'the great day.' (See BURRA DIN.)

KIST, s. Ar. kist. The yearly land revenue in India is paid by instalments which fall due at different periods in different parts of the country; each such instalment is called a kist, or quota. [The settlement of these instalments is kist-bandī.]

[1767.—"This method of comprising the whole estimate into so narrow a compass . . . will convey to you a more distinct idea . . . than if we transmitted a monthly account of the deficiency of each person's Kistbundes."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 56.]

1809.—"Forcē was always requisite to make him pay his Kists or tribute."—Ld. Valentia, i. 347.

1810.—"The heavy Kists or collections of Bengal are from August to September."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 493.

1817.—"So desperate a malady," said the President, "requires a remedy that shall reach its source. And I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that there is no mode of eradicating the disease, but by removing the original cause; and placing these districts, which are pledged for the security of the Kists, beyond the reach of his Highness's management."—Mitl, vi. 65.

KITMUTGAR, s. Hind. khidmat-gār, from Ar.—P. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Muslim servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kismutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khuzmutgār. In the word khidmat, as in khiṭat (see KILLUT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropped, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1760.—"The wages of a Khedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month."—In Long, p. 182.

1765.—". . . they were taken into the service of Soufah Dowlah as immediate attendants on his person; Hodjee (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kistmutgar (or valet)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

1782.—"I therefore beg to caution strangers against those race of rascals who ply about them under the denomination of Consumahs and Kismutgars."—Letter in India Gazette, Sept. 23.

1784.—"The Bearer . . . perceiving a quantity of blood . . . called to the Hookaburdar and a Kistmutgar."—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1810.—"The Khedmutgar, or as he is often termed, the Kismutgar, is with very few exceptions, a Muslim; his business is to . . . wait at table."—Williamson, V. M. i. 212.

c. 1810.—"The Kitmutgaur, who had attended us from Calcutta, had done his work, and made his harvest, though in no very large way, of the 'Taze Willant' or white people."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 253. The phrase in italics stands for Willayut (see BILAYUT), "fresh or green Europeans"—Griffiths (q.v.).

1813.—"We . . . saw nothing remarkable on the way but a Khidmutgar of Chhinagio Appa, who was rolling from Poona to Panderpoor, in performance of a vow which he made for a child. He had been a month at it, and had become so expert that he went on smoothly and without pausing, and kept rolling evenly along the middle of the road, over stones and everything. He travelled at the rate of two cows a day."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 257-8.

1878.—"We had each our own . . . Kitmutgar or table servant. It is the custom in India for each person to have his own table servant, and when dining out to take him with him to wait behind his chair."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 32.

KITTYSOL, KITSOL, s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quitta-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also tinale occurs in Scott's Discourse of Java, quoted below from Purchas. See also Mulsins, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Skent points out that in Howison's Malay Diet. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: "A kittasol, sombrero," which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

1688.—"The present was fortie peeces of silke . . . a litter chair and quilt, and two quitasoles of silke."—Parkes's Mendoza, ii. 105.

1605.—" . . . Before the shewes came, the King was brought out vpon a mans shoulders, bestriding his necke, and the man holding his legs before him, and had many rich tyrasoles carried ouer and round about him."—R. Scot, in Purchas, i. 181.

1611.—"Of Kittasoles of State for to shadow him, there bee twentie" (in the Treasury of Akbar).—Haukins, in Purchas, i. 215.

[1614.—"Quitta salls (or sombreros)."—Poster, Letters, ii. 207.]

1615.—"The China Capt., Andrea Dittis, returned from Langasque and brought me a present from his brother, viz., 1 fairo Kittesoll. . . ."—Cock's Diary, i. 28.

1648.—" . . . above his head was borne two Kippe-soles, or Sun-screens, made of Paper."—Van Twist, 51.

1673.—"Little but rich Kitsolls (which are the names of several Countries for Umbrelloes)."—Fryer, 160.

1687.—"They (the Aldermen of Madras) may be allowed to have Kottysolls over them."—Letter of Court of Directors, in Wheeler, i. 200.

1690.—"nomen . . . vulgo asseritur Perit-sol . . . aliquando paulo aliter scribitur . . . et utrumque rectius pronuntiandum est Parosol vel potius Parasol cuius significatio Appellativa est, i. q. "No Man in India, no not the Mogul's Son, is permitted the Priviledge of wearing a Kittisal or Umbrella. . . . The use of the Umbrella is sacred to the Prince, appropriated only to his use."—Orrington, 315.

1755.—"He carries a Roundell, or Quit do Soleil over your head."—Irra, 50.

1759.—In Expenses of Nawab's entertainment at Calcutta, we find: "A China Kittysol . . . Rs. 31."—Long, 191.

1761.—A chart of Chittagong, by Barth. Plained, marks on S. side of Chittagong R., an umbrella-like tree, called "Kittysoll Tree."

[1785.—"To finish the whole, a Kittesaw (a kind of umbrella) is suspended not infrequently over the lady's head."—Diary, in Buteck, Schoer, 3rd ed. 112.]

1792.—"In those days the Ketessal, which is now sported by our very Cooks and Boat-swains, was prohibited, as I have heard, d'you see, to any one below the rank of field officer."—Letter, in Madras Courier, May 3.

1813.—In the table of exports from Meneo, we find:—

"Kittisolls, large, 2,000 to 3,000, do. small, 8,000 to 10,000,"

Milburn, ii. 461.

1875.—"Umbrellas, Chinese, of paper, or Kottysolls."—Indian Tariff.

In another table of the same year "Chinese paper Kettisolls, valuation Rs. 30 for a box of 110, duty 5 per cent." (See CHATTA, ROUNDEL, UMBRELLA.)

KITTYSOL-BOY, s. A servant who carried an umbrella over his master. See Milburn, ii. 62. (See examples under ROUNDEL.)

KLING, n.p. This is the name (Kaling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of those settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The standard Malay form is not Kaling, which is the Sumatran form, but Keling (K'ling or Kling). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense."]

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the "Northern Circars," (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahāndī. "The Kalingas" also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Aśoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII.) remaining in fragments at Girnār and Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khāṣṭī, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Magas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antig. iii. 152, x. 243). It was from a daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahāwanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, "the Three Kalingas"; and this probably, in a Telugu version Mādu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modogalinga of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Tri-kalinga with the names Tilinga and Tilingāna, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Sijara Malayu the word Kaling or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mergui Archip. 1792, p. 82) that Macassar "Indostan" was called "Neegree Telinga" (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kalinga.

The name Kling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the "Northern Circars," but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijsinga translates Kaling by 'Coromandel people.' They are either Hindūs or Labbais (see LUBBYE). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. "In 1876," writes Dr. Burnell, "the head-servant at Bekker's great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagūr Labbais; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before." The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Siva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandārāms (q.v.). The only Brahmans there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Kalingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

B.C. c. 250 — "Great is Kaliṅga conquered by the King Piyadasi, beloved of the Devas. There have been hundreds of thousands of creatures carried off. . . . 1768-71.—“The coins current at Batavia are the following:—The milled Dutch gold ducat, which is worth 6 gilders and 12 stivers; the Japan gold coupangs, of which the old go for 24 gilders, and the new for 14 gilders and 8 stivers.”—Navorinus, E.T. i. 307.

1830.—“Never give a Kobang to a cat.”—Jap. Proverb, in Miss Bird, i. 307.

KOEL, s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamis orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called kokild and kokla. The name koil is taken from its cry during the breeding season, “ku-il, ku-il, increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on. The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Ho-chee-ho, or Ho-a-o, or Ho-y-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call; all thoroughly cuculine.” (Jerdon.)

c. 1526.—“Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindustan. It is respected by the natives of Hindustan as much as the nightingale is by us. It inhabits gardens where the trees are close planted.”—Babur, p. 323.

c. 1590.—“The Koyil resembles the mynch (see MYNA), but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be enamoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale.”—Ayren, ed. Gladwin, ii. 381; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 121].

c. 1790.—“Le plaisir que cause la fraîcheur dont on jouit sous cette bello verdure est augmenté encore par le gazouillement des oiseaux et les cris clairs et perçans du Koewil. . . .”—Haafner, ii. 9.

1810.—“The Kokeela and a few other birds of song.”—Maria Graham, 22.

1883.—“This same crow-pheasant has a second or third cousin called the Koel, which deposits its eggs in the nest of the crow, and has its young brought up by that discreditable foster-parent. Now this bird supposes that it has a musical voice, and devotes the best part of the night to vocal exercise, after the manner of the nightingale. You may call it the Indian nightingale if you like. There is a difference however in its song: . . . when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, or rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again. . . . Does not the Marntha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air was filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?”—Tribes on My Frontier, 156.

KOHINOR, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nūr, 'Mountain of Light'; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alāuddīn Khiljī (dd. 1318), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humāyūn) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nādir extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shāh (1739). After Nādir's death it came into the hands of Alamed Shāh, the founder of the Afghan monarchy. Shāh Shujā', Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 180½ carats to 106½. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1526.—"In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikermājīt (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bikermājīt's family . . . were at this moment in Agra. When Hāmān arrived . . . (he) did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Hāmān a peashesh (see PESHESH), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultān Alāuddīn. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expence of the whole world. It is about eight mīshkal. . . ."—Baber, p. 308.

1676.—(With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul . . . and it weighs 310 Ratis (see RUTTEE) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weigh'd 907 Ratis, which make 793 carats."—Tavernier, L.T. ii. 148; [ed. Dall, ii. 123].

1856.—"He (Akbar) bears no weapon, save his dagger, hid

Up to the ivory haft in muslin swathes;
No ornament but that one famous gem,

Mountain of Light! bound with a silken thread

Upon his nervous wrist; more used, I woun,

To feel the rough strap of his buckler there." The Banyan Tree.

KOOKRY, s. Hind. kukri, [which originally means 'a twisted skein of thread,' from kūkud, 'to wind'; and then anything curved]. The peculiar weapon of the Goorkhas, a bill, admirably designed and poised for hewing a branch or a foe. [See engravings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. ix.]

1793.—"It is in telling small trees or shrubs, and lopping the branches of others for this purpose that the dagger or knife worn by every Nepaulian, and called khookheri, is chiefly employed."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul, 118.

[c. 1826.—"I hear my friend means to offer me a Cuckery."—Id. Combrunne, in Life, ii. 179.

[1828.—"We have seen some men supplied with Cookeries, and the curved knife of the Ghorka."—Skinner, Excursions, ii. 129.]

1866.—"A dense jungle of bamboo, through which we had to cut a way, taking it by turns to lead, and how a path through the tough stems with my 'kukri,' which here proved of great service."—Id. Col. T. Lezin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 258.

KOOMKY, s. (See COOMKY.)

KOONBEE, KUNBEE, KOOL-UMBEE, n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmi of N. India. Skt. kutumba. The Kumbi is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Mahratta (Drummond).

[1598.—"The Canarijns and Corumbijns are the Countrimen."—Jānschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 260.

[c. 1610.—"The natives are the Bramonis, Canarins and Coulombins."—Pyrard de LaVal, Hak. Soc. ii. 35.

[1813.—"A Sopyo of the Mharatta or Columbee tribe."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 27.]

KOOT, s. Hind. kut, from Skt. kushta, the costum and costus of the Roman writers. (See under PITCHOCK.)

"Costum molle date, et blandi mihi thuris honores."—Propertius, IV. vi. 5.

c. 70-80.—"Odorum causâ unguentorumque et deliciarum, si placet, etiam superstitionis gratiâ emantur, quoniam tunc supplicamus et costo."—Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxii. 56.

c. 80-90.—(From the Sinthus or Indus) "ἀρριφορτίζεται δὲ κόστος, βδέλλα, λίκιον, νέρδος. . . ."—Periplus.

1563.—"R. And does not the Indian costus grow in Guzarate?"

"O. It grows in territory often subject to Guzarat, i.e. lying between Bengal and Dely and Cambay, I mean the lands of Mamdou and Chitor. . . ."—Garcia, f. 72.

1584.—"Costo dylee from Zindi and Carubain."—Barret, in Hall, ii. 413.

KOOZA, s. A goglet, or pitcher of porous clay; corr. of Pers. kāza. Commonly used at Bombay.

[1611.—"One sack of cusher to make cohob."—Danvers, Letters, i. 128.]

1690.—"Therefore they carry about with them Koussers or Jars of Water, when they go abroad, to quench their thirst. . . ."—Ovington, 293.

[1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their Coojahs or goglets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whitish clay."—Riddell, Ind. Domest. Econ., 362.]

KOSHOUN, s. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piddah askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahris (see CUTCHERRY), composed in all of 27 Kushûns. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kushoon was properly Skt. kshuni or kshavuni, 'a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Mahābhārata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdur-razzāk: "He (Shāh Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomāns (corps of 10,000), the koshûn (corps of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the dekeh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards" (Notes et Exts. xiv. 91; see also p. 89). Again: "The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshûn by koshûn." (Ibid. 130.) Vambéry gives koshûn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

[1753.—" . . . Kara-kushun, are also foot soldiers . . . the name is Turkish and signifies black guard."—Hanway, I. pt. ii. 252.]

c. 1782.—"In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exeroises . . . of the regular troops were . . . performed, and the word given according to the French system . . . but now, the Sultan (Tippoo) . . . changed the military code . . . and altered the technical terms or words of command . . . to words of the Persian and Turkish languages. . . . From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kushoon, and the officer commanding that body was called a Sipahdar. . . ."—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.

KOTOW, KOWTOW, s. From the Chinese k'o-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Cheu Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Hārūn-al-Rashid (A.D. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khāns, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst's refusal to perform it at Peking in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation.

K'o-tou-k'o-ton! is often colloquially used for 'Thank you' (E. C. Huber).

c. B.C. 484.—"And afterwards when they were come to Susa in the king's presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose."—Herodotus, by Radclinton, vii. 136.

c. B.C. 464.—"Themistocles . . . first meets with Artabanus the Chiliarch, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king. . . . But quoth he; 'Stranger, the laws of men are various. . . . You Greeks, 'tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things.' . . . Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him; 'But I, O Artabanus, . . . will myself obey your laws.' . . ."—Plutarch, Themistoc., xxvii.

c. B.C. 390.—"Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, first presented himself to the Chiliarch Tithraustes who held the second rank in the empire, and stated that he desired an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: 'It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call προσκυλεύειν). If this is disagreeable to you you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.' Then Conon says: 'Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit upon my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own, but those of foreigners.' Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer."—Corn. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

n.c. 324.—"But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to be despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolus was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kasandor had come but lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (προσκυνοῦντας), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Alexander in a rage gript him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall."—Plutarch, Alexander, lxxiv.

A.D. 798.—"In the 14th year of Tchinyuan, the Khalif Galun (Hārūn) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedans declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer."—Gaubil, Abrégé de l'Histoire des Thangs, in Amoy, Mémoires conc. les Chinois, xvi. 141.

c. 1245.—"Tartari de mandato ipsius principes suos Balochony et Bato violentor ab omnibus nunciis ad ipsos venientibus faciant adorari cum triplici genuum flexione, triplici quoque caputum suorum in terram allisione."—Vincenut Bellovacensis, Spec. Historiale, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298.—"And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: 'Bow and adore!' And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times."—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1401.—"E sicaronle vestir dos ropas do amocan (seo KINCOB), é la uzanza era, quando estas roupa ponian por el Señor, do facer un grm yantar, é despues do comer do les vestir de las ropas, é entonces do linear los fnojos tres veces in tierra por reverencia del gran Señor."—Clarjo, § xcii.

"And the custom was, when these robes were presented as from the Emperor, to make a great feast, and after eating to clothe them with the robes, and then that they should touch the ground three times with the knees to show great reverence for the Lord."—See Markham, p. 104.

1421.—"His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was . . . chief of one of the twelve Imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Mussulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: 'First prostrate yourselves, and then touch the ground three times with your heads.'"—Embassy from Shah Rukh, in Cathay, p. ccci.

1502.—"My uncle the older Khan came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced . . . and when he came to the distance at which the korki is to be performed, he knelt nine times. . . ."—Dabur, 106.

c. 1590.—The kornish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kornish."—Lin, ed. Blochmann, i. 158.

But for his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (sijda) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man-worship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly; when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."—Ibid. p. 169.

1618.—"The King (Shāh 'Abbās) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times."—P. della Valle, i. 646.

[c. 1636.—"Job (Charnock) made a salam Kornish, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced."—Orme, Fragments, quoted in Fule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xcvii.]

1816.—"Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some others from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador. . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of (Lord Amherst's) Embassy to China, 213-214.

1821.—"The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Pauthier, 192.

1855.—" . . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the ko-tou to the aristocracy of the accident."—H. Martineau, Autobiog. ii. 377.

1860.—"Some Seiks, and a private in the Buffs, having remained behind with the grog-carts, fell into the hands of the Chinese. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the ko-tou. The Seiks obeyed; but Moyses, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed;
Vain those all-shattering guns;
Unless proud England kneel, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as firm as Sparta's king, Because his soul was great."

Marmillan's Map, iii. 130.

1876.—"Nooba more ko-tou big people."—Leland, 46.

1879.—"We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing, would scarcely ko-tou to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Review, April 19, p. 505.

KOTUL, s. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotal, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1554.—"Koutel." See under RHINO-CEROS.]

[1809.—"We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotuls or passes."—Elphinstone, Cambul, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBBER, KHUBBER, s. Ar.—P.—H. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, e.g. "There is pukka khubber of a tiger this morning."

[1828.—" . . . the servant informed us that there were some gongwals, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khubber (news about tigers) to give us."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1853, p. 13.]

1878.—"Khabar of innumerable black partridges had been received."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 169.

1879.—"He will not tell me what khubber has been received."—'Unity Fair', Nov. 29, p. 299.

KUBBERDAUR. An interjectional exclamation, 'Take care!' Pers. khavar-dār! 'take heed!' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidārs to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy'.]

c. 1664.—"Each omrah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kaber-dar, have a care."—Berner, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 369].

c. 1665.—"Les archers crient ensuite a pleino tête, Caberdar, c'est à dire prondz garde."—Theriot, v. 53.

[1813.—"There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khubar-dar, or newsman, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 25.]

KUHĀR, s. Hind. Kahār, [Skt. skandha-kāra, 'one who carries loads on his shoulders']. The name of a Śūdra caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahār and the N.W. Provinces, whose speciality is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankin-bearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1350.—"It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kahārs, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palankin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1550.—"So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulbs, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kahārs in basketfuls."—Rāmāyana of Tulsi Dās, by Growse, 1878, ii. 101.

1673.—"He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palankeons, carried by Cohors, Muselman Porters."—Fryer, 63.

1810.—"The Cahar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, P.M. i. 209.

1873.—"Bhut Kahār. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palkis, dolis, water-skins, &c.; to act as Porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits: they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telinga descent. . . ."—Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Prov., quoted in Ind. Antiq. ii. 151.

KULĀ, KLĀ, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerns who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kols; another suggestion has connected it with Kalinga (see KLING); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kā, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea).' But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gauda, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gauṛ (see GOUR, c).

14th cent.—"The Heroes Sona and Uttara were sent to Rāmañña, which forms a part of Suvannabhūmi, to propagate the holy faith. . . . This town is called to this day Golamattikanagara, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of houses of the Gola people."—Iussr. at Kalyāni near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 5.

1795.—"They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855.—"His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalās; . . ."—Puler, Mission to the Court of Ava (Phayré's), p. 5.

"By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kālā admi—'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kālā, a foreigner."—Ibid. p. 37.

KUMPÁSS, s. Hind. kampās, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation, and even to the shaft of a carriage. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunta kumpass, "the 3-cornered compass."

[1806.—"Many an amusing story did I hear of this wonderful kumpass. It possessed the power of reversing everything observed. Hence if you looked through the doorbars at a fort, everything inside was revealed. Thus the Feringhees so readily took forts, not by skill or by valour, but by means of the wonderful power of the doorbar."—Confess. of an Officer, 175.]

KUNKUR, CONKER, &c., s. Hind. kankar, 'gravel.' As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: "A coarse kind of lime-stone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small." Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1781.—"Maya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called concha, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification" (1).—Hodges, 110.

1791.—"Konker" appears in a Notification for tenders in Calcutta Gazette.—In Seton-Karr, ii. 135.

c. 1809.—"We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high conkur bank."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810.—"... a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at first, might be mistaken for small rugged flints, slightly coated with soil."—Williamson, i. M. ii. 13.

KUREEF, KHUREEF, s. Hind. adopted from Ar. kharij ('autumn'). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November–December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. (See RUBBEE).

[1821.—"The basis on which the settlements were generally founded, was a measurement of the Khureef, or first crop, when it is cut down, and of the Rubbee, or second, when it is about half a foot high. . . ."—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 29.]

KURNOOL, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Karnāt of the Imp. Gazetteer; till 1838 a tributary Nawabship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandanūr; Canoul of Orme. Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all of which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country 'fine spun, clear thread,' and according to Meer Husam it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who "ought to know better," as we are often told. [The Madras Gloss. gives the name as Tam. karnūlu, from lundna, 'a mixture of lamp-oil and burnt straw used in greasing cart-wheels' and prolu, 'village,' because when the temple at Alampur was being built, the wheels of the carts were greased here, and thus a settlement was formed.]

KUTTAUR, s. Hind. katār, Skt. latātri, 'a dagger,' especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. [See a drawing in Egerton, Handbook, Indian Arms, pl. ix.] Ibn Batuta's account is vivid, and perhaps in the matter of size there may be no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a prototype of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-4; among them two great latātri, with sheaths made from the snouts of two saw-fishes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26. There is also a plate in the Ind. Antig. (vii. 193) representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace Armoury, among which are katār-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Walkhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted katār-fashion were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferara. I add an extract. Mr. Wallhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavovinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by 'belly piercer.'

c. 1343.—"The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the forearm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal."—Un Baita, iv. 31-32.

1442.—"The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. . . . In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (kattārah-ī-Hindī), and in the other a buckler of ox-hide . . . this costume is common to the king and the beggar."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVIIth Cent., p. 17.

c. 1526.—"On the whole there were given one tipchāk horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the bolts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (khanjar—see HANGER), 16 enamelled kitārehs, two daggers (jamāher—see JUMDUD) set with precious stones."—Naber, 338.

[c. 1690.—In the list of the Moghul arms we have: "10. Kattārah, price $\frac{1}{2}$ R. to 1 Muhr."—Āin, ed. Blockmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.]

1633.—"Les personnes de qualité portēt dans la ceinture vne sorte d'armes, ou de poignards, courte et large, qu'ils appellent ginda (?) ou Catarre, dont la garde et la gaine sont d'or."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 223.

1673.—"They go rich in Attire, with a Poniard, or Catarre, at their girdle."—Fryer, 93.

1690.—". . . which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Catarray or Bagonet in his hands he first falls upon those that are near him . . . killing and stabbing as he goes. . . ."—Orington, 237.

1754.—"To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cuttarrī) and two swords. . . ."—H. of Nadir, in Hanway's Travels, ii. 386.

1768-71.—"They (the Moguls) on the left side . . . wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped."—Stavovinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813.—"After a short silent prayer, Lullaby, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarra, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man. . . . The patient continued for some time motionless: in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened, . . . at the expiration of the third hour Lullaby had effected his cure."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 69].

1856.—"The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the 'Kutār,' or dagger, a representation of which is scrawled beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā" (q.v.).—Forbes, Rds Māda, ed. 1878, pp. 559-560.

1878.—"The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Srirangam near Trichinapalli, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kuttars or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kuttars, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than $\frac{2}{3}$ of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding . . . and all were so soft as to be easily bent."—Ind. Antig. vii.

KUZZANNA, s. Ar.—H. khezāna, or khezāna, 'a treasury.' [In Ar. kha-zīnah, or kha-znah, means 'a treasure,' representing 1000 kis or purses, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405).] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khasānchi for the treasurer.

1633.—"Yo King's Duan (see DEWAUN) had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year's Tallicas (see TALIGA) . . . ordering his Peasdnst (Peashdnst, an assistant) to see it suddenly paid in yo King's Guzzanna."—Hedger, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 103.

[1757.—"A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coining gold and silver into Siccas and Mohurs . . . they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna. . . ."—Forwannah from Jaffier Ally Khan, in Verelst, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH, n.p. Turki kizil-bash, 'red-head.' This title has been since the days of the Safavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. ["At Kābul," writes Bellew (Races of Afghanistan, 107), "he (Nādir) left as chandaul, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kizilbāsh (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nādir they remained at Kābul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chandaul. These Kizilbāsh hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority."] Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

c. 1510.—"L'vianza loro è di portare vna berretta rossa, ch'auanza sopra la testa mezzo braccio, a guisa d'un zon ('like a top'), che dalla parte, che si mette in testa, vine a esser larga, ristringendosi tuttauia sino in cima, et è fatta con dodici coste grosse vn dito . . . no mai tagliano barba no mustacchi."—G. M. Angiolello, in Ramusio, ii. f. 74.

1550.—"Oltra il deserto che è sopra il Corassam fino à Samarcand . . . signorreggiano Iscit bas, cioè le berrette verdi, le quali berrette verdi sono alcuni Tartari Musulmani che portano le loro berrette di feltro verde acute, o così si fanno chiamare à differentia de Sofiani suoi capitali nemici che signorreggiano la Persia, pur anche essi Musulmani, i quali portano le berrette rosse, quali berrette verdi e rosse, hanno continuamente hauuta fra se guerra crudelissima per causa di diversità di opinione nella loro religione."—Chaggy Mem., in Ramusio, ii. f. 16v. "Beyond the desert above Corassam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Iscitbas (Iscitbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Musulman Tartars who wear pointed caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies, the Sofians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Musulmans, but who wear red caps."

1574.—"These Persians are also called Red Turis, which I beelieve is because they have bebind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c. with Red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations."—Hanwolff, 173.

1606.—"Cocelbaxas, who are the soldiers whom they esteem most highly."—Gourea, f. 143.

1653.—"Je visité le keselbache qui y commande vne petite forteresse, duquel ie receu beaucoup de civilitez."—De La Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, pp. 234-5.

"Keselbache est vn mot composé de Kesel, qui signifie rouge, et bachi, teste, comme qui diroit teste rouge, et par ce terme s'entendent les gens de guerre de Perse, à cause du bonnet de Sophi qui est rouge."—Ibid. 545.

1673.—"Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cusle-Bashees, or with us the Chevaliers."—Fryer, 356. Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815.—"The seven Turkish tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Ismail's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzelbash, or 'golden heads,' which has descended to their posterity."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1828.—"The Kuzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser."

1883.—"For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilzais, Kuki Kheyls, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logaris, Wardaks, Mandozais, Lepel-Griffin, and Kizilbashees, as to master the division of the great race of rats."—Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

KYFE, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustani dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how?' 'in what manner?' the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how comed you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by hashish, &c.

1808.—" . . . a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Ganja or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, lulling the senses and disposing to sleep."—R. Drummond.

KYOUNG, s. Burm. kyaung. A Buddhist monastery. The term is not employed by Padre Sangermano, who uses bao, a word, he says, used by the

Portuguese in India (p. 88). I cannot explain it. [See BAO.]

1799.—“The Idoums or convents of the Thahanans are different in their structure from common houses, and much resemble the architecture of the Chinese; they are made entirely of wood; the roof is composed of different stages, supported by strong pillars,” &c.—Symes, p. 210.

KYTHEE, s. Hind. Kaithi. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by Bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kāyath (Skt. Kāyastha), a member of the writer-caste.

LAC, s. Hind. lakh, from Skt. lakṣhā, for rikṣhā. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhak (see DHAWK) is one, but chiefly Peepul, and khosum [kusum, kusumb], i.e. Schleichera bijuga, trijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seqq.; [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Walt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men's hats.

Though lak bears the same sense in Persian, and lak or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Gloss., pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-sumutri, ‘lac of Sumatra’; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfart's account below. The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are laquer and lacked ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbaricē, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariakū:—

“Σίδηρος Ἴριδος καὶ στέμματα (Indian iron and steel) Λάκκος χρωμάτων (Lac-dye).”

c. 250.—“There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrum, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia.”—Aelian, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1313.—The notice of laca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of laca, the matura and acerba, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: “It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from coviere (f). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the coviere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and these coviere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe laca. And more of these coviere is found in the unripe than the ripe laca,” and so on.—Della Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—“There also grows a very large quantity of lacca (or larna) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts.”—Varthema, 233.

1516.—“Here (in Pegu) they load much fine lacquer, which grows in the country.”—Barbora, Lisbon Acad., 360.

1619.—"And because he had it much in charge to get all the lac (lacro) that he could, the governor knowing through information of the merchants that much came to the Coast of Chormandel by the ships of Pegu and Martaban that frequented that coast. . . ."—Corrae, ii. 167.

1663.—"Now it is time to speak of the lacro, of which so much is consumed in this country in closing letters, and for other seal, in the place of wax."—Garcia, i. 112r.

1682.—"Laker is a kind of gum that proceedeth of the ant."—Casadeira, tr. by N.L., f. 33.

c. 1690.—(Recipe for Lac varnish). "Lac is used for clayhs (see CHICK, a). If red, 1 err of lac, and 1 s. of vermillion, if yellow, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. zarnikh."—Lin, ed. Blochmann, i. 226.

1616.—"In this Iland (Goa) is the hard Waxo made (which we call Spanish Wax), and is made in the manner following. They inclose a large plotte of ground, with a little trench filled with water; then they stick up a great number of small staves upon the rayd plot, that being done they bring thither a sort of pismires, farre bigger than ours, which being delar'd by the water to issue out, are constrained to retire them selves upon the said staves, where they are kill'd with the Heate of the Sunne, and thereof it is that Lacka is made."—De Monfort, 35-36.

c. 1610.—" . . . Vno maniere de lacre ronde, vernie, et lacrée, qui est vno ourage de ces bestes."—Pantal de Lantil, i. 127; (Mal. Soc. i. 170).

1627.—"Lac is a strange druggs, made by certain winged Pismires of the gumme of Trees."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 563.

1641.—"There are in the territories of the Mogor, besides those things mentioned, other articles of trade, such as Lacre, both the insect luro and the cake" (de foras de de puta).—Barrocas, MS.

1663.—"In one of these Halls you shall find Embroiderers . . . in another you shall see Goldsmiths . . . in a fourth Workmen in Lacca."—Berner E.T. 83, [ed. Conrad, 226].

1737.—"Their lackt or yapon'd Ware is without any Doubt the best in the World."—A. Hamilton, ii. 305; [ed. 1741].

LACCADIVE ISLANDS, n.p. Probably Skt. Lakadvipa, '100,000 Islands'; a name however which would apply much better to the Maldives, for the former are not really very numerous. There is not, we suspect, any ancient or certain native source for the name as specifically applied to the northern group of islands. Barbosa, the oldest authority we know as mentioning the group (1616), calls them Malandira, and the Maldives Palandira. Several of the individual islands are mentioned in the Tuhfat al-Majidiyin (E.T. by Rowlandson, pp. 160-52), the group itself being called "the islands of Malabar."

LAOK, s. One hundred thousand, and especially in the Anglo-Indian colloquial 100,000 Rupees, in the days of better exchange the equivalent of £10,000. Hind. lakh, lak, &c., from Skt. lakṣa, used (see below) in the same sense, but which appears to have originally meant "a mark." It is necessary to explain that the term does not occur in the earlier Skt. works. Thus in the Tilavalakṣa Brahmayud, a complete series of the higher numerical terms is given. After śata (10), śahara (1000), comes ayuta (10,000), prayuta (now a million), nyuta (now also a million), arabuta (100 millions), nyarabuta (not now used), nikharna (do.), and yadma (now 10,000 millions). Lakṣa is therefore a modern substitute for prayuta, and the series has been expanded. This was probably done by the Indian astronomers between the 5th and 10th centuries A.D.

The word has been adopted in the Malay and Javanese, and other languages of the Archipelago. But it is remarkable that in all of this class of languages which have adopted the word it is used in the sense of 10,000 instead of 100,000 with the sole exception of the Lampung of Sumatra, who use it correctly. (Clausen).

(See CRORE.) We should observe that though a lack, used absolutely for a sum of money, in modern times always implies rupees, this has not always been the case. Thus in the time of Akbar and his immediate successors the revenue was settled and reckoned in *lak*s of dams (q.v.). Thus:

c. 1591.—"In the 40th year of his majesty's reign (Akbar's), his dominions consisted of 105 Sirars, subdivided into 2737 Kushtis (see CUSBAH), the revenue of which he settled for ten years, at the annual rent of 3 Arribi, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 53,216 Daris. . . ."—Lyren, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

At Ormuz again we find another lack in vogue, of which the unit was apparently the dindr, not the old gold coin, but a degenerate dindr of small value. Thus:

1554.—“(Money of Ormuz).—A league is equivalent to 50 pardaos of cadis, which is called ‘bad money,’ (and this league is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz); and each of those pardaos is equal to 2 azars, and each azar to 10 cadis, each cadis to 100 dinars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house. . . .”—Annaes, Lyro dos Persas, &c., in Subsídios, 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazâr or 1000 (dinars); the cadis Pers. sad or 100 (dinars); the league or lak, 100,000 (dinars); and the tomân (see TOMAUN), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dinars).

c. 1300.—“They went to the Kâfir’s tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 laks. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dinars, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dinars.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

c. 1340.—“The Sultan distributes daily two laks in alms, never less; a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 100,000 pieces of silver.”—Shihabuddin Dimishki, in Notes and Exts., xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1510.—“The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faria’s demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and an half sixteen Lacaznas (headed) of men were slain, every Lacazna containing an hundred thousand.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1516.—“ . . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories . . . there died fifty Lacaznas of persons.”—Ibid. p. 221.

1615.—“And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling.”—Coryat’s Letters from India (Crudities, iii. f. 25r).

1616.—“He received twenty leacks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling).”—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and rec. i. 45, 183, 238].

1651.—“Yoder Lac is hondert duysond.”—Rogierus, 77.

c. 1665.—“Il faut cent mille roupies pour faire un lak, cent mille laks pour faire un couron, cent mille courons pour faire un padan, et cent mille padan pour faire un nil.”—Theriot, v. 54.

1673.—“In these great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leagues, which is no many hundred thousand in our account.”—Fryer, [p. 101, reading Leagues].

1684.—“They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great summes of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 44. In the House of Office two Lacks. They in all found Ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—“ . . . a lack of Pagodas. . . .”—In Wheeler, i. 262.

1747.—“The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lacerative (sic) Disposition, and . . . are so exceedingly avaritious, occasioned by the large Profusers they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them.”—Letter from Ft. St. David to the Court, May 2 (MS. Records in India Office).

1778.—“Sir Matthew Mito will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 6 lacks of roupies.”—Footes, The Nabob, Act I. sc. 1.

1785.—“Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacks of pagodas.”—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke’s Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—“Tout le reste (et dans la reste il y a des Intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s’assied par terre.”—Jacquemont, Correspond. ii. 120.

1879.—“In modern times the only numbers in practical use above ‘thousands’ are lala (‘lac’ or ‘lakh’) and lo (‘crore’); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 lakhs, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety.”—Whitney, Sansk. Grammar, 161.

The older writers, it will be observed (c. 1600-1620), put the lakh at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; now (1850) it is little more than £8000; [now (1901) about £6666].

LAOKERAGE. (See KHIRAJ.)

LALL-SHRAUB, s. Englishman’s Hind. lâl-sharâb, ‘red wine.’ The universal name of claret in India.

[c. 1780.—“To every plate are set down two glasses; one pyramidal (like hobnob glasses in England) for Lall Shrub (scillet, claret); the other a common sized wineglass for whatever beverage is most agreeable.”—Diary of Mrs. Fay, in Busted, Echoes, 123.]

LALLA, s. P.—II. lalla. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, ‘child’s bearer.’ In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respectable merchant. [For the Pers. usage see Hochmann, Äin, i. 426 note.]

[1841.—"Where there are no tigers, the Lalla (scribe) becomes a shikaree."—Society in India, ii. 170.]

LAMA, s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. bLama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590.—"Fawning Court doctors . . . said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years . . . and in Thibet there were even now a class of Lamahas or Mongolian devotees, and recluses, and hermits that live 200 years and more. . . ."—Bedouin, quoted by Hochmann, Äin, i. 201.

1664.—"This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lamy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmans are in the Indies. . . . he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born. . . ."—Berner, E.T. 135; [ed. Constable, 421].

1771.—" . . . ma questo primo figlio . . . rinunziò in corona al secondo o lui disfatti si fece religioso o lama del paese."—Della Tomba, 61.

c. 1818.—

"The Parliament of Thibet met—

The little Lama, called before it,

Did there and then his whipping get,

And, as the Nursery Gazette

Assures us, like a hero bore it."

T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876.—" . . . Hastings . . . touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. . . . But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confirming in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Fluelen—"Tis all one; 'tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both."—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:—

1879.—"The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Lama."—Pitt's Drams, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. convent of lami and soral), but is a factitious French word analogous to nonnerie, sacherie, laiterie, &c.

[c. 1811.—"According to the Tartars, the Lamasery of the Five Towers is the best place you can be buried in."—Hue, Travels in Turkey, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lāmbārd, Malh. Lambāy, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, 'long, tall'; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lampata, 'greedy.'] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Banjāris (see BRINJARRY). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lubhātā, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjāras. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lavana); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—"The army was constantly supplied . . . by bands of people called Lamballie, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Orme, ii. 102.

1755.—"What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwāl (see COTWAL), and many Lumbānehs with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tippon, 49.

LANCHARA, s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchār, 'quick, nimble.' [Mr. Skent writes: "The real Malay form is lanchar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchār, 'swift,' and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanchar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchār, as has hitherto been implied or suggested."]

c. 1535.—"In questo paese di Cambaja (read Cambaja) vi sono molti fiumi, nelli quali vi sono li nauili detti Lancharas, cō li quali vanno nauigando la costa di Siam. . . ."

—Sommario de' Regni, &c., in Ramusio, i. f. 338.

c. 1539.—"This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malacca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabundar (see SHABUNDER). . . . This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor."—Pinto, E.T. p. 81.

LANDWIND, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.] In Port. Terrenho.

1561.—"Correndo a cor-la com terrenhos."
—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

[1598.—"The East winds beginne to blow from off the land into the sea, whereby they are called Torreinhos."—Linechoten, Hak. Soc. i. 231.

[1612.—"Send John Dench . . . that in the morning he may go out with the land-torne and return with the seatorne."—Danvers, Letters, i. 206.]

1644.—"And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monsoon) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W. prevails more than any other wind . . . and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, MS.

1673.—". . . we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrenhoes."—Fryer, 23.

[1773.—See the account in Jrs, 70.]

1833.—"We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious land-wind, very fatiguing and weakening. . . . Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 190-200.

LANGASAGUE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611.—"After two or three dayes space a Iesuita came vnto vs from a place called Langasacke, to which place the Carako of Macao is yearly wont to come."—W. Adams, in Furber, i. 126.

1613.—The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Nangasaque and Langasaque.—Ibid. 360.

1614.—"Gore hym counsell to take heed of one Pedro Guzano, a papist Christian, whoe is his hoste at Macao; for a lying fryro (or Jexuit) tould Mr. Peacock at Langasaque that Capt. Adams was dead in the howse of the said Guzano, which now I know is a lye por letters I received. . . ."—Cocks, to Wtcham, in Diary, &c., ii. 264.

1618.—"It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com downe together every yeare to Langasaque and this place, and have allwaie byn accustomed to buy by the pancada (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goodes which came in the carick from Amacan, the Portugales having no prevelage as we have."—The same to the E.I. Co., ii. 207-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nangasaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabang on the Mekong. Lang-chan is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1587.—"I went from Pegu to Lanabey (see JANGOMAY), which is in the country of the *Langianne*s; it is fine and twentie dayes journey North-east from Pegu."—Fitch, in Hall, ii.

c. 1598.—"Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Laos) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegu."—De Morga, 93.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lang John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma (JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea. . . . and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

1663.—"Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquelz on n'a presque jamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a un qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens. . . . le Royaume n'a pris son nom que du grand nombre d'Elephants qui s'y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, milliers d'Elephants."—Marini, II. Nouvelle et Crierie des Royaumes de Siam et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1666), 329, 337.

1668.—Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Loubère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

c. 1632.—"Laos est situé sous le même Climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, reparté des États voisins par des forêts et par des déserts. . . Les principales villes sont Landjam et Triamja."—Kaempfer, H. du Japon, l. 22-3.

LANTEA, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

c. 1510.—" . . . that . . . they set sail from Ziampra for Malacca, and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sundra they had been set upon by a Pyrat, a Ugarut by Nation, called Cuia Aera, who had three Junks, and four Lanteas. . ."—Pinto, L.T. p. 69.

c. 1560.—"There be other lesser shipping than Junks, somewhat long, called Lanteas, they place three Oars on a side, and rowe very well, and load a great deal of goods, there be other lesser called Lanteas, which doe rowe very swift, and beare a good burthen also, and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Lanteas and Lanteas, because they are swift, the threene do commonly use."—Guyar da Cruz, in Perelas, iii. 174.

LAOS, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on the one hand and China and Tongking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shans, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the same race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xieng-mni, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jangomay of some old English documents. In later times the chief States were Muang Luang Prabang (see LAN JOHN) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Lao is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Prabang is still quasi independent; Vien-shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1533.—"Of silver of 11 dinheiros alloy he (Albuquerque) made only a kind of money called Melayozes, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dinheiros assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms."—Barros, H. vi. 6.

1533.—" . . . certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gucos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, lying between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon . . . and on the South adjoin the Laos the two Kingdoms of Cambodia and Chouja (see CHAMPAL), which are on the southward. These Laos . . . though they are lords of so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him."—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

"Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangom (see JANGOMAY), the chief city of which is called Chinay . . . the second Chouja (Chouja); the third Lauchra (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cacho, or Cachenelma. . ."—Ibid.

c. 1569.—"These Laos came to Cambodia, down a River many daies Journee, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fifteen, and twentie fathome water, as my selfe saw by experience in a great part of it, it passeth through many unknowne and desert Countries of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffes . . . and certaine herdes which in that Countrie they call Jirdas (see ABADA)."—Guyar da Cruz, in Perelas, iii. 169.

c. 1595.—" . . . I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. . ."—Blas de Herman Gonzalez, in De Morja (E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1611.—"Concerning the Land of the Louwen, and a Journey made thereto by our Folk in Anno 1611" (Kc.).—Valentijn, III. Pt. ii. pp. 60 seqq.

1663.—"Relation Nouvelle et Curieuse de Romme de Lao.—Traduit du l'italien du P. de Marini, Romain. Paris, 1666."

LAR, n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a). To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Λαρκή of Ptolemy; and appears to represent an old Skt. name Lata, adj. Latala, or Latika. ["The name Lāta appears to be derived from some local tribe, perhaps the Luttar, who, as r and l are commonly used for each other, may possibly be the well-known Rashtrakūṭas since their great King Amoghavarsha (A.D. 851-879) calls the name of the dynasty Ratta."]—Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. I. 7.]

c. A.D. 150.—"Τῆς δὲ Ἰνδοσκίθας τὰ ἐπὶ ἀνατολῆς τὰ μὲν ἀπὸ θαλάσσης κατέχει ἡ Λαρκὴ χώρα, ἐν ᾗ μετέχουσιν ἀπὸ μὲν δόξαι τοῦ Σαρδάου ποταμοῦ πόλιν ἴδε. . . . Παρίγαφα ἑμπορίων."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 62.

c. 910.—"On the coast, e.g. at Saimūr, nt Sūlām, and at Tāna, they speak Lārī; these provinces give their name to the Sea of Lār (Lārāwī) on the coast of which they are situated."—Maṣ'ūdī, i. 351.

c. 1020.—" . . . to Kach the country producing gum (mūl, i.e. Edellum, q.v.), and Ardrād (I) . . . to Somnāt, fourteen (parangs); to Kamikāya, thirty . . . to Tāna five. Thero you enter the country of Lārān, where is Jaimūr (i.e. Saimūr, see CHOUL).—Al-Bīrūnī, in Ellis, i. 65.

c. 1190.—"Udaya the Parmār mounted and came. The Doms followed him from Lār. . . ."—The Poem of Chand Bardai, E.T. by Beames, in Ind. Antiq. i. 275.

c. 1330.—"A certain Traveller says that Tāna is a city of Guzerat (Jucrat) in its eastern part, lying west of Malabar (Munūṭā); whilst Ibn Sa'īd says that it is the furthest city of Lār (Al-Lār), and very famous among traders."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 168.

(b). To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived until recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond

Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see LARRY BUNDER).

c. 1820.—"Dival . . . was reduced to ruins by a Muhammedan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name . . . and was succeeded by Lāri Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern deltā, particularly the western part."—M. Murdo, in J.R. As. Soc. i. 29.

(c). To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital.

c. 1220.—Lār is erroneously described by Yāqūt as a great island between Sīrāf and Kīsh. But there is no such island.* It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1330.—"We marched for three days through a desert . . . and then arrived at Lār, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shaikh Abu Duhaf Muhammad. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 210.

c. 1357.—"Returning along the coast, for against Ormuz there is a towne called Lār, a great and good towne of merchandise, about ijmi houses. . . ."—Joana Barlora, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 80.

[c. 1590.—"Lār borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous. . . ."—Ata, ed. Jarrett, n. 363.]

1553.—"These benefactions the Kings of Ormuz . . . pay to this day to a mosque which that Caeiz (see CASIS) had made in a district called Honger of Sheikh Damiar, adjoining the city of Lara, distant from Ormuz over 40 leagues."—Barros, II. h. 2.

1602.—"This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lara, adjoining that of Ormuz: his proper name was Cuso, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lara he took a surname from the country, and called himself Cuso Larym."—Canto, IV. vii. 6.

1622.—"Lār, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there absolutely; but about 23 years since, for reasons rather generous than covetous, as it would seem, it was attacked by Abas K. of Persia, and the country forcibly taken. . . . Now Lār is the seat of a Sultan dependent on the Khan of Shiraz. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 322.

1727.—"And 4 Days Journey within Land, is the City of Lār, which according to their fabulous tradition is the Burying-

* It is possible that the island called Shakh Shu'āl, which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sīrāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the K. of Ormuz (p. 87).

place of Lot. . . .—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1741].

LARĀĪ, s. This Hind. word, meaning 'fighting,' is by a curious idiom applied to the biting and annoyance of fleas and the like. [It is not mentioned in the dictionaries of either Fallon or Platts.] There is a similar idiom (jung lardan) in Persian.

LAREK, n.p. Lārak; an island in the Persian Gulf, not far from the island of Jerun or Ormus.

[1623.—"At noon, being near Lareck, and no wind stirring, we cast Anchor."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 3.]

1653.—"We came up with the Islands of Ormus and Arack . . ." (called Lareck afterwards).—Hedges, Diary, May 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

LARIN, s. Pers. lārī. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use on the Persian Gulf, W. Coast of India, and in the Maldivé Islands, in which last it survived to the last century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It is sufficiently described in the quotations, and representations are given by De Bry and Tavernier. The name appears to have been derived from the territory of Lar on the Persian Gulf. (See under that word, [and Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Larā, Hak. Soc. i. 232 seq.].)

c. 1663.—"I have seen the men of the Country who were Gentiles take their children, their sonnes and their daughters, and have desired the Portugalls to buy them, and I have seene them sold for eight or ten larynes apiece, which may be of our money x s. or xii s. iiii d."—Master Caesar Frederick, in Hall, ii. 313.

1583.—Gasparo Balbi has an account of the Larino, the greater part of which seems to be borrowed literatim by Fitch in the succeeding quotation. But Balbi adds: "The first who began to striko them was the King of Lar, who formerly was a powerful King in Persia, but is now a small one."—f. 35.

1687.—"The said Larino is a strange piece of money, not being round, as all other current money in Christianitie, but is a small rod of silver, of the grentness of the pen of a goose feather . . . which is wrested so that two endes meet at the just half part, and in the head thereof is a stamp Turkeco, and these be the best current money in all the India, and 6 of these Larines make a ducket."—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 407.

1598.—"An Oxo or a Cowe is there to be bought for one Larin, which is as much as halfe a Gilderne."—Lincolne, 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 14; in i. 48 Larynen; see also i. 212].

c. 1610.—"La monnoye du Royaume n'est que d'argent et d'une sorte. Ce sont des pieces d'argent qu'ils appellent larins, de valeur de huit sols ou environ de nostre monnoye . . . longue comme le doigt mais redoublée. . . ."—Pyrard de Larā, i. 161; [Hak. Soc. i. 232].

1613.—"We agreed with one of the Governor's kinsred for twenty laries (twenty shillings) to conduct us. . . ."—N. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 491.

1622.—"The lari is a piece of money that I will exhibit in Italy, most eccentric in form, for it is nothing but a little rod of silver of a fixed weight, and bent double unequally. On the bend it is marked with some small stamp or other. It is called Lari because it was the peculiar money of the Princes of Lar, invented by them when they were separated from the Kingdom of Persia. . . . In value every 5 lari are equal to a piastre or pataca of reals of Spain, or 'piece of eight' as we choose to call it."—P. della Valle, ii. 431.

LARKIN, s. (obsolete). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch—which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers. We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1610, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of "Certaine Wordes of the Naturall Language of Iava," in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 216): "Larnike=Drinke." Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Javan.) larih, 'to pledge,' or invite to drink at an entertainment, and (Malay) larih-larahan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

1623.—"Meanwhile the year 1622 was drawing near its close, and its last days were often celebrated of an evening in the House of the English, with good fellowship. And on one of these occasions I learned from them how to make a beverage called Larkin, which they told me was in great vogue in Java, and in all those other islands of the Far East. This said beverage seemed to me in truth an admirable thing,—not for use at every meal (it is too strong for that),—but as a tonic in case of debility, and to make tasty possetts, much better than those we make with Muscatel wines or Croatan malmseys. So I asked for the recipe; and am taking it to Italy with me. . . . It seemed odd to me that those hot southern regions, as well as in the environs of Hormuz here, where also the heat is great, they should use both spice in their food and spirits in their drink, as well as sundry other hot beverages like this larkin.”—J. della Valle, ii. 476.

LARRY-BUNDER, n.p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Dabul (see DIUL-SIND) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in later Mahomedan times called Lāhorī-bandar, probably from presumed connection with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliot, i. 378). At first sight M'Murdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Lāri-bandar, from Lār, the local name of the southern part of Sind, seems probable. M'Murdo, indeed, writing about 1820, says that the name Lāri-bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lāhorī-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to M'Murdo's suggestion.

1030. —“This stream (the Indus) after passing (Alor) . . . divides into two streams; one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Lāharānī, and the other branches off to the East, to the borders of Kach, and is known by the name of Sind Sagar, i.e. Sea of Sind.”—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 49.

c. 1333. —“I travelled five days in his company with Alā-ul-Mulk, and we arrived at the seat of his Government, i.e. the town of Lāharī, a fine city situated on the shore of the great Sea, and near which the River Sind enters the sea. Thus two great waters join near it; it possesses a grand haven, frequented by the people of Yemen, of Fārs (etc.). . . . The Amir Alā-ul-Mulk . . . told me that the revenue of this place amounted to 60 laks a year.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 112.

1565. —“Blood had not yet been spilled, when suddenly, news came from Thatta, that the Firingis had passed Lāhorī-bandar, and attacked the city.”—Tārīkh-i-Tāhīrī, in Elliot, i. 277.

[1007. —“Then you are to sail for Lawrio in the Bay of the River Syndus.”—Bindwood, First Letter-book, 251.

[1611. —“I took . . . Larree, the port town of the River Sind.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 162.]

1613. —“In November 1613 the Expedition arrived at Laurebunder, the port of Sind, with Sir Robert Shirley and his company.”—Sainsbury, i. 321.

c. 1665. —“Il se fait aussi beaucoup de trafic au Loure-bender, qui est à trois jours de Tatta sur la mer, où la rade est plus excellente pour vaisseaux, qu'en quelque autre lieu que ce soit des Indes.”—Therriot, v. 169.

1679. —“ . . . If Suratt, Baroach, and Bunduricee in Scinda may be included in the same Phyrmaund to be customs free . . . then that they get these places and worts imported.”—Fl. St. Geo. Customs, Feb. 29. In Notes and Exts., No. 1. Madras, 1871.

1727. —“It was my Fortune . . . to come to Larribunder, with a Cargo from Mallebar, worth above £10,000.”—A. Hamilton, i. 116; [ed. 1741, i. 117, Larribunder].

1739. —“But the Castle and town of Lahore Bender, with all the country to the eastward of the river ARROK, and of the waters of the SCIND, and NALY SUSKURA, shall, as before, belong to the Empire of Hindostan.”—H. of Nadir, in Hanway, ii. 387.

1753. —“Le bras gauche du Sind se rend à Laheri, où il s'épanche en un lac; et ce port, qui est celui de Tattamgar, communément est nommé Laurebender.”—D'Ancville, p. 40.

1763. —“Les Anglois ont sur cette côte encore plusieurs petits établissements (sic) où ils envoient des premiers Marchands, des sous-Marchands, ou des Facteurs, comme en Scind, à trois endroits, à Tatta, une grande ville et la résidence du Seigneur du pays, à Lar Bunder, et à Seah-Bunder.”—Nebeker, Voyage, ii. 8.

1780. —“The first place of any note, after passing the bar, is Laribunda, about 5 or 6 leagues from the sea.”—Dunn's Oriental Navigator, 5th ed. p. 96.

1813. —“Laribunder. This is commonly called Scindy River, being the principal branch of the Indus, having 16 feet water on the bar, and 6 or 7 fathoms inside; it is situated in latitude about 21° 30' north. . . . The town of Laribunder is about 5 leagues from the sea, and vessels of 200 tons used to proceed up to it.”—Mulhern, i. 146.

1821. —“We took the route by Durnjoo and Meerpoor. . . . The town of Lahory was in sight from the former of these places, and is situated on the same, or left bank of the Pittco.”—A. Burnes, 2nd. ed. i. 22.

LASCAR, s. The word is originally from Pers. lashkar, ‘an army,’ ‘a camp.’ This is usually derived from Ar. al-uskar, but it would rather seem that

Ar. 'askar, 'an army' is taken from this Pers. word: whence lashkari, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word lascár or lâscár (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of lashkari in the forms lasquarin, lascari, &c., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskár has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape. The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier'; but lascar is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of khalâsi, in the various senses of that word (see CLASSY), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ('gun-lascar'); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language. The use of lascar in the modern sense by Pyrard de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, [also see quotation from Pringle below]; whilst the curious distinction which Pyrard makes between Lascar and Lascari, and Dr. Fryer makes between Luscar and Lascár (accenting probably Lâscár and Lascár) shows that lashkari for a soldier was still in use. In Ceylon the use of the word lascaren for a local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps is not yet extinct. The word lashkari does not seem to occur in the Âin.

LĀT, LĀT SĀHIB, s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sahib, or Lord Sāhib, as it is written in Hind., is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernaculars. The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Ohota (‘Little’) Lāt, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulki Lāt Sāhib (or Barē Lāt), and the Jangi Lāt Sāhib (‘territorial’ and ‘military’), the Bishop as the Lāt Pādārē Sāhib, and the Chief Justice as the Lāt Justy Sāhib. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government, [whilst the common form of blessing addressed to a civil officer is “Huzūr Lāt Gv-nar, Lāt Sikritar ho-jāri.”]

1821.—“He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any ‘Lord Sahib,’ except the Governor General, while he was still more perplexed by the exposition of ‘Lord Bishop Sahib,’ which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Padre.”—Heber, i. 69.

1837.—“The Amā, thinking I had purposely stolen his kitten, ran after the buggy at full speed, shouting as he passed Lord Auckland's tent, ‘Dohā! dohā! Sāhib! dohā! Lord Sāhib!’ (see DOAH). ‘Mercy, mercy, sir! mercy, Governor-General!’ The faster the horse rushed on, the faster followed the shouting Arab.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 142.

1868.—“The old barber at Roorkee, after telling me that he had known Strachey when he first began, added, ‘Ah Lāt-Sekretar hai! Ah! hum bhū boodda hogya!’ (‘Now he is Lord Secretary! Ah! I too have become old!’)”—Letter from the late M. Gen. W. W. H. Greathed.

1877.—“ . . . in a rare but most valuable book (Gallows's Observations on India, 1825, pp. 251-8), in which the author reports, with much quiet humour, an aged native's account of the awful consequences of contempt of an order of the (as he called the Supreme Court) ‘Shahrem Kōort,’ the order of impey being ‘Lord Justoy Sahib-kulookm,’ the instruments of whose will were ‘ahidabā’ or affidavits.”—Letter from Sir J. F. Stephen, in Times, May 31.

LĀT, s. Hind. lat, used as a corruption of the English lot, in reference to an auction (Carnegie).

LĀT, LĀTH, s. This word, meaning a staff or pole, is used for an obelisk or columnar monument; and is specifically used for the ancient Buddhist columns of Eastern India.

[1861-62.—“The pillar (at Beshar) is known by the people as Bhū-Sen-lā-lā and Bhū-Sen-lā-lā-lā.”—Cunningham, Arch. Rep. i. 61.]

LATERITE, s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found in two distinct types: viz.

(1) High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps at one time extended over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahal and Monghyr hills. (2) Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Newbold, in J.R.A.S., vol. viii.; and the Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. xlv. seqq., 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as kunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called cabook (q.v.).

1800.—“It is diffused in immenso masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malayala. . . . It very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. . . . As it is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (Iticacullee) [Malayil. retukal]. . . . The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Lateris, the appellation that may be given it in science.”—Buchanan, Mysore, &c., ii. 440-441.

1800.—“Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detrital communication its hue to the soil.”—Tennant's Ceylon, i. 17.

LATTEE, s. A stick; a bludgeon, often made of the male bamboo (Dendrocalamus strictus), and sometimes bound at short intervals with iron rings, forming a formidable weapon.

The word is Hind. lāṭhi and lāṭhi, Mahr. lāṭhā. This is from Prakrit lāṭhi, for Skt. yasthi, ‘a stick,’ according to the Prakrit grammar of Vavaruchi (ed. Cowell, i. 32); see also Lassen, Institutiones, Ling. Prakrit, 195. Jiskī lāṭhi, us kī bhāṭis, is a Hind. proverb (cujus baculum ejus bubalus), equivalent to the “good old rule, the simple plan.”

1830.—“The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. I took one as a curiosity, which had been seized on a man in a fight in a village. It is a very heavy lāṭhi, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner. There are 6 jagged semicircular irons at the top, each 2 inches in length, 1 in height, and it is shod with iron bands 16 inches deep from the top.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 133.

1878.—“After driving some 6 miles, we came upon about 100 men seated in rows on the roadside, all with lattles.”—Life in the Mofussil, i. 114.

LATTEAL, s. Hind. lāṭhīyāl, or, more cumbersomely, lāṭhīwālā, ‘a club-man,’ a hired ruffian. Such gentry were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1878.—“Doubtless there were hired lattles . . . on both sides.”—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

LAW-OFFICER. This was the official designation of a Mahomedan officer learned in the (Mahomedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' Courts in the districts, as well as of the Sudder or Courts of Review at the Presidency.

It is to be remembered that the law administered in Courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahomedan law; at first by the hands of native Gazees and Mufties, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence which, while undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallis's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793

(see ADAWLUT). The Mahommedan law continued, however, to be the professed basis of criminal jurisprudence, though modified more and more, as years went on, by new Regulations, and by the recorded constructions and circular orders of the superior Courts, until the accomplishment of the great changes which followed the Mutiny, and the assumption of the direct government of India by the Crown (1858). The landmarks of change were (a) the enactment of the Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), and (b) that of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act XXV. of 1861), followed by (c) the establishment of the High Court (July 1, 1862), in which became merged both the Supreme Court with its peculiar jurisdiction, and the (quondam-Company's) Sudder Courts of Review and Appeal, civil and criminal (Dewanny Adawlt, and Nizamut Adawlt).

The authoritative exposition of the Mahommedan Law, in aid and guidance of the English judges, was the function of the Mahommedan Law-officer. He sat with the judge on the bench at Sessions, i.e. in the hearing of criminal cases committed by the magistrate for trial; and at the end of the trial he gave in his written record of the proceedings with his Futwa (q.v.) (see Regn. IX. 1793, sect. 47), which was his judgment as to the guilt of the accused, as to the definition of the crime, and as to its appropriate punishment according to Mahommedan Law. The judge was bound attentively to consider the futwa, and if it seemed to him to be consonant with natural justice, and also in conformity with the Mahommedan Law, he passed sentence (save in certain excepted cases) in its terms, and issued his warrant to the magistrate for execution of the sentence, unless it were one of death, in which case the proceedings had to be referred to the Sudder Nizamut for confirmation. In cases also where there was disagreement between the civilian judge and the Law-officer, either as to finding or sentence, the matter was referred to the Sudder Court for ultimate decision.

In 1832, certain modifications were introduced by law (Regn. VI. of that year), which declared that the futwa might be dispensed with either by referring the case for report to a punchayet (q.v.), which sat apart from the Court; or by constituting assessors in the trial (generally three in number). The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of Law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old standing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the Moolvee (maulawi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any Circular of the Sudder Nizamut; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Rungpore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus :

"The Moulvée-ship . . . must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny; for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moulvée, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Rungpore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moulvée in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Karr, again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes :

"I am quite certain of my own practice . . . and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed, and came into operation, I wished to get rid of futwas and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect of civil litigation, it had been especially laid down (Regn. of April 11, 1780, quoted below) that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, marriage, caste, and all religious usages

* Reg. I. of 1810 had empowered the Executive Government, by an official communication from its Secretary in the Judicial Department, to dispense with the attendance and futwa of the Law officers of the courts of circuit, when it seemed advisable. But in such case the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamut Adawlt.

and institutions, the Mahomedan laws with respect to Mahomedans, and the Hindû laws with respect to Hindûs, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahomedan and Hindû law-officers of the court were to attend and expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahomedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahomedan Law. The Hindû law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down at least to 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (see quotation under CAZEE) abolishing Law-officers. But in many of the districts it would seem that he had very long before 1860 practically ceased to exist, under what circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Moolree is attached to the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench. It need only be added that under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the Law-officer of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character. The designation of the Law-officer was Maulavi. (See ADAWLUT, CAZEE, FUTWA, NOOLVEE, MUFFY.)

1780.—“That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahomedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentooes, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahmins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the decree.”—Regulation passed by the G. O. and Council, April 11, 1780.

1793.—“II. The Law Officers of the Sudder Downny Adawlut, the Nizamut Adawlut, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the zillah and city courts . . . shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct. . . .”—Reg. XII. of 1793.

In §§ iv., v., vi. Canzy and Muffy are substituted for Law-Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1793.—“IV. If the fatwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahomedan law on the ground of . . . the Court of Nizamut Adawlut shall notwithstanding sentence the prisoner to suffer death. . . .”—Reg. VIII. of 1793.

LAXIMANA, LAQUESIMENA, &c., s. Malay Laksumana, from Skt. lakṣmaṇa, ‘having fortunate tokens’ (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Rama). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces.

1511.—“There used to be in Malacca five principal dignities . . . the third is Laxsaman; this is Admiral of the Sea. . . .”—Altoquerque, by Burch, iii. 87.

c. 1539.—“The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Saibs. . . . And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemena, his Admiral, of whose Valor the History of the Indians hath spoken in divers places.”—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 38.

1653.—“Laxsamana was harassed by the King to engage Don Garcia; but his reply was: Sure, against the Portuguese and their high-sailed vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut lancharas like ours. Leave us (to us) for I know this people well, bring how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with thee, and I am about to avenge you on them. And so he did.”—Barros, III. viii. 7.

[1615.—“On the morrow I went to take my leave of Laxaman, to whom all strangers’ business were resigned.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 6.]

LEAGUER, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. ‘beer for laying down, for keeping’ (primarily in cask). The word in this sense is neither in Minshew (1627), nor in Bayley (1730).

1717.—“That the Storekeeper do provide Leaguers of good Colombo or Batavia arrack.”—Fr. St. David Consol., May 6 (MS. Record in India Office).

1782.—“Will be sold by Public Auction by Mr. Bondfield, at his Auction Room, formerly the Court of Cutcherry . . . Squaro and Globe Lanthorns, a quantity of Country Rum in Leaguers, a Slave Girl, and a variety of other articles.”—India Gazette, Nov. 23.

LECQUE, s. We do not know what the word used by the Abbé Raynal in the following extract is meant for. It is perhaps a mistake for last, a Dutch weight.

1770.—“They (Dutch at the Cape) receive a still smaller profit from 60 lecques of red wine, and 80 or 90 of white, which they carry to Europe every year. The lecque weighs about 1,200 pounds.”—Raynal, E.T. 1777, i. 231.

LEE, s. Chin. li. The ordinary Chinese itinerary measure. Books of the Jesuit Missionaries generally interpret the modern li as $\frac{1}{2}$ of a league, which gives about 3 li to the mile; more exactly, according to Mr. Giles, $27\frac{1}{2}$ li=10 miles; but it evidently varies a good deal in different parts of China, and has also varied in the course of ages. Thus in the 8th century, data quoted by M. Vivien de St. Martin, from Père Gaubil, show that the li was little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ of an English mile. And from several concurrent statements we may also conclude that the li is generalised so that a certain number of li, generally 100, stand for a day's march. [Archdeacon Gray (China, ii. 101) gives 10 li as the equivalent of $3\frac{1}{4}$ English miles; Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 305) asserts that Hwen Tshang converts the Indian yojanas into Chinese li at the rate of 40 li per yojana, or of 10 li per kos.]

1555.—“By the said books it is found that the Chinos have amongst them but only three kind of measures; the which in their language are called li, pu, and icham, which is as much as to say, or in effect, as a forlong, league, or journey: the measure, which is called li, hath so much space as a man's voice on a plaine ground may bee heard in a quiet day, halowing or whoping with all the force and strength he may; and ten of these lis maketh a pu, which is a great Spanish league; and ten pus maketh a day's journey, which is called icham, which maketh 12 (sic) long leagues.”—Mendoza, i. 21.

1861.—“In this part of the country a day's march, whatever its actual distance, is called 100 li; and the li may therefore be taken as a measure of time rather than of distance.”—Col. Sarel, in J.R. Geog. Soc. xxii. 11.

lai-chi; the beautiful and delicate fruit of the Nephelium litchi, Cambessèdes (N. O. Sapindaceae), a tree which has been for nearly a century introduced into Bengal with success. The dried fruit, usually ticketed as lychee, is now common in London shops.

c. 1540.—“... outra verdura muito mais fresca, o de melhor cheiro, que esta, a que os naturaes da terra chamão lechias. . . .”—Pinto, ch. lxviii.

1563.—“R. Of the things of China you have not said a word; though there they have many fruits highly prized, such as are lallechias (lathyrus) and other excellent fruits.

“O. I did not speak of the things of China, because China is a region of which there is so much to tell that it never comes to an end. . . .”—Garcia, f. 157.

1685.—“Also they have a kinde of plumme that they doo call lechias, that are of an exceeding gallant tast, and never hurteth anybody, although they should eat a great number of them.”—Parke's Menology, i. 14.

1693.—“There is a kind of fruit called Lechyas, which are like Plums, but of another taste, and are very good, and much esteemed, wherof I have eaten.”—Linschoten, 38; [Hak. Soc. i. 131].

1631.—“Adfertur ad nos præterea fructus quidam Lancea (read Lalcea) vocatus, qui racematum, ut uvæ, crescit.”—Jac. Bontu, Dial. vi. p. 11.

1694.—“Lataea, or Chinese Chestnuts.”—Valentijn, iv. (China) 12.

1750-52.—“Leleld is a species of trees which they seem to reckon equal to the sweet orange trees. . . . It seems hardly credible that the country about Canton (in which place only the fruit grows) annually makes 100,000 tel of dried leleldis.”—Olof Torren, 302-3.

1824.—“Of the fruits which this season offers, the finest are leeches (sic) and mangoes; the first is really very fine, being a sort of plum, with the flavour of a Frongnæ grape.”—Heber, i. 60.

c. 1855.—

“Et tandis que ton pied, sorti de la bouche, Pendait, rose, au bord du manchey (see MUNCHEE),
À l'ombre des bois noirs touffus, et du Letchi,
Aux fruits moins pourpres que ta bouche.”
Léconte de Lisle.

1878.—“... and the li-chi hiding under a shell of ruddy brown its globes of translucent and delicately fragrant flesh.”—P'h. Robinson, in My Indian Garden, 49.

1870.—“... Here are a hundred and sixty li-chi fruits for you. . . .”—M. Stok, Indian Fairy Tales (Calc. ed.) 61.

LEMON, s. Citrus medica, var. Limonum, Hooker. This is of course not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Ar. leimān, and is, according to Hehn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both limā and nimbā, which last, at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Skt. dictionaries give nimbāka. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limon, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form is liman, 'a lime, lemon, or orange.' The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form. I feel sure that liman, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe."] (See LIME.)

c. 1200.—"Sunt præterea aliae arbores fructus necidos, pontici videlicet æporis, ex se procreantes, quos appellant limones."—Jacobi de Vitruve, Hist. Hierosolym., cap. lxxv. in Bongars.

c. 1323.—"I will only say this much, that this India, as regards fruit and other things, is entirely different from Christendom; except, indeed, that there be lemons in some places, as sweet as sugar, whilst there be other lemons sour like ours."—Itiner Jordanus, 16.

1331.—"Profunditas hujus aquae plena est lapidibus preciosis. Quae aqua multum est rudrinitus et sanguinis plena. Hos lapidos non accipit rex, sed pro animâ suâ semel vel bis in anno sub aquâ ipsos pauperes ire permittit. . . . Et ut ipsi pauperes ire sub aquâ possint accipiant limonem et quendam fructum quem bene putant, et illo bene se ungunt. . . . Et cum se sint uncti rudrinitâ et sanguine illos offendero non valent."—Fr. Oloric, in Catalay, &c., App., p. xxi.

c. 1333.—"The fruit of the mango-tree (al-unla) is the size of a great pear. When yet green they take the fallen fruit and powder it with salt and preserve it, as is done with the sweet citron and the lemon (al-leimān) in our country."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126.

LEMON-GRASS, s. Andropogon citratus, D.C., a grass cultivated in Ceylon and Singapore, yielding an oil much used in perfumery, under the name of Lemon-Grass Oil, Oil of Verbena, or Indian Melissa Oil. Royle (Hind. Medicine, 82) has applied the name to another very fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus, L., according to him the exuvios of Dioscorides. This last, which grows wild in various parts of India, yields Rûsa Oil, alias O. of Ginger-grass or of Geranium, which is exported from Bombay to Arabia and Turkey, where it is extensively used in the adulteration of "Otto of Roses."

LEOPARD, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sports-men, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (F. pardus) and leopard (Felis leopardus), the latter being the smaller, though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical. Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felis pardus). [Mr. Blanford takes the same view: "I cannot help suspecting that the difference is very often due to age. . . . I have for years endeavoured to distinguish the two forms, but without success." (Mammalia of India, 63 &c.)]

LEWCHIEW, LIU KIU, LOO-OHOO, &c., n.p. The name of a group of islands to the south of Japan, a name much more familiar than in later years during the 16th century, when their people habitually navigated the China seas, and visited the ports of the Archipelago. In the earliest notices they are perhaps mixt up with the Japanese. [Mr. Chamberlain writes the name Luchu, and says that it is pronounced Dâchû by the natives and Ryûkyû by the Japanese (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 267). Mr. Pringle traces the name in the "Gold flowered loes" which appear in a Madras list of 1694, and which he supposes to be "a name invented for the occasion to describe some silk stuff brought from the Liu Kiu islands." (Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 174.)]

1516.—"Opposito this country of China there are many islands in the sea, and beyond them at 175 leagues to the east there is one very large, which they say is the mainland, from whence there come in each year to Malacca 3 or 4 ships like those of the Chinese, of white people whom they describe as great and wealthy merchants. . . . These islands are called Lequeos, the people of Malacca say they are better men, and greater and wealthier merchants, and better dressed and adorned, and more honourable than the Chinese."—Barbosa, 207.

1510.—"And they, demanding of him whence he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Siam [of the settlement of the Tanaucarim foreigners, and that he came from Veniaga] and as a merchant was going to traffique in the Isle of Leguios."—Pinto (orig. cap. x. xii), in Cogan, 49.

1553.—"Fernaõ Pores . . . whilst he remained at that island of Beniaga, saw there certain junks of the people called Leguios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information at Malaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandize that they brought was a great quantity of gold . . . and they appeared to him a better disposed people than the Chinese. . . ."—Barros, III. ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556.—"[In this year] a Portugal arrived at Malaca, named Pero Gomez d'Almeida, servant to the Grand Master of Santiago, with a rich Present, and letters from the Nandegim, Prince of the Island of Tanizuma, directed to King John the third . . . to have five hundred Portugals granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Leguios, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kintals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly. . . ."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 188.

1615.—"The King of Mashona (qu. Shashma) . . . who is King of the westernmost islands of Japan . . . has conquered the Legues Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China."—Sainsbury, i. 447.

"The King of Shashma . . . a man of greato power, and hath conquered the islands called the Legues, which not long since were under the government of China. Legue Grande yeeldeth greato store of amber greeco of the best sorte, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarso cloth, as dutties and such like, per annum."—Letter of Raphe Coppindall, in Cocks, ii. 272.

LIAMPO, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or of those who learned from them. Thus Nanking is similarly called Lanchin in the publications of the same age, and Yunnan appears in Mendoza as Olam.

1540.—"Sailing in this manner we arrived six dayes after at the Ports of Liampo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant threes Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce; There they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 6 or 7 other kinde of Officers [com governança de Vereadores, & Ouvidor, & Alcaides, & outras seis ou sete Varas de Justiça & Officiaes de Republica], where the Notaries undermenth the publicque Acts which they made, wrote thus, I, such a one, publique Notari of this Town of Liampo for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with as much confidence and assurance as if this Place had been situated between Santarem and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Duckats the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chinese. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxvi.), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders 'Ports of Liampo' is portas, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation; the oldest document regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Renaud) says that the ships after crossing the Sea of Sony 'pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea; between these mountains is an opening, through which the ships pass' (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under BOCCA TIGRIS.

1553.—"The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminates in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole coast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696.—"Those Junks commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petre, Geelongs, and other Silks."—Donquair, in Datrymple, i. 87.

1701.—"The Mandarin of Justice arrived late last night from Liampo."—Fragmentary MS. Records of China Factory (at Chusan?), in India Office, Oct. 21.

1727.—"The Province of Chequiam, whose chief city is Limpon, by some called Nimpo, and by others Ningpo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 283; [ed. 1744, ii. 282]

1779.—"To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junks, from Emoy, Lampo, and Canton."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 219.

LIKIN, LEKIN, s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Taiping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set aside for military purposes only—hence its common name of 'war tax'. . . The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of the Foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin" (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as "li (le, i.e. a cash or 1/100 of a tael)-money," because of the original rate of levy. The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of the provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. [It was ratified in 1886. For the conditions of the Agreement see Bull, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 629 seq.] We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876.—"Sect. III. . . (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond . . . until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin: in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each."—Agreement of Chefoo.

1878.—"La Chine est parsemée d'une infinité de petits bureaux d'octroi échelonnés le long des voies commerciales; les Chinois les nomment Lî-kin. C'est la source la plus sûre, et la plus productive des revenus."—Roussel, A Travers la Chine, 221.

LILAC, s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with anil (q.v.), and with the Skt. nīla, 'of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)'; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes, in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form līlang; in Ar. this, modified into līlak and līlak, is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Ar. adj. līlak has the modified sense 'bleuâtre.' See a remark under BUCKYNE. We may note that in Scotland the 'striving after meaning' gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the uneducated of 'lily-oak.'

LIME, s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon's egg, and one well-known miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin kāghazī nīmā, or 'paper lime.' This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thin-skinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the "China orange." But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica, var. Limetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Port. lima, which is from the Ar. lima; Fr. lime, Pers. limā, limān (see LEMON). But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minsheu (2nd ed. 1727).

1404.—"And in this land of Guilan snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (cidras e limas e narangas)."—Clavijo, §lxxxvi.

c. 1526.—"Another is the lime (limā), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen's egg, which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boils and eats its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted."—Baber, 323.

1563.—"It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructus de espinho. For the lemons of those parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Dagaim; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better. . . ."—Garcia, l. 133.

c. 1630.—"The Ile enrich us with many good things; Buffolls, Goats, Turtle, Hens, hugo Batts . . . also with Oranges, Lemons, Lymes. . . .—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1673.—“Hero Asparagus flourish, as do Limes, Pomegranates, Genotins. . . .”—Fryer, 110. (“Jonneting” from Fr. genétin, [or, according to Prof. Skeat, for jeanneton, a dimin. from Fr. pomme de St. Jean].)

1690.—“The Island (Johanna) abounds with Fowls and Rice, with Pepper, Yams, Plantains, Bonanoes, Potatoes, Oranges, Lemons, Limes, Pine-apples, &c. . . .”—Orrington, 109.

LINGAIT, LINGAYET, LINGUIT, LINGAVANT, LINGADHARI, s. Mahr. Linga-ñ, Can. Lingayata, a member of a Sivaite sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the linga (see LINGAM) in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Basava. They are also called Jangama, or Vira Saiva, and have various subdivisions. [See Nelson, Madura, pt. iii. 48 seq.; Monier Williams, Brahmanism, 88.]

1673.—“At Huby in this Kingdom are a caste called Linguits, who are buried upright.”—Fryer, 153. This is still their practice.

Lingua is given as the name or title of the King of Columbum (see QUILON) in the 14th century, by Friar Jordanus (p. 41), which might have been taken to denote that he belonged to this sect; but this seems never to have had followers in Malabar.

LINGAM, s. This is taken from the S. Indian form of the word, which in N. India is Skt. and Hind. līṅga, ‘a token, badge,’ &c., thence the symbol of Siva which is so extensively an object of worship among the Hindus, in the form of a cylinder of stone. The great idol of Somnāth, destroyed by Mahmūd of Ghazni, and the object of so much romantic narrative, was a colossal symbol of this kind. In the quotation of 1838 below, the word is used simply for a badge of caste, which is certainly the original Skt. meaning, but is probably a mistake as attributed in that sense to modern vernacular use. The man may have been a lingait (q.v.), so that his badge was actually a figure of the lingam. But this clever authoress often gets out of her depth.

1311.—“The stone idols called Ling Mahadeo, which had been a long time established at that place . . . there, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. . . . Doo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had seats there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the foot of Lanka, and in that affright the lings themselves would have fled, had they had any legs to stand on.”—Amir Khurshid, in Elliot, iv. 91.

1616.—“. . . above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions; and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousness.”—Coxe, Dec. VII. iii. 11.

1720.—“There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam . . . round the neck, or else in the hair of the head. . . .”—Valentin, Choro, 74.

1781.—“These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingham.”—Hodges, 91.

1799.—“I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahadeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot.”—Colebrooke, in Life, p. 152.

1809.—“Without was an immense lingam of black stone.”—Id. Valentia, i. 371.

1814.—“. . . two respectable Brahmuns, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divines.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 364; [2nd ed. ii. 4; in ii. 161, Lingam].

1838.—“In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man’s Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away.”—Letters from Madras, 156.

1843.—“The homage was paid to Lingamism. The insult was offered to Monism. Lingamism is not merely idolatry, but idolatry in its most pernicious form.”—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Somnauth.

LINGUIST, s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. lingua, used for an interpreter.

1554.—“To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 pardaos monthly. . . .”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 63.

“To the lingua of this kingdom (Ormuz) a Portuguese . . . To the lingua of the custom-house, a braman.”—Ibid. 104.

[1612.—“Did Captain Sarris Linguist attend?”—Duners, Letters, i. 68.]

1700.—"I carried the Linguist into a Merchant's House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remora, that stop'd the Man of War from entering into the Harbour."—A. Hamilton, iii. 251; [ed. 1711].

1711.—"Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, nor a Barrel the better Herring."—Lockyer, 102.

1760.—"I am sorry to think your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been anyway concerned in that unduly affair that happened at the Negrais, in the month of October 1759; but give me leave to assure your Honour that I was no further concerned, than as a Linguist for the King's Officer who commanded the Party."—Letter to the Gov. of Port St. George, from Antonio the Linguist, in Autrypse, i. 396.

1760-1810.—"If the ten should presume to enter villages, public places, or bazars, punishment will be inflicted on the Linguist who accompanies them."—Regulation at Canton, from The Fankwa at Canton, p. 29.

1822.—"As up to treaty days, neither Consul nor Vice-Consul of a foreign nation was acknowledged, whenever either of these officers made a communication to the Hoppo, it had to be done through the Hong merchants, to whom the dispatch was taken by a Linguist."—The Fankwa at Canton, p. 56.

LIP-LAP, s. A vulgar and disparaging nickname given in the Dutch Indies to Europeans, and corresponding to Anglo-Indian chee-chee (q.v.). The proper meaning of lip-lap seems to be the uncoagulated pulp of the coco-nut (see Rumphius, bk. i. ch. 1). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is not in the dictionaries, but Klinkert gives Jav. lap-lap, 'a dish-clout'.]

1763-71.—"Children born in the Indies are nicknamed liplaps by the Europeans, although both parents may have come from Europe."—Statourus, I.T. i. 316.

LISHTEE, LISTEE, s. Hind. lishti, English word, 'a list.'

LONG-CLOTH, s. The usual name in India for (white) cotton shirtings, or Lancashire calico; but first applied to the Indian cloth of like kind exported to England, probably because it was made of length unusual in India; cloth for native use being ordinarily made in pieces sufficient only to clothe one person. Or it is just possible that it may have been a corruption or misapprehension of lungi (see LOONGHEE). [This latter view is accepted without question by Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., 224), who dates its introduction to Europe about 1676.]

1670.—"We have continued to supply you . . . in regard the Dutch do so fully fall in with the Calicoe trade that they had the last year 50,000 pieces of Long-cloth."—Letter from Court of E.I.C. to Madras, Nov. 9th. In Notes and Etc., No. i. p. 2.

[1682.—" . . . for Long cloth brown English 72; Coated long & 2 broad No. 1. . . ."—Pringle's Diary, 17. N. O. 1st ser. i. 10.]

1727.—"Sudran, or Sudran Padan, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth."—A. Hamilton, i. 353; [ed. 1711].

1785.—"The trade of Port St. David's consists in long cloths of different colours."—Corruccioli's Life of Clive, i. 5.

1865.—"Long-cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics."—Waring, Tropical Resident, p. 111.

1880.—"A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long-cloth."—Pall Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

LONG-DRAWERS, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outlanders' lists. [Mosquito drawers were probably like these.]

[1623.—"They wear a pair of Drawers of the same Cloth, which cover not only their Thighs, but legs also to the Feet."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

1711.—"The better sort wear long Drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Callico, thrown loose over the Shoulders."—Lockyer, 67.

1774.—" . . . gave each private man a frock and long drawers of chintz."—L'orré, Y. to N. Girard, 100.

1780.—"Leroy, one of the French hussars, who had saved me from being cut down by Hyder's horse, gave me some soup, and a shirt, and long-drawers, which I had great want of."—Hon. John Lindsay in Lives of the Lindseys, iv. 266.

1789.—"It is true that they (the Sey) wear only a short blue jacket, and blue long draws."—Note by Translator of Sey Mutagherin, i. 87.

1810.—"For wear on board ship, pantaloons . . . together with as many pair of worst cotton long-drawers, to wear under them."—Witherston, Y. M. i. 9.

(See PYJAMAS, MOGUL BREECHES, SHULWAURS, SIRDRAWS.)

LONG-SHORE WIND, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837.—"This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of sham sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular cheat upon the non-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one."—Letters from Madras, 73.

LONTAR, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on are called lontan-leaves. Fillet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontan as the Malay name of two palms, viz. Borassus flabelliformis (see PALMYRA, BRAB), and Livistona tundifolia. [See CADJAN.] [Mr. Skeat notes that Klinkert gives—"Lontar, metathesis of ron-tal, leaf of the tal tree, a fan-palm whose leaves were once used for writing on, borassus flabelliformis." Ron is thus probably equivalent to the Malay dawn, or in some dialects don, 'leaf.' The tree itself is called p'uhun (pohun) tar in the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, tar and tal being only variants of the same word. Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 121, gives: "Lontar, a palm, dial. form of dawn tal (tal, Hind.)." (See TODDY.)

LOOCHER, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a black-guard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchoha, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with lūtiya (see under LOOTY). [A rogue in Pandurang Hari (ed. 1873, ii. 168) is Loorhajre. The place at Matheran originally called "Louis Point" has become "Loocha Point!"]

LOONGHEE, s. Hind. lungi, perhaps originally Pers. lung and lunggi; [but Platts connects it with linga]. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapped once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahomedans in India. The Qanoon-e-Islam further distinguishes between the lunggi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India. ["The lungi is really meant to be worn round the waist, and is very generally of a checked pattern, but it is often used as a paggri (see PUGGRY), more especially that known as the Kohat lungi" (Cookson, Mon. on Punjab Silk, 4). For illustrations of various modes of wearing the garment, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures and Costumes, pl. iii. iv.]

1673.—"The Elder sat in a Row, where the Men and Women came down together to wash, having Lungies about their Waists only."—Fryer, 101. In the Index, Fryer explains as a "Waste-Clout."

1726.—"Silk Longia with red border, 160 pieces in a pack, 14 colados long and 2 broad."—Valentijn, v. 178.

1727.—". . . For some coarse chequered Cloth, called Cambaya (see COMBOY), Lungies, made of Cotton-Yarn, the Natives would bring Elephant's Teeth."—A. Hamilton, i. 9; [ed. 1741].

"(In Pegu) "Under the Frock they have a Scarf or Lungie doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle. . . ."—Ind. ii. 49.

c. 1760.—"Instead of petticoats they wear what they call a loongee, which is simply a long piece of silk or cotton stuff."—Grove, i. 143.

c. 1800-10.—"Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 102.

LOOT, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lūt, and that from Skt. lotra, for loptra, root lup, 'rob, plunder'; [rather lung, 'to rob']. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary, of 1788, as "Loot—plunder, pillage." It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-

Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean War (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognized constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Naval Glossary (1897) thus: "Loot, plunder, or pillage, a term adopted from China."

1435.—St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal advises that he must encourage any true friend of his to go to India, to have the fruit of his labours to be sold, the rich of Europe to do it, and the poor of India to buy it. Sanctus pateris natus cum fructu in Indiam cum Fructu tuo nihil ad recipere poteras, et tunc tu testaberis. Nemo dicit de vero filio: fructus tuus capere habet. Dei nature de illis videntur et cum fructu in a nobis habetur. . . . Indiam facienda est emissio non publici in detritis, dum vix dubitaverit non habere quod legat et sit. Hic, regem, episcopum, et centum a detritis. Sed capere non potest in Indiam. Qui enim carere et timere, praedare. Episcopus mori satis nequit, quod, propter naturam suam, indolis ferax in Indiam etiam hic. rapidum verum quod bonum auxilium obsequi venient. —*Epist. a. 1860—"Loot, hang or plunder."—See Dict. N.Y.

1861.—"When I mentioned the 'looting' of villages in 1845, the word was printed in italics as little known. Unhappily it requires no distinction now, custom having rendered it rather common of late."—Admiral W. H. Smyth, Smyth's, p. 52.

1575.—"It was the Colonel Sahib who carried off the loot."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

versal loot."—Blackwood's Mag. No. cxix.

The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, common enough among many Asiatics, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chauki-auks (for chairs and tables), naukar-chakar (where both are however real words), 'servants,' lakri-akri, 'sticks and staves,' and so forth. Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawām-ud-Daulat, a Shirāzi, was asked by the Shāh :

"Why is it, Kawām, that you Shirāzis always talk of Kubob-malob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word; is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shirāz does so, only the lūti-pūti says it!"

LOQUOT, LOQUAT, s. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalised in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespola giapponese (Japan medlar). It is Eriobotrya japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kūh, pron. at Canton lu-lwat, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

[1821.—"The Lacott, a Chinese fruit, not unlike a plum, was produced also in great plenty (at Bangalore); it is sweet when ripe, and both used for tarts, and eaten as dessert."—Hoole, Missions in Madras and Mysore, 2nd ed. 1859.]

c. 1880.—"A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but 'the phenomenon' is now on view at Richmond. (This was in the garden of Lady Parker at Stawell House.) We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries. . . ."—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

LORCHA, s. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having a hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew. The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto's passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view. [Other suggestions are that it is Chinese low-chuen, a sort of fighting ship, or Port. lançã, our launch (2 N. & Q. iii. 217, 236).]

1540.—"Now because the Lorch (lorcha), wherein Antonio de Faria came from Patana leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel . . . and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk . . . drew much water, so that fearing the Sands . . . he sent Christovano Borralho with 14 Soldiers in the Lorch up the River. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiii.), Cogan, p. 50.

"Cō isto nos partemos deste lugar de Laito muyto embandeirados, com as gaviãs toldadas de paños de seda, et os juncos e lorchas cō duas ordens de pavões por banda"—Pinto, ch. lviii. i.e. "And so we started from Laito all dressed out, the tops draped with silk, and the junks and lorchas with two tiers of banners on each side."

1613.—"And they use smaller vessels called lorchas and lyolyo (†), and these never use more than 2 oars on each side, which serve both for rudders and for oars in the river traffic."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 26v.

1856.—" . . . Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned lorcha at Canton. The lorcha 'Arrow,' employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Boulger, H. of China, 1884, iii. 396.

LORY, s. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nāri, 'a parrot'; but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Luillier below). [Mr. Skeat writes: "Lāri is hardly a corruption of nāri; it is rather a parallel form. The two forms appear in different dialects. Nāri may have been first introduced, and lāri may be some dialectic form of it."] The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrots.' [Can. panchavarnagiri.]

c. 1330.—“Parrots also, or popinjays, after their kind, of every possible colour, except black, for black ones are never found; but white all over, and green, and red, and also of mixed colours. The birds of this India seem really like the creatures of Paradise.”—Friar Jordanus, 29.

c. 1430.—“In Bandan three kinds of parrot are found, some with red feathers and a yellow beak, and some parti-coloured which are called Nori, that is brilliant.”—Conti, in India in the XVth Cent., 17. The last words, in Poggio's original Latin, are: “quos Noros appellat hoc est lucidos,” showing that Conti connected the word with the Pers. nār = “lux.”

1516.—“In these islands there are many coloured parrots, of very splendid colours; they are tame, and the Moors call them nure, and they are much valued.”—Barbosa, 202.

1555.—“There are hogs also with horns (see BABI-ROUSSA), and parats which prattle much, which they call Noris.”—Galvano, E.T. in Hall, iv. 424.

[1598.—“There cometh into India out of the Island of Molucens beyond Malacca a kind of birdes called Noyras; they are like Parrottes. . . .”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 307.]

1601.—“Psittacorum passim in sylvis multae turmae obvolitant. Sed in Molucanis Insulis per Malaccam avis alia, Noyra dicta, in Indiam importatur, quae psittaci faciem universam exprimit, quem cantu quoque adamussum aemulatur, nisi quod pennis rubicundis crebrioribus vestitur.”—De Bry, v. 4.

1673.—“... Cockatoos and Newries from Bantam.”—Fryer, 116.

1682.—“The Lorys are about as big as the parrots that one sees in the Netherlands. . . . There are no birds that the Indians value more: and they will sometimes pay 30 rix dollars for one. . . .”—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 287.

1698.—“Brought ashore from the Resolution . . . a Newry and four yards of broad cloth for a present to the Havildar.”—In Wheeler, i. 333.

1705.—“On y trouve de quatre sortes de perroquets, searoir, perroquets, lauris, per-ruches, & cacatois.”—Lullier, 72.

1809.—

In the warm isles of India's summer sea.”
Molanna.

LOTA, s. Hind. lotā. The small spheroidal brass pot which Hindus use for drinking, and sometimes for cooking. This is the exclusive Anglo-

Indian application; but natives also extend it to the spheroidal pipkins of earthenware (see CHATTY or GHURRA.)

1810.—“... a lootah, or brass water vessel.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 284.

LOTE, s. Mod. Hind. lot, being a corruption of Eng. ‘note.’ A bank-note; sometimes called bunklot.

LOTOO, s. Burm. Hwat-dhan, ‘Royal Court or Hall’; the Chief Council of State in Burma, composed nominally of four Wungyis (see WOON) or Chief Ministers. Its name designates more properly the place of meeting; compare Star-Chamber.

1792.—“... in capital cases he transmits the evidence in writing, with his opinion, to the Lotoo, or grand chamber of consultation, where the council of state assembles. . . .”—Symes, 307.

1819.—“The first and most respectable of the tribunals is the Lutto, comprised of four presidents called Pungli, who are chosen by the sovereign from the oldest and most experienced Mandarins, of four assistants, and a great chancery.”—Sangermano, 164.

1827.—“Every royal edict requires by law, or rather by usage, the sanction of this council: indeed, the King's name never appears in any edict or proclamation, the acts of the Lut-dhan being in fact considered his acts.”—Crawford's Journal, 401.

LOUTEA, LOYTIA, &c. s. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it. “It would almost seem certain that this is the word given as follows in C. O. Baldwin's Manual of the Foochow Dialect: ‘Lo-tia’ . . . (in Mandarin Lao-tye) a general appellative used for an officer. It means ‘Venerable Father’ (p. 215). In the Court dialect Ta-lao-ye, ‘Great Venerable Father’ is the appellative used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The ye of this expression is quite different from the tyé or tia of the former” (Note by M. Terrien de la Couperie). Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglas's Amoy Dict., adds: “It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-mu-kuan, ‘Parental Officers’ (lit. ‘Father-and-Mother Officers') and it is very likely that the expression 'Old Papa' is intended to convey the same idea of paternal government."

c. 1600.—"Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignitie by the King, is called Louthia, which is to say with us Señor."—Gasper da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

"I shall have occasion to speake of a certain Order of gentlemen that are called Loutea; I will first therfore expound what this word signifieth. Loutea is as muche as to say in our language as Syr. . . ."—Galeotto Perera, by R. Wille, in Hall, ii.; [ed. 1810, ii. 518].

1655.—"And although all the King's officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, he generally called by the name of Loytia; yet euorio one hath a speciall and a particular name besides, according vnto his office."—Mendoza, tr. by Lt. Parks, ii. 101.

1698.—"Not any Man in China is esteemed or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but onely for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serue at every towne, and haue the government of the same. They are called Loltias and Mandorijns."—Linschoten, 39; [Hak. Soc. i. 133].

1618.—"The China Capt. had letters this day per way of Xaxma (see SATSUMA) . . . that the letters I sent are receiued by the noblemen in China in good parte, and a mandarin, or loytea, appointed to com for Japon. . . ."—Cocle's Diary, ii. 41.

1631.—"They call . . . the lords and gentlemen Loytias. . . ."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 26.

LOVE-BIRD, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lorikeet, Loriculus vernalis, Sparrman, called in Hind. lalkan or 'pendant,' because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

LUBBYE, LUBBEE, s. [Tel. Labbi, Tam. Ilappai]; according to C. P. Brown and the Madras Gloss. a Dravidian corruption of 'Arabi.' A name given in S. India to a race, Mussulmans in creed, but speaking Tamil, supposed to be, like the Moplahs of the west coast, the descendants of Arab emigrants by inter-marriage with native women. "There are few classes of natives in S. India, who in energy, industry, and perseverance, can compete with the Lubbay"; they often, as pedlars, go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

1810.—"Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Concan; the others to the eastward of C. Comorin; the descendants of the former are the Nerayets; of the latter the Lubbè; a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic participle (a modification of Lubbeik) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbè pretend to one common origin with the Nerayets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives; but the Nerayets affirm that the Lubbè are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certainly in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia."—Wills, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1836.—"Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Cholias (see CHOOLIA); and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible; for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affix to the proper names of some of their chief men."—Simon Carle Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J.R. As. Soc. iii. 338.

1868.—"The Labbeis are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus forcibly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like. . . ."—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1869.—In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Pulicat and Nagnpatam. Their headquarters are at Nagore, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mir Sahib. They excel as merchants, owing to their energy and industry.—In Trans. Linn. Soc. of London, N.S. vii. 189-190.

LUCKERBAUG, s. Hind. lakrā, lagrā, lakarbaghā, lagarbaghā, 'a hyena.' The form lakarbaghā is not in the older diets, but is given by Platts. It is familiar in Upper India, and it occurs in Hickey's Bengal Gazette, June 24, 1781. In some parts the name is applied to the leopard, as the extract from Buchanan shows. This is the case among the Hindi-speaking people of the Himalaya also (see Jerdon). It is not clear what the etymology of the name is, laka, lakrā meaning in their everyday sense, a stick or piece of timber. But both in Hind. and Mahr., in an adjective form, the word is used for 'stiff, gaunt, emaciated,' and this may be the sense in which it is applied to the hyena. [More probably the name refers to the bar-like stripes on the animal.] Another name is harvagh, or (apparently) 'bone-tiger,' from its habit of gnawing bones.

c. 1809.—"It was said not to be uncommon in the southern parts of the district (Bhāgalpur) . . . but though I have offered ample rewards, I have not been able to procure a specimen, dead or alive; and the leopard is called at Mungger Lakravagh."

"The hyena or Lakravagh in this district has acquired an uncommon degree of ferocity."—F. Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 142-3.

[1849.—"The man seized his gun and shot the hyena, but the 'lakmbakka' got off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 162.]

LUCKNOW, n.p. Properly Lakhanau; the well-known capital of the Nawābs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of the Lieutenant-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877. [The name appears to be a corruption of the ancient Lakshmandatī, founded by Lakshmana, brother of Rāmachandra of Ayodhya.]

1523.—"On Saturday the 29th of the latter Jemādī, I reached Lucknow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gāmti and encamped."—Dabur, p. 381.

[c. 1500.—"Lucknow is a large city on the banks of the Gāmti, delightful in its surroundings."—Atin, ed. Jurāt, ii. 173.]

1663.—"In Agra the Hollanders have also an House. . . . Formerly they had a good trade there in selling Scarlet . . . as also in buying those cloths of Jelapour and Lakman, at 7 or 8 days journey from Agra, where they also keep an house. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 94; [ed. Constable, 292, who identifies Jelapour with Jalāpur-Nāhir in the Fyzābād district.]

LUDDOO, s. H. ladḍū. A common native sweetmeat, consisting of balls of sugar and ghee, mixt with wheat and gram flour, and with cocoanut kernel rasped.

[1826.—"My friends . . . called me boor le luddoo, or the great man's sport."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 197.]

[1828.—"When at large we cannot even get rabri (porridge), but in prison we eat ladoo (a sweetmeat)."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 185.]

LUGOW, TO, v. This is one of those imperatives transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under BUNOW, PUCKEROW. H. inf. lagā-na, imperative lagā-o. The meanings of lagāna, as given by Shakespear, are: "to apply, close, attach, join, fix, affix, ascribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, plaster, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice"—in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lugow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagāna is the active form of the neuter verb lag-na, 'to touch, lie, to be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagāna expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lagna, active lagāna, we have a secondary casual verb, lagwāna, 'to cause to apply,' &c. Lagna, lagāna are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A.-S. liegan, and legan, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespear gives of lagāna. [See Shak, Concise Etym. Dict. s.v. lie.]

[1839.—"They lugāsed, or were fastened, about a quarter of a mile below us. . . ."—Davidson, Travels in Upper India, ii. 20.]

LUMBERDAR, s. Hind. lam-bardār, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dār, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number.' "The registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue." (Carnegy). "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election." (Wilson).

by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hanumān. The genus is Presbytes, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. [See Manford, Mammalia, 27, who classes the Langūr as Semnopithecus entellus.] The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langūr of the Prasii is P. entellus.

c. 250.—“Among the Prasii of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hyrcanian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one ignorant of the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Latagā (now Latagū is a city of the Indians) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King's order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurt anybody that they meet by the way.”—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1827.—“An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon drawing near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Suwarrs, who on the Sopoys's repeating his exclamation of the broken English ‘Who goes ‘cro?’ said with a laugh, ‘Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you.’”—Heber, ii. 85.

1859.—“I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whisker.”—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 49.

1881.—“Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengali langur. (Ho) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males receive charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle. Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession.”—Saturday Rev., May 31, on Strindale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

LUNGOOTY, s. Hind. langotī. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower classes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhoti (see DHOTY). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the “Langoth or Lungota” (as he writes) is “a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. . . . The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons. . . .” This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of lungūla by Abdurrazāk would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Mocquet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Amazon. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1122.—“The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lankoutah, which descend from the navel to above the knee.”—Abdurrazāk, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526.—“Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langoti, which is a piece of clout that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendant modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langoti, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langoti behind.”—Daher, 333.

c. 1609.—“Leur capitaine avoit fort bonne façon, oncore qu'il fust tout nud et luy seul avoit vne langoutin, qui est vne petite pièce de coton pointe.”—Mocquet, 77.

1653.—“Langouti est une pièce de linge dont les Indous se servent à cacher les parties naturelles.”—De la Boullay-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 517.

“They wear nothing but the langoty, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand's breadth fastened to it in front.”—(Ref. lost), p. 25.

LUNKA, n.p. Skt. Laṅka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahmanism. Also 'an island' in general.

—, s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the 'islands' (the local term for which is laṅka) of the Godavery Delta.

M

MĀ-BĀP, s. 'Āp mā-bāp hai khudd-wand !' 'You, my Lord, are my mother and father !' This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young sāhib hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

MABAR, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coromandel. The word is Ar. ma'bar, 'the ferry or crossing-place.' It is not clear how the name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. [The Madras Gloss, says it was so called because it was the place of crossing from Madura to Ceylon; also see Logan, Malabar, i. 280.] We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1203. — "I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours. . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mabar for two dinars apiece."—Abd-Allatif, Relation de l'Egypte, p. 31.

1279-86. — In M. Panthier's notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States, including Ma-pa-rh.—(See pp. 600-605).

c. 1292. — "When you leave the Island of Seilan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Maabar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 10.

c. 1300. — "The merchants export from Ma'bar silken stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearls are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Irak, Khorāsān, Syria, Russia and Europe."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1303. — "In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Malik-i-Azam, Takid-d-din . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma'bar) of corruption. The King of Ma'bar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu'azzam Siraj-d-din, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dinars, not only obtained the wealth, but rank also of his father."—Wasaf, in Elliot, iii. 45.

1310. — "The country of Ma'bar, which is so distant from Dohli that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached."—Amir Khurda, in Elliot, iii. 85.

c. 1330. — "The third part (of India) is Ma'bar, which begins some three or four days journey to the eastward of Kaulam; this territory lies to the east of Malabar. . . . It is stated that the territory Ma'bar begins at the Cape Kumhari, a name which applies both to a mountain and a city. . . . Biyyardawal is the residence of the Prince of Ma'bar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries"—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 185. We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinaud's translation of Abulfeda, absolutely, in some places, substitutes "Coromandel" for "Ma'bar." It is French fashion, but a bad one.

c. 1493. — "Zo deser stat Kangera anlen-den alle Kouffschiff die in den landen zo doyn hauen, ind lijcht in eyner provincie Moabar genant."—Pilgerfahrt des Ritters Arnold von Harff (a fiction-monger), p. 140.

1753. — "Selon cet autorité le pays du continent qui fait face à l'île de Ceylan est Maabar, ou le grande Inde: et cette interpretation de Marc-Pol est autant plus juste, quo maha est un terme Indien, et propre mème à quelques langues Scythiques ou Tartares, pour signifier grand. Ainsi, Maabar signifie la grande region."—D'Anville, p. 105. The great Geographer is wrong!

MACAO, n.p.

a. The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1557. The place is called by the Chinese Ngao-mān (Ngao, 'bay or inlet,' Mān, 'gate'). The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-mā-ngao, 'the Bay of Ama,' i.e. of the Mother, the so-called 'Queen of Heaven,' a patroness of seamen. And indeed Amacao is an old form often met with.

c. 1567.—"Hanno i Portoghesi fatta vna picciola città in vna Isola vicina a' i liti della China chiamato Machao . . . ma i datii sono del R^e della China, o vanno a pagarli a Canton, bellissima città, o di grande importanza, distante da Machao due giorni o mezzo."—Cesars de' Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1570.—"On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at . . . Lampacau, where at that time the Portugals exercised their commerce with the Chinese, which continued till the year 1557, when the Mandarins of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is; of which place (that was but a desert land before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Duckats, together with a Cathedral Church. . . ."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 315.

1581.—"There was in Machao a religious man of the order of the barefooted friars of S. Francis, who vnderstanding the great and good desire of this king, did sende him by certaine Portugal merchants . . . a cloth whereon was painted the day of iudgement and hell, and that by an excellent workman."—Mendoza, ii. 391.

1585.—"They came to Amacao, in July, 1585. At the same time it seasonably hapned that Linsulan was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Amacao, certaine goodly feathers for the King."—From the Jesuit Accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

1599 . . . —"Amacao." See under MONSOON.

1602.—"Being come, as heretofore I wrote your Worship, to Macao a city of the Portugals, adjoining to the firme Land of China, where there is a Colledge of our Company."—Letter from Diego de Pantoia, in Purchas, iii. 350.

[1611.—"There came a Jesuit from a place called Langasack (see LANGASAGUE), which place the Carraek of Amakau yearly was wont to come."—Daniels, Letters, i. 146.]

1615.—"He advieth me that 4 junks are arrived at Langasague from Chanchow, which with this ship from Amacau, will cause all matters to be sould cheape."—Cocks's Diary, i. 35.

1625.—"That course continued divers yeeres till the Chinese growing lesse fearful, granted them in the greater land a little Prainsula to dwell in. In that place was an Idoll, which still remained to be seene, called Ama, whence the Peninsula was called Amacao, that is Ama's Bay."—Purchas, iii. 310.

b. MACAO, MACCAO, was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatness. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1551.—"The baar (see BAHAR) of Macao contains 120 bicas, each lica 100 ticals (q.v.) . . ."—A. Nunes, p. 39.

1563.—"Si fa commodamente il viaggio sino a Maccao distante da Pegu dodeci miglia, o qui si sbarca."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 395.

1599.—"The King of Arracan is now ending his business at the Town of Macao, carrying thence the Silver which the King of Tung had left, exceeding three millions."—N. Pimenta, in Purchas, iii. 1748.

MACAREO, s. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cambay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu. The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Skt. word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagre for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Drayton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandinavian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea."* [This theory is rejected by N.E.D. s.v. Eagre.] One of the Hindi names for the phenomenon is Mendha, 'The Ram'; whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R. Drummond, the natives call it ghora, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them."† But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted (p. 401), which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak :

* See an interesting paper in the Saturday Review of Sept. 29, 1883, on Le Mascaret.

† Other names for the bore in India are: Hind, Amma, and in Bengal Ida.

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Macarot is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great naturo-forco which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness."

Take also the following :

1835.—"Here at his mouth Father Meghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement. . . . In deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling billow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Tty on the W'Arch, 161-162.

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of makara or the like; whilst both mascaret (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macré are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though mascaret, has of late began on the Seine to supplant the old term barre, which is evidently the same as our bore. [The N.E.D. suggests O. N. bára, 'wave.'] Littré can suggest no etymology for mascaret; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garonne called St. Macaire, but only to reject it. There would be no impossibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of the transfer of a French term to India in such a way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littré's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dict., but this hardly seems final.

Mag'adi, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 916) i. 255; also less precisely by Ibu Batuta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the No. Cort. Selections, N.S. No. xxvi., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10½ knots. [See also Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 313.]

1553.—"In which time there came hither (to Diu) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambay, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambay, which were the cause of the loss of many ships."—Nurris, II. ii. cap. 6.

1563.—"These Sholds (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and four-score miles about in a straight or gulle, which they call Macareo (Macareo in orig.) which is as much as to say a race of a Tide."—Master G. Frederick, Hall, ii. 312; [and comp. ii. 362].

1589.—"And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (of Martaban) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard of in the way of tides, and high waters. . . . The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, inasmuch that the boat is soured from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel."—Gaspard Balbi, ff. 91r, 92.

1614.—". . . thence to the Gulf of Cambaya with the impetuosity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose fury strange things are told, inasmuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run."—Docarro, MS.

1727.—"A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two Fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it overturns, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives called a Mackrea."—J. Hamilton, ii. 33; [ed. 1741, ii. 32].

1811.—Solrýns uses the word Macrés as French for 'bore,' and in English describes his print as "... the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Macrae or tide, at the mouth of the river Ougly."—Les Hindous, iii.

MACASSAR, n.p. In Malay Many-kassar, properly the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The last quotation refers to a time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

[1605-6.—"A description of the Iland Solobes or Makassar."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 77.

[1610.—"Solobes or Makassar, wherein are spent and uttered the warres following."—Danvers, Letters, i. 71.

[1664-5.—"... and anon to Grosham College, where, among other good discourse, there was tried the great poison of Macassas upon a dogg, but it had no effect all the time we sat there."—Pryps, Diary, March 15; ed. Whitely, iv. 372.]

1816.—"Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1816), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependant on the dethroned Raja of Boni."—As. Journal, i. 237.

MACE, s.

a. The crimson net-like mantle, which envelops the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Macir, Macer, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The name does not seem to be mentioned by Mas'udi; it is not in the list of aromatics, 25 in number, which he details (i. 307). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopœia of the Middle Ages under the name of kifut-al-karamful or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahomedan of Delhi if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodurci, Comment. in Theophrastum, 932); and by the quotation from Funnel.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. habbisa, possibly in some confusion with the ancient macir. [See Skeat, Concise Dict. who gives F. macis, which was confused with M. F. macer, probably Lat. macer, macir, doubtless of Eastern origin.]

c. 1150.—"On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Mihrija, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, and producing ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamom, cubeb, &c."—Edrisi, i. 89; see also 51.

c. 1347.—"The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (habbisa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."—Jbn Natuta, iv. 213.

c. 1370.—"A great Ylo and great Contree, that men clopen Java. . . . There growen alle manere of Spicerie more plentyfoulliche than in any other contree, as of Gyn-govero, Clowegyloufres, Canelle, Zedewalle, Notemuges, and Maces. And wryteth he, that the Notemuge bereth the Maces. For righte as the Noto of the Havello hath an Husk withouten, that the Noto is closed in, til it be ripe, and after falleth out; righte so it is of the Notemuge and of the Maces."—Sir John Maundeville, ed. 1866, p. 187-188. This is a remarkable passage for it is interpolated by Maundeville, from superior information, in what he is borrowing from Odoric. The comparison to the hazel-nut husk is just that used by Hanbury & Flückiger (Pharmacographia, 1st ed. 456).

c. 1430.—"Hac (insulas Java) ultra xv dierum cursu duno reperiuntur insule, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellata, in qua nucis muscatæ et maces, altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola garofali producuntur."—Conti, in Poggius, De Var Fortunæ.

1514.—"The tree that produces the nut (meg) and macis is all one. By this ship I send you a sample of them in the green state."—Letter of Hier. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 81.

1563.—"It is a very beautiful fruit, and pleasant to the taste; and you must know that when the nut is ripe it swells, and the first cover bursts as do the husks of our chestnuts, and shows the mace, of a bright vermilion like fine grain (i.e. coccus); it is the most beautiful sight in the world when the trees are loaded with it, and sometimes the mace splits off, and that is why the nutmegs often come without the mace."—Garcia, f. 129r-130.

[1602-3.—"In yo^r Provision you shall make in Nutmeggs and Mace haue you a greate care to receiue such as be good."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 36; also see 67.]

1705.—"It is the commonly received opinion that Cloves, Nutmegs, Mace, and Cinnamon all grow upon one tree; but it is a great mistake."—Funnel, in Dumpler, iv. 179.

b. Jav. and Malay mā. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Mā is really short for amā or emā, one of those curious forms with prefixed a, as in the case of ābādā, which are probably native, but may have been influenced by Portuguese."] A weight used in Sumatra, being, according to Crawford, 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Achin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denominate the tenth part of the Chinese liang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candareen (q.v.). The word is originally Skt. māśa, 'a bean,' and then 'a particular weight of gold' (comp. CARAT, RUTTEE).

1539.—" . . . by intervention of this thirdsman whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mazes of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 roya, at the rate of a half cruzado the maz."—Pinto, cap. xxv. Cognā has, "the fisherman sold me to the merchant for seven mazes of gold, which amounts in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1554.—"The weight with which they weigh (at Malacca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calambuco . . . consists of cates which contain 20 tael, each tael 16 mazes, each maz 20 cumduryngs. Also one pauā 4 mazes, one maz 4 cupōes (see KOBANG), one cupō 5 cumduryngs (see CANDAREEN)."—A. Nunez, 39.

1593.—"Likewise a Tael of Malacca is 16 Mases."—Linschoten, 44; [Hak. Soc. i. 149].

1699.—"Bezār sive Bazar (i.e. Bezoar, q.v.) per Masas venditur."—De Bry, ii. 64.

1825.—"I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coine (Achin) . . . that is of gold named a Mas, and is ninpence halfpence nearest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813.—"Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Achin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

4	copangs	=	1 mace
5	mace	=	1 mayam
16	mayam	=	1 tael
5	tales	=	1 bancal
20	bancals	=	1 cattay.

MAHEEN, MAHACHEEN, n.p.

This name, Maha-china, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Al-Birūnī uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himālaya) is Mahā-chin. But "in later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chin, to denote the same thing, Chin and Māchin, a phrase having some analogy to the way Sind and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Gog and Magog, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chin was discovered to be the eldest son of Japhet, and Māchin his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thither, p. cxix.).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Manzi as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the West, it would appear that this name was confounded with Māchin, and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klaproth, J. As. Soc. ser. 2, tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chin and Māchin as N. and S. China, but this distinction seems never to have been entertained by the Hindus. Ibn Batuta sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chin) as South China from Khitāi (see CATHAY) as North China. In times when intimacy with China had again ceased, the double name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a rotund way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Sodor and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Māchin to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Frn Mauro). An exceptional application, arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the West as the city of Māchin, or in Persian translation Chinkalān, i.e. Great Chin.

Mahachina as applied to China :

636.—“In what country exists the kingdom of the Great Thang?” asked the king (Sīlāditya of Kanauj), ‘how far is it from this?’

“It is situated,” replied he (Hwen T’sang), ‘to the N.E. of this kingdom, and is distant several ten-thousands of li. It is the country which the Indian people call Mahā-china.’—Jñ. Boddhi, ii. 251-255.

c. 641.—“Mohochintan.” See quotation under CHINA.

c. 1030.—“Some other mountains are called Harmakāt, in which the Gange has its source. These are impassable from the side of the cold regions, and beyond them lies Māchin.”—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 46.

1501.—In the Letter of Amerigo Vespucci on the Portuguese discoveries, written from C. Verde, 4th June, we find mention among other new regions of Marchin. Published in Baldelli Boni’s Il Mondo, p. ciii.

c. 1590.—“Adjoining to A-ham is Tibet, bordering upon Khatāi, which is properly Mahacheen, vulgarly called Macheen. The capital of Khatāi is Khan Balcegh, 4 days’ journey from the sea.”—Ayren, by Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 4; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 116].

[c. 1665.—“... you told me . . . that Persia, Ushee, Kachguer, Tartary, and Catay, Pegu, Siam, China and Matchine (in orig. Tehine et Matchine) tumbled at the name of the Kings of the Indies.”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 165 seq.]

c. 1300.—“Khatāi is bounded on one side by the country of Mūchin, which the Chinese call Manzi. . . In the Indian language S. China is called Mahā-chin, i.e. ‘Great China,’ and hence we derive the word Manzi.”—Rashid-uddīn, in Il. des Mongols (Quatremère), xci.-xciii.

c. 1318.—“It was the Kaan’s orders that we should proceed through Manzi, which was formerly known as India Maxima” (by which he indicates Mahā-China, see below, in last quotation).—John Marignolli, in Cathay, p. 354.

Applied to Indo-China :

c. 1430.—“La provincia (Avn)—Macium incolae dicunt. . . referta est elephantis.”—Conti, in Poggini, De Var. Fortunae.

Chin and Machin :

c. 1320.—“The curiosities of Chin and Machin, and the beautiful products of Hind and Sind.”—Massif, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1410.—“Poi si ritrova in quella istessa provincia di Zagatai Sanmarcant città grandissima e ben popolata, per la qual vanno o vengono tutti quelli di Cinf e Macini e del Catiao, o mercanti o viandanti che siano.”—Barbaro, in Ramusio, ii. f. 106r.

c. 1412.—“The merchants of the 7 climates from Egypt . . . from the whole of the realms of Chin and Machin, and from the city of Khānbālik, steer their course to this port.”—Ibidarrazil, in Noties et Extraits, xiv. 429.

[1503.—“Sin and Masin.” See under JAVA.]

Mahāchin or Chin Kalān, for Canton.

c. 1030.—In Spronger’s extracts from Al-Birūnī we have “Sharyūd, in Chinese Sanfi. This is Great China (Mahāsin).”—Post und Reise-routen des Orients, 90.

c. 1390.—“This canal extends for a distance of 40 days’ navigation from Khānbālik to Khingsai and Zaitūn, the ports frequented by the ships that come from India, and from the city of Māchin.”—Rashid-uddīn, in Cathay, &c., 259-260.

c. 1332.—“... after I had sailed eastward over the Ocean Sea for many days I came to that noble province Manzi. . . The first city to which I came in this country was called Gens-Kalan, and ‘tis a city as big as three Venices.”—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 103-105.

c. 1317.—“In the evening we stopped at another village, and so on till we arrived at Sin-Kalān, which is the city of Sin-ul-Sin. . . one of the greatest of cities, and one of those that has the finest of bazars. One of the largest of these is the porcelain bazaar, and from it china-ware is exported to the other cities of China, to India, and to Yemen.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 272.

c. 1319.—“The first of these is called Manzi, the greatest and noblest province in the world, having no paragon in beauty, pleasantness, and extent. In it is that noble city of Campsay, besides Zayton, Cynkalan, and many other cities.”—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 973.

MĀCHIS, s. This is recent Hind. for ‘lucifer matches.’ An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is dīdā, dīdā-saldī.

MADAPOLLAM, n.p. This term, applying to a particular kind of cotton cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Madharayalam, [Tel. Madharayya-jellenu, 'fortified village of Madharva']. This was till 1633 [according to the Madras Gloss., 1827] the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunka and Injeram. Madapallam is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

[1610.—"Madafunum is chequered, some what fine and well requested in Prjatan."—Danvers, Letters, i. 71.]

1673.—"The English for that cause (the unhealthfulness of Macchapatnam, only at the time of shipping), remove to Madapollam, where they have a wholesome Soil Forty Miles more North."—Fryer, 35.

[1684-85.—"Mr. Benj^s Northerly having brought up Mustered the Madapollam Cloth, It is thought convenient that the same be taken of him. . . ."—Pringle's Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 49.]

c. 1810.—"Pierrette est de polles chemises on Madapollam."—Malac, Pierrette.

1870.—" . . . hushness seems to be the unfailling characteristic of autographs, fans, Cromora fiddles, Louis Quatorze snuff-boxes, and the like, however sluggish pig-iron and Madapollams may be."—Sat. Rev. vii. Jan. 11, p. 45.

MADRAFAXAO, s. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing Muzaffar-shahi. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably Muzaffar-Shah II. (1611-1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 165 grs. (Puthén King, 353).

1651.—"There also come to this city Madrafaxaos, which are a money of Cambaya, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tangas of 60 reis the tanga, others of 23, 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Nunes, 32.

MADRAS, n.p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madaram; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard.* Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Manda-rāja, 'Realm of the Stupid'. No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthumskunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengalee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted". It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoys and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Mandray. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madrayatnam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madrayatnam as the Mahomedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah. The word is therefore probably of Mahomedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madras, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madaram (see Faria y Sousa, Africa Portuguesa, 1691, p. 6); and the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madras in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century.† Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahomedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madras itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient"; formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account. [The Madras Admin. Man. says: "The origin of this name has been much discussed. Madras, a Mahomedan school, has been suggested, which considering the date at which the name is first found seems fanciful. Manda is in Sanscrit 'slow.' Madant was a king of the lunar race.

* It is given in No. II. of Selections from the Records of the Arcot District, p. 107.

† In a letter from poor Arthur Burnell, on which this paragraph is founded, he adds: "It is said that the most Philitine town (in the German sense) in all the East should have such a name."

The place was probably called after this king" (ii. 91). The Madras Gloss. again writes: "Hind. Madrats, Can. Madardau, from Tel. Mandaradzu, name of a local Telegu Royer," or ruler. The whole question has been discussed by Mr. Pringle (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 106 seqq.). He points out that while the earliest quotation given below is dated 1653, the name, in the form Madrazpatam, is used by the President and Council of Surat in a letter dated 29th December, 1640 (J. O. Records, O. C. No. 1764); "and the context makes it pretty certain that Francis Day or some other of the factors at the new Settlement must have previously made use of it in reference to the place, or 'rather,' as the Surat letter says, 'plot of ground' offered to him. It is no doubt just possible that in the course of the negotiations Day heard or caught up the name from the Portuguese, who were at the time in friendly relations with the English; but the probabilities are certainly in the opposite direction. The nayak from whom the plot was obtained must almost certainly have supplied the name, or what Francis Day conceived to be the name. Again, as regards Hamilton's mention of a 'college,' Sir H. Yule's remark certainly goes too far. Hamilton writes, 'There is a very Good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-stables are neat, but the old College where a good many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is ill-kept in repair.' This remark taken together with that made by Lockyer . . . affords proof, indeed, that there was a building known to the English as the 'College.' But it does not follow that this, or any, building was distinctively known to Muslims as the 'madrasa.' The 'old College' of Hamilton may have been the successor of a Musliman 'madrasa' of some size and consequence, and if this was so the argument for the derivation would be strengthened. It is however equally possible that some old buildings within the plot of territory acquired by Day, which had never been a 'madrasa,' was turned to use as a College or place where the young writers should live and receive instruction; and in this case the argument, so far as it rests on a mention of a College' by Hamilton and Lockyer, is entirely destroyed. Next as regards the probability that the first part of 'Madraspatanam' is 'of Mahomedan origin,' Sir H. Yule does not mention that date of the maps in which Madraspatanam is shown 'as the Mahomedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah'; but in Fryer's map, which represents the fort as he saw it in 1672, the name 'Madirasa'—to which is added 'the Indian Town with flat houses'—is entered as the designation of the collection of houses on the north side of the English town, and the next makes it evident that in the year in question the name of Madras was applied chiefly to the crowded collection of houses styled in turn the 'Heathen,' the 'Malabar,' and the 'Black' town. This consideration does not necessarily disprove the supposed Musliman origin of 'Madras,' but it undoubtedly weakens the chain of Sir H. Yule's argument." Mr. Pringle ends by saying: "On the whole it is not unfair to say that the chief argument in favour of the derivation adopted by Sir H. Yule is of a negative kind. There are fatal objections to whatever other derivations have been suggested, but if the mongrel character of the compound 'Madraspatanam' is disregarded, there is no fatal objection to the derivation from 'madrasa.' . . . If however that derivation is to stand, it must not rest upon such accidental coincidences as the use of the word 'College' by writers whose knowledge of Madras was derived from visits made from 30 to 50 years after the foundation of the colony."]

1720.—"The Town or Place, anciently called Chinapatnam, now called Madraspatnam, and Port St. George."—Letters Patent, in Charters of E. I. Company, 369-D.

1727.—"Fort St. George or Maderass, or as the Natives call it, China Patana, is a Colony and City belonging to the English East India Company, situated in one of the most inconvenient Places I ever saw. . . . There is a very good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-Stables are neat, but the Old College, where a great many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is kept in ill Repair."—J. Harrison, l. 361, (ed. 1731, ii. 182). (Also see CHINAPATAN.)

MADRAS, s. This name is applied to large bright-coloured handkerchiefs, of silk warp and cotton wool, which were formerly exported from Madras, and much used by the negroes in the W. Indies as head-dresses. The word is preserved in French, but is now obsolete in England.

c. 1830.—" . . . We found President Pottion, the black Washington, sitting on a very old ragged sofa, amidst a confused mass of papers, dressed in a blue military undress frock, white trousers, and the ever-lasting Madras handkerchief bound round his brows."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, p. 425.

1846.—"Et Madame se manifesta! C'était uno de ces vieilles dévotées par Adrien Brauerer dans ses sorcières pour le Sabbat . . . coiffée d'un Madras, faisant encore pippillottes avec les imprimés, que recevait gratuitement son maltro."—Balsac, Le Cousin Pons, ch. xviii.

MADREMALUCO, n.p. The name given by the Portuguese to the Mahommedan dynasty of Berar, called 'Imād-shāhī. The Portuguese name represents the title of the founder 'Imād-ul-Mulk, ('Pillar of the State'), otherwise Fath Ullah 'Imād Shāh. The dynasty was the most obscure of those founded upon the dissolution of the Būhmani monarchy in the Decan. (See COTAMALUCO, IDALCAN, MELIQUE VERIDO, NIZAMALUCO, SABAIO.) It began about 1484, and in 1572 was merged in the kingdom of Ahmednagar. There is another Madremaluco (or 'Imād-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shāh (1526) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correa, ii. 272, 344, &c.; Couto, Deca. v. and vi. passim).

[1513.—See under COTAMALUCO.]

1553.—"The Madro Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalchan (see IDALCAN), and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Meleque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV. vii. 1.

1563.—"The Imadmaluco or Madremaluco, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cherques) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546. . . . Imad is as much as to say 'prop,' and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imadmaluco, or 'Prop of the Kingdom.' . . ."—Garcia, l. 326.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of Imād-ul-Mulk's Circassian origin, agree with those of Firishtha. The latter says that Fath-Ullah 'Imād Shāh was descended from the heathen of Bijanagar (iii. 485).

MADURA, n.p. properly Madurei, Tam. Mathurai. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as "Mádorpa βασιλειῶν Μαθιδρόν." The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathurā, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (see MUTTRA), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* [On the other hand, a writer in J.R. As. Soc. (xiv. 578, n. 3) derives Madura from the Dravidian Madur in the sense of 'Old Town,' and suggests that the northern Mathura may be an offshoot from it.] Madura was, from a date, at least as early as the Christian era, the seat of the Pāndya sovereigns. These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolkri on the Tamraparni, the Kōlke of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 95, 101). The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Muttra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have

* This perhaps implies an earlier spread of northern influence than we are justified in assuming.

Matura in Ceylon; the city and island of Madura adjoining Java; and a town of the same name (Madura) in Burma, not far north of Mandalé, Madaya of the maps.

A.D. c. 70-80.—"Alius utillior portus gentis Neeeyndon qui vocatur Becare. Ibi regnabat Iandion, longo ab emporio mediterraneo distante oppido quod vocatur Modura."—Pliny, vi. 26.

[c. 1315.—"Mardi." See CRORE.]

c. 1317.—"The Sultan stopped a month at Fattan, and then departed for his capital. I stayed 15 days after his departure, and then started for his residence, which was at Mutra, a great city with wide streets. . . . I found there a pest raging of which people died in brief space . . . when I went out I saw only the dead and dying."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 200-1.

1311.—" . . . the royal canopy moved from Birdhul . . . and 5 days afterwards they arrived at the city of Mathra . . . the dwelling-place of the brother of the Râi Sundar Pandya. They found the city empty, for the Râi had fled with the Rânis, but had left two or three elephants in the temple of Jagnâr (Jaganâth)."—Amir Khurâ, in Elliot, iii. 91.

MADURA FOOT, s. A fungoid disease of the foot, apparently incurable except by amputation, which occurs in the Madura district, and especially in places where the 'Black soil' prevails. Medical authorities have not yet decided on the causes or precise nature of the disease. See Nelson, Madura, Pt. i. pp. 91-94; [Gribble, Cuddapah, 193].

MAGADOXO, n.p. This is the Portuguese representation, which has passed into general European use, of Makdashau, the name of a town and State on the Somali coast in E. Africa, now subject to Zanzibar. It has been shown by one of the present writers that Marco Polo, in his chapter on Madagascar, has made some confusion between Magadoxo and that island, mixing up particulars relating to both. It is possible that the name of Madagascar was really given from Makdashau, as Sir R. Burton supposes; but he does not give any authority for his statement that the name of Madagascar "came from Makdishui (Magadoxo) . . . whose Sheikh invaded it" (Comment. on Camôes, ii. 520). [Owen (Narrative, i. 357) writes the name Mukdesha, and Boteler (Narrative, ii. 215) says it is pronounced by the Arabs Makdîsha. The name is said to be Maqaad-el-Shata, "Harbour of the Sheep," and the first syllable has been identified with that of Magdala and is said to mean "door" in some of the Galla dialects (Notes & Queries, 9 ser. ii. 193, 310. Also see Mr. Gruy's note on Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 29, and Dr. Burnell on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 19.]

c. 1330.—"On departing from Zaila, we sailed on the sea for 15 days, and then arrived at Makdashau, a town of great size. The inhabitants possess a great number of camels, and of these they slaughter (for food) several hundreds every day."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 181.

1493.—"And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories, and in the midst of the city certain great palaces; and about it a wall with four towers; and this city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. And when we were come well abreast of it, we discharged many bombards (at it), and kept on our way along the coast with a fine wind on the poop."—Roteiro, 102.

1505.—"And the Viceroy (Don Francisco D'Almeida) made sail, ordering the course to be made for Magadoxo, which he had instructions also to make tributary. But the pilots objected saying that they would miss the season for crossing to India, as it was already the 26th of August. . . ."—Correia, i. 560.

1514.—" . . . The most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla . . . and these people continue to be found in Mazambic, Melinda, Mogodocio, Marachilno (read Brava Chilvo, i.e. Brava and Quilva), and Mombazza; which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own; except Mazambich."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.

1516.—"Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—Burboa, 16.

1532.—" . . . and after they had passed Cape Guardafu, Don Isotavão was going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—Conto, IV. viii. 2.

1727.—"Magadoxo, or as the Portuguese call it, Magadoela, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorn'd with many high Steeple and Mosques."—A. Hamilton, i. 12-13, [ed. 1744].

MAGAZINE, s. This word is, of course, not Anglo-Indian, but may find a place here because of its origin from Ar. makhāzin, plur. of al-makhzan, whence Sp. almacen, almagacen, maga-cen, Port. almazem, armazem, Ital. mazzino, Fr. magazin.

c. 1340.—"The Sultan . . . made him a grant of the whole city of Stri and all its houses with the gardens and fields of the treasury (makhzan) adjacent to the city (of Delhi)."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 262.

1539—"A que Pero de Faria respondeo, que lhe desse elle commissão per mandar nos almozês, et que logo provera no socorro quo entendia ser necessario."—Pinto, cap. xxi.

MAHĀJUN, s. Hind. from Skt. mahā-jan, 'great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

c. 1861.—

"Down there lives a Mahajun—my father gave him a bill,
I have paid the knave thrice over, and here I'm paying him shall.

He shows me a long stamp paper, and must have my land—must he?

If I were twenty years younger, he should get six feet by three."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1885.—"The Mahajun hospitably entertains his victim, and speeds his homeward departure, giving no word or sign of his business till the time for appeal has gone by, and the decree is made absolute. Then the storm bursts on the head of the luckless hill-man, who finds himself loaded with an overwhelming debt, which he has never incurred, and can never hope to discharge; and so he practically becomes the Mahajun's slave for the rest of his natural life."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 339.

MAHANNAH, s. (See MEEANA.)

MAHE, n.p. Properly Māyeli. [According to the Madras Gloss. the Mal. name is Māyayāzhi, mai, 'black,' āzhi, 'river mouth'; but the title is from the French Mahe, being one of the names of Labourdonnais.] A small settlement on the Malabar coast, 4 m. S.E. of Tellicherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

MAHI, n.p. The name of a considerable river flowing into the upper part of the Gulf of Cambay. ["The height of its banks, and the fierceness of its floods; the deep gullies through which the traveller has to pass on his way to the river, and perhaps, above all, the bad name of the tribes on its banks, explain the proverb: 'When the Mahi is crossed, there is comfort'" (Imp. Gazetteer, s.v.).]

c. A.D. 80-90.—"Next comes another gulf . . . extending also to the north, at the mouth of which is an island called Baionēs (Perim), and at the innermost extremity a great river called Mals."—Periplus, ch. 42.

MAHOUT, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. mahā-wat, from Skt. mahā-mātra, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahābhārata (e.g. iv. 1761, &c.). The Mahout is mentioned in the 1st Book of Maccabees as 'the Indian.' It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahā-mātra, in the sense of a high officer in Hesychius:

"Μαμάτραι, ο στρατηγὸς παρ' Ἰνδοῖς."
—Hesych. s.v.

c. 1590.—"Mast elephants (see MUST). There are five and a half servants to each, viz., first a Mahawat, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements. . . . He gets 200 dāms per month. . . . Secondly a Bhōi, who sits behind, upon the rump of the elephant, and assists in battle, and in quickening the speed of the animal; but he often performs the duties of the Mahawat. . . . Thirdly the Ma'is (see MATE). . . . A Ma'is fetches fodder, and assists in caparisoning the elephant. . . ."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 125.

1648.—". . . and Mahouts for the elephants. . . ."—Van Tourst, 56.

1826.—"I will now pass over the term of my infancy, which was employed in learning to read and write—my preceptor being a mahouhut, or elephant-driver—and will take up my adventures."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

1848.—"Then he described a tiger hunt, and the manner in which the Mahout of his elephant had been pulled off his seat by one of the infuriated animals."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

MAHRATTA, n.p. Hind. Marhātā, Marhattā, Marhātā (Marhātī, Marahī, Marhātī), and Marāthā. The name of a famous Hindu race, from the old Skt. name of their country, Mahā-rāshtra, 'Magna Regio.' [On the other hand H. A. Acworth (Ballads of the Marathas, Intro. vi.) derives the word from a tribal name

Rathi or Rathā, 'chariot fighters,' from rath, 'a chariot,' thus Mahā-Rathā means 'Great Warrior.' This was transferred to the country and finally Sanskritised into Mahā-rāshtra. Again some authorities (Wilson, Indian Caste, ii. 48; Baden-Powell, J. R. As. Soc., 1897, p. 249, note) prefer to derive the word from the Mhār or Mahār, a once numerous and dominant race. And see the discussion in the Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. ii. 143 seq.]

c. 550.—"The planet (Saturn's) motion in Aṣleṣhā causes affliction to aquatic animals or products, and snakes . . . in Pūrva Phālgunī to vendors of liquors, women of the town, damsels, and the Mahrattas. . . ."—Bṛhat Saṃhitā, tr. by Kern, J. R. As. Soc. 2nd ser. v. 61.

610.—"Do là il prit la direction du Nord-Ouest, traversa une vaste forêt, et . . . il arriva au royaume de Mo-ho-la-to (Mahā-rāshtra). . . ."—Pt. Dandh. i. 202; [Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. ii. 353].

c. 1030.—"Do Dhar, en se dirigeant vers le midi, jusqu'à la rivière de Nymyah on comte 7 parangsas; do là Mahrat-dessa 18 paras."—Albirāni, in Renaud's Fragments, 108.

c. 1291-5.—"Alā-ud-dīn marched to Ellichpūr, and thence to Ghatī-lājaurā . . . the people of that country had never heard of the Musulmans; the Mahratta land had never been punished by their armies; no Musulman King or Prince had penetrated so far."—Zia-ud-dīn Barnī, in Elliot, iii. 150.

c. 1323.—"In this Greater India are twelve idolatrous Kings, and more. . . . There is also the Kingdom of Maratha which is very great."—Friar Jordanus, 41.

1673.—"They tell their tale in Moratty; by Profession they are Gontues."—Fryer, 174.

1747.—"Agreed on the arrival of these Ships that We take Five Hundred (500) Peons more into our Service, that the 50 Moratta Horses be augmented to 100 as We found them very usefull in the last Skirmish. . . ."—Consul at Ft. St. David, Jan. 6 (MS. Record in India Office).

1748.—"That upon his hearing the Mirattoes had taken Tanner's Fort . . ."—In Long, p. 5.

c. 1760.—". . . those dangerous and powerful neighbors the Morattoes; who being now masters of the contiguous island of Salsette . . ."—Groes, ii. 44.

"The name of Morattoes, or Marattas, is, I have reason to think, a derivation in their country-language, or by corruption, from Mar-Rajah."—Ibid. ii. 76.

1765.—"These united princes and people are those which are known by the general name of Maharattas; a word compounded of Rattor and Manah; the first being the name of a particular Rajpoot (or Rajpoot) tribe; and the latter, signifying great or mighty (as explained by Mr. Fraser). . . ."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 105.

c. 1769.—Under a mezzotint portrait: "The Right Honourable George Lord Pigot, Baron Pigot of Patsbul in the Kingdom of Ireland, President and Governor of and for all the Affairs of the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, on the Coast of Choromandel, and Oriza, and of the Chingee and Moratta Countries, &c., &c., &c."

c. 1812.—

" . . . Ah, for some retreat Deep in yonder shining Orient, where my life began to beat;
Where in wild Mahratta battle fell my father's evil star'd."

—Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The following is in the true Hobson-Jobson manner:

[1859.—"This term Marhatta or Mār-hutta, is derived from the mode of warfare adopted by these men. Mar means to strike, and hutta, to get out of the way, i.e. those who struck a blow suddenly and at once retreated out of harm's way."—H. Dundas Robertson, District Duties during the Revolt in 1857, p. 101, note.]

MAHRATTA DITCH, n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the landward sides of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Mahratta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta (see DITCHER). The line of the Ditch corresponded nearly with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S.E. and S., where the work was never executed. [There is an excavation known by the same name at Madras excavated in 1780. (Murray, Handbook, 1859, p. 43).]

1742.—"In the year 1712 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, round the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Sootanatty to the southern part of Govindpore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants . . . discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe ditch."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 45.

1767.—"That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Marattes; also 600 yards without it, for an Esplanado."—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Clive (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 14). In Memoirs of the Revolution in Bengal, 1760, p. 89.

1782.—"To the Proprietors and Occupiers of Houses and other Tenements within the Mahratta Entrenchment."—India Gazette, Aug. 10.

[1840.—"Less than a hundred years ago, it was thought necessary to fortify Calcutta against the horsemen of Borar, and the name of the Mahratta Ditch still preserves the memory of the danger."—Macaulay, Essay on Oliver.]

1872.—"The Calcutta cockney, who glories in the Mahratta Ditch. . . ."—Govinda Samanta, i. 25.

MAHSEER, MASEER, MASAL, &c. Hind. mahāsīr, mahāser, mahāsaṭī, s. The name is applied to perhaps more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N.O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. megaleptus, McLelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. mahā-sīras, 'big-head,' or mahā-salka, 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca. Mr. H. S. Thomas suggests mahā-āśya, 'great mouth.' [The word does not appear in the ordinary diets; on the whole, perhaps the derivation from mahā-sīras is most probable.]

c. 1809.—"The Masal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think still better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon."—Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 194.

1822.—"Mahasaula and Tora, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, amongst the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers."—F. Buchanan Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873.—"In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon."—H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

MAINATO, s. Tam. Mal. Maindatta, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516.—"There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Naires; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their sons can take up any other business."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 334.

c. 1542.—"In this inclosure do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynatos, which wash the linen of the City (Pequin), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 133. The original (cap. cv.) has todos os mainatos, whose sex Cogan has changed.

1554.—"And the farm (renda) of mainatos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). . . ."—Tombo, &c., 53.

[1598.—"There are some among them that do nothing els but wash cloathes: . . . they are called Maynattos."—Lincolnton, Hak. Soc. i. 260.

[c. 1610.—"These folk (the washermen) are called Menates."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 71.]

1644.—(Expenses of Daman) "For two maynatos, three water boys (bois de agua), one sombreyro boy, and 4 torch bearers for the said Captain, at 1 xerafim each a month, comes in the year to 36,000 réis or x^m. 00120.0.00."—Bocarro, MS. i. 181.

MAISTRY, MISTRY, sometimes even MYSTERY, s. Hind. mistrī. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use. Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman'; but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artisan, as rāj-mistrī (properly Pers. rāj), 'a mason or bricklayer,' lohār-mistrī, 'a blacksmith,' &c. The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artisans in Bluteau: "Artifice que sabe bem o seu officio. Peritus artifex . . . Opifex, alienorum operum inspector." In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor. (See CALEEFA.)

Master (Ματρεψ) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives. There is too a similar word in modern Greek, ματρωπος.

1404.—"And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and azure and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; insomuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maestros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see."—Clavijo, § cv. (Comp. Marikhām, p. 125).

1524.—"And the Viceroy (D. Vasco da Gama) sent to seize in the river of the Culymatus four newly-built caturs, and fetched them to Cochín. These were built very light for fast rowing, and were greatly admired. But he ordered them to be burned, saying that he intended to show the Moors that we knew how to build better caturs than they did; and he sent for Mestre Vyne the Genoese, whom he had brought to build galleys, and asked him if he could build boats that would row faster than the Malabar paraos (see FROW). He answered: 'Sir, I'll build you brigantines fast enough to catch a mosquito. . . .'"—Correa, ii. 830.

[1548.—"He ordered to be collected in the smithies of the dockyard as many smiths as could be had, for he had many misteres."—Ibid. iv. 663.]

1554.—"To the mestre of the smith's shop (ferraria) 30,000 reis of salary and 600 reis for maintenance" (see BATTÀ).—S. Botelho, Tombo, 65.

1800.—". . . I have not yet been able to remedy the mischief done in my absence, as we have the advantage here of the assistance of some Madras dubashes and maistries" (ironical).—Wellington, i. 67.

1883.—". . . My mind goes back to my ancient Goanese cook. He was only a maistry, or more vulgarly a bobberjee (see BOBACHEE), yet his sonorous name recalled the conquest of Mexico, or the doubling of the Cape."—Tribes on My Frontier, 35.

[1900.—"Mystery very sick, Mem Sahib, very sick all the night."—Temple Bar, April.]

MAJOON, s. Hind. from Ar. ma'-jūn, lit. 'kneaded,' and thence what old medical books call 'an electuary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but especially applied to an intoxicating confection of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazar. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 159.] In the Deccan the form is ma'-jūm. Moodeen Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Pharmac. of India, writes magh-jūn. "The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (see DATURA), the powder of nux vomica, and sugar" (Qanoon-e-Islam, Gloss. lxxxiii).

1519.—"Next morning I halted . . . and indulging myself with a maajūn, made them throw into the water the liquor used for intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish."—Baber, 272.

1563.—"And this they make up into an electuary, with sugar, and with the things above-mentioned, and this they call maju."—Garcia, f. 27v.

1781.—"Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majum each, and obliged us to eat it . . . a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Caffres, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed."—Soldier's letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Mysore, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 293.

1874.—". . . it (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majum of a green colour."—Hanbury and Flückiger, 493.

MALABAR, n.p.

a. The name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Λιμύρικη, or rather Διμύρικη, of the Greeks (see TAMIL), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Malai, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravidian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malaya, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghats, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayalam, distinguishing that branch of the Dravidian language in the tract which we call Malabar. This name—Male or Malai, Maliah, &c.—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India; whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malai-nāḍu (nāḍu, 'country'). The affix bār appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian?) termination, bār, whatever be its origin, and whether or no it be connected either with the Ar. barr, 'a continent,' on the one hand, or with the Skt. vāra, 'a region, a slope,' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangi-bār (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kaldh-bār, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even according to the dictionaries, Hindū-bār for India. In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 17) it is expressly explained: "The word bār serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom." It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malavar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form. [Mr. Logan (Manual, i. 1) remarks that the name is not in use in the district itself except among foreigners and English-speaking natives; the ordinary name is Malayālam or Maldyām, 'the Hill Country'.]

c. 545.—"The imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, sandalwood. . . . These again are passed on from Sieladiba to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown. . . . And the most notable places of trade are these, Sindu . . . and then the five marts of Malé, from which the pepper is exported, viz., Parti, Manguruth, Salopatana, Nalopatana, and Pudoputana."—Cosmas, Bk. xi. In Cathay, &c., p. clxxviii.

c. 645.—"To the south this kingdom is near the sea. There rise the mountains called Mo-la-ye (Malaya), with their precipitous sides, and their lofty summits, their dark valleys and their deep ravines. On these mountains grows the white sandal-wood."—Huen Tsang, in Julien, iii. 122.

851.—"From this place (Maskat) ships sail for India, and run for Kaulam-Malai; the distance from Maskat to Kaulam-Malai is a month's sail with a moderate wind."—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 15. The same work at p. 15 uses the expression "Country of Pepper" (Balad-ul-falful).

890.—"From Sindán to Mali is five days' journey; in the latter pepper is to be found, also the bamboo."—Ibn Khurdādhba, in Elliot, i. 15.

c. 1030.—"You enter then on the country of Idrán, in which is Jaimúr (see under CHOUL), then Maliāh, then Kānchi, then Dravira (see DRAVIDIAN)."—Al-Birāni, in Reinaud, Fragments, 121.

c. 1150.—"Fandarina (see PANDARANI) is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Manibār, where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor."—Idrīsī, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1200.—"Harrisports here in the delightful spring . . . when the breeze from Malaya is fragrant from passing over the charming lauanga" (cloves).—Gilia Gorinda.

1270.—"Malibar is a large country of India, with many cities, in which popper is produced."—Kacoini, in Gildemeister, 214.

1293.—"You can sail (upon that sea) between these islands and Ormes, and (from Ormes) to those parts which are called (Minibar), is a distance of 2,000 miles, in a direction between south and south-east; then 300 miles between east and south-east from Minibar to Maabar" (see MABAR).—Letter of Fr. John of Montecorvino, in Cathay, i. 215.

1298.—"Melibar is a great kingdom lying towards the west. . . . There is in this kingdom a great quantity of pepper."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 25.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan (see CONCAN) and Tina; beyond them the country of Malibār, which from the boundary of Karoba to Kulam (probably from Gheriah to Quillon) is 300 parasangs in length."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1320.—"A certain traveller states that India is divided into three parts, of which the first, which is also the most westerly, is that on the confines of Kerman and Sind, and is called Gūzerāt; the second Manibār, or the Land of Pepper, east of Gūzerāt."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1322.—"And now that ye may know how pepper is got, let me tell you that it groweth in a certain empire, whereunto I came to land, the name whereof is Minibar."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 74.

c. 1343.—"After 3 days we arrived in the country of the Malaibār, which is the country of Pepper. It stretches in length a distance of two months' march along the sea-shore."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 71.

c. 1348-49.—"We embarked on board certain junks from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—John de Marignoli, in Cathay, 356.

c. 1420-30.—" . . . Departing thence he . . . arrived at a noble city called Coloen. . . . This province is called Melibar, and they collect in it the ginger called by the natives colombi, pepper, brazil-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa."—Conti, corrected from Jones's tr. in India in XVth Cent. 17-18.

c. 1442.—"The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kaci), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serendib . . . bears the general name of Melibār."—Abdurrazak, ibid. 19.

1459.—Fra Mauro's great Map has Millibar.

1514.—"In the region of India called Melibar, which province begins at Goa, and extends to Cape Comedis (Comorin). . . ."—Letter of Gior. da Empoli, 79. It is remarkable to find this Florentine using this old form in 1514.

1516.—"And after that the Moors of Meca discovered India, and began to navigate near it, which was 610 years ago, they used to touch at this country of Malabar on account of the pepper which is found there."—Barbosa, 102.

1553.—"We shall hereafter describe particularly the position of this city of Calicut, and of the country of Malabar in which it stands."—Barros, Dec. I. iv. c. 6. In the following chapter he writes Malabar.

1554.—"From Diu to the Islands of Dib. Steer first S.S.E., the pole being made by five inches, side towards the land in the direction of E.S.E. and S.E. by E. till you see the mountains of Monibār."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 461.

1672.—

"Esta provincia cuja porto agora Tomado tendes, Malabar se chama : Do culto antigo os idolos adora, Que cá por estas partes os derrama." Cantos, vii. 32.

By Burton :

"This province, in whose Ports your ships have tano refuge, the Malabar by name is known ; its antique rite adoreth idols vain, Idol-religion being broadest sown." Since Do Barros Malabar occurs almost universally.

[1623.—" . . . Mahabar Pirates. . . ."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 121.]

1877.—The form Malibar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., "Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch," to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 18.

MALABAR, n.p.

b. This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see MALAYALAM); those under B are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see c.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of the last century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Eurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

"Leva alguns Malabares, quo tomou Por força, dos quo o Samorim mandara." Cantos, ix. 14.

* "The Portuguese . . . sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration . . . made their acquaintances with various places on the eastern or Coromandel Coast . . . and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. . . . A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Cael, in Tanorevelly, on the Coromandel Coast . . . they found the King of Quilon (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there."—Bp. Caldwell, u.s.

[By Aubertin :

"He takes some Malabars he kept on board By force, of those whom Samorin had sent . . ."] 1582.—"They asked of the Malabars which went with him what he was!"—Custanheda, (tr. by N. L.) i. 37v.

1602.—"We came to anchor in the Roade of Achen . . . where we found sixteene or eighteene saile of shippes of diuers Nations, some Goeruls, some of Bengala, some of Calcut, called Malabares, some Pegurs, and some Patanyes."—Sir J. Lancaster, in Purchas, i. 153.

1606.—In Gouvea (Synodo, ff. 2r, 3, &c.) Malavar means the Malayalam language.

1519.—"Enrico Enriques, a Portuguese priest of our Society, a man of excellent virtue and good example, who is now in the Promontory of Comorin, writes and speaks the Malabar tongue very well indeed."—Letter of Xavier, in Coleridge's Life, ii. 73.

1680.—"Whereas it hath been hitherto accustomed at this place to make sales and alienations of houses in writing in the Portuguese, Gentue, and Mallabar languages, from which some inconveniences have arisen. . . ."—Ft. St. Geo. Const., Sept 9, in Notes and Extracts, No. iii. 33.

[1682.—"An order in English Portuguese Gentue & Mallabar for the preventing the transportation of this Countrey People and making them slaves in other Strange Countreys. . . ."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 87.]

1718.—"This place (Tranquebar) is altogether inhabited by Malabarian Heathens."—Propn. of the Gospel in the East, Pt. i. (3rd ed.), p. 18.

"Two distinct languages are necessarily required ; one is the Damutian, commonly called Malabarick."—Ibid. Pt. iii. 33.

1734.—"Magnopere commendantes zelum, ac studium Missionarium, qui libros sacram Ecclesiae Catholicae doctrinam, rerumque sacram monumenta continentes, pro Indorum Christi fidelium eruditione in linguam Malabaricam seu Tamulicam transtulero."—Brief of Pope Clement XII., in Norbert, ii. 432-3. These words are adopted from Carl. Tournon's decrees of 1701 (see ibid. i. 173).

c. 1760.—"Such was the ardent zeal of M. Ziegenhals that in less than a year he attained a perfect knowledge of the Malabarian tongue. . . . He composed also a Malabarian dictionary of 20,000 words."—Grose, i. 261.

1782.—"Les habitants de la côte de Coromandel sont appelés Tamouls; les Européens les nomment improprement Malabars."—Sonnerat, i. 47.

1801.—"From Nilisaram to the Chander-gerry River no language is understood but the Malabars of the Coast."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 322.

In the following passage the word Malabars is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent :

1810.—“The language spoken at Madras is the Talinga, here called Malabars.”—Marin Graham, 123.

1860.—“The term ‘Malabar’ is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalese Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Mahavamsa ‘dumiles, or Tamils, came not only from . . . ‘Malabar,’ but also from all parts of the Peninsula as far north as Cuttack and Orissa.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 353.

MALABAR-CREEPER, s. Argyreia malabarica, Choisy.

[MALABAR EARS, s. The seed vessels of a tree which Ives calls Codaga palli.

1773.—“From their shape they are called Malabar-Ears, on account of the resemblance they bear to the ears of the women of the Malabar coast, which from the large slit made in them and the great weight of ornamental rings put into them, are rendered very large, and so long that sometimes they touch the very shoulders.”—Ives, 465.

MALABAR HILL, n.p. This favourite site of villas on Bombay Island is stated by Mr. Whitworth to have acquired its name from the fact that the Malabar pirates, who haunted this coast, used to lie behind it.

[1674.—“On the other side of the great Inlet, to the Sea, is a great Point abutting against Old Woman’s Island, and is called Malabar-Hill . . . the remains of a stupendous Pagod, near a Tank of Fresh Water, which the Malabars visited it mostly for.”—Fryer, 68 seq.]

[MALABAR OIL, s. “The ambiguous term ‘Malabar Oil’ is applied to a mixture of the oil obtained from the livers of several kinds of fishes frequenting the Malabar Coast of India and the neighbourhood of Karachi.”—Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 113.

MALABAR RITES. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches. These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de Nobili (“Robertus de Nobilibus”), who came to Madura about 1600. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation !

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1623 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—1. The investiture of Brahmans and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge. 2. The ornamental use of sandalwood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification. 3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification. 4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the churches was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (June 23, 1704) prohibited:—1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of ‘sativa, eal, et insufflatio.’ 2. The use of Pagan names. 3. The Hinduizing of Christian terms by translation. 4. Deferring the baptism of children. 5. Infant marriages. 6. The use of the Hindu tal (see TALEE). 7. Hindu usages at marriages. 8. Augury at marriages, by means of a coco-nut. 9. The exclusion of women from churches during certain periods. 10. Ceremonies on a girl’s attainment of puberty. 11. The making distinctions between Pariahs and others. 12. The assistance of Christian musicians at heathen ceremonies. 13. The use of ceremonial washings and bathings. 14. The use of cowdung-ashes. 15. The reading and use of Hindu books.

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

MALABATHRUM, s. There can be very little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamomum, which leaf was known in Skt. as tamūla-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pān or betel-leaf for the malabathrum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Ar. name of the betel, tāmbūl, which is taken from Skt. tāmbūla, betel; tāmbūla-pattra, betel-leaf. The tamūla-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamomum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as tejpāt, or corruptly tezpāt, i.e. 'pungent leaf.' The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of sādhaj or sādhajī Hindī, as was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Folium indicum, which will still be found in Italian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios of Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabathrum and Folium indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists. The ancients did no doubt apply the name Malabathrum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract. Rheede, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Cathay, &c., pp. cxlv.-xlv.) The name Cinnamon is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinnamoma are properly Cassia barks. [See Watt. Econ. Dict. ii. 317 seqq.]

c. A.D. 60.—"Μαλαβαθρον ἐνιοι ὑπολαμβάνουσιν εἶναι τῆς Ἰνδικῆς νάρδου φύλλον, πλανώμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς κατὰ τὴν ὁμῆν, ἐμφερείας, . . . ἴδιον γὰρ ἐστὶ γένος φυόμενον ἐν τοῖς Ἰνδοῖς τέλει, φύλλον δὲ ἐπινυγόμενον ὕδατι."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. i. 11.

c. A.D. 70.—"We are beholden to Syria for Malabathrum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eye withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Oil for perfumers to use. . . . And yet there cometh a better kind thereof from India. . . . The rollish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that . . . the leaf yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is straunge and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denier to three hundred a pound."—Pliny, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

c. A.D. 90.—" . . . Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withes. And these they divide into three classes. . . . And thus originate the three qualities of Malabathrum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale."—Periplus, near the end. [Also see I'ule, Intro. Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 89.]

1563.—"R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indu, a piece of information of great value to me; for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same; and what is more, the modern writers . . . call betel in their works tāmbūl, and say that the Moors give it this name. . . .

"O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear, for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz., in 259, which treats of folium indu, and in 707, which treats of tāmbūl . . . and the folium indu is called by the Indians Tamalapatra, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into Malabathrum," &c.—Garcia, ff. 95v, 96.

c. 1690.—"Hoc Tembul seu Sirium, licet vulgatissimum in India sit folium, distinguendum est a Folio Indo seu Malabathro, Arabibus Cadeji Hindī, in Pharmacopoeis, et Indis, Tamala-patra et folio Indo dicto, . . . A nostra autem natione intellexi Malabathrum nihil aliud esse quam folium canellae, seu cinnamomi sylvestris."—Rumphius, v. 337.

c. 1760.—" . . . quand l'on considère que les Indiens appellent notre fouille Indienne tamalapatra on croit d'apercevoir que le mot Grec μαλάβαρον on a été anciennement dérivé."—(Diderot) Encyclopédie, xx. 816.

1837.—(Malatroom is given in Arabic works of Materia Medica as the Greek of Sidhay, and inj and tey-pat as the Hindi synonymes). "By the latter names may be obtained everywhere in the lazars of India, the leaves of Cinn. Tamula and of Cinn. albflosum."—Royle, Essay on Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine, 85.

MALACCA, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D'Albuquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes some etymological connection between Malayu and Malacca. And such a connection is put forward by De Barros and D'Albuquerque (see below, and also under MALAY). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of the city, which evidently refers to the Ar. mulakat, 'a meeting.' This last, though it appears also in the Sijara Malayu, may be totally rejected. Crawford is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phyllanthus emblica, or emblic Myrobalan (q.v.), "a tree said to be abundant in that locality"; and thus, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eredia as the etymology. Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. amlaka, from amla, 'acid.' [Mr. Skeat writes: "There can be no doubt that Crawford is right, and that the place was named from the tree. The suggested connection between Malayu and Malaka appears impossible to me, and, I think, would do so to any one acquainted with the laws of the language. I have seen the Malaka tree myself and eaten its fruit. Ridley in his Botanical Lists has laka-laka and malaka which he identifies as Phyllanthus emblica, L. and P. pectinatus Hooker (Euphorbiaceae). The two species are hardly distinct, but the latter is the commoner form. The fact is that the place, as is so often the case among the Malays, must have taken its name from the Sungei Malaka, or Malaka River."]]

1416.—"There was no King but only a chief, the country belonging to Siam. . .

In the year 1409, the Imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and gave to the chief two silver seals. . . he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Ma-la-ka). . . Tin is found in the mountains . . . it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 cattis 8 taels . . . ten pieces are bound together with rattan and form a small bundle, whilst 40 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading . . . they use these pieces of tin instead of money."—Chinese Annals, in Groeneveldt, p. 123.

1498.—"Molequa . . . is 40 days from Qualecut with a fair wind . . . hence proceeds all the clove, and it is worth there 9 cruados for a bahar (q.v.), and likewise nutmeg other 9 cruados the bahar; and there is much porcelain and much silk, and much tin, of which they make money, but the money is of large size and little value, so that it takes 3 farazmas (see Frazmas) of it to make a cruado. Here too are many large parrots all red like fire."—Roteiro de P. da Gama, 110-111.

1510.—"When we had arrived at the city of Melacha, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor . . . I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world. . ."—Tartarum, 224.

1511.—"The Paremiqua gave the name of Malaca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Pallubio flees away they call him Malayo. . . Others say that it was called Malaca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malaca also signifies to meet. . . Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter."—Commentaries of Albuquerque, F.T. by Birch, iii. 76-77.

1516.—"The said Kingdom of Anyano (see Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malaca."—Barboza, 191.

1553.—"A son of Parami-ora called Naquom Darxa, (i.e. Sikandar Shah) . . . to form the town of Malacca, to which he gave that name in memory of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say 'banished,' and hence the people are called Malaios."—De Barros, II. vi. 1.

"That which he (Albuquerque) regretted most of all that was lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work, and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malacca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Alfonso Albuquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph on the capture of the city."—Ibid., II. vii. 1.

 "Nem tu menos fugir poderás deste
 Postoque rica, e postoque assenlada
 Lá no gremio da Aurora, onde nasceste, Opulenta Malaca nomeada!
 Assettas venenosas, que fizeste,
 Os crises, com quo já te vejo armada,
 Malaios namorados, Jaos valentes, Todos fardos ao Luso obedientes."

Camões, x. 44.

By Burton:

"Nor shalt thou 'scape the fate to fall his prize, albeit so wealthy, and so strong thy sito there on Aurora's bosom, whence thy rise, thou Home of Opulence, Malacca hight!
 The poisoned arrows which thine art supplies,
 the Krises thirsting, as I see, for fight, th' enamoured Malay-men, the Javan braves,
 all of the Lusian shall become the slaves."

1612.—"The Arabs call it Malakat, from collecting all merchants."—Sjara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 322.

1613.—"Malaca significa Mirabolano, fructa do hua arvore, plantada ao longo de hum ribeiro chamado Aeriele."—Godinho de Eradia, l. 4.

MALADOO, s. Chicken maladoo is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu.
 It looks like a corruption from the French cuisine, but of what? [Malado or Manadoo, a lady informs me, is cold meat, such as chicken or mutton, cut into slices, or pounded up and re-cooked in batter. The Port. malhado, 'beaten-up,' has been suggested as a possible origin for the word.]

MALAY, n.p. This is in the Malay language an adjective, Malāyu;
 thus orang Malāyu, 'a Malay'; tāna [tānah] Malāyu, 'the Malay country'; bahāsa [bhāsa] Malāyu, 'the Malay language.'

In Javanese the word malāyu signifies 'to run away,' and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this, in reference to the alleged foundation of Malacca by Javanese fugitives; but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of S.
 Indian origin, and connected with the Malāya of the Peninsula (see under MALABAR). [Mr. Skeat writes: "The tradition given me by Javanese in the Malay States was that the name was applied to Javanese refugees, who peopled the S. of Sumatra. Whatever be the original meaning of the word, it is probable that it started its life-history as a river-name in the S. of Sumatra, and thence became applied to the district through which the river ran, and so to the people who lived there; after which it spread with the Malay dialect until it included not only many allied, but also many foreign, tribes; all Malayspeaking tribes being eventually called Malays without regard to racial origin.

 A most important passage in this connection is to be found in Leyden's Tr.
 of the 'Malay Annals' (1821), p. 20, in which direct reference to such a river is made: 'There is a country in the land of Andalās named Paralembang, which is at present denominated Palembang, the raja of which was denominated Damang Lebar Dawn (chieftain Broad-leaf), who derived his origin from Raja Sulan (Chulan?), whose great-grandson he was. The name of its river Muartatang, into which falls another river named Sungey Malayu, near the source of which is a mountain named the mountain Sagantang Maha Miru.' Here Palembang is the name of a well-known Sumatran State, often described as the original home of the Malay race. In standard Malay 'Damang Lebar Dawn' would be 'Dēmang Lebar Dawn.' Raja Chulan is probably some mythical Indian king, the story being evidently derived from Indian traditions. 'Muartatang' may be a mistake for Muar Tenang, which is a place one heard of in the Peninsula, though I do not know for certain where it is. 'Sungey Malayu' simply means 'River Malayu.' 'Sagantang Maha Miru' is, I think, a mistake for Sa-guntang Maha Miru, which is the name used in the Peninsula for the sacred central mountain of the world on which the episode related in the Annals occurred" (see Skeat, *Malay

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawford, that a name which appears on Ptolemy's Tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Maulmain, is Μαλειὸν Κέλον, words which in Javanese (Malāyu-Kulon) would signify "Malays of the West."
 After this the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the Geography of Edrisi, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Sclater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinj, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable) or of the Island of the Malagashes (Madagascar), if it is either. We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

[A.D. 690.—Mr. Skeat notes: "I Tsing speaks of the 'Molo-yu country,' i.e. the district W. or N.W. of Palembang in Sumatra."]

c. 1150.—"The Isle of Malai is very great. . . . The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatics and spices, such as clove, cinnamon, nard . . . and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality . . . the people also have windmills."—Edrisi, by Jaubert, i. 945.

c. 1273.—A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Malii, or Maliurh, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China."—Notice by Sir T. Wade, in Bowering's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292.—"You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malaiur. The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spicery are to be found there."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 8.

c. 1539.—" . . . as soon as he had delivered to him the letter, it was translated into the Portugal out of the Malayan tongue wherein it was written."—Pinto, E.T. p. 15.

1548.—" . . . having made a breach in the wall twelve fathom wide, he assaulted it with 10,000 strangers, Turks, Abyssins, Moors, Malauares, Achems, Jaos, and Malayos."—Ibid. p. 279.

1553.—"And so these Gentles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malacca as being the most general language of those parts."—Barros, III. v. 1.

"Everything with them is to be a gentleman; and thus has such prevalence in those parts that you will never find a native Malay, however poor he may be, who will set his hand to lift a thing of his own or anybody else's; every service must be done by slaves."—Ibid. II. vi. 1.

1610.—"I cannot imagine what the Hollanders means, to suffer these Malaysians, Chinesians, and Moors of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade throw all the Indies, and forbid it their own servants, countrymen, and Brethren, upon paine of death and losse of goods."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The word Malaya is now often applied by English writers to the Peninsula as a whole, and from this the term Malaysia as a term of wider application (i.e. to the Archipelago) has been coined (see quotation of 1610 above). The former is very frequently miswritten by English writers as 'Malay,' a barbarism which has even found place on the title-page of a book—'Travel and Sport in Burma, Siam and Malay, by John Bradley, London, 1876.'"]

MALAYĀLAM. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the Western side of the Ghauts (or Malāya mountains), from the Chandragiri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandrum on the South (lat. 8° 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it. Tamil, however, also intertwines with Malayālam all along Malabar. The term Malayālam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region" [See under MALABAR, and Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

MALDIVES, MALDIVE ISLDS., n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Nale-diva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one. The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for 'island' which we have in the Skt. dvīpa and the Pali dīpa. We find this reflected in the Divi of Ammianus, and in the Diva and Diba-jāt (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the 18th century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom Dirchi Rajé, and his people Diveh mihun. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mahal-dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mahal, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connection with Mahal, 'a palace.' This form of the name looks like a foreign 'striving after meaning.' But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Malé, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dives, or islands, of Malé, as Malebâr (see MALABAR) was the coast-tract or continent, of Malé. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from malā, 'a garland or necklace,' of which their configuration is highly suggestive. [The Madras Gloss. gives Malayūl, mal, 'black,' and dripi, 'island,' from the dark soil. For a full account of early notices of the Maldives, see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 423 seqq.] Milburn (Or. Commers., i. 335) says: "This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1507." Let us see!

c. 515.—"And round about it (Sirdidat or Tuprobani, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxxvii.

851.—"Between this Sea (of Horkand) and the Sea called Laravi there is a great number of isles; their number, indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,900; . . . the distance from island to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs. They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-palms, . . . The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Horkand; it is the chief of all; they give the islands the name of Dibajāt (i.e. Divas).—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 4-5.

c. 1030.—"The special name of Diva is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect . . . these islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product. Those of one class are called Diva-Kārah (or the Cowry Divas), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Diva-Kanbar, from the word kanbar (see GOIR), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched."—Al-Dirant, in Reinaud, Frugemus, 124.

1150.—See also Extrin, in Jaubert's Travels, i. 68. But the translator prints a bad reading, Natibhat, for Dibajāt.

c. 1343.—"Ten days after embarking at Calcut we arrived at the Islands called Dhibat-al-Mahal. . . These islands are reckoned among the wonders of the World; there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered into a ring, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter. . . Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-palms. . . They are divided into regions or groups . . . among which are distinguished . . . 3° Mahal, the group which gives a name to the whole, and which is the residence of the Sultans."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 110 seqq.

1412.—Abdurrazak also calls them "the isles of Diva-Mahal."—In Not. et Extr. xiv. 429.

1503.—"But Dom Vasco . . . said that things must go on as they were to India, and there he would inquire into the truth. And so arriving in the Gulf (golfo) where the storm befel them, all were separated, and that vessel which sailed badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Maldiva, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves. For the island abounded in provisions, and the men indulged to excess in eating coconuts, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died."—Curra, i. 317.

1563.—"R. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business in hand,—why is that chain of islands called 'Islands of Maldiva'?"

"O. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands; how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names in foreign tongues! But, nevertheless, I will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldiva, but Nalediva; for nale in Malabar means 'four,' and diva 'island,' so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say 'Four Isles.' . . . And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Goa Angediva (see ANCHEDIAVA), because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar means 'Five Isles,' for ange is 'five.' But these derivations rest on common report, I don't detail them to you as demonstrable facts."—Garcia, Colloquios, f. 11.

1572.—"Nas ilhas de Maldiva." (See COCO-DE-MER.)

c. 1510.—"Ce Royaume en leur langage s'appelle Malé-ragué, Royaume de Malé, et des autres peuples de l'Inde il s'appelle Malé-divar, et les peuples fines . . . L'Isle principale, comme j'ay dit, s'appelle Malé, qui donne le nom à tout le reste des autres; car le mot Dives signifie vn nombre de petites isles amassées."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 83, 68, ed. 1679. [Hak. Soc. i. 83, 177.]

1633.—"Mr. Beard sent up his Couries, which he had received from ye Mauldivas, to be put off and passed by Mr. Charnock at Cassumbazar."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2, [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

MALUM, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called málum sáhib. The word is Ar. mu'allim, literally 'the Instructor,' and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our 'master' in the Navy. In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nakhuda (see NACODA) is, rather than Mu'allim, 'the captain'; though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Mu'allim from Nakhuda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1497.—"And he sent 20 cruzados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malemos, who were the pilots, for of these coins he would give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct."—Correa, i. 38 (E.T. by Ld. Stanley of Alderley, 88). On this passage the Translator says: "The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa." It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1541.—"Meanwhile he sent three catura (q.v.) to the Port of the Malemos (Porto dos Malemos) in order to get some pilot. . . . In this Port of the Bundel of the Malemos the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again."—Corren, iv. 163.

* This Port was immediately outside the Straits, as appears from the description of Dom João do Castro (1541): "Now turning to the 'Gates' of the Strait, which are the chief object of our description, we remark that here the land of Arabia juts out into the sea, forming a prominent Point, and very prolonged. . . . This is the point or promontory which Ptolemy calls Posidium. . . . In front of it, a little more than a gunshot

c. 1590.—"Mu'allim or Captain. He must be acquainted with the depths and shallow places of the Ocean, and must know astronomy. It is he who guides the ship to her destination, and prevents her falling into dangers."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 280.

MAMIRAN, MAMIRA, s. A medicine from old times of much repute in the East, especially for eye-diseases, and imported from Himalayan and Trans-Himalayan regions. It is a popular native drug in the Punjab bazars, where it is still known as mamira, also as pilāri. It seems probable that the name is applied to bitter roots of kindred properties but of more than one specific origin. Hanbury and Fluckiger describe it as the rhizome of Coptis Teeta, Wallich, tita being the name of the drug in the Mishmi country at the head of the Assam Valley, from which it is imported into Bengal. But Stewart states explicitly that the mamira of the Punjab bazars is now "known to be" mostly, if not entirely, derived from Thalictrum foliosum D.C., a tall plant which is common throughout the temperate Himālaya (5000 to 8000 feet) and on the Kasia Hills, and is exported from Kumann under the name of Momiri. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 42 seq.] "The Mamira of the old Arab writers was identified with Σελιδόριον μέγα, by which, however, Low (Aram. Pflanzennamen, p. 220) says they understood curcuma longa." W.R.S.

c. A.D. 600-700.—"Μαμιάς, ὅσον ῥίζον τι πᾶς ἐστίν ἔχον ὡσερ κονδύλους πυκνοὺς, ὅπως οὐλὰς τε καὶ λευκώματα λεγόμενα πεπιστευέται, δηλονότι μνηστικῆς ὑπερχον δυνάμεως."—Pauli Aeginetiae Medici, Libri vii., Basileae 1538. Lib. vii. cap. iii. sect. 12 (p. 246).

The Island retains its name, and is mentioned as Pilot Island by Capt. Haines in J. R. Geog. Soc. ix. 126. It lies about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. due east of Perim.

The glossary of Arabic terms by Andreas do Alpago de Bolluno, attached to various early editions of Avicenna, gives the following interpretation: "Memirum est radix nodosa, non multum grossa, citrini coloris, sicut curcuma; minor tamen est et subtilior, et asportatur ex India, et apud physicos orientales est valde nota, et usitatur in passionibus oculi."

c. 1200.—"Some maintain that this plant ('urik al-sābaghin) is the small kurkum (turmeric), and others that it is mamirān. . . The kurkum is brought to us from India. . . The mamirān is imported from China, and has the same properties as kurkum."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 186-188.

c. 1550.—"But they have a much greater appreciation of another little root which grows in the mountains of Suenir (i.e. Suchau in Shensi), where the rhubarb grows, and which they call Mambron-Chini (i.e. Mamirān-i-Chini). This is extremely dear, and is used in most of their ailments, but especially when the eyes are affected. They grind it on a stone with rose water, and anoint the eyes with it. The result is wonderfully beneficial."—Haji Mahomud's Account of Cathay, in Ramuzot, ii. f. 15c.

c. 1573.—(At Aleppo). "Mamiranitchini, good for eyes as they say."—Rauwolf, in Hay's 2nd ed. p. 114.

Also the following we borrow from Dozy's Suppl. aux Dict. Arabes:—

1582.—"Mohr haben ihre Krämer kleine wurtzelein zu verkaufen mamirani tohini genennot, in gelresten der Augen, wie sie fūrgoben ganz dioulich; diese seind gelblecht wie die Curcuma umb ein zimlich lenger, auch danner und knopffet das solche unroren weisz wurtzen sehr ehulich, und wol für das rechte mamiran mögen gehalten werden, dessen sonderlich Rhasea an mehr orton gedenecket."—Rauwolf, Eigentliche Beschreibung der Raiz, 126.

c. 1665.—"These caravans brought back Muski, China-wood, Rubarb, and Mamiron, which last is a small root exceeding good for ill eyes."—Bernier, E.T. 136; (ed. Constable, 426).

MAMLUṬḌAR, s. P.—H. mu'āmalatdār (from Ar. mu'dmala, 'affairs, business'), and in Mahr. māmlatdār. Chiefly used in Western India. Formerly it was the designation, under various native governments, of the chief civil officer of a district, and is now in the Bombay Presidency the title of a native civil officer in charge of a Talook, corresponding nearly to the Tahseeldar of a pergunna in the Bengal Presidency, but of a status somewhat more important.

[1826.—"I now proceeded to the Maamulut-dar, or farmer of the district. . ."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 42.]

MAMOOŁ, s.; MAMOOLEE, adj. Custom, Customary. Ar.—H. ma'mūl. The literal meaning is 'practised,' and then 'established, customary.' Ma'mūl is, in short, 'precedent,' by which all Orientals set as much store as English lawyers, e.g. "And Laban said, It must not so be done in our country (lit. It is not so done in our place) to give the younger before the firstborn."—Genesis xxix. 26.

MAMOOTY, MAMOTY, MO-MATTY, s. A digging tool of the form usual all over India, i.e. not in the shape of a spade, but in that of a hoe, with the helve at an acute angle with the blade. [See FOWR.] The word is of S. Indian origin, Tamil mauvūti, 'earth-cutter'; and its vernacular use is confined to the Tamil regions, but it has long been an established term in the list of ordnance stores all over India, and thus has a certain prevalence in Anglo-Indian use beyond these limits.

[1752.—"He marched . . . with two battalions of sepoyes . . . who were ordered to make a show of entrenching themselves with mamuties. . ."—Letter of Lt. Mucartary, in Forrest, Selections, iii. 855.]

[1852.—" . . . by means of a mometty or hatchet, which he ran and borrowed from a husbandman . . . this fellow dug . . . a reservoir. . ."—Noble, Narrative of Residence in Siam, 138.]

MANCHUA, s. A large cargo-boat, with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast. This is the Portuguese form; the original Malayālam word is manji, [manchi, Skt. mancha, 'a cot,' so called apparently from its raised platform for cargo,] and nowadays a nearer approach to this, manjer, &c., is usual.

c. 1612.—"So he made ready two manchuas, and one night got into the house of the King, and stole from him the mo-beautiful woman that he had, and, along with her, jewels and a quantity of money."—Correa, i. 281.

1525.—"Quatro lancharas (q.v.) grandes e seis qualaluzes (see CALALUZ) e manchuas quo se romam muyto."—Lanchungu das Cousas de India, p. 8.

1552.—"Manchuas quo sam navios de romo."—Castanheda, ii. 362.

c. 1610.—"Il n vno petito Gahote, qu'ils appellent Manchoués, fort bien couverto . . . et faut huit ou neuf hommes seulement pour la mener."—L'ymur de Laral, ii. 26; [Hak. Soc. ii. 12].

1682.—"Ex hujusmodi arboribus excavatis naviculas Indi conficiunt, quas Mansjons appellant, quarum nonnullae longitudine 80, latitudine 9 pedum mensuram superant."—Rheede, Hort. Malabar, iii. 27.

[1736.—"All ships and vessels . . . as well as the manchuas appertaining to the Company's officers."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, ii. 31.

MANDADORE, s. Port. mandador, 'one who commands.'

1673.—"Each of which Tribes have a Mandadore or Superintendent."—Fryer, 67.

MANDALAY, MANDALÉ, n.p. The capital of the King of Burmah, founded in 1860, 7 miles north of the preceding capital Amarapura, and between 2 and 3 miles from the left bank of the Irawadi. The name was taken from that of a conical isolated hill, rising high above the alluvial plain of the Irawadi, and crowned by a gilt pagoda. The name of the hill (and now of the city at its base) probably represents Mandara, the sacred mountain which in Hindu mythology served the gods as a churning-staff at the churning of the sea. The hill appears as Mandaye-tany in Major Grant Allan's Map of the Environs of Amarapura (1855), published in the Narrative of Major Phayre's Mission, but the name does not occur in the Narrative itself.

1861.—"Next morning the son of my friendly host accompanied me to the Mandalay Hill, on which there stands in a gilt chapel the image of Shwesayatta, pointing down with outstretched finger to the Palace of Mandalay, interpreted as the divine command there to build a city . . . on the other side where the hill falls in an abrupt precipice, sits a gigantic Buddha gazing in motionless meditation on the mountain opposite. There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and whitewashed, which are inhabited by eremites. . . ."—Barthien's Travels (German), ii. 68-90.

MANDARIN, s. Port. Mandarij, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus: "A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c." So also T. Hyde in the quotation below. Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandarij be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article (see MANDADORE) shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivation from 'order,' and called them orderumbos.

The word is really a slight corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a Minister of State,' for which it was indeed the proper old pie-Mahommedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawford's Malay Dict. s.v. [and Klinkert, who writes mantri, colloquially mentri]). Yet Crawford himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 189). [Klinkert adopts the Skt. derivation.] It is, no doubt, probable that the instinctive "striving after meaning" may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsden is still more oddly perverse, videns meliora, deteriora secutus, when he says: "The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese" (II. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.* The true etymon is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries, but in Continental India. We may add that mantri (see MUN-TREE) is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kasias (see COSSYA) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarin; see below.

MANDARIN LANGUAGE, s.

The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kuan-Hua. It is substantially the language of the people of the northern and middle zones of China, extending to Yun-nan. It is not to be confounded with the literary style which is used in books. [See Ball, Things Chinese, 169 seq.]

1674.—"The Language . . . is called Qwenhra (hua), or the Language of Mandarines, because as they spread their command they introduced it, and it is used throughout all the Empire, as Latin in Europe. It is very barren, and as it has more Letters far than any other, so it has fewer words."—Faria y Sousa, L.T. ii. 463.

MANGALORE, n.p. The only place now well known by this name is (a) Mangal-ār, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 51' N. In Mir Husain Ali's Life of Haider it is called "Gorial Bunder," perhaps a corr. of Kandidāl, which is said in the Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name. [There is a place called Gurupura close by; see Madras Gloss, s.v. Goorpore.] The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology. [The present name is said to be taken from the temple of Mangala Devi.] But the name in approximate forms (from maṅgala, 'gladness') is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat was formerly well known, now commonly called Mungrole. And another place of the name (c) Mangla-rar in the valley of Swat, north of Peshāwar, is mentioned by Hwen Tsang as a city of Gandhāra. It is probably the same that appears in Skt. literature (see Williams, s.v. Mangala) as the capital of Udyāna.

1648.—This place is called Mangerol by Van Twist, p. 13.

1727.—"The next maritime town is Mangaroul. It admits of Trade, and affords coarse Callicoes, white and died, Wheat, Pulse, and Butter for export."—A. Hamilton, i. 136, [ed. 1744].

c. Manglavar in Swat.

c. 630.—"Le royaume de Ou-tchang-na (Oudyana) a environ 5000 li de tour . . . on compte 4 ou 5 villes fortifiées. La plus-part des rois de ce pays ont pris pour capitale la ville de Moung-kie-li (Moungali). . . . La population est fort nombreuse."—Hien Tsang, in Pel. Bouddh. ii. 131-2.

1858. — "Mongkieli so retrouve dans Manglavar (in Sanskrit Maṅgala-poura) . . . villo située près de la rive gauche de la rivière de Swat, et qui a été longtemps, au rapport des indigènes, la capitale du pays."—Pirien de St. Martin, Ibid. iii. 314-315.

MANGELIN, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones. The word is Telegu manjālī; in Tamil manjāḍi, [from Skt. manjū, 'beautiful']; the seed of the Aden-anthera pavonina (Compare RUTTEE). On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India. The manjāḍi seed was used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4.13 grs. Three parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5.02 and 5.03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1516.—Diamonds " . . . sell by a weight which is called a Manglar, which is equal to 2 tare and $\frac{3}{4}$, and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 321r.

1551.—(In Ceylon) "A calamja contains 20 mangelins, each mangelim 8 grains of rice; a Portuguese of gold weighs 8 calamjas and 2 mangelins."—A. Nunes, 35.

1584.—"There is another sort of weight called Mangiallino, which is 5 grains of Venico weight, and therewith they weigh diamonds and other jewels."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 403.

1611.—"Quem não sabe a grandeza das minas do finisimos diamantes do Reyno do Bisnaga, donde cada dia, e cada hora se tiram peças do tamanho do hum ovo, e muitas de sessenta e oitenta mangelins."—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, 151.

1605.—"Le poids principal des Diamans est le mangelin; il peso cinq grains et trois cinquièmes."—Thevenot, v. 293.

1676.—"At the mine of Raolconda they weigh by Mangelins, a Mangelin being one Carat and three quarters, that is 7 grains. . . . At the Mine of Soumelpore in Bengal they weigh by Rati's (see RUTTEE), and the Rati is $\frac{1}{4}$ of a Carat, or 31 grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Visapour, they make use of Mangelins, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and $\frac{3}{4}$. The Portugals in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above 5 grains."—Turner, E.T. ii. 141; [ed. Bull. ii. 87, and see ii. 433.]

MANGO, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil mān-kāy or mān-gāy, i.e. mān fruit (the tree being māmarum, 'mān-tree'). The Portuguese formed from this manga, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is uneatable.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (Herb. Amboyn. i. 95) traces its then recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malacca) "mangka, vel vulgo Manga et Mapelaam." This last word is only the Tamil Māpalam, i.e. 'mān fruit' again. The close approximation of the Malay mangka to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malacca. But we see manga already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar. [Mr. Skent writes: "The modern standard Malay word is mangga, from which the Port. form was probably taken. The other Malay form quoted from Rumphius is in standard Malay mapelam, with mēpelam, kēmpelam, amēpelam, and pelam or plam as variants. The Javanese is pēlēm."] The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayan colonists, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape mangka. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are Ām and Āmba, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkan, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1328), calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de' Marignolli calls the tree "amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach" (Cathay, &c., ii, 362). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree. The Skt. name is Amra, and this we find in Hwen T'sang (c. 645) phoneticised as An-mo-lo.

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dysentery in the army of Alexander. (See the passage s.v. JACK).

c. 1323.—"Est etiam alia arbor quae fructus facit ad modum pruni, gro-re-mo, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt fructus ita dulces et amabiles, quod oro tenuis exprimi hoc minime possit."—Fr. Jordanus, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv, 12.

c. 1334.—"The mango tree (anba) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unwholesome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever."—Abu Hafsa, iii, 125. At p. 185 he writes 'anba. [The same change is made against the tamarind; see Burton, Ar. Nights, iii, 81.]

c. 1319.—"They have also another tree called Amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 362.

1510.—"Another fruit is also found here, which is called Anba, the stem of which is called Manga," &c.—Arthema, 160-161.

c. 1526.—"Of the vegetable productions peculiar to Hindustan one is the mango (ambh). . . . Such mangoes as are good are excellent. . . ." &c.—Nabur, 321.

1563.—"O. Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the veranda here—and they seem but small ones

"Servant. I will bring you word presently.

"S. Sir! it is Simon To-cano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of mangas for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has moored the boat he will come here to stop.

"O. He couldn't have come more à propos. I have a manga-tree (mangurira) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency. Boy! take out six mangas."—Garcia, ff. 131r, 135. This author also mentions that the mangas of Ormuz were the most colo-rated; also certain mangas of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Balaghat were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arrat and a half (1½ lbs.); and those of Bengal, Pegu, and Malacca were also good.

[1569.—"There is much fruit that comes from Arabia and Persia, which they call mangoes (mangas), which is very good fruit."—Cronica dos Reis Dornas, translated from the Arabic in 1569.]

c. 1590.—"The Mangoo (Anba). . . . This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmands of Tüsrin and Irân place it above musk melons and grapes. . . . If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months."—Lin, ed. Blochmann, i, 67-68.

[1615.—"George Durois sent in a present of two bottles of Mangas."—Cocke's Diary, Hnk. Soc. i, 79.]

"There is another very liquorish fruit called Amanques growing on trees, and it is as big as a great guinea, with a very great stone in it."—De Monfort, 20.

1622.—P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Mink (Minao) near Hormuz, under the name of Anba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as "manga or amba,"—ii, pp. 313-14, and 631; [Hnk. Soc. i, 49].

1631.—"Alibi vero commemorat mangae speciem fortis admodum odoris, Terebinthinum scilicet, et Praeae arboris lacrymam redolentes, quas propterea nostri stinkera appellant."—Isis on Montius, Hist. Nat. p. 55.

[1663.—"Ambas, or Mangues, are in season during two months in summer, and are plentiful and cheap; but those grown at Delhi are indifferent. The best come from Bengale, Golkonda, and Goa, and these are indeed excellent. I do not know any sweet-meat more agreeable."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 219.]

1673.—Of the Goa Mango,* Fryer says justly: "When ripe, the Apples of the Hesperides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Nectarine, Peach, and Apricot fall short. . . ."—p. 182.

1679.—"Mango and saio (see SOY), two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Cocke's Journal, in Ld. King's Life, 1630, i, 219.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangos is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jesuits (Annae Marienses, ii, 270). In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahomedan names. The author of Traces on My Frontier, 1853, p. 14, mentions the luscious garia and the delicate af-sa as two fine varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Perris and a certain Afonso.

1727.—“The Goa mango is reckoned the largest and most delicious to the taste of any in the world, and I may add, the wholesomest and best tasted of any Fruit in the World.”—A. Hamilton, i. 255, [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1883.—“... the unsophisticated ryot ... conceives that cultivation could only emasculate the pronounced flavour and firm fibrous texture of that prince of fruits, the wild mango, likest a ball of tow soaked in turpentine.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 149.

The name has been carried with the fruit to Mauritius and the West Indies. Among many greater services to India the late Sir Proby Cautley diffused largely in Upper India the delicious fruit of the Bombay mango, previously rare there, by creating and encouraging groves of grafts on the banks of the Ganges and Jumna canals. It is especially true of this fruit (as Sultan Baber indicates) that excellence depends on the variety. The common mango is coarse and strong of turpentine. Of this only an evanescent suggestion remains to give peculiarity to the finer varieties. [A useful account of these varieties, by Mr. Maries, will be found in Huff, Econ. Diet. v. 148 seq.]

MANGO-BIRD, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its “loud mellow whistle” from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1878.—“The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle melody.”—P. H. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 59.

MANGO-FISH, s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polynemus Visua of Buchanan, P. paradiseus of Day), in flavour somewhat resembling the smelt, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the mullets. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindustani name is tapā or tapasī, ‘an ascetic,’ or ‘penitent,’ but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or free rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave. [Dr.

Grierson writes: “What the connection of the fish with a hermit was I never could ascertain, unless it was that like wandering Fakirs, they disappear directly the rains begin. Compare the uposatha of the Buddhists.” But tapasya means ‘produced by heat,’ and is applied to the month Phāgun (Feb.-March) when the fish appears; and this may be the origin of the name.]

1781.—“The BOARD OF TRUSTIES Assembled on Tuesday at the New Tavern, where the Committee meet to eat Mangoe Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs.”—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, March 3.

[1820.—“... the mangoes fish (so named from its appearing during the mango season). . . . By the natives they are named the Tapasī (penitent) fish, (abbreviated by Europeans to Tipy) from their re-sembling a class of religious penitents, who ought never to shave.”—Hamilton, Des. of Hindustan, i. 53.]

MANGO-SHOWERS, s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangoes begin to ripen.

MANGO-TRICK. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahāngir in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

c. 1610.—“... Khaun-o-Jehaun, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry-tree. The man arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves . . . when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proved the tree required by Khaun-o-Jehaun. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fig-tree, an almond, a walnut . . . open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits. . . . Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood . . . in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind . . . the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, however, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage birds of such surpassing beauty, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. . . . At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth. . . .—Mém. of the Imp. Ichanguiet, tr. by Major D. Prie, pp. 96-97.

c. 1650.—“Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and ask’d the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Mengues; then one of the Mountebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stooped to the ground two or six times one after another. I was so curious to go up-stairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Mountebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the armpits with a Razor, he rubb’d the stick with his Blood. After the two first times that he rubb’d himself, the stick seemed to the very eye to grow. The third time there sprung out branches with young buds. The fourth time the tree was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. . . . The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that these Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-an-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bore leaves and flowers as in the Spring-time; he went about to break it, protesting that he would not give the Communion to any person that should stay any longer to see those things.”—Tavernier, Travels made English, by J.P., ii. 36; [ed. Hall, i. 67, seq.].

1667.—“When two of these Jauguis (see JOGEE) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them up on the point and power of their knowledge or Jauguisme, you shall see them do such tricks out of spite to one another, that I know not if Simon Magus could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree blossom and bear fruit in less than an hour, hatch eggs in their bosoms in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand. . . . I mean, if what is said of them is true. . . . For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity none of those happy Men, that are present at, and see these great feats.”—Hervier, E.T. 103; [ed. Constable, 321].

1673.—“Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less.”—Fryer, 192.

1690.—“Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had pluckt one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and was never well as long as he kept it till he consulted a Drum for his Health, who prescrib’d his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restor’d to his Health again.”—Orington, 253-259.

1726.—“They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit: after they have got their answer the jugglers (Koorle-danvers) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (&c. &c.).

“There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

“These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the armpits, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground they wetted it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and to come to the perfection before described.

“This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can’t move me to believe it!”—Valentin, v. (Charon.) 53.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer’s, and the hugger-mugger performance that he disparages. But many others have testified to more remarkable skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjuror, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mango-plant. But lo! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

1657.—“ . . . trium horarum spatio arbusculam veram epitamæ longitudine omentis facere enasci, ut et alias arborum frondiferas et fructiferas.”—Magia Universalis, of P. Gaspar Schottus e Soc. Jes., Herbipoli, 1657, i. 32.

MANGOSTEEN, s. From Malay manggusta (Crawford), or manggistan (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. [Mr. Skeat writes: “The modern standard Malay form used in the W. coast of the Peninsula is manggis, as in Javanese, the forms manggusta and manggistan never being heard there. The Siamese form maangkut given in M'Farland's Siamese Grammar is probably from the Malay mangguta. It was very interesting to me to find that some distinct trace of this word was still preserved in the name of this fruit at Patani-Kelantan on the E. coast, where it was called baucak 'seta (or 'setar), i.e. the 'setar fruit,' as well as occasionally mestar or mesetar, clearly a corruption of some such old form as manggisar."] This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garcinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Guttiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and, in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1563.—"R. They have bragged much to me of a fruit which they call mangostans; let us hear what you have to say of these.

"O. What I have heard of the mangostan is that 'tis one of the most delicious fruits that they have in these regions. . . ."
—Garcia, f. 151a.

1598.—"There are yet other fruites, as . . . Mangostaine [in Hak. Soc. Mangestains] . . . but because they are of small account I thinke it not requisite to write severallie of them."—Linschoten, 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 34].

1631.—
"Cedant Hesperii longo hinc, mala aurea, fructus,

Ambrosiâ pascit Mangostan et nectare diuos—

. . . Inter omnes Indiae fructus longo sapidissimus."

Jac. Bontii, lib. vi. cap. 28, p. 115.

[1662.—"The Mangosthan is a Fruit growing by the Highwayes in Java, upon bushes, like our Sloes."—Mundseto, tr. Durieu, Bk. ii. 121 (Stanf. Dict.).]

1727.—"The Mangostane is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, the Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astrigent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlic, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold."—A. Hamilton, ii. 80 [ed. 1744].

MANGROVE, s. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For while the former genus is, according to Crawford, called by the Malays manggi-manggi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French manglier, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New. Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that "maize, mangle, hammock, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahiz, mangle, hamaca, canoa, and tabaco." It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question. [Mr. Skeat observes: "I believe the old English as well as French form was mangle, in which case Prof. Sayce would be perfectly right. Mangrove is probably mangle-grove. The Malay manggi-manggi is given by Klinkert, and is certainly on account of the reduplication, native. But I never heard it in the Peninsula, where mangrove is always called bakau."] The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1535.—"Of the Tree called Mangle. . . . These trees grow in places of mire, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see . . . they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots . . . and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other."—Oviedo, in Ramuzo, iii. f. 145r.

"So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoe with some 30 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-water, and which they call mangle."—Ibid. f. 224.

1553.—" . . . by advice of a Moorish pilot, who promised to take the people by night to a place where water could be got . . . and either because the Moor desired to land many times on the shore by which he was conducting them, seeking to get away from the hands of those whom he was conducting, or because he was really perplex by its being night, and in the middle of a great growth of mangrove (mangues) he never succeeded in finding the wells of which he spoke."—Barros, l. iv. 4.

c. 1830.—"Smite my timbers, do the trees bear shellfish?" The tide in the Gulf of Mexico does not obb and flow above two feet except in the springs, and the ends of the drooping branches of the mangrove trees that here cover the shore, are clustered, within the wash of the water, with a small well-flavoured oyster."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 119.

MANILLA-MAN, s. This term is applied to natives of the Philippines, who are often employed on shipboard, and especially furnish the quarter-masters (Seacunny, q.v.) in Lascar crews on the China voyage. But Manilla-man seems also, from Wilson, to be used in S. India as a hybrid from Telug manela vādv, 'an itinerant dealer in coral and gems'; perhaps in this sense, as he says, from Skt. mani, 'a jewel,' but with some blending also of the Port. manilha, 'a bracelet.' (Compare COBRA-MANILLA.)

MANJEE, s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft; Hind. mānjhi, Beng. māji and mājhi, [all from Skt. madhya, 'one who stands in the middle']. The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Pahāris or Hill-people of Rājmahal (Wilson), [and as equivalent for Majhwar, the name of an important Dravidian tribe on the borders of the N.W. Provinces and Chota Nāgpur].

1688.—"We were forced to track our boat till 4 in the Afternoon, when we saw a great black cloud arise out of ye North with much lightning and thunder, which made our Manges or Steerman advise us to fasten our boat in some Creeke."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 88.

[1706.—"Manjee." See under HARRY.]

1781.—"This is to give notice that the principal Gaut Mangies of Calcutta have entered into engagements at the Police Office to supply all Persons that apply there with Boats and Budgerows, and to give security for the Dandies."—India Gazette, Feb. 17.

1784.—"Mr. Austin and his head bearer, who were both in the room of the budgerow, are the only persons known to be drowned. The manjee and dandees have not appeared."—In Selon-Karr, i. 25.

1810.—"Their manjies will not fail to take every advantage of whatever distress, or difficulty, the passenger may labour under."—Williamson, V. M. i. 143.

[1864.—"The Khond chiefs of villages and Mootas are termed Maji instead of Mulliko as in Goomsur, or Khonro as in Boad. . . ."—Campbell, Wild Tribes of Khondistan, 120.]

MANNICKJORE, s. Hind. mānik-jor; the white-necked stork (Ciconia leucocephala, Gmelin); sometimes, according to Jerdon, called in Bengal the 'Beef-steak bird,' because palatable when cooked in that fashion. "The name of Manikjor means the companion of Manik, a Saint, and some Mussulmans in consequence abstain from eating it" (Jerdon). [Platts derives it from mānik, 'a ruby.']

MANUCODIATA. (See BIRD OF PARADISE.)

MARAMUT, MURRUMUT, s. Hind. from Ar. maramma(t), 'repair.' In this sense the use is general in Hindustani (in which the terminal t is always pronounced, though not by the Arabs), whether as applied to a stocking, a fortress, or a ship. But in Madras Presidency the word had formerly a very specialised sense as the recognised title of that branch of the Executive which included the conservation of irrigation tanks and the like, and which was worked under the District Civil Officers, there being then no separate department of the State in charge of Civil Public Works. It is a curious illustration of the wide spread at one time of Musulman power that the same Arabic word, in the form Marama, is still applied in Sicily to a standing committee charged with repairs to the Duomo or Cathedral of Palermo. An analogous instance of the wide grasp of the Saracenic power is mentioned by one of the Musulman authors whom Amari quotes in his History of the Mahomedan rule in Sicily. It is that the Caliph Al-Māmūn, under whom conquest was advancing in India and in Sicily simultaneously, ordered that the idols taken from the infidels in India should be sent for sale to the infidels in Sicily!

[1873.—"For the actual execution of works there was a Maramat Department constituted under the Collector."—Dowsett, Man. of Nellore, 642.]

MARGOSA, s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon for the Nim (see NEEM) tree. The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, 'bitter,' indicating the character of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the *Jātaka*s, that you cannot sweeten the nim tree though you water it with syrup and ghee (Naturam expellas furcē, &c.).

1727.—"The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crows come and eat the fruit of the margoise tree as soon as it is ripe."—Apophtegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 390.

1834.—"Adjacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margosa trees."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

MARKHORE, s. Pers. mār-khōr, 'snake-eater.' A fine wild goat of the Western Himālaya; Capra megaceros, Hutton.

MARTABAN, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talaing, Māt-ta-man, the meaning of which we have been unable to ascertain.

1614.—". . . passed then before Marta-man, the people also heathens; men expert in everything, and first-rate merchants; great masters of accounts, and in fact the greatest in the world. They keep their accounts in books like us. In the said country is great produce of lac, cloths, and provisions."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, p. 80.

1545.—"At the end of these two days the King . . . caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martabano was delivered to the mercy of the Souldiers . . . and therein showed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown."—Pinto, in Cogan, 203.

1553.—"And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast of that country, are Vagarr, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Roy, Talanga, and Tavey."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1695.—"Concerning Bartholomae Rodrigues. . . I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place."—Governor Higginson, in Dalrymple, Or. Report, ii. 342-3.

MARTABAN, s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telegu. [The word is certainly not obsolete in Upper India: "The martaban" (Plate ii. fig. 10) is a small deep jar with an elongated body, which is used by Hindus and Muhammadans to keep pickles and acid articles" (Hallifax, Mono. of Punjab Pottery, p. 9). In the endeavour to supply a Hindi derivation it has been derived from im-rita-bān, 'the holder of the water of immortality.' In the Arabian Nights the word appears in the form bartaman, and is used for a crock in which gold is buried. (Burton, xi. 26). Mr. Bell saw some large earthenware jars at Malé, some about 2 feet high, called rumba; others larger and barrel-shaped, called matabán. (Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 259.) For the modern manufacture, see Scott, Gardener of Upper Burma, 1900, Pt. i. vol. ii. 399 seq.

c. 1350.—"Then the Princess made me a present consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four rolls of cordial syrup, and four Martabans, or huge Jars, filled with pepper, citron, and mango, all prepared with salt, as for a sea-voyage."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 253.

1503.—"The lac (lacre) which your Highness desired me to send, it will be a piece of good luck to get, because these ships depart early, and the vessels from Pegu and Martaban come late. But I hope for a good quantity of it, as I have given orders for it."—Letter from the Viceroy Dora Francisco Alencara to the King. In Correa, i. 600.

1516.—"In this town of Martaban are made very large and beautiful porcelain vases, and some of glazed earthenware of a black colour, which are highly valued among the Moors, and they export them as merchandise."—Barbous, 185.

1598. "In this town many of the great earthen pots are made, which in India are called Martabanans, and many of them carried throughout all India, of all sorts both small and great, some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. The cause why so many are brought into India is for that they use them in every house, and in their ships instead of casks."—Linschoten, p. 36; (Hak. Soc. i. 101; see also i. 25, 26).

"The goods exported hitherward (from Pegu) are . . . glazed pots (called Martavans after the district where they properly belong), both large and little."—Ibid. v. 123.

1727.—"Martavan was one of the most flourishing Towns for Trade in the East. . . . They make earthen Ware there still, and glaze them with Lead ear. I have seen some Jars made there that could contain two Hogsheads of Liquor."—J. Hamilton, i. 63, ed. 1744, ii. 624.

1740.—"The Pay Master is likewise ordered . . . to look out for all the Pegu Jars in Town, or other vessels proper for keeping water."—In Walker, iii. 194.

Such jars were apparently imitated in other countries, but kept the original name. Thus Bailhe Frézier says that "certain jars called Martaban were manufactured in Oran."—Journey into Maroccan, 18.

MARTIL, MARTOL. s. A hammer. Hind martol, from Port. martella, but assisted by imaginary connection with Hind mār-nā, 'to strike.'

MARTINGALE. s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martingale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, Littre gives chauses à la martingale as meaning "culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière," and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Ménage, is from Martiques in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skeat seems to accept these explanations. [But see his Concise Dict., where he inclines to the view given in this article, and adds: "I find Arab. rataka given by Richardson as a verbal root, whence ratak, going with a short quick step." But there is a Span. word al-martaga, for a kind of bridle, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab. rataka, "qui, à la 1^{re} forme signifie 'effecit ut brevibus assibus incederet.'" This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabia direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Span. word from al-mirta'a, 'a halter.'

MARWÁREE, n.p. and s. This word Mārwaṛī, properly a man of the Mārwaṛ [Skt. maru, 'desert'], or Jodhpur country in Rājputāna, is used in many parts of India as synonymous with Banya (see BANYAN) or Sowcar, from the fact that many of the traders and money-lenders have come originally from Mārwaṛ, most frequently Jains in religion. Compare the Lombard of medieval England, and the caorsino of Dante's time.

[1826—"One of my master's under-shoymen, Sewchund, a Marwarry."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 233.]

MARYACAR, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so called. Maryu Karar, or 'Mary's People.' [The word appears to be really marakkar, of which two explanations are given. Logan (Malabar, i. 332 note) says that Marakkar means 'doer or follower of the Law' (maraygam), and is applied to a foreign religion, like that of Christians and Mohammedans. The Madras Gloss. (iii. 474) derives it from Mal. marakkalam, 'boat,' and kar, a termination showing possession, and defines it as a "titular appellation of the Moplah Mahommedans on the S.W. coast."]

MASCABAR, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for 'the last day of the month,' quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 345. He suggests as its etymon Hind. mās-ke-ba'ad, 'after a month.' [In N. Indian public offices the māskabār is well known as the monthly statement of cases decided during the month. It has been suggested that it represents the Port. mes-acabar, 'end of the month'; but according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hind. māsik-īdar or mās-kāt-īdar.]

MASH, s. Hind. māsh, [Skt. māsha, 'a bean']; Phaseolus radiatus, Roxb. One of the common Hindu pulses. [See MOONG.]

MASKEE. This is a term in Chinese "pigeon," meaning 'never mind,' 'n'importe,' which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or ellipsis of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested. [Mr. Skent writes: "Surely this is simply Port. mas que, probably imported direct through Macao, in the sense of 'although, even, in spite of,' like French malgré. And this seems to be its meaning in 'pigeon':

"That nighty tim begin chop-chop,
One young man walkeo—no can stop.

Maskee snow, maskee ice'

He eally slag with chop ro nice—

Topside Galow!

'Ezcelloor,' in 'pigeon.'"]

MASULIPATAM, n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machhli-patan or Machhli-bandar, or simply Bander (see BUNDER, 2); and its name explained (Hind. machhli, 'fish') as Fish-town, [the Madras Gloss. says from an old tradition of a whale being stranded on the shore.] The etymology may originally have had such a connection, but there can be no doubt that the name is a trace of the Μαῖσολλα and Μαῖσώλου ποταμοῦ ἐκβολαὶ which we find in Ptolemy's Tables; and of the Masalla producing muslins, in the Periplus. [In one of the old Logs the name is transformed into Mesopotamia (J.R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 169). In a letter of 1605-6 it appears as Mesopotamya (Birdwood, First Letter Book, 72).

Ball*, i. 168].

1789.—"Masullipatam, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machilipatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago."—Note on Sir Munglherin, iii. 370.

c. 1790.—". . . cloths of great value . . . from the countries of Bengal, Bunnar, China, Kashmeer, Boorhanpoor, Mutchilputtun, &c."—Moor Hussain Ali, H. of Hydr Na'il, 353.

MATE, MATY, s. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a 'head-man,' the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see BEARER); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (qq.v.) (see JOMPON), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c., to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives metti as a distinct Malayalam word for an inferior domestic servant, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil mel, 'high']. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Āin, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar's establishment are styled respectively Mahaurat, Bhoi, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as metha, mentha, and meyda, 'an elephant-keeper or feeder.' But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mitra, 'associate, friend'! We have in Pali metta, 'friendship,' from Skt. mitra.

c. 1690.—"A meth fetches fodder and assists in caparisoning the elephant. Meths of all classes get on the march 1 dau daily, and at other times 3."—Āin, ed. Blochmann, i. 125.

1837.—"One mates."—See Letters from Madras, 105.

1872. — "At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them."—A Tree Reformer, ch vi.

1873.—"To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of one of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper" (of an elephant).—Nat. Rev. Sept. 6, 302.

MATRANEES, s. Properly Hind. from Pers. mihardni; a female sweeper (see MEHTAR). [In the following extract the writer seems to mean Bhathiydran or Bhathiydrin, the wife of a Bhathiydra or inn-keeper.

[1755.—". . . a handsome femi . . . where a number of people, chiefly women, called metrahnees, take up their abode to attend strangers on their arrival in the city."—Du Roy, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 401.]

MATROSS, s. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ.

matrose, Dutch matroos, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it. In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals, "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matrosses, and 2 Drummers." A definition of the Matross is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. It appears in the Establishment as given by Grose in 1801 (Military Antiq. i. 315). As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

[1800.—"A serjeant and two matrosses employed under a general committee on the captured military stores in Seringapatam."—Wellington Suppl. Desp. ii. 32 (Stanf. Dict.).]

Skt. mātra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be 9 mātru, inferior gold of 5 or 6 mātru.

MAUMLET, s. Domestic Hind. māmlat, for 'omelet'; [Māmlēt is 'marmalade'.]

MAUND, s. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. man, Mahr. man), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. Professor Sayce traces it (mana) back to the Accadian language.* But in any case it was the Babylonian name for ½ of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or mna of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the emna or amna of the Copts, the Hebrew māneh, the Greek μνᾶ, and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almena, and in old French almène, for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devic).

The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted man into mão, of which the English made maune, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund)* our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese mão, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 seers, each ser being divided into 16 chhiṭṭaks; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the ser varies. That of the standard ser is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82½ lbs. avoirdupois. The Bombay maund (or man) of 48 seers = 28 lbs.; the Madras one of 40 seers = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Ahmadnagar contained 64 seers, and was = 163½ lbs. This is the largest man we find in the 'Useful Tables.' The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and that = 18 lbs. 12 oz. 13 dr. The Persian Tabrizi man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shahi twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9½ dr.

"The Mena of Sarai makes in Genoa weight . . . lb. 6 oz. 2
The Mena of Organci (Urghany) . . . lb. 3 oz. 9
in Genoa . . .
The Mena of Oltrarre (Ohār) . . . lb. 3 oz. 9
in Genoa . . .
The Mena of Armalecho (Al-maligh) in Genoa . . . lb. 2 oz. 8
The Mena of Cameau (Kancheu in N.W. China) . . . lb. 2" Pegolotti, 4.

1563.—"The value of stones is only because people desire to have them, and because they are scarce, but as for virtues, those of the loadstone, which staunches blood, are very much greater and better attested than those of the emerald. And yet the former sells by maos, which are in Cambay . . . equal to 26 arratels each, and the latter by rahis, which weigh 3 grains of wheat."—Garcia, i. 159.

1593.—"They have another weight called Mao, which is a Hand, and is 12 pounds."—Linschoten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1610.—"He was found . . . to have sixtie maunes in Gold, and every maune is five and hittle pound weight."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 218.

1611.—"Each maund being three and thirtie pound English weight."—Middleton, ibid. i. 270.

[1645.—"As for the weights, the ordinary mand is 69 livres, and the livre is of 16 onces; but the mand, which is used to weigh indigo, is only 53 livres. At Surat you speak of a seer, which is 1½ livres, and the livre is 16 onces."—Tavernier, ed. Bull, i. 38.]

c. 1665.—"Le man pese quarante livres par toutes les Indes, mais ces livres ou seers sont diferentes selon les Pais."—Thévenot, v. 54.

1673.—"A Lumbree (Sconce) of pure Gold, weighing about one Maund and a quarter, which is Forty-two pounds."—Fryer, 78.

"The Surat Maund . . . is 40 Seer, of 20 Pice the Seer, which is 37½.

The Pucka Maund at Agra is double as much, where is also the Ecbarry Maund which is 40 Seer, of 30 Pice to the Seer. . . ."

Ibid. 205.

1683.—"Agreed with Chittur Mulsaw and Muttradas, Merchants of this place (Hugly), for 1,500 Bales of ye best Tissinda Sugar, each bale to weigh 2 Maunds, 6½ Seers, Factory weight."—Hedges, Dia'y, April 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 75].

1711.—"Sugar, Coffee, Tutanague, all sorts of Drugs, &c., are sold by the Maund Tabrees; which in the Factory and Custom house is nearest 6¾. Avoidupoiz. . . .

 Etatables, and all sorts of Fruit . . . &c. are sold by the Maund Copara of 7¾. . . .
 The Maund Shaw is two Maunds Tabrees, used at Ispahan."—Lockyer, 230.

c. 1760.—Grose says, "the maund they weigh their indicos with is only 53 lb." He states the maund of Upper India as 69 lb.; at Bombay, 28 lb.; at Goa, 14 lb.; at Surat, 37½ lb.; at Coromandel, 25 lb.; in Bengal, 75 lb.

1854.—" . . . You only consent to make play when you have packed a good maund of traps on your back."—Life of Lord Lawrence, i. 433.

MAYLA, s. Hind. mela, 'a fair,' almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the medieval fairs in Europe. The word is Skt. mela, melaka, 'meeting, concourse, assembly.'

[1832.—"A party of foreigners . . . wished to see what was going on at this far-famed maylah. . . .—Mrs. Meer Havan Ali, Observations, ii. 321-2.]

1869.—"Le Mela n'est pas précisément une foire telle que nous l'entendons; c'est le nom qu'on donne aux réunions de pèlerins et des marchands qui . . . se rendent dans les lieux considérés comme sacrés, aux fêtes de certains dieux indiens et des personnages réputés saints parmi les musulmans."— Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. p. 26.

MAZAGONG, MAZAGON, n.p.
 A suburb of Bombay, containing a large Portuguese population. [The name is said to be originally Maheśa-grāma, 'the village of the Great Lord,' Siva.]

1643.—

"Mazaguão, por 15,000 federos, Monbaym (Bombay), por 15,000."
S. Botelho, Tombo, 149.

1044.—"Going up the stream from this town (Mombaym, i.e. Bombay) some 2 leagues, you come to the aldea of Maza-gam."—Bocarro, MS. f. 227.

1673.—" . . . for some miles together, till the Sea break in between them; over against which lies Massegoun, a great Fishing Town. . . . The Ground between this and the Great Breach is well ploughed and bears good Baty. Here the Portugals have another Church and Religious House belonging to the Franciscans."—Fryer, p. 67.

[MEARBAB, s. Pers. mīrbāhr,
 'master of the bay,' a harbour-master.
Mīrbāhrī, which appears in Botelho (Tombo, p. 56) as mirabary, means 'ferry dues.'

[1675.—"There is another hangs up at the daily Waiters, or Meerbar's Choultry, by the Landing-place. . . ."—Fryer, 96.]

[1682.—" . . . ordering them to bring away ye boat from ye Meambar."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 34.]

MECKLEY, n.p. One of the names of the State of Munneepore.

MEEANA, MYANNA, s. H.—P. mīyāna, 'middle-sized.' The name of a kind of palankin; that kind out of which the palankin used by Europeans has been developed, and which has been generally adopted in India for the last century. [Buchanan Hamilton writes: "The lowest kind of palanquins, which are small litters suspended under a straight bamboo, by which they are carried, and shaded by a frame covered with cloth, do not admit the passenger to lie at length, and are here called miyana, or Mahapa.
 In some places, these terms are considered as synonymous, in others the Miyana is open at the sides, while the Mahapa, intended for women, is surrounded with curtains." (Eastern India, ii. 426).] In Williamson's Vaide
Mecum (i. 319) the word is written Mohannah.

1781.—" . . . an entire new myannah, painted and gilt, lined with orange silk, with curtains and bedding complete."—In Ston-Karr, i. 49.

"Patna common chairs, couches and teapoy's, two Mahana palanquins."— Ibid. 62.

1793.—"To be sold . . . an Elegant New Bengal Meana, with Hair Bedding and furniture."—Bombay Courier, Nov. 2.

1795.—"For Sale, an Elegant Fashionable
 New Meanna from Calcutta."—Ibid. May 16.

MEERASS, s., MEERASSY, adj., MEERASSIDAR, s. 'Inheritance,' 'hereditary,' 'a holder of hereditary property.' Hind. from Arab. mīrās, mīrāsī, mīrāsīdār; and these from waris, 'to inherit.'

1803.—"Every meerassdar in Tanjoro has been furnished with a separate pottah (q.v.) for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812.—"The term meerasssee . . . was introduced by the Mahomedans."—Ibid.
 136.

1877.—"All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years' absence."—Mendocis Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

"I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasdar's,—that is, persons who hold their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.

MEHAUL, s. Hind. from Arab. malall, being properly the pl. of Arab. malall. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Walton may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of malall (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, malah) is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. malah (also written in the vernacular malah and malah) is often used for a palace or important edifice, see SHISH-MUHULL, TAJ MAHAL.

MEHTAR, s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengal Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mehtar (Lat. mehtar), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consolation, as the domestic tailor is called caleefa. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. His wife is the Matrance. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars beating each other as Malahs. In Persia the mental application of the word seems to be different (see below). The same class of servant is usually called in W. India Phangi (see BUNGY), a name which in Upper India is applied to the caste generally and specially to the eunot in the service of Europeans. [Examples of the word used in the honorific sense will be found below.]

c. 1800.—"Maitre." See under BUNOW.

1810.—"The mater, or sweeper, is considered the lowest mental in every family."—Williams, F. M. I. 276-7.

1823.—". . . besides many mehtars or stable-boys."—Haji Baba in England, l. 60.

[In the honorific sense:]

1821.—"In each of the towns of Central India, there is . . . a mehtar, or head of every other class of the inhabitants down to the lowest."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. l. 155.

1850.—"On the right bank is the fort in which the Miltar or Kid-shih, for he is known by both titles, resides."—Bidduph, Tales of the Bidden Koot, 61.]

MELINDE, MELINDA, n.p. The name (Melinda or Mulindi) of an Arab town and State on the east coast of Africa, in S. lat. 3° 0'; the only one at which the expedition of Vasco da Gama had amicable relations with the people, and that at which they obtained the pilot who guided the squadron to the coast of India.

c. 1498.—"Melinde, a town of the Zangl, . . . is situated on the seashore at the mouth of a river of fresh water. . . . It is a large town, the people of which . . . draw from the sea different kinds of fish, which they dry and trade in. They also process and work mines of iron."—Elm (Jouart), l. 60.

c. 1520.—See also Melinda, by Ercizet, li. 297.

1805.—"And that same day at sundown we cast anchor and sailed up to a place which is called Melinde, which is 20 leagues from Mombasa. . . . On Easter Day it was those whom we held prisoners, told us that in the said town of Melinde were eleven four ships of Christians, who were Indians, and that if we desired to take them they would give us, instead of those others, Christian Pilots."—Relation of Vasco da Gama, l. 423.

1851.—"As the King of Melinde pays no tribute, nor is there any reason why he should, consider me the many tokens of friendship we have received from him, both on the first discovery of these countries, and to this day, and which in my spirit I we repay very badly, by the ill treatment which he has from the Captains who go on service to this Coast."—See de Baltha, T. 160, 17.

c. 1570.—"Di Chinal di negottia ando per la costa de Melindi in Ethiopia."—Couto de Fozza in Barrore, iii. 795.

1572.—

"Quando el गया a festa a quella parte Onde era Melinde feto via,
He tel he adeuada, e leda de arte;
Que beta mostra estimar a varca dia
Trame a bandeira, ou o estandarte,
A cor purpura a ao lio apparecia,
Seem as atandares, e pandeiras;
E ao entravarem ledo e guerreiros."—Couto, ii. 73.

By Burton:

"At such a time the Squadron neared the port where first Melinde's gaily shroun unseen, in awnings dress and prink with gallant art, to show that none the Holy Day misween: Flutter the flags, the streaming Estandart gleams from afar with gorgeous purple sheen, tom-toms and timbrels mingle martial jar; thus past they forwards with the pomp of war."

1610.—P. Texeira tells us that among the "Moors" at Ormuz, Albuquerque was known only by the name of Malandy, and that with some difficulty he obtained the explanation that he was so called because he came thither from the direction of Melinde, which they call Maland.—Relacion de los Reyes de Harmuz, 45.

[1823.—Owen calls the place Maleenda and gives an account of it.—Narrative, i. 399 sepp.]

1859.—"As regards the immigration of the Wagemu (Ajemi, or Persians), from whom the ruling tribe of the Wasawahili derives its name, they relate that several Shaykhs, or elders, from Shiraz emigrated to Shangaya, a district near the Ozi River, and founded the town of Mallindi (Melinda)."—Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 51.

MELIQUE VERIDO, n.p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 15th century, on the decay of the Bāhnani kingdom. The name represents 'Malik Barid.' It was apparently only the third of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of ('Ali) Barid Shāh.

1533.—"And as the folomniā (?) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Yzam Maluco (Nizamaluco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Decanin, that lies between the Balgata and Camhaya) . . . that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions."—Corra, iii. 614.

1563.—"And these regents . . . concerted among themselves . . . that they should seize the King of Daquem in Badar, which is the chief city and capital of the Decan; so they took him and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salaam (salama) at certain days of the year. . . . The Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian, as I have heard on sure authority."—Garcia, i. 35 and 35v.

c. 1601.—"About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultan Dāniyāl, reporting that (Malik) Ambar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid."—Indyat Ullah, in Elliot, vi. 104.

MEM-SAHIB, s. This singular example of a hybrid term is the usual respectful designation of a European married lady in the Bengal Presidency; the first portion representing ma'am. Madam Sahib is used at Bombay; Doresani (see DORAY) in Madras. (See also BURRA BEEBEE.)

MENDY, s. Hind. mehndi, [mehndi, Skt. mendhika]; the plant Lawsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is the plant whose leaves afford the henna, used so much in Mahommedan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehndi is, according to Royle, the Cyprus of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the camphire of Canticles i. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cyprus for cyprus.

[1813.—"After the girls are betrothed, the ends of the fingers and nails are dyed red, with a preparation from the Mendey, or henna shrub."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 55; also see i. 22.]

c. 1817.—". . . his house and garden might be known from a thousand others by their extraordinary neatness. His garden was full of trees, and was well fenced round with a ditch and minney hedge."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, p. 71.

MERCALL, MARCÁL, s. Tam. marakkal, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was = 12 seers of grain. [Also known as toom.] Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and = $\frac{1}{16}$ of a garce (q.v.).

1551.—(Negapatam) "Of ghee (mantriga) and oil, one mercac is = $\frac{2}{3}$ canadas" (a Portuguese measure of about 3 pints).—A. Nunes, 36.

1803.—". . . take care to put on each bullock full six mercalls or 72 seers."—Wellington Disp., ed. 1837, ii. 85.

MERGUI, n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of Lower Burma with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824-26. The name is probably of Siamese origin; the town is called by the Burmese Beit (Sir A. Phayre).

1563.—"Tenasseri la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Sion, posta infra terra due o tre marce sopra un gran fumo . . . ed ouo il fumo entra in mare o vna villa chiamata Mergi, nel porto della quale ogn' anno si caricano alcune navi di vino (see BRAZIL-wood and SAPPAN-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di bezarin (see BENJAMIN), o qualche poco di garofalo, macis, noel. . . ."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 327v.

[1727.—"Merjee." See under TENASERIM.]

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE, s. Euphorbia Tirucalli, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.

c. 1590.—"They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the zeloom (zalkum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Ayren, ed. Gladius, ii. 68; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 239].

[1773.—"Milky Hedge. This is rather a shrub, which they plant for hedges on the coast of Coromandel. . . ."—Ives, 462.]

1780.—"Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used . . . when squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . . A horse will have his head and eyes prodigiously swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."—Munro's Narr. 80.

1879.—

"So saying, Buddha
Silently laid aside sandals and staff, His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand. . . ."

Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

c. 1886.—"The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charcoal from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M.-Gen. R. H. Kington.

MINCOPIE, n.p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lieut. Colebrooke in vol. iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained. [Mr. Man (Proc. Anthropol. Institute, xii. 71) suggests that it may have been a corruption of the words min kaich! 'Come here!']

MINICOY, n.p. Minikai; [Logan (Malabar, i. 2) gives the name as Menakayat, which the Madras Gloss. derives from Mal. min, 'fish,' kayam, 'deep pool.' The natives call it Mahiku (note by Mr. Gray on the passage from Pyrard quoted below).] An island intermediate between the Maldivé and the Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Maldivian. The population in 1871 was 2800. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse was in 1883 erected on the island. This is probably the island intended for Mulkee in that ill-edited book the E.T. of Tuhfat al-Mujahidin. [Mr. Logan identifies it with the 'female island' of Marco Polo. (Malabar, i. 287.)]

MISCALL, s. Ar. misāl (mīḥlāl, properly). An Arabian weight, originally that of the Roman aureus and the gold dīnār; about 73 grs.

c. 1340.—"The prince, violently enraged, caused this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mīthkals of gold. This anecdote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shihābuddin, in Not. et Ext., xiii. 192.

1502.—"Upon which the King (of Sofala) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call pingo, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 res, and gave for the King another that weighed 3000 maticals. . . ."—Correa, i. 274.

MISREE, s. Sugar candy. Misri, 'Egyptian,' from Misr, Egypt, the Misraim of the Hebrews, showing the original source of supply. [We find the Misri or 'sugar of Egypt' in the Arabian Nights (Burton, xi. 396).] (See under SUGAR.)

1810.—"The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of miscery, bears a price suited to its quality. . . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 134.

MISSAL, s. Hind. from Ar. misāl, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court. [The word is also used in its original sense of a 'clan.']

[1861.—"The martial spirit of the Sikhs thus aroused . . . formed itself into clans or confederacies called Misals. . . ."—Cave-Brown, Punjab and Delhi, i. 368.]

MOBED, s. P. mubid, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlvi magb-pat, 'Lord Magus.'

[1616.—"The rites ordained by the chief Mobuds are still observed."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ed. 1820, i. 499.]

MOCUDDUM, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddam, 'præpositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realisation of the revenue (see LUMBERDAR); to the local head of a caste (see CHOWDRY); to the head man of a body of peons or of a gang of labourers (see MATE), &c. &c. (See further detail in Wilson). Colarruvias (Tesoro de la Lengua Castellana, 1611) gives Almocaden, "Capitan de Infanteria."

c. 1347.—"... The princes invited... the tandail (see TINDAL) or mukaddam of the crew, and the sipahsitar or mukaddam of the archers."—Jin Baidia, iv. 250.*

1538.—"O Mocadão da mazmorra q em o carcereiro d'aquella prisão, tanto q os rio mortos, dou logo rebate di-ao no Guanzil da justiça. . . ."—Pinto, cap. vi.

"The Taylor, which in their language is called Mocadan, repairing in the morning to us, and finding our two companions dead, goes away in all haste therewith to acquaint the Guanzil, which is as the Judge with us."—Cogan's Travels, p. 8.

1554.—"E a hum naique, com roys pites (peons) e hum mocadão, com roys tochas, hum boy de sombreiro, dous mainatos," &c.—Baltho, Tombo, 57.

1567.—"... furthermore that no infidel shall serve as scrivener, shroff (zarrafo) mocadum (mocadão), naique (see NAIK), peon (pião) parpatrim (see PARBUTTY), collector of dues, corregidor, interpreter, procurator or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge in which he can in any way hold authority over Christians."—Decree of the Sacred Council of Goa, Dec. 27. In Arch. Port. Orient. fascie. 4.

[1598.—"... a chief Bateson . . . which they call Mocadon."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 207.

[c. 1610.—"They call these Lascarys and their captain Moncadon."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 117.

* This passage is also referred to under NACODA. The French translation runs as follows:—"Cette princeps invite . . . le tandail ou général des piétons, et le sipahsitar ou général des archers." In answer to a query, our friend, Prof. Robertson Smith, writes: "The word is rifil, and this may be used either as the plural of rifil 'man,' or as the pl. of rifil, 'piéton.' But foreman, or 'præpositus' of the 'men' (mukaddam) is not well rendered 'général'; it is just as possible. And, if possible, much more reasonable. Dulaunier (J. A. ser. iv. tom. ix.) renders rifil here 'sailors.' See the article TINDAL; and see the quotation under the present article from Bocarro 318.

[1615.—"The Generall dwelt with the Makadow of Swally."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 45; comp. Dauvers, Letters, i. 234.]

1644.—"Each vessel carries forty mariners and two mocadons."—Bocarro, MS.

1672.—"Il Mucadamo, così chiamano li Padroni di questo barcho."—P. Vincenz. Maria, 3rd ed. 459.

1680.—"For the better keeping the Boatmen in order, resolved to appoint Black Tom Muckadum or Master of the Boatmen, being Christian as he is, his wages being paid at 70 fanams per mens-em."—Fort St. Geo. Conen., Dec. 23, in Notes and Exts. No. iii. p. 42.

1870.—"This headman was called the Mokaddam in the more Northern and Eastern provinces."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 163.

MOCUDDAMA, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddama, 'a piece of business,' but especially 'a suit at law.'

MODELLIAR, MODLIAR, s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste title, assumed by certain Tamil people who styled themselves Sudras (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. mudaliyiti, muthaliyār, an honorific pl. from mudali, muthali, 'a chief.'

c. 1350.—"When I was staying at Columbum (see QUILON) with the Christian chiefs who are called Modilhal, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me . . ."—John de Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., ii. 381.

1522.—"And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made, in which they found part of the bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tani (Tamil) mudoliyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.'"—Corra, ii. 726.

1541.—"... apud Prasæctum locis illis quom Mudoliarem vulgo nuncupant."—S. Fr. Xaverii Epistolæ, 129.

1607.—"On the part of Dom Fernando Modeliar, a native of Ceylon, I have received a petition stating his services."—Letter of K. Philip III. in L. das Monções, 135.

1616.—"These entered the Kingdom of Candy . . . and had an encounter with the enemy at Matale, where they cut off five-and-thirty heads of their people and took certain araches and modiliars who are chiefs among them, and who had . . . deserted and gone over to the enemy as is the way of the Chingulas."—Bocarro, 495.

1618.—"The 6 August followed from Candy the Modeliar, or Great Captain . . .

in order to inspect the ships."—T'ar Spilbergen's Voyage, 33.

1685.—"The Modeliares . . . and other great men among them put on a shirt and doublet, which those of low caste may not wear."—Ribeiro, f. 46.

1708.—"Mon Révérend Père. Vous êtes tellement accoutumé à vous mêler des affaires de la Compagnie, que non obstant la prière que je vous ai réitérés plusieurs fois de nous laisser en repos, je ne suis pas étonné si vous prenez parti dans l'affaire de Lazaro ci-devant courtier et Modeliar de la Compagnie."—Norbert, Mémoires, i. 274.

1726.—"Modelyaar. This is the same as Captain."—Valenty'n (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 9.

1810.—"We . . . arrived at Barbareen about two o'clock, where we found that the provident Modeliar had erected a beautiful rest-house for us, and prepared an excellent collation."—Maria Graham, 93.

MOFUSSIL, s., also used adjectively, "The provinces,"—the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from 'the Presidency'; or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contra-distinguished from the sudder or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities. Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Mofussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Mofussil, he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India. The word (Hind. from Ar.) mufassal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as mufassal 'addlat, a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of Too Clever by Half, &c., and endured for many years.

1781.—". . . a gentleman lately arrived from the Moussele," (plainly a misprint).—Jicky's Bengal Gazette, March 31.

"A gentleman in the Mofussil, Mr. P., fell out of his chaise and broke his leg. . . ."—Ibid., June 30.

1810.—"Either in the Presidency or in the Mofussil. . . ."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 499.

1836.—". . . the Mofussil newspapers which I have seen, though generally disposed to cavil at all the acts of the Government, have often spoken favourably of the measure."—T. B. Macaulay, in Life, &c. i. 399.

MOGUL, n.p. This name should properly mean a person of the great nomad race of Mongols, called in Persia, &c., Mughals; but in India it has come, in connection with the nominally Mongol, though essentially rather Turk, family of Baber, to be applied to all foreign Mahommedans from the countries on the W. and N.W. of India, except the Pathāns. In fact these people themselves make a sharp distinction between the Mughal Irānī, of Pers. origin (who is a Shīah), and the M. Tūrānī of Turk origin (who is a Sunni). Beg is the characteristic affix of the Mughal's name, as Khān is of the Pathān's. Among the Mahommedans of S. India the Moguls or Mughals constitute a strongly marked caste. [They are also clearly distinguished in the Punjab and N.W.P.] In the quotation from Baber below, the name still retains its original application. The passage illustrates the tone in which Baber always speaks of his kindred of the Steppe, much as Lord Clyde used sometimes to speak of "confounded Scotchmen."

In Port. writers Mogol or Mogor is often used for "Hindustān," or the territory of the Great Mogul.

1247.—"Terra quondam est in partibus orientis . . . quae Mongal nominatur. Haec terra quondam populos quatuor habuit: unus Yeka Mongal, id est magni Mongali. . . ."—Joannis de Plano Carpini, Hist. Mongalorum, 645.

1298.—". . . Mungul, a name sometimes applied to the Tartars."—Marco Polo, i. 276 (2nd ed.).

c. 1300.—"Ipsi verò dicunt se descendisse de Gog et Magog. Vnde ipsi dicuntur Mogoli, quasi corrupto vocabulo Magogoli."—Ricoldus de Monte Crucis, in Per. Quatvor, p. 118.

c. 1308.—"Ο δὲ Νογᾶς . . . ὅς ἐμα πλεῖστους δυνάμεων ἐξ ἐμογενῶν Τογάρων, οὗς αὐτοὶ Μουγουλλιοὺς λέγουσι, ἐξαποσταλῆς ἐκ τῶν κατὰ τὰς Κασπίας ἀρχόντων τοῦ γένους οὗς Κανιδας σπουδαίους,"—Georg. Pachymeres, de Mich. Palaeol., lib. v.

c. 1310.—“In the first place from Tana to Gintarchan may be 25 days with an ox-wagon, and from 10 to 12 days with a horse-wagon. On the road you will find plenty of Mocoels, that is to say of armed troopers.”—Pegolotti, on the Land Route to Cathay, in Cathay, &c., ii. 287.

1404.—“And the territory of this empire of Samarkand is called the territory of Mogalia, and the language thereof is called Mugalia, and they don't understand this language on this side of the River (the Oxus) . . . for the character which is used by those of Samarkand beyond the river is not understood or read by those on this side the river; and they call that character Mongali, and the Emperor keeps by him certain scribes who can read and write this Mogali character.”—Clavius, § ciii. (Comp. Markham, 119-120.)

c. 1500.—“The Moghul troops, which had come to my assistance, did not attempt to fight, but instead of fighting, betook themselves to dismounting and plundering my own people. Nor is this a solitary instance; such is the uniform practice of these wretches the Moghuls; if they defeat the enemy they instantly seize the booty; if they are defeated, they plunder and dismount their own allies, and betide what may, carry off the spoil.”—Baber, 93.

1531.—“And whilst Badur was there in the hills engaged with his pleasures and luxury, there came to him a messenger from the King of the Mogores of the kingdom of Dely, called Bobur Mirza.”—Corræ, iii. 571.

1536.—“Diets Mogores vel à populis Persarum Mogoribus, vel quod nunc Turko à Persis Mogores appellatur.”—Letter from K. John III. to Pope Paul III.

1555.—“Tartaria, otherwyse called Mongal, As Vincentius wryteth, is in that parte of the earth, where the East and the north joine together.”—W. Watreman, Fardle of Facions.

1563.—“This Kingdom of Dely is very far inland, for the northern part of it marches with the territory of Coraçon (Khorasan). . . . The Mogores, whom we call Tartars, conquered it more than 30 years ago. . . .”—Garcia, i. 31.

Blunderer, Description and use of Plancius his Mappe, in Eight Treatises*, ed. 1626, p. 647.]

c. 1650.—“Now shall I tell how the royal house arose in the land of the Monghol. . . . And the Ruler (Chingiz Khan) said, . . . ‘I will that this people Bëdd, resembling a precious crystal, which even to the completion of my enterprise hath shown the greatest fidelity in every peril, shall take the name of Kike (Blue) Monghol. . . .”—Sinang Setzen, by Schmidt, pp. 57 and 71.

1741.—“Ao mesmo tempo que a paz se ajustou entre os referidos generaes Mogor e Marata.”—Resumo das Possesões Portug. na Oriente—Documentos Comprobativos, iii. 21 (Lisbon 1853).

1761.—“Whatever Moguls, whether Ormies or Toormies, come to offer their services should be received on the foresaid terms.”—Paper of Articles sent to Major Munro by the Nawab, in Long, 360.

c. 1773.—“. . . the now-writers of Rai Droog frequently wrote to the Nawab . . . that the besieged Naik . . . had attacked the batteries of the besiegers, and had killed a great number of the Moghuls.”—H. of Hydr, 317.

1781.—“Wanted an European or Mogul Coachman that can drive four Horses in hand.”—India Gazette, June 30.

1800.—“I pushed forward the whole of the Mahratta and Mogul cavalry in one body. . . .”—Sir A. Wellesley to Munro, Munro's Life, i. 263.

1803.—“The Mogul horse do not appear very active; otherwise they ought certainly to keep the plunderies at a greater distance.”—Wellington, ii. 281.

In these last two quotations the term is applied distinctively to Hyderabad troops.

1855.—“The Moguls and others, who at the present day settle in the country, intermarrying with these people (Barnese Mahommedans) speedily sink into the same practical heterodoxies.”—Tule, Mission to Aia, 161.

MOGUL, THE GREAT, n.p. Sometimes ‘The Mogul’ simply. The name by which the Kings of Delhi of the House of Tinnur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grão Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy (q.v.), as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the ‘Great Turk’ applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one. As noticed under the preceding article, MOGOL, MOGOR, and also Mogolistan are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Mughal is thus used in the Araish-i-Mahfil below, and Mogolistan must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. (See quotations from Thevenot here and under MOHWA.)

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July 1863, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

MOHUR, GOLD, s. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Pers. mīhr, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin. It seems possible that the word is taken from mīhr, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circle on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Pullers). [Platts, on the contrary, identifies it with Skt. mudrā, 'a seal.']

The term mīhr, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahomedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghūrī Kings of Ghazni and their freedmen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratīs (see RUTTEE) of pure gold, or about 175 grains, thus equalling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called Rupree.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.* But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably; a deviation which seems to have commenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (1325-1351), who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the immemorial accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, inasmuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167.22 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1766, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 sicca rupees. The full weight of this coin was 170.66 grs., containing 149.72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 sicca rupees. The weight of this was 180.773 grs. (according to Regn. of 1793, 190-894), and it contained 190.086 grs. of gold. Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to fine silver, from the present rates of 1 to 14.801 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass current at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204.710 grs., containing fine gold 187.651 grs. Once more Art. xvii. of 1835 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with proportionate subdivisions) a gold mohur or "15 rupee piece" of the weight of 180 grs. troy, containing 165 grs. of pure gold; and declared also that no gold coin should thenceforward be a legal tender of payment in any of the territories of the E.I. Company. There has been since then no substantive change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohur was a corruption of gol, ('round') mohr, indicating a distinction from the square mohurs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

MOHURRUM, s. Ar. Muḥarram (sacer'), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahomedan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hassan and of his brother Husain (A.D. 669 and 680) and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashūrā', commonly however known in India as 'the Mohurrum.' men camp under the trees to collect them. And it is a common practice to sit perched on one of the trees in order to shoot the large deer which come to feed on the fallen mhowa. The timber is strong and durable." (Al.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge).

c. 1665.—"Les bornes du Mogolistan et de Golconde sont plantées à environ un lieu et demi de Calvar. Ce sont des arbres qu'on appelle Mahoua; ils marquent la dernière terre du Mogol."—Théracot, v. 200.

1810.—"... the number of shops where Taddy, Mowah, Pariah Atrach, &c., are served out, absolutely incalculable."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 153.

1814.—"The Mowah . . . attains the size of an English oak . . . and from the beauty of its foliage, makes a conspicuous appearance in the landscape."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 452; [2nd ed. ii. 261, reading Mawah].

1871.—"The flower . . . possesses considerable substance, and a sweet but sickly taste and smell. It is a favourite article of food with all the wild tribes, and the lower classes of Hindus; but its main use is in the distillation of ardent spirits, most of what is consumed being Mhowa. The spirit, when well made, and mellowed by age, is by no means of despicable quality, resembling in some degree Irish whiskey. The luscious flowers are no less a favourite food of the brute creation than of man. . . ." Forsyth, Highlands of C. India, 75.

MOLE-ISLAM, n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahommedans or quasi-Mahommedans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahimūd Bigarra, Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term. [In the E. Panjab the descendants of Jats forcibly converted to Islam are known as Mūla, or 'unfortunate' (Ibbetson, Panjab Ethnography, p. 142). The word is derived from the nakshatra or lunar asterism of Mūla, to be born in which is considered especially unlucky.]

[1803.—"Molo-Islams." See under GRASSIA.]

MOLEY, s. A kind of (so-called vel) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Malay'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malays.

[1885.—"Regarding the Ceylon curry. . . It is known by some as the 'Malay curry,' and it is closely allied to the moli of the Tamils of Southern India." Then follows the recipe.—Wyerne, Culinary Jottings, 5th ed., 209.]

MOLLY, or (better) MALLEE, s. Hind. mālī, Skt. mālīka, 'a garland-maker,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of "the Molly with his dolly," viz. of the mālī with his dālī.

1769.—In a Calcutta wages tariff of this year we find—

"House Molly . . . 4 Rs." In Long, 182.

MOLUCCAS, n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Tarndti), Tidore (Tidori), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. [See Mr. Gray's note on Pyramid de Lalat, Ind. Soc. ii. 166.] But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Amboyna, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz. Amboyna, Banda, Ternate and Mauido. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazīrat-al-Mulūk, 'The Isles of the Kings.'

Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Moluccos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject" (Deel, i. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:

"For what reason they have been called Moluccos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukke Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Congress of Geog. at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seqq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as Molokos, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolano, or King. "Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peu à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l'état même. A la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos." There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer's deductions and etymologies. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The islands appear to be mentioned in the Chinese history of the Tang dynasty (618-696) as Mi-li-ku, and if this be so the name is perhaps too old to be Arab."]"]

c. 1430.—"Has (Javas) ultra xv dierum cursu duos reperitur inculas, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellatur, in qua nuce muscatæ et mace; altera Bandani nomine, in qua sola garofali producentur."—N. Conti, in Poggius.

1501.—The earliest mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespucci (quoted under CANHAMEIRA), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral's fleet, mentions the Maluche Islands.

1510.—"We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse. . . . Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited."—Varthema, 216.

1514.—"Further on is Timor, whence comes sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Maluc, whence come the cloves. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers."—Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515.—"From Malacca ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nut (meg), sandalwood, and other rich things. They have discovered the five Islands of Cloves: two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the rod. 'Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us. . . . God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!"—Another letter of da. . ., ibid. pp. 85-86.

1516.—"Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluco, in which all the cloves grow. . . . Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Bachan, the second Maggian, the third is called Motil, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternaty. . . . every year the people of Maluca and Javu come to these islands to ship cloves. . . ."—Barboza, 201-202.

1521.—"Wednesday the 6th of November . . . we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery. . . . since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco."—Pigafetta, Voyage of Magellan, Hak. Soc. 121.

1553.—"We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and by land cut up into many thousand islands, these together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth. . . . and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco. . . . (These) five islands called Maluco. . . . stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues. . . . we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them five because in that number the clove grows naturally. . . . Moreover we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terceiras, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own."—Barros, III. v. 5.

" . . . li molti viaggi dalla città di Lisbona, o dal mar rosso a Calicut, et insino alle Molucche, dono nascono lo spezierie."—G. B. Ramusio, Pref. sopra il Libro del Magn. M. Marco Polo.

1685.—

"As when far off at sea a fleet descried
Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial wind
Close sailing from Bengala, or the Isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs. . . ."

Paradise Lost, ii. 636-640.

MONE, n.p. Môn or Mân, the name by which the people who formerly occupied Pegu, and whom we call Talaing, called themselves. See TALAING.

MONEGAR, s. The title of the headman of a village in the Tamil country; the same as padai (see PATEL) in the Deccan, &c. The word is Tamil mani yakutan, 'an overseer,' maniyam, 'superintendence.'

1707.—"Ego Petrus Manicaren, id est Villarum Inspector. . . ."—In Norbert, Mem. i. 390, note.

1717.—"Towns and villages are governed by inferior Officers . . . maniakaror (Mayors or Bailiffs) who hear the complaints."—Phillips, Account, &c., 83.

1800.—"In each Hobly, for every thousand Pagodas (335*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*) rent that he pays, there is also a Munegar, or a Tahsildar (see TAHSEELDAR) as he is called by the Mussulmans."—Buckanan's Mysore, &c., i. 276.

MONKEY-BREAD TREE, s. The Baobab, Adansonia digitata, L. "a fantastic-looking tree with immense elephantine stem and small twisted branches, laden in the rains with large white flowers; found all along the coast of Western India, but whether introduced by the Mahomedans from Africa, or by ocean-currents wafting its large light fruit, full of seed, across from shore to shore, is a nice speculation. A sailor once picked up a large seedy fruit in the Indian Ocean off Bombay, and brought it to me. It was very rotten, but I planted the seeds. It turned out to be Kigelia pinnata of E. Africa, and propagated so rapidly that in a few years I introduced it all over the Bombay Presidency. The Baobab however is generally found most abundant about the old ports frequented by the early Mahomedan traders" (Sir G. Birdwood, MS.) We may add that it occurs sparsely about Allalabad, where it was introduced apparently in the Mogul time; and in the Gangetic valley as far E. as Calcutta, but always planted. There are, or were, noble specimens in the Botanic Gardens at Calcutta, and in Mr. Arthur Grote's garden at Aliphar. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 105.]

MONSOON, s. The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Ar. mausim, 'season,' which the Portuguese corrupted into monção, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger's) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali. "The rationale of the term is well put in the Deirat Mohit, which says: 'Mausim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the mausim is the season of working with the silk,'—which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen." (W. R. S.)

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Cringle.* The Venetian, Leonardo Ca' Masser (below) calls the monsoons li tempa. And the quotation from Garcia De Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes moução, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual misreading of the written n for m. Linshoten in Dutch (1596) has monsoyn and monsoon (p. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 33]). It thus appears probable that we get our monsoon from the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French form mousson. [Prof. Skeat traces our monsoon from Ital. monzone.] We see below (Cs. Feder.) that Monsoon was used as synonymous with "the half year," and so it is still in S. India.

1505.—"Do qui passano el colfo de Colocut cho sono legho 800 do pacizo (i passaggio): aspettano li tempi cho sono nel principio dell' Autunno, e con lo colo fatto (i) passano."—Leonardo di Ca' Masser, 26.

[1512.—" . . . because the mauçam for both the voyages is at one and the same time."—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 30.]

1553.—" . . . and the more, because the voyage from that region of Malacca had to be made by the prevailing wind, which they call monção, which was now near its end. If they should lose eight days they would have to wait at least three months for the return of the time to make the voyage."—Barrow, Dec. II. liv. ii. cap. iv.

* "Don Ricardo began to fret andidget most awfully—"Beginning of the seasons"—why, we may not get away for a week, and all the ships will be kept back in their loading."—Ed. 1875, p. 209.

1554.—“The principal winds are four, according to the Arabs, . . . but the pilots call them by names taken from the rising and setting of certain stars, and assign them certain limits within which they begin or attain their greatest strength, and cease. These winds, limited by space and time, are called Mausim.”—The Mohit, by Sid. 'Ali Kapudân, in J. As. Soc. Beng. iii. 518.

“Be it known that the ancient masters of navigation have fixed the time of the monsoon (in orig. doubtless mausim), that is to say, the time of voyages at sea, according to the year of Yazdajird, and that the pilots of recent times follow their steps. . . .” [Much detail on the monsoons follows.]—Ibid.

1563.—“The season (monção) for these (i.e. mangoes) in the earlier localities we have in April, but in the other later ones in May and June; and sometimes they come as a reiotho (as we call it in our own country) in October and November.”—Garcia, f. 134r.

1568.—“Come s'arriva in vna città la prima cosa si piglia vna casa a fitto, ò per mesi ò per anno, seconda cho si disegna di starui, o nel Pegù ò costume di pigliarla per Moson, cioè per sei mesi.”—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 394.

1585-6.—“But the other goods which come by sea have their fixed season, which here they call Monção.”—Nassetti, in De Gubernatis, p. 201.

1599.—“Orn nell anno 1599, essendo venuta la Mansona a proposito, si messero alla vela due navi Portoghesi, le quali eran venute dalla città di Goa in Amacao (see MACAO).”—Carletti, ii. 206.

c. 1610.—“Ces Monssons ou Mueissons sont vents qui changent pour l'Esté ou pour l'Hiver de six mois en six mois.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 199; see also ii. 110; [Hak. Soc. i. 280; in i. 257 Monsoons; in ii. 175, 235, Mueissons].

[1615.—“I departed for Bantam having the time of the year and the opportunity of the Monthstone.”—Foster, Letters, iii. 268]

[“The Monthstone will else be spent.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 36.]

1616.—“... quos Lusitania patriâ voce Moncam indigetant.”—Jarric, i. 46.

“Sir T. Roe writes Monson.

1627.—“Of Corea hee was also told that there are many bogges, for which cause they have Waggones with broad wheelles, to keepe them from sinking, and observing the Monson or season of the wind . . . they have sayles fitted to these waggones, and so make their Voyages on land.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 602.

1634.—

“Partio, vendo que o tempo em vao gastava, E que a monção di navegar passava.”

Malaca, Conquistada, iv. 75.

1644.—“The winds that blow at Diu from the commencement of the change of season in September are sea-breezes, blowing from time to time from the S., S.W., or N.W., with no certain Monsam wind, and at that time one can row across to Diu with great facility.”—Bocarro, MS.

c. 1665.—“... and it would be true to say, that the sun advancing towards our Pole, causeth on that side two great regular currents, viz., that of the Sea, and that of the Air which maketh the Mounson-wind, as he causeth two opposite ones, when he returns towards the other Pole.”—Brenter, E.T. 139-40; [ed. Constable, 436; see also 109].

1673.—“The northern Monsoons (if I may so say, being the name imposed by the first Observers, i.e. Motlones) lasting hither.”—Fryer, 10.

“A constellation by the Portugals called Rabodel Elephanta (see ELEPHANTA, b.) known by the breaking up of the Monsoons, which is the last Flory this Season makes.”—Ibid. 48. He has also Monsoons or Monsoons, 46.

1690.—“Two Mussoons are the Ago of a Man.”—Bombay Proverb in Orcington's Voyag. 142.

[“Mussoons.” See under ELEPHANTA, b.]

1696.—“We thought it most advisable to remain here, till the next Monsoon.”—Boycar, in Dalrymple, i. 87.

1783.—“From the Malay word moossin, which signifies season.”—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 35.

“Their prey is lodged in England; and the cries of India are given to seas and winds, to be blown about, in every breaking up of the monsoon, over a remote and unhearing ocean.”—Burke's Speech on Fox's E.I. Bill, in Works, iii. 468.

[MOOBAREK, adj. Ar. mubārak, ‘blessed, happy’; as an interjection, ‘Welcome!’ ‘Congratulations to you!’]

[1617.—“... a present . . . is called Mombareck, good News, or good Success.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 413.

[1812.—“Bombareek . . . which by sailors is also called Bombay Rock, is derived originally from ‘moobarek,’ ‘happy, fortunate.’—Morier, Journey through Persia, 6.]

MOOCHULKA, s. Hind. muchalka or muchalka. A written obligation or bond. For technical uses see Wilson. The word is apparently Turki or Mongol.

c. 1267.—“Five days thereafter judgment was held on Husamuddin the astrologer, who had executed a muchalkai that the death of the Khalif would be the calamity of the world.”—Hammer's Golden Horde, 166.

c. 1280.—“When he (Kubilai Khan) approached his 70th year, he desired to raise in his own lifetime, his son Chimkin to be his representative and declared successor. . . . The chiefs . . . represented . . . that though the measure . . . was not in accordance with the Yasa and customs of the world-conquering hero Chinghiz Khan, yet they would grant a muchilka in favour of Chinkin's Khanship."—Ward's History, Germ. by Hammer, 46.

c. 1360.—"He shall in all divisions and districts execute muchilkas to lay no burden on the subjects by extraordinary imposts, and irregular exaction of supplies."—Form of the Warrant of a Territorial Governor under the Mongols, in the above, App. p. 463.

1818.—"You were present at the India Board when Lord B—— told me that I should have 10,000 pagodas per annum, and all my expenses paid. . . . I never thought of taking a muchilka from Lord B——, because I certainly never suspected that my expenses would . . . have been restricted to 500 pagodas, a sum which hardly pays my servants and equipage."—Munro to Malcolm, in Munro's Life, &c., iii. 257.

MOOCHY, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind. mochi. The name and caste are also found in S. India, Telug. muchche. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer's work, &c.

[1815.—"Cow-stealing . . . is also practiced by . . . the Mootchee or Shoemaker cast."—Tytler, Considerations, i. 103.]

MOOKTEAR, s. Properly Hind. from Ar. mukhtār, 'chosen,' but corruptly mukhtyār. An authorised agent; an attorney. Mukhtyār-nāma, 'a power of attorney.'

1860.—"I wish he had been under the scaffolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtars."—The Duck Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser's Mag. lxxiii. p. 218.

1878.—"These were the mookhtyars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtyars' house."—Life in the Mofussil, f. 90.

1885.—"The wily Bengali mukhtears, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 336.

MOOLLAH, s. Hind. mullā, corr. from Ar. maulā, a der. from wild, 'propinquity.' This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called maulā. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually 'a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.' In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Korān in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Korān, the servitor who held the book was called Mullā Korānī. Mullā is also in India the usual Mussulman term for 'a schoolmaster.'

1616.—"Their Moolahs employ much of their time like Scriveners to doo business for others."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

[1617.—"He had showed it to his Mulaies."—Sir T. Roe, Itak. Soc. ii. 417.]

1633.—"While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred mutter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Mollas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days. . . ."—Mandelslo, E.T. 63.

1673.—"At funerals, the Mullahs or Priests make Orations or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Alchoran."—Fryer, 91.

1680.—"The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cozzee (see CAZEE) Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per mensem, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c., in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company's servants as shall desire to learn it."—Fl. St. Gen. Consn. March 11. Notes and Ltr. No. iii. p. 12; [also see Pringle, Diary, Fl. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 2, with note].

1763.—"The Mulla in Indian superintend the practice, and punishes the breach of religious duties."—Orme, reprint, i. 26.

1809.—"The British Government have, with their usual liberality, continued the allowance for the Moolahs to read the Koran."—Id. Valentin, i. 423.

[1842.—See the classical account of the Moolahs of Kabul in Elphinstone's Caubul, ed. 1842, i. 231 seqq.]

1870.—". . . struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moola."—Sat. Rev. No. 1251, p. 484.

MOOLVEE, s. Popular Hind. mullā, Ar. maulā, from same root as mullā (see MOOLLAH). A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature. (See LAW-OFFICER.)

1784.—

"A Pundit in Bengal or Molaveo

May daily see a carcass burn;

But you can't furnish for the soul of ye

A dirgo eans ashes and an urn."

N. B. Halliell, see Cult. Review, xxvi. 79.

MOONAU, s. Hind. mund or mond (it seems to be in no dictionary); [Platts gives "Mund (dialec.). The Lophophorus Impeyanus, most splendid perhaps of all game-birds, rivalling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. "This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas, from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan" (Jerdon) "In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone" (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with Skt. muni, 'an eremite'?

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtedly refers to the Mund. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (tom. vii. p. 409 of ed. Ajasson de Grandsagne, Paris, 1830). It appears from Jerdon that Monaul is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Cerionis satyra, otherwise sometimes called 'Argus Pheasant' (q.v.).

c. A.D. 350.—"Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have a crest, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent into a curve (like a cock's), but flattened out. And this tail they trail after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. 2.

MOON BLINDNESS. This affection of the eyes is commonly believed to be produced by sleeping exposed to the full light of the moon. There is great difference of opinion as to the facts, some quoting experience as incontrovertible, others regarding the thing merely as a vulgar prejudice, without substantial foundation. Some remarks will be found in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 308-10. The present writer has in the East twice suffered from a peculiar affection of the eyes and face, after being in sleep exposed to a bright moon, but he would hardly have used the term moon-blindness.

MOONG, MOONGO, s. Or. 'green-gram'; Hind. mūṅg, [Skt. mudga]. A kind of vetch (Phaseolus Mungo, L.) in very common use over India; according to Garcia the mese (mūṣh?) of Avicenna. Garcia also says that it was popularly recommended as a diet for fever in the Deccan; [and is still recommended for this purpose by native physicians (Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 191)].

c. 1336.—"The munj again is a kind of mūṣh, but its grains are oblong and the colour is light green. Munj is cooked along with rice, and eaten with butter. This is what they call Kicheri (see KEDGEREE), and it is the diet on which one breakfasts daily."—Don Batuta, iii. 131.

1557.—"The people were obliged to bring hay, and corn, and mungo, which is a certain species of seed that they feed horses with."—Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 132.

1563.—"Servant-maid.—That girl that you brought from the Deccan asks me for mungo, and says that in her country they give it them to eat, husked and boiled. Shall I give it her?

"Orta.—Give it her since she wishes it; but bread and a boiled chicken would be better. For she comes from a country where they eat bread, and not rice."—Garcia, f. 145.

[1611.—". . . for 25 maunds Moong. 28m. 09 p."—Danvers, Letters, i. 141.]

MOONGA, MOOGA, s. Beng. mūṅg. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraea assama, collected and manufactured in Assam. ["Its Assamese name is said to be derived from the number munga, 'coral' colour of the silk, and is frequently used to denote silk in general" (B. G. Allen, Mono. on the Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899, p. 10).] The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles ("velleraque ut foliis depectunt tenuin Seres"); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thin into Gangetic India.

1626.—“... Moga which is made of the bark of a certain tree.”—Purchase, Pilgrimage, 1005.

c. 1676.—“The kingdom of Asem is one of the best countries of all Asia. . . . There is a sort of Silk that is found under the trees, which is spun by a Creature like our Silk-worms, but rounder, and which lives all the year long under the trees. The Silks which are made of this Silk glist'n very much, but they rot presently.”—Tavernier, U.T. ii. 187-8; [ed. Bell, ii. 291].

1680.—“The Florotta yarn or Musketta examined and priced. . . . The Agent informed ‘that twas called Arunder, made neither with cotton nor silke, but of a kind of Horla spun by a worme that feeds upon the leaves of a stalk or tree called Arunder which bears a round prickly berry, of which oyle is made; vast quantitys of this cloth is made in the country about Goora Ghant beyond Seriporo Mercha; where the wormes are kept as silke wormes here; twill never come white, but will take any colour.” &c.—Fr. St. Geo. Agent on Tour, Comen., Nov. 19. In Notes and Exts., No. iii. p. 68. Arandi or rundi is the castor-oil plant, and this must be the Attaca ricini, Jones, called in H. Arindi, Arindiaria (?) and in Bengali Eri, Eria, Erendy, according to Forbes Watson's Nomenclature, No. 8002, p. 371. [For full details see Allen, Mono. pp. 6, seqq.]

1763.—“No duties have ever yet been paid on Lacks, Munga-dutties, and other goods brought from Assam.”—In Van Sittart, i. 219.

c. 1778.—“... Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga dutties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade.”—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 174.

MOONSHEE, s. Ar. munshi, but written in Hind. munshi. The verb insha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means ‘to educate’ a youth, as well as ‘to compose’ a written document. Hence ‘a secretary, a reader, an interpreter, a writer.’ It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, though the application to a native aminuensis in those tongues, and to any respectable, well-educated native gentleman is also common. The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. “The Persian Moonshee, by F. Gladwyn,” 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1777.—“Moonshi. A writer or Secretary.”—Hathred, Code, 37.

1782.—“The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating . . . they reason and dispute with their munchees (tutors) in Persian and Moors. . . .”—Price's Tracts, i. 89.

1785.—“Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Munshi, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received.”—Tippoo's Letters, 67.

“A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonshee. . . . The Moonshee, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more substantial evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1000, on the plea that the latter (i.e. Shoro) had saved little.”—Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814.—“They presented mo with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durlar munseo.”—Foiles, Or. Mem. iii. 365; [2nd ed. ii. 344].

1817.—“Its authenticity was fully proved by . . . and a Persian Moonshee who translated.”—Mill, Hist. v. 127.

1825.—“... the great Moonshee of State himself had applied the whole of his genius to selecting such flowers of language as would not fail to diffuse joy, when exhibited in those dark and dank regions of the north.”—Haji Baba in England, i. 39.

1867.—“When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his rupees as a Moonshee, or a language-master, to that infidel people.”—Select Writings of Viscont Strangford, i. 265.

MOONSIFF, s. Hind. from Ar. munsi, ‘one who does justice’ (inshi), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1812.—“... munsis, or native justices.”—Fifth Report, p. 32.

[1852.—“I wonder, Mr. Deputy, if Providence had made you a Moonsiff, instead of a Deputy Collector, whether you would have been more lenient in your strictures upon our system of civil justice?”—Railas, Notes on the N.W. Provinces, 155.]

MOOR, MOORMAN, s. (and adj. MOORISH). A Mahomedan; and so from the habitual use of the term (Mouro), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahomedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahomedans were known as the Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Batuta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6). At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—“Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics.” But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Muslims of Mauritania who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahomedans were Moors. So the Mahomedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Mouros; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahomedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moors of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixed race, just as the Moplahs (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumāls of Magadoxo, the Arabs and Persians of Kalihāt and Ormuz, the Soras of Guzerat, are all Mouros to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moors of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boatmen of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahomedanism, Hinduism, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahomedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiery, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Muslim is still in common use. Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahomedans, or of a certain class of these. Moro is still applied at Manila to the Muslim Malay.

1498.—“... the Moors never came to the house when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, inasmuch that when any of us went ashore, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say ‘Portugal, Portugal.’”—Relatório de V. da Gama, p. 75.

“For you must know, gentlemen, that from the moment you put into port here (Calicut) you caused disturbance of mind to the Moors of this city, who are numerous and very powerful in the country.”—Correa, Hak. Soc. 163.

1499.—“We reached a very large island called Sumatra, where pepper grows in considerable quantities. . . . The Chief is a Moor, but speaking a different language.”—Santo Stefano, in India in the XVth Cent. [7].

1505.—“Adi 28 mçno vengo in Venetia insieme co Sier Alvise da Boni un selav moro el qual portorono i spagnoli da la insula spagniola.”—M.S. in Museo Civico at Venice. Here the term Moor is applied to a native of Hispaniola!

1513.—“Hanc (Malaccam) rex Maurus gubernabat.”—Emmanuelis Regis Epistola, f. 1.

1553.—“And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Frangue, they call in reproach the Christians of our parts of the world Frangues (see FIRINGHEE), just as we improperly call them again Moors.”—Barrow, IV. iv. 16.

c. 1560.—“When we lay at Fuquien, we did see certain Moors, who know so little of their sects that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moor, my father was a Moor, and I am a Moor.”—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Wille, in Hall, ii. 557.

1563.—“And as to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who know him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sin; and that the man never went further than Calicut and Cochin, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate.”—Garcia, f. 30.

1560.—“... always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moors, I mean Mahomets sects.”—Cæsar Frederic, in Hall, ii. 359.

1610.—“The King was fled for feare of the King of Makasar, who . . . would force the King to turne Moor, for he is a Gentile.”—Middleton, in Purchas, i. 239.

161.—“Les Mores du pay faisoient courir le bruit, que les notres avoient esté battus.”—Waghtel, H. des Indes, iii. 9.

1648.—“King Jangier (Jehangir) used to make use of a reproach: That one Portugues was better than three Moors, and one Hollander or Englishman better than two Portuguese."—Van Twist, 50.

c. 1665.—"Il y en a de Mores et de Gentils Rasputes (see RAJPOOT) parce que jo s'avois qu'ils servent mieux que les Mores qui sont superbes, and ne veulent pas qu'on se plaigne d'eux, quelque sottise ou quelque tromperie qu'ils fassent."—Theriot, v. 217.

1673.—"Their Crew were all Moors (by which Word hereafter must be meant those of the Mahometan faith) apparell'd all in white."—Fryer, p. 21.

"They are a Shame to our Sailors, who can hardly ever work without horrid Onths and hideous Cursing and Imprecations; and these Moormen, on the contrary, never set their Hands to any Labour, but that they sing a Psalm or Prayer, and conclude at every joint Application of it, 'Allah, Allah,' invoking the Name of God."—Ibid. pp. 55-56.

1685.—"We putt out a peece of a Red Ancient to appeare like a Moor's Vessel: not judging it safe to be known to be English; Our nation having lately gott an ill name by abusing ye Inhabitants of these Islands: but no boat would come neer us . . ." (in the Maldives).—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Mal. Soc. i. 190].

1688.—"Lascars, who are Moors of India."—Dampier, ii. 57.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was a Town of the Moors: Which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolators, Gentous or Rajpoots (see RAJPOOT)."—Dampier, i. 507.

1747.—"We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success chiefly depended on the assistance of the Moors, We were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from Ft. St. Geo. to the Court, May 2 (India Office MS. Records).

1752.—"His successor Mr. Godolhuo . . . even permitted him (Duplex) to continue the exhibition of those marks of Moorish dignity, which both Murza-jing and Salla-bad-jing had permitted him to display."—Orme, i. 367.

1757.—"In 1756, writing in this year, we constantly find the terms Moormen and Moorish, applied to the forces against which Clive and Watson were acting on the Hoogly.

1763.—"From those origins, time has formed in India a mighty nation of near ten millions of Mahomedans, whom Europeans call Moors."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 21.

1770.—"Before the Europeans doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Moors, who were the only maritime people of India, sailed from Surat and Bengal to Malacca."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 210.

1781.—"Mr. Hicky thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to inform his friends in particular, and the Public in General, that an attempt was made to Assassinate him last Thursday Morning between the Hours of One and two o'Clock, by two armed Europeans aided and assisted by a Moor-man. . . ."—Hicky's Dengal Gazette, April 7.

1784.—"Lieutenants Speediman and Rutledge . . . were bound, circumcised, and clothed in Moorish garments."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1797.—"Under the head of castes entitled to a favourable term, I believe you comprehend Brahmans, Moormen, merchants, and almost every man who does not belong to the Sudra or cultivating caste. . . ."—Minute of Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 17.

1807.—"The rest of the inhabitants, who are Moors, and the richer Gentous, are dressed in various degrees and fashions."—Ld. Minto in India, p. 17.

1829.—"I told my Moorman, as they call the Mussulmans here, just now to ask the drum-major when the mail for the Praduan (!) was to be made up."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed. p. 80.

1839.—"As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-rider,' and began to show off."—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

MOORA, s. Sea Hind. mūra, from Port, amūra, Ital. mura; a tack (Roe-buck).

MOORAH, s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. it would seem that mūdā and mudī are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and varying measure. But there is a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Mādī. [The Madras Gloss. gives mooda, Mal. mūta, from mātu, 'to cover,' "a fastening package; especially the packages in a circular form, like a Dutch cheese, fastened with wisps of straw, in which rice is made up in Malabar and Canara." The mooda is said to be 1 cubic foot and 1,116 cubic inches, and equal to 3 Kulsies (see CULSEY).]

1551.—"(At Bagaim) the Mura of batee (see BATTA) contains 3 candis (see CANDY), which (batee) is rice in the husk, and after it is stript it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—A. Nunes, p. 30.

[1611.—"I send your worship by the bearer 10 moracs of rice."—Danvers, Letters, i. 116.]

1813.—"Batty Measure.—

25 parahs make 1 moorah.*

4 candies..... " 1 moorah.*
Miliburn, 2nd ed. p. 143.

MOORPUNKY, s. Corr. of Marpunkhi, 'peacock-tailed,' or 'peacock-winged'; the name given to certain state pleasure-boats on the Gangetic rivers, now only (if at all) surviving at Murshidabad. They are a good deal like the Burmese 'war-boats,' see cut in Mission to Ara (Major Phayre's), p. 4. [A similar boat was the Perlechehra (Hind. fil-chehra, 'elephant-faced'). In a letter of 1784 Warren Hastings writes: "I intend to finish my voyage to-morrow in the felchehra" (Buteat, Lehors, 3rd ed. 201).]

1767.—"Charges Dewanny, viz. :—

"A few moorpunkkeys and boutahs (see BOLLAH) for the service of Mahomed Reza Khan, and on the service at the city some are absolutely necessary . . . 25,000 : 0 : 0."
—Dacca Accounts, in Long, 521.

1780.—"Another boat . . . very curiously constructed, the Moor-punky: these are very long and narrow, sometimes extending to upwards of 100 feet in length, and not more than 8 feet in breadth; they are always paddled, sometimes by 40 men, and are steered by a large paddle from the stern, which rises in the shape of a peacock, a snake, or some other animal."—Holger, 40.

[1785.—" . . . moor-punkees, or peacock-boats, which are made as much as possible to resemble the peacock."—Duany, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 150.]

MOORS, THE, s. The Hindustani language was in the 18th century commonly thus styled. The idiom is a curious old English one for the denomination of a language, of which 'broad Scots' is perhaps a type, and which we find exemplified in 'Malabars' (see MALABAR) for Tamil, whilst we have also met with Bengals for Bengali, with Indostans for Urdu, and with Turks for Turkish. The term Moors is probably now entirely obsolete, but down to 1830, at least, some old officers of the Royal army and some old Madras civilians would occasionally use the term as synonymous with what the former would also call 'the black language.' [Moors for Urdu was certainly in use among the old European pensioners at Chunar as late as 1892.]

Captain Hadley's orthography is on a detestable system. He writes chookerau, chookeree, for chhokra, chhokri ('boy, girl'); dolchinney for dal-chini ('cinnamon'), &c. His etymological ideas also are loose. Thus he gives shrimps = chinghra mutcher, 'fish with legs and claws,' as if the word was from chang (Pers.), 'a hook or claw.' Bigdor, 'a halter,' or as he writes, baug-doore, he derives from där, 'distance,' instead of dor, 'a rope.' He has no knowledge of the instrumental case with terminal ne, and he does not seem to be aware that ham and tum (hum and toom, as he writes) are in reality plurals ('we' and 'you'). The grammar is altogether of a very primitive and tentative character, and far behind that of the R. C. Missionaries, which is referred to s.v. HINDOSTANCE. We have not seen that of Schulz (1745) mentioned under the same.

1752.—"The Centinel was sitting at the top of the gate, singing a Moorish song."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 272.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country, you must at least have a smattering of the Language for few of the Inhabitants (except in great Towns) speak English. MOPLAH, s. Malayül. mutpillā. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Mahomedans of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so-called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton's Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misprinted as madilla. The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mut-pilla, 'mother's son,' as sprung from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women." Nelson, as quoted below interprets the word as 'bridegroom' (it should however rather be 'son-in-law').* Dr. Badger suggests that it is from the Arabic verb salaha, and means 'a cultivator' (compare the fellah of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic mu'abbar, 'from over the water.' No one of these greatly commends itself. [Mr. Logan (Malabar, ii. cxxiii.) and the Madras Glossary derive it from Mal. ma, Skt. māh, 'great,' and Mal. pillā, 'a child.' Dr. Gundert's view is that Māpilla was an honorary title given to colonists from MORT-DE-CHIEN, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of the 18th century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the governorship of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese mordexim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkani and Mahratti modachi, modshi, or modwashi, ‘cholera,’ from a Mahr. verb modnen, ‘to break up, to sink’ (as under infirmities, in fact ‘to collapse’). The Guzarati appears to be morchī or morachi.

[1504.—Writing of this year Correa mentions the prevalence of the disease in the Samorin's army, but he gives it no name. “Besides other illness there was one almost sudden, which caused such a pain in the belly that a man hardly survived 8 hours of it.”—Correa, i. 430.]

1543.—Correa's description is so striking that we give it almost at length: “This winter they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morxy, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and fowls, so that it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused as some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever could be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong poison; e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the ham and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead, with the eyes broken and the nails of the fingers and toes black, and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; inasmuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day . . . inasmuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people . . . and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of morexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the paunch was shrunk up like a hen's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather. . . .—Correa, iv. 288-289.

"Page.—Don Jeronimo sends to beg that you will go and visit his brother immediately, for though this is not the time of day for visits, delay would be dangerous, and he will be very thankful that you come at once.

"Orta.—What is the matter with the patient, and how long has he been ill?

"Page.—He has got morxi; and he has been ill two hours.

"Orta.—I will follow you.

"Ruano.—Is this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from? Tell me how it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it.

"Orta.—Our name for the disease is Collerica passio; and the Indians call it morxi; whence again by corruption we call it mordechi. . . . It is sharper here than in our own part of the world, for usually it kills in four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception, I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up ("curginosa"?) . . . bile, and died at last. Let us go and see this sick man; and as for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is."—Garcia, ii. 74v, 75.

1578.—"There is another thing which is useless called by them canarin, which the Canarin Brahman physicians usually employ for the collerica passio sickness, which they call morxi; which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less."—Acosta, Traciado, 27.

1598.—"There reigneth a sickness called Mordexijn which stealeth upon men, and handleth them in such sorte, that it weakeneth a man, and maketh him cast out all that he hath in his bodie, and many times his life withall."—Linschoten, 67; [Hak. Soc. i. 235; Morxi in ii. 22].

1599.—"The disease which in India is called Mordicin. This is a species of Colic, which comes on in those countries with such force and vehemence that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. It causes evacuations by stool or vomit, and makes one burst with pain. But there is a herb proper for the cure, which bears the same name of mordescin."—Carletti, 227.

1602.—"In those islets (off Aracan) they found bad and brackish water, and certain beans like ours both green and dry, of which they ate some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysentery, which in India they corruptly call mordexim, which ought to be morxis, and which the Arabs call sachata (Ar. hayat), which is what Rasis calls sahida, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse, with cold sweat, great inward fire, and excessive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomitings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (derrubada) that the patient seems like a dead man."—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

c. 1610.—"Il regne entre eux une autre maladie qui vient à l'improviste, ils la nomment Mordessin, et vient avec grande douleur des testes, et vomissement, et orient fort, et le plus souvent en meurent."—Fyrdar de Larai, ii. 19; [Hak. Soc. ii. 13].

1631.—"Pulvis ejus (Calumbac) ad scrap. unius pondus sumptus cholerae prodect, quam Mordexi incolae vocant."—Jac. Bontii, lib. iv. p. 43.

1638.—". . . celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordexin, qui tue subitement."—Mandelst, 265.

1648.—See also the (questionable) Voyages Fameux du Sieur Victor le Blanc, 76.

c. 1665.—"Les Portugais appellent Mordechin les quatre sortes de Coliques qu'on souffre dans les Indes ou elles sont frequentes . . . ceux qui ont la quatrième souffrent les trois maux ensemble, à savoir le vomissement, le flux de ventre, les extremes douleurs, et je crois que cette dernière est le Colera-Morbus."—Thevenot, v. 324.

1673.—"They apply Cauteris most unmercifully in a Mordisheen, called so by the Portugals, being a Vomiting with Looseness."—Fryer, 114.

[1674.—"The disease called Mordechi generally commences with a violent fever, accompanied by tremblings, horrors and vomitings; these symptoms are generally followed by delirium and death." Ho prescribes a hot iron applied to the soles of the feet. Ho attributes the disease to indigestion, and remarks bitterly that at least the prisoners of the Inquisition were safe from this disease.—Dellon, Relation de l'Inquisition de Goa, ii. ch. 71.]

1690.—"The Mordechine is another Disease . . . which is a violent Vomiting and Looseness."—Ovington, 350.

c. 1690.—Rumphius, speaking of the Jack-fruit (q.v.): "Non nisi vacuo stomacho edendus est, alias enim . . . plerumque oritur Pasmo Cholericum, Portugallis Mordexi dicta."—Herb. Amb., i. 106.

1702.—"Cette grande indigestion qu'on appelle aux Indes Mordechin, et que quelques uns de nos Français ont appelée Mort-de-Chien."—Lettres Edif., xi. 156.

Bluteau (s.v.) says Mordexim is properly a failure of digestion which is very perilous in those parts, unless the native remedy be used. This is to apply a thin rod, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705.—"Co mal s'appelle mort-de-chien."
—Lullier, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique :

1716.—"The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the Cholick, and what they call the Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron."—Act. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roque's Voyage to Arabin the Happy, &c., E.T. London, 1726, p. 155.

1727.—"... the Mordexin (which seizes one suddenly with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot)."—Valentin, v. (Malabar) 5.

c. 1760.—"There is likewise known, on the Malabar coast chiefly, a most violent disorder they call the Mordechin; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and tormina of the intestines, that it will often carry him off in 30 hours."—Gros, i. 250.

1763.—"This (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien."—Lind, Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778.—In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammatica Indostana, we find Mordechin, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hind. by the word badami, i.e. bad-hami, 'dyspepsia' (p. 99). The most common modern Hind. term for cholera is Arab. haizah. The latter word is given by Garcia de Orta in the form hachizu, and in the quotation from Couto as sachaka (?). Jahāngir speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Deccan, of haizah, in A.D. 1615 (see note to Elliot, vi. 316). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that haizah always means cholera. Thus Macpherson mentions that a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzib at Bijapur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khāfi Khān (Elliot, vii. 337) the general phrases ta'un and wabā are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781.—"Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien."—Curtis, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1782.—"Les indigestions appellées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent atteintes. . . ."—Sonnerat, i. 205. This author writes just after having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Flux aigu. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1783.—"A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 122.

1786.—"Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colic, called by the Indians shāni, mordexin and also Nircomben. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains . . . the consequence is that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fevers, and stupefaction; so that persons attacked with the disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day. . . . In the year 1782 this disease raged with so much fury that a great many persons died of it."—Fra Paulino, E.T. 409-410 (orig. see p. 353). As to the names used by Fra Paulino, for his Shani or Chian, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. sanni, 'convulsion, paralysis.' (Winslow in his Tamil Dict. specifies 13 kinds of sanni. Komben is explained as 'a kind of cholera or smallpox' (!); and nir-komben ('water-k.') as a kind of cholera or bilious diarrhoea.) Paulino adds: "La droga amara costa assai, e non si poteva amministrare a tanti miserabili che perivano. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillammo in Tāgara, o acqua vite di coco, molto storcio di cavalli (!), o l'amministrammo agl' infermi. Tutti quelli che prenderano questa guarivano."

1808.—"Mörchee or Mortshee (Guz.) and Midee (Mah.). A morbid affection in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage up and down, with intolerable tenesmus, or twisting-like sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbus of European synopsists, called by the country people in England (!) mortsheeh, and by others mord-du-chien and Maau des chienes, as if it had come from France."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author was, we presume, from his title of "Dr.," a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with :

1812.—"General M—— was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort de chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes."—Original Familiar Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1816, p. 237.

1813.—"Mort de chien is nothing more than the highest degree of Cholera Morbus."—Johnson, Infl. of Tropical Climate, 465.

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned, after Macpherson, in the next paragraph.

1780.—“I am once or twice a year (!) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien. . . .”—Impey to Dunning, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 339.

1781.—“The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons, 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days.”—Mickey's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as an epidemic or as sporadic disease, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name is given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Emboli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1517, the ships' crews were attacked by a pestima mulatin di fruso (virulent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these Giovanni himself, and two other Florentines (Vita, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 33). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goa pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1766, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of it as raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson, see the quotation of 1781 above). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearse, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst “death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described.” The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feby. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The paucity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr.

Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great recrudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Jan'y. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera, by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of these publications.

MORDEXIM, MORDIXIM, s. Also the name of a sea-fish. Bluteau says ‘a fish found at the Isle of Quixembe on the Coast of Mozambique, very like bogus (?) or river-pikes.’

MOSELLAY, n.p. A site at Shīrīz often mentioned by Hāfiz as a favourite spot, and near which is his tomb.

c. 1350.—

“Boy ! let yon liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
What'er the frowning recluses say ;
Tell them that Eden cannot show
A stream so clear as Roenahad ;
A bower so sweet as Mossellay.”

Hāfiz, rendered by Sir W. Jones.

1811.—“The stream of Rūknahīd murmured near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mossellā and the Tomb of Hāfiz.”—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 318.

1813.—“Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mossella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower.”—Macdonald Kinnaird's Persia, 62.

MOSQUE, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Ar. maqīd, ‘a place of worship,’ literally the place of sujūd, i.e. ‘prostration.’ And the probable course is this. Maqīd becomes (1) in Span. mezquita, Port. mesquita;^{*} (2)

^{*} According to Pymard mesquite is the word used in the Maldivé Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Egypt now; the older and probably the most widely diffused. [See Mr. Gray's note in Isak, Soc. ii. 417.]

Ital. meschita, moschea; French (old) mosquete, mosquée; (3) Eng. mosque. Some of the quotations might suggest a different course of modification, but they would probably mislead.

Appropos of masjid rather than of mosque we have noted a ludicrous misapplication of the word in the advertisement to a newspaper story. "Musjeed the Hindoo: Adventures with the Star of India in the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857." The Weekly Detroit Free Press, London, July 1, 1882.

1336. — "Corpusque ipsius perditissimi Pseudo-prophetæ . . . in civitate quæ Mecha dicitur . . . pro maximo sanctuario conservatur in pulchrâ ipsorum Ecclesiâ quam Mulsectet vulgariter dicunt."—Gul. de Boldensele, in Canini Thesaur. ed. Basnage, iv.

1381. — "Sonvi le mosquette, cioè ohiese de' Saraceni . . . dentro tutte bianche ed intonicate ed ingessate."—Frescobaldi, 29.

1643. — "And with the stipulation that the 5000 larin tangas which in old times were granted, and are deposited for the expenses of the mizquitas of Baçaim, are to be paid from the said duties as they always have been paid, and in regard to the said mizquitas and the prayers that are made in them there shall be no innovation whatever."—Treaty at Baçaim of the Portuguese with King Bador of Cambaya (Bahâdur Shâh of Guzernat) in S. Botelho, Tombo, 137.

1553. — ". . . but destined yet to unfurl that divine and royal banner of the Soldiery of Christ . . . in the Eastern regions of Asia, amidst the infernal mesquitas of Arabia and Persia, and all the pagodes of the heathenism of India, on this side and beyond the Ganges."—Barros, I. i. 1.

[1862. — ". . . I slept at a Musheed, or village house of prayer."—Brinckman, Rift in Cashmere, 78.]

MOSQUITO, s. A gnat is so called in the tropics. The word is Spanish and Port. (dim. of mosca, 'a fly'), and probably came into familiar English use from the East Indies, though the earlier quotations show that it was first brought from S. America. A friend annotates here: "Arctic mosquitoes are worst of all; and the Norfolk ones (in the Broads) beat Calcutta!"

It is related of a young Scotch lady of a former generation who on her voyage to India had heard formidable, but vague accounts of this terror of the night, that on seeing an elephant for the first time, she asked: "Will you be what's called a musquetæe?"

1539. — "To this misery was there ad-joined the great affliction, which the Flies and Gnats (por parte dos atadões e mosquitos), that coming out of the neighbouring Woods, bit and stung us in such sort, as not one of us but was gore blood."—Pinto (orig. cap. xxiii.), in Cogan, p. 29.

1582. — "We were oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fle, which in the Indian tongue is called Tiquari, and the Spanish call them Muskitos."—Miler Phillips, in Hall, iii. 564.

1584. — "The 29 Day we set Saile from Saint Johns, being many of vs stung before upon Shoare with the Muskitos; but the same night we tooke a Spanish Frigate."

Sir Richard Greeneville's Voyage, in Hakl. iii. 308.

1616 and 1673.—See both Terry and Fryer under Chints.

1662.—“At night there is a kind of insect that plagues one mightily; they are called Muscieten,—it is a kind that by their nose and sting cause much irritation.”—Suar, 68-69.

1673.—“The greatest Pest is the Mosquito, which not only whens, but domineers by its continual Hums.”—Fryer, 189.

1690.—(The Governor) “carries along with him a Peon or Servant to Fan him, and drive away the busie Flies, and troublesome Musketoes. This is done with the Hair of a Horse's Tail.”—Orington, 227-8.

1740.—“... all the day we were pestered with great numbers of muscatos, which are not much unlike the gnats in England, but more venomous. . . .”—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed., 1756, p. 46.

1764.—

“Mosquitos, sandflies, seek the sheltered roof,

And with full rage the stranger guest assail,

Nor spare the sportive child.”

—Granger, bk. i.

1833.—“Among rank weeds in deserted Bombay gardens, too, there is a large, speckled, unmusical mosquito, raging and importunate and thirsty, which will give a new idea in pain to any one that visits its haunts.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 27.

MOTURPHA, s. Hind. from Ar. muhṭarafa, but according to C. P. B. muhṭarifa; [rather Ar. muhṭarifa, muhṭarīf, ‘an artizan’]. A name technically applied to a number of miscellaneous taxes in Madras and Bombay, such as were called sayer (q.v.), in Bengal.

[1813.—“Mohterefa. An artificer. Taxes, personal and professional, on artificers, merchants and others; also on houses, implements of agriculture, looms, &c., a branch of the sayer.”—Gloss. 5th Report, s.v.

1826.—“... for example, the tax on merchants, manufacturers, &c. (called mohṭarfa). . . .”—Grant Duff, II. of the Mahrattas, 3rd ed. 356.]

MOULMEIN, n.p. This is said to be originally a Talaing name Mut-muoa-lem, syllables which mean (or may be made to mean) ‘one-eye-destroyed’; and to account for which a cock-and-bull legend is given (probably invented for the purpose): “Tradition says that the city was founded . . . by a king with three eyes, having an extra eye in his forehead, but that by the machinations of a woman, the eye in his forehead was destroyed. . . .” (Mason's Burmah, 2nd ed. p. 18). The Burmese corrupted the name into Maula-yaing, whence the foreign (probably Malay) form Maulmain. The place so called is on the opposite side of the estuary of the Salwin R. from Martaban (q.v.), and has entirely superseded that once famous port. Moulmein, a mere site, was chosen as the headquarters of the Tenasserim provinces, when those became British in 1826 after the first Burmese War. It has lost political importance since the annexation of Pegu, 26 years later, but is a thriving city which numbered in 1881, 53,107 inhabitants; [in 1891, 55,785].

MOUNT DELY, n.p. (See DELLY, MOUNT.)

MOUSE-DEER, s. The beautiful little creature, Memina indica (Gray), [Tragulus memina, the Indian Chevrotain (Blanford, Mammalia, 555),] found in various parts of India, and weighing under 6 lbs., is so called. But the name is also applied to several pigmy species of the genus Tragulus, found in the Malay regions, [where, according to Mr. Skeat, it takes in popular tradition the place of Brer Rabbit, outwitting even the tiger, elephant, and crocodile.] All belong to the family of Musk-deer.

MUCHÁN, s. Hind. machān, Dekh. manchān, Skt. mancha. An elevated platform; such as the floor of huts among the Indo-Chinese races; or a stage or scaffolding erected to watch a tiger, to guard a field, or what not.

c. 1662.—“As the soil of the country is very damp, the people do not live on the ground-floor, but on the machān, which is the name for a raised floor.”—Shihabuddin Tālish, by Blockmann, in J. A. S. B. xli. Pt. i. 81.

[1832.—“In a shady green mechan in some fine tree, watching at the cool of evening, . . .”—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed. 284.]

MUCHWA, s. Mahr. machuā, Hind. machuā, machuā. A kind of boat or barge in use about Bombay.

MUCKNA, s. Hind. makhnā, [which comes from Skt. matkuna, ‘a bug, a flea, a beardless man, an elephant without tusks’]. A male elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, "not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grubbers, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter." (The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon, 11.) Sanderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, [3rd ed. 66]) says: "On the Continent of India mucknas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare. . . . Mucknas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted." This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were mucknas. But the definition of a muckna in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the 'short grubbers' of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partially due to a preference in purchasers.* The same author derives the term from mukh, 'face'; but the reason is obscure. Shakespeare and Platts give the word as also applied to 'a cock without spurs.'

c. 1780.—"An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unlucky, and not saleable; the mukna or elephant born without teeth is thought the best."—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Landays, iii. 191.

MUCOA, MUKUYA, n.p. Malayal. and Tamil, mukkuram (sing.), 'a diver,' and mukkurar (pl.). [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss, s.v.) derives it from Drav. mukkuha, 'to dive'; the Madras Gloss. gives Tam. mukhugu, with the same meaning.] A name applied to the fishermen of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin. [But Mr. Pringle (Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 187) points out that formerly as now, the word was of much more general application. Orme in a passage quoted below employs it of boatmen at Karikal. The use of the word extended as far N. as Madras, and on the W. coast; it was not confined to the extreme S.] It was among these, and among the corresponding class of Paravars on the east coast, that P. Xavier's most noted labours in India occurred.

1510.—"The fourth class are called Mechua, and these are f-fishers."—Parthian, 112.

1525.—"And Dom João had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaos (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to houses that stood round the fort. . . . So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes . . . put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ashes after the fashion of jogues (see JOGEE) . . . also dressing his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jogee, whilst he stood under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macuas, which are f-fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual pulaver of the jogues, i.e. prayers for their long life and health, and the conquest of enemies, and every deliverance for their household, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things."—Corroa, ii. 271.

1532.—Barrow has mucuaris, 'a f-fisher-man's village.'

1600.—"Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macóas; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such fervour that the Father found himself at times with 6000 or 6500 souls about him."—Lucena, Vida do P. P. Xavier, 117.

c. 1610.—"These manners are called Moucole."—Pesqui de Lasil, Hak. Soc. i. 311.]

1615.—"Edixit ut Macuas omnes, id est villi-cima plebecula et piscata virens, Christiani sacra suscipere."—Jarric, i. 390.

1626.—"The Muchoa or Mechoe are f-fishers . . . the men Thecue, the women Harlots, with whom they please. . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 523.

1677.—Resolved "to raise the rates of hire of the Marrhas (see MUSSOOLA) boatmen called Macquars."—Pt. St. Geo. Chron., Jan 12, in Notes and Exs. No. i. 51.

[1684.—"The Maquas or Boatmen ye Ordinary Astralogers (sic) for weather did . . . prognosticate great Rains. . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. iii. 131.]

1727.—"They may marry into lower Tribes . . . and so may the Muckwas, or Fishers, who, I think, are a higher tribe than the Poulis (see POLEA)."—A. Hamilton, i. 310, [ed. 1741, i. 312]

* Sir George Yule notes: "I can distinctly call to mind 6 mucknas that I had (I may have had more) out of 30 or 40 elephants that passed through my hands." This would give 15 or 20 per cent. of mucknas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson's 5 out of 51 males.

MUDDĀR, s. Hind. madār, Skt. mandāra; Calotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Asclepiadaceae. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark fibre is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilisation. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, but as yet without practical success. The plant abounds with an acrid milky juice which the Rajputs are said to employ for infanticide. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called AK in Sind and throughout N. India.

MUDDLE, s. (?) This word is only known to us from the proverb—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budlee. [Even Mr. Brandt and Mrs. Wyatt are unable to explain this word. The former does not remember hearing it. Both doubt its connection with budlee. Mrs. Wyatt suggests with hesitation Tamil muder, "boiled rice," mudci-palli, "the cook-house."]

1836-7. — "Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistress."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"They always come accompanied by their Vakools, a kind of Secretaries, or interpreters, or sappers,—their muddles in short; everybody here has a muddle, high or low."—Letters from Madras, 86.

a. Ar. Mufti, an expounder of the Mahommedan Law, the utterer of the fatwā (see FUTWAH). Properly the Mufti is above the Kāzī who carries out the judgment. In the 18th century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganization which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Cauis and Mufties as authorized expounders of the Mahommedan Law; but, though Kāzis were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Kāzis became limited to quite different objects and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the fatwā in our District Courts was Maulavi. The title Mufti has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. (See CAZEE, LAW-OFFICER, MOOLVEE).

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure. [It was perhaps originally applied to the attire of dressing-gown, smoking-cap, and slippers, which was like the Oriental dress of the Mufti who was familiar in Europe from his appearance in Moliere's Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Compare the French en Pekin.]

MUGG, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson's definition of this obscure name: "A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong." It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz. the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognised by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note: "There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Maga, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Behar). The kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this race. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Montg. Martin, ii. 18 seqq.)" The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahommedan writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire-worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh = 'magus.' [See Risley, Tribes and Castes, ii. 28 seq.] The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1585.—"The Mogen, which be of the kingdom of Recon (see ARAKAN) and Rame, be stronger than the King of Tipara; so that Chatigam or Porto Grande (q.v.) is often under the King of Recon."—J. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 389.

c. 1590.—(In a country adjoining Pegu) "there are mines of ruby and diamond and gold and silver and copper and petroleum and sulphur and (the lord of that country) has war with the tribe of Magh about the mines; also with the tribe of Tipara there are battles."—Arin (orig.) i. 388; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 120].

c. 1604.—"Defeat of the Magh Rájá.—This short-sighted Rájá . . . became elated with the extent of his treasures and the number of his elephants. . . . He then openly rebelled, and assembling an army at Sundarāw laid siege to a fort in that vicinity. . . . Rájá Mán Singh . . . despatched a force. . . . These soon brought the Magh Rájá and all his forces to action . . . regardless of the number of his boats and the strength of his artillery."—Ināyatullah, in Elliot, vi. 109.

1676.—"In all Bengala this King (of Arakan) is known by no other name but the King of Mogue."—Tavernier, E.T. i. 8.

1752.—". . . that as the time of the Mugs draws nigh, they request us to order the pinnace to be with them by the end of next month."—In Long, p. 87.

c. 1810.—"In a paper written by Dr. Leyden, that gentleman supposes . . . that Magadha is the country of the people whom we call Muggs. . . . The term Muggs, these people assured me, is never used by either themselves or by the Hindus, except when speaking the jargon commonly called Hindustani by Europeans. . . .—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, ii. 18.

1811.—“Mugs, a dirty and disgusting people, but strong and skilful. They are somewhat of the Malayan race.”—Solyns, iii.

1866.—“That vegetable curry was excellent. Of course your cook is a Mug?”—The Dark Bungalow, 389.

MUGGUR, s. Hind. and Mahr. magar and makar, from Skt. makara ‘a sea-monster’ (see MACAREO). The destructive broad-snouted crocodile of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, formerly called Crocodilus biporcatus, now apparently subdivided into several sorts or varieties.

1611.—“Alagaters or Crocodiles there called Muxur match. . . .”—Hackins, in Purchas, i. 436. The word is here intended for magar-mats or machh, ‘crocodile-fish.’

1878.—“The muggur is a gross pleb, and his features stamp him as low-born. His manners are coarse.”—Ph. Robinson, in My Indian Garden, 82-3.

1879.—“En route I killed two crocodiles; they are usually called alligators, but that is a misnomer. It is the muggur . . . these muggers kill a good many people, and have a playful way of getting under a boat, and knocking off the steersman with their tails, and then swallowing him afterwards.”—Pollok, Sport, &c., i. 163.

1881.—“Alligator leather attains by use a beautiful gloss, and is very durable . . . and it is possible that our rivers contain a sufficient number of the two varieties of crocodile, the muggar and the gariat (see GAVIAL) for the tanners and leather-dressers of Cawnpore to experiment upon.”—Pioneer Mail, April 29.

MUGGRABEE, n.p. Ar. maghrabi, ‘western.’ This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is, as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Hayraddin Mograbbîn of Quentin Durward. From gharb, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province of Algarve, and both Spanish and Portuguese have garbin, a west wind. [The magician in the tale of Aladdin is a Maghrabi, and to this day in Languedoc and Gascony Maugraby is used as a term of cursing. (Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 36, 379). Muggerbee is used for a coin (see GUBBER).]

1663.—“The proper tongue in which Avicenna wrote is that which is used in Syria and Mesopotamia and in Persia and in Tartary (from which latter Avicenna came) and this tongue they call Araby; and that of our Moors they call Magaraby, as much as to say Moorish of the West. . . .”—Garcia, f. 19r.

MULL, s. A contraction of Mulligatawny, and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the Service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called Qui-his, and Bombay people Ducks or Be-nighted.

[1837.—“The Mulls have been excited also by another occurrence . . . affecting rather the trading than fashionable world.”—Anatole Journal, December, p. 251.]

[1852.—“ . . . residents of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras are, in Eastern parlance, designated ‘Qui Hies,’ ‘Ducks,’ and ‘Mulls.’”—Notes and Queries, 1st ser. v. 165.]

1860.—“It ys ano darko Londe, and ther dwollen yo Cimmerian, whereof spoketh Homerus Porta in his Odysea, and to thys Daye thei elopen Tenebris or ‘yo Benyghted folke.’ Bot thei elopen hemselvys Mullys from Mulligatawnne wher ys ano of theyr goddys from wch thei ben ysprung.”—Ext. from a lately discovered MS. of Sir John Maundeville.

MULLIGATAWNY, s. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil milagu-tannir, ‘pepper-water’; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence—and not merely from the complexion acquired there—the sobriquet of the preceding article.

1784.—

“In vain our hard fate we repine;
In vain our fortune we rail;
On Mullaghee-tawny we dine,
Or Congee, in Bangalore Jail.”

Song by a Gentleman of the Navy (one of Hyder’s Prisoners), in Seton-Karr, i. 18.

[1823.—“ . . . in a brasen pot was mulugu tanni, a hot vegetable soup, made chiefly from pepper and capsicums.”—Hoolc, Missions in Madras, 2nd ed. 219.]

MULMULL, s. Hind. malmal; Muslin.

[c. 1690.—“Malmal, per piece . . . 4 R.”—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 91.]

1683.—“Yo said Ellis told your Pettitioner that he would not take 500 Pieces of your Pettitioner’s mulmulls unless your Pettitioner gave him 200 Rups. which your Pettitioner being poor could not do.”— Pétition of Rogood, Weaver of Hugly, in Judges, Diary, March 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 73].

1705.—"Malle-molles et autre diverses sortes de toiles . . . atinquerques et les bolles mousselines."—Luillier, 78.

MUNCHEEL, MANJEEL, s. This word is proper to the S.W. coast; Malayal. manjil, mañchal, from Skt. mañcha. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palankin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy of the Himalaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561.—" . . . He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent upwards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth . . . the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen . . . may desire."—Corræ, Three Voyages, &c., p. 199.

1811.—"The Inquisition is about a quarter of a mile distant from the convent, and we proceeded thither in manjeels."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2nd ed., 171.

1819.—"Muncheel, a kind of litter resembling a sea-cot or hammock, hung to a long pole, with a moveable cover over the whole, to keep off the sun or rain. Six men will run with one from one end of the Malabar coast to the other, while twelve are necessary for the lightest palanquin."—Welsh, ii. 142.

1841.—"Muncheels, with poles complete. . . . Poles, Muncheel, Sparo."—Jameson's Bombay Code, Ordinance Nomenclature.

1862.—"We . . . started . . . in Muncheels or hammocks, slung to bamboos, with a shade over them, and carried by six men, who kept up unearthly yell the whole time."—Marlham, Peru and India, 353.

c. 1886.—"When I landed at Diu, an officer met me with a Muncheel for my use, viz. a hammock slung to a pole, and protected by an awning."—M.-Gen. R. II. Keatinge.

A form of this word is used at Réunion, where a kind of palankin is called "le manchy." It gives a title to one of Leconte de Lisle's Poems:

c. 1858.—

"Sous un nuage frais de clair mousvoline
Tous les dimanches au matin, Tu venais à la ville en manchy de rotin, Par les rampes de la colline."
Le Manchy.

The word has also been introduced by the Portuguese into Africa in the forms maxilla, and machilla.

1810.—" . . . tangas, quo elles chamão maxilas."—Annaes Maritimas, iii. 434.

1880.—"The Portuguese (in Quilliman) seldom even think of walking the length of their own street, and . . . go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a machilla (pronounced machela). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the native, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned-looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each machilla requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in L. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

MUNGOOSE, s. This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumon, represented in the South by Mangusta Mungos (Elliot), or Herpestes griseus (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes malaccensis. [Blanford (Mammalia, 119 seqq.) recognises eight species, the "Common Indian Mongoose" being described as Herpestes mungo.] The word is Telugu, mangisu, or mungisa. In Upper India the animal is called neval, neola, or nyaul. Jerdon gives mangūs however as a Deccani and Mahr. word; [Platts gives it as dialectic, and very doubtfully derives it from Skt. malashu, 'moving quickly.' In Ar. it is bin-'arīs, 'daughter of the bridegroom,' in Egypt kūt or katt Farūn, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 369].

1691.—"The knowledge of these antidotal herbs they have learned from the Mongoose, a kind of Ferret."—Knar, 115.

1695.—"They have what they call a Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeyron, i. 56.

Bluteau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon, tr. from Portuguese into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 153. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeyron.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is ill-tempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774.—"Ho (the Dharma Raja of Bhootan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mongoose, which he is very fond of."—Dogiel's Diary, in Marlham's Tibet, 27.

1790. — "His (Mr. Glan's) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mungoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes . . . but that the poison of snakes is, to this animal, innocent."—Letter in Colbrooke's Life, p. 40.

1829. — "Il Monguoso animale similo ad una donnola."—Papi, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viaggi. Ital., p. 279.

MUNJEET, s. Hind. majith, Skt. mañjishtha; a dye-plant (Rubia cordifolia, L., N.O. Cinchonaceae); 'Bengal Madder.'

MUNNEEPORE, n.p. Properly Manipūr; a quasi-independent State lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the late kingdom of Burma, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Irawadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongoloid aspect, and the State, small and secluded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the States of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese States, too, Manipūr has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rājas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipūr by Alompra, founder of the present Burmese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoys was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipūr. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmese War (1824-25), when the country was overrun by the Burmese, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipūri force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipūr, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipūr. [The murder of Mr. Quinton, Chief-Commissioner of Assam, and other British officers at Manipūr, in the close of 1890, led to the infliction of severe punishment on the leaders of the outbreak. The Mahārāja, whose abdication led to this tragedy, died in Calcutta in the following year, and the State is now under British management during the minority of his successor.]

This State has been called by a variety of names. Thus, in Rennell's Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Meckley. In Symes's Narrative, and in maps of that period, it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Meckley represents the name (Makli?) by which the country was known in Assam; Mogli (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Ka-ri or Ka-thi (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shans or Burmese.

1755. — "I have carried my Arms to the confines of CHINA . . . on the other quarter I have reduced to my subjection the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay; whose heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you. . . ."—Speech of Alompra to Capt. Baler at Momechabur. Dairymple, Or. Rep. i. 152.

1759. — "Cassay, which . . . lies to the N. Westward of AVA, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unheard of in Europe. . . ."—Letter, dd. 22 June 1759, in ibid. 116.

1762. — " . . . the President sent the Board a letter which he had received from Mr. Verelst at Chittagong, containing an invitation which had been made to him and his Council by the Rājah of Meckley to assist him in obtaining redress . . . from the Burmas. . . ."—Letter, in Wheeler, Early Records, 291.]

1763. — "Meckley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Coolie Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East* by the Burampoota (see BURAMP-FOOTER); beyond the Hills, to the North by Asam and Poong, to the West Cachar; to the South and East the BURMAN Country, which lies between Meckley and China. . . . The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Poong, into two large branches, one of which passes through Asam, and down by the way of Decca, the other through Poong into the Burma Country."—Acct. of Meckley, by Arthur Doss Goussen, in Dairymple's Or. Rep., ii. 477-478.

" . . . there is about seven days plain country between Moneypoor and Burampoota, after crossing which, about seven days, Jungle and Hills, to the inhabited border of the Burmah country."—Ibid. 481.

1793.—" . . . The first ridge of mountains towards Tibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley. . . . The space between Bengal and China, is occupied by the province of Meckley and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava. . . ."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799.—(Referring to 1767). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months . . . he took up arms against the Cassayera. . . . Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munnepoora, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguers had revolted. . . ."—Symes, Narrative, 41-42.

"All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Birmanas."—Ibid. 318.

1819.—"Beyond the point of Negraglia (see NEGRAIS), as far as Azen (see ASSAM), and even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aracan and Cassé from the Burmese. . . ."—Sangermano, p. 33.

1827.—"The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Burmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Lao, the Cassay, or more correctly Kathé. . . ."—Craigford's Journal, 372.

1855.—"The weaving of these silks . . . gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Munnipoorians, or Kathé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"The people, the descendants of unfortunates who were carried off in droves from their country by the Burmans in the time of King Mentarngyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion . . . of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the districts of Central Burma. . . . Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if boats have to be manned they furnish the rowers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remuneration they may receive is very scanty and uncertain."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 153-154.

MUNSUBDAR. Hind. from Pers. mansubdar, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. mansab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant. [Mr. Irvine discusses the question at length and represents mansab by "the word 'rank,' as its object was to settle precedence and fix gradation of pay; it did not necessarily imply the exercise of any particular office, and meant nothing beyond the fact that the holder was in the employ of the State, and bound in return to yield certain services when called upon." (J.R.A.S., July 1896, pp. 510 seqq.)]

[1623.—" . . . certain Officers of the Militia, whom they call Mansubdar."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 97.]

c. 1665.—"Mansubdars are Cavaliers of Mansab, which is particular and honourable Pay; not so great indeed as that of the Omrahs . . . they being esteemed as little Omrahs, and of the rank of those, that are advanced to that dignity."—Bernier, E.T. p. 67; [ed. Constable, 215].

1673.—"Munsuddars or petty omrahs."—Fryer, 183.

1758.—" . . . a munsuddar or commander of 6000 horse."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 278.

MUNTRA, s. Skt. mantra, 'a text of the Vedas; a magical formula.'

1612.—" . . . Trata da causa primeira, segundo os livros que tem, chamados Terum Mandra mole (mantra-mula, mula 'text').—Couto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 3.

1778.—"Mantur—a text of the Shaster."—Malhed, Code, p. 17.

1817.—" . . . he is said to have found the great mantra, spell or talisman."—Mitl, Mist. ii. 143.

MUNTREE, s. Skt. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derive their ancient civilisation from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1810.—"When the Court was full, and Ibrahim, the son of Candu the merchant, was near the throne, the Raja entered. . . . But as soon as the Rajah seated himself, the muntries and high officers of state arrayed themselves according to their rank."—In a Malay's account of Government House at Calcutta, transl. by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, p. 200.

[1811.—"Mantri." See under ORANEAY.
1829.—"The Mantris of Mowar prefer estates to pecuniary stipend, which gives more consequence in every point of view."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 150.

MUNZIL, s. Ar. manzil, 'descending or alighting,' hence the halting place of a stage or march, a day's stage.

1635.—"We were not able to reach Obdeen-deen (yo usual Monzill) but lay at a sorry Caravan Sarai."—Hedges, Diary, July 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 203. In i. 214, manzeil].

MUSCAT, n.p., properly Māskāt. A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time the capital of 'Omān. (See IMAU.)

1673.—"Muschat." See under IMAU.

MUSIO. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of Western music which they appreciate, and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1860, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! it is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the hearers became insensible (behosh).'

1780.—"The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives. They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 33.

MUSK, s. We get this word from the Lat. musculus, Greek μβος, and the latter must have been got, probably through Persian, from the Skt. mushka, the literal meaning of which is rendered in the old English phrase 'a cod of musk.' The oldest known European mention of the article is that which we give from St. Jerome; the oldest medical prescription is in a work of Aetius, of Amida (c. 540). In the quotation from Cosmas the word used is μβος, and kastūri is a Skt. name, still, according to Royle, applied to the musk-deer in the Himālaya. The transfer of the name to (or from) the article called by the Greeks καρόπιον, which is an analogous product of the beaver, is curious. The Musk-deer (Moschus moschiferus, L.) is found throughout the Himālaya at elevations rarely (in summer) below 8000 feet, and extends east to the borders of Szechuen, and north to Siberia.

c. 390.—"Odori autem suavitatis, et diversa thymiamata, et amomum, et cyphi, conanthe, muscus, et peregrini muri pollicula, quod dissolutis et amatoribus conveniat, nemo nisi dissolutus negat."—St. Jerome, in lāb. Secund. adv. Jovinianum, ed. Valtersii, ii. col. 337.

c. 516.—"This little animal is the Musk (μβος). The natives call it in their own tongue καρόπιον. They hunt it and shoot it, and binding tight the blood collected about the navel they cut this off, and this is the sweet smelling part of it, and what we call musk."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bl. xi.

["Musk cometh from Tartaria. . . There is a certain beast in Tartaria, which is wilde and big as a wolfe, which beast they take alive, and beat him to death with small staves; his blood may be spread through his whole body, then they cut it in pieces, and take out all the bones, and beat the flesh with the blood in a mortar very small, and dry it, and make pures to put it in of the skin, and these be the Cods of Musko."—Cæsar Frederick, in Hall. ii. 372.]

1673.—"Musk. It is best to buy it in the Cod . . . that which openeth with a bright Musk colour is best."—Fryer, 212.

MUSK-RAT, s. The popular name of the Sorex caeruleus, Jerdon, [Crociodura caerulea, Blanford], an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously observes, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling; [and Blanford (Mammalia, 237) writes that "the absurd story . . . is less credited in India than it formerly was, owing to the discovery that liquors bottled in Europe and exported to India are not liable to be tainted."] When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly. Can this be the mus peregrinus mentioned by St. Jerome (see MUSK), as P. Vincenzo supposes?

c. 1590.—“Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also mice that have a fine musky scent.”—Ayeen, by Gladwin (1800) ii. 106; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 406].

[1593.—“They are called sweet smelling Rattes, for they have a smell as if they were full of Muske.”—Linuschten, Ilak. Soc. i. 303.]

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal (il ratto del musco), which occurred in the Capuchin Convent at Surat, says with simplicity for malignity? : “I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant* in the vicinity of those most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation.”—Vaggio, p. 385.

1681.—“This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Muskrats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do.”—Knoz, p. 31.

1789.—H. Munro in his Narrative (p. 34) absurdly enough identifies this animal with the Bandicoot, q.v.

1813.—See Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd. ed. i. 26].

MUSLIN, s. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mauṣal or Mauṣil) on the Tigris,† and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent tissue to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ mauṣilī in the same sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights (Macnaghten's ed., i. 176, and ii. 159), in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban. [Burton (i. 211) translates ‘Mosul stuff,’ and says it may mean either of ‘Mosul fashion,’ or muslin.] The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1298.—“All the cloths of gold and silk that are called Mosollins are made in this country (Mausul).”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. chap. 5.

c. 1544.—“Almusoli est regio in Mesopotamia, in qua texuntur telae ex bombyce valde pulchrae, quae apud Syros et Aegyptios et apud mercatores Venetos appellantur muscoli, ex hoc regionis nomine. Et principes Aegyptii et Syri, tempore aestatis edentes in loco honoratiori induunt vestes ex hujusmodi muscoli.”—Andrea Bellinensis, Arabicorum nominum quae in libris Aricennae sparsim legebantur Interpretatio.

1573.—“ . . . you have all sorts of Cotton-works, Handkerchiefs, long Fillets, Girles . . . and other sorts, by the Arabians called Mossellini (after the Country Musoli, from whence they are brought, which is situated in Mesopotamia), by us Muslin.”—Rauicolf, p. 81.

c. 1580.—“For the rest the said Agiani (misprint for Bagnani, Banyans) wear clothes of white muscolo or essa (!); having their garments very long and crossed over the breast.”—Gaspard Balbi, i. 336.

1673.—“Le drap qu'on extend sur les matelas est d'une toile aussi fine que de la mousceline.”—App. to Journal d'Int. Galland, ii. 198.

1685.—“I have been told by several, that muscelin (so much in use here for cravats) and Calligo (!), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of nettles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them.”—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray Correspondence, 1848, p. 163.

c. 1760.—“This city (Mosul)'s manufacture is Mussolin [read Mussollen] (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets.”—Ives, Voyage, p. 321.

MUSNUD, s. H.—Ar. masnad, from root sanaa, ‘he leaned or rested upon it.’ The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752.—“Salabat-jing . . . went through the ceremony of sitting on the musnud or throne.”—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 250.

1757.—“On the 29th the Colonel went to the Soubah's Palace, and in the presence of all the Rajahs and great men of the court,

* Stupra d'odore tanta fragrantia. The Scotchman is laughed at for “feeling” a smell, but here the Italian hears one!

† We have seen, however, somewhere an ingenious suggestion that the word really came from Maisolia (the country about Manipatam, according to Ptolemy), which even in ancient times was famous for fine cotton textures.

led him to the Muslund. . . .”—Reflections by Luke Scrifton, Esq., ed. 1770, p. 93.

1803.—“The Peshwah arrived yesterday, and is to be seated on the musnud.”—A. Wellesley, in Munro's Life, i. 343.

1809.—“In it was a musnud, with a carpet, and a little on one side were chairs on a white cloth.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 846.

1824.—“They spread fresh carpets, and prepared the royal musnud, covering it with a magnificent shawl.”—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 142.

1827.—“The Prince Tippoo had scarcely dismounted from his elephant, and occupied the musnud, or throne of cushions.”—Sir W. Scott, Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

MUSSALLA, s. P.—H. (with change of sense from Ar. masālik, pl. of masālah) ‘materials, ingredients,’ lit. ‘things for the good of, or things or affairs conducive to good.’ Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like. There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to “rough it on chuprassies and mussaulchees” (qq.v.), meaning chupatties and mussalla.

1780.—“A dose of marsall, or purgative spices.”—Munro, Narrative, 85.

1809.—“At the next hut the woman was grinding missala or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin.”—Maria Graham, 20.

MUSSAUL, s. Hind. from Ar. mash'al, ‘a torch.’ It is usually made of rags wrapt round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

c. 1407.—“Suddenly, in the midst of the night they saw the Sultan's camp approaching, accompanied by a great number of marshal.”—Abdurazzak, in N. & Ext. xiv. Pt. i. 153.

1673.—“The Duties* march like Furies with their lighted mussals in their hands, they are Pots filled with Oyl in an Iron Hoop like our Beacons, and set on fire by stinking rags.”—Fryer, 33.

1705.—“... flambeaux qu'ils appellent Mansalles.”—Luillier, 89.

1809.—“These Mussal or link-boys.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 17.

* Deot, a torch-bearer. Thus Baber: “If the emperor or chief nobility (in India) at any time have occasion for a light by night, these filthy Deoties bring in their lamps, which they carry up to their master, and stand holding it close by his side”—Baber, 353.

1810.—“The Mosaul, or flambeau, consists of old rags, wrapped very closely round a small stick.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 219.

[1813.—“These nocturnal processions illuminated by many hundred massauls or torches, illustrate the parable of the ten virgins. . . .”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 274.

[1857.—“Near him was another Hindoo . . . he is called a Mussal; and the lamps and lights are his special department.”—Lady Falkland, Chow-Chow, 2nd ed. i. 35.]

MUSSAULCHEE, s. Hind. mash'alchī from mash'al (see MUSSAUL), with the Turkish termination chī, generally implying an agent. [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, i. 239) al-masha'it is the executioner.] The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran alongside of a palankin on a night journey, bearing a mussaul. “In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nāi) to carry the torch; hence nāi commonly=‘torch-bearer’” (M.-Gen. Keatinge). The word [or sometimes in the corrupt form mussaul] is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valentia, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase ‘a scullion.’

1610.—“He always had in service 500 Massalgees.”—Finch, in Purchas, i. 432.

1662.—(In Asam) “they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a mash'alchī [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp.”—Shihabuddin Talish, tr. by Blochmann, in J.A.S.B. xli. Pt. i. 82.

[1665.—“They (flambeaux) merely consist of a piece of iron hafted in a stick, and surrounded at the extremity with linen rags steeped in oil, which are renewed . . . by the Masalchis, or link boys, who carry the oil in long narrow-necked vessels of iron or brass.”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 361.]

1673.—“Trois Massalgis du Grand Seigneur vinrent faire honneur à M. l'Ambassadeur avec leurs feux allumés.”—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 103.

1686.—“After strict examination he chose out 2 persons, the Chout (Chouts), an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Mossalagee, a person who carries the light before me in the night.”—Hedger, Diary, July 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 232].

[1775.—“... Mashargues, Torch-bearers.”—Letter of W. Mackrabit, in Francis, Letters, i. 227.]

1701.—" . . . un masolehi, ou porteur flambeau, pour la nuit."—J. de St. Pierre, La Chaudière Indienne, 16.

1802.—"It is universally the custom to drive out between sunset and dinner. The Massalchees, when it grows dark, go out to meet their masters on their return, and run before them, at the full rate of eight miles an hour, and the numerous lights moving along the esplanade produce a singular and pleasing effect."—J. de Valentia, l. 210.

1813.—"The occupation of massalchees, or torch-bearer, although generally allotted to the village barber, in the parganahs under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Men, li. 417; [2nd ed. li. 43].

1825.—"After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 200 men, accompanied by Massalchees or torch-bearers."—Pardoning Harp, 557. [ed. 1873, li. 69].

[1831.—" . . . a mossolei, or man to light up the place."—Another Journal, N S v. 197.]

MUSSENDOM, CAPE, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking, it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of 'Oman. The name is written Mosandam in the map which Dr. Badger gave, with his H of Oman. But it is late Masandam (or possibly Mosandam) in the Mokd of Sidi 'Ali Kapudian (J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 459). Sprenger writes Mosandam (Alt. Pers., Arabien, p. 107). [Morier gives another explanation (see the quotation below).]

1516.—" . . . it (the coast) trends to the N.E. by N. 30 leagues until Cape Mocandon, which is at the mouth of the Sea of Persia."—Bartoli, 32.

1533.—" . . . before you come to Cape Mocandon, which Ptolemy calls Asaboro (Asabōr aspor) and which he puts in 23°, but which we put in 26°; and here terminates our first division" (of the Eastern Coast).—Jarras, l. ix. 1.

1572.—"Olha o cabo Asabōro que chamado Agor he Mocandão dos navegantes: Por aqui entra o lago, quo he fechado De Arabia, e Persia terras abundantes."—Camões, x. 102.

By Burton :

'Behold of Asabōn the Head, now hight Mosandam, by the men who plough the Main:

Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Right, parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the poet copies the misprint or mistake of Jarras in Asaboro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1673.—"On the one side St. James (see JASE) his Headland, on the other that of Mussendown appeared, and afore Sunset we entered the Straights Mouth."—Fryer, 221.

1727.—"The same Chain of rocky Mountains continue as high as Zoor, above Cape Musenden, which Cape and Cape Jajuer begin the Gulf of Persia."—A. Hamilton, l. 71; [ed. 1711, l. 73].

1777.—"At the mouth of the Strait of Mocandon, which leads into the Persian gulph, is the Island of Gombroon" (B)—Rogers, ix. 177, l. 69.

[1823.—"Musselfdom is a still stronger instance of the perversion of words. The genuine name of this head-land is Marsa Sōmak, who was a female saint of Arabia, and lived on the spot or in its neighbourhood."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 6.]

MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH, BOAT, s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of cyprus size, and formed of planks sewn together with coir-twine; the open joints being made good with a caulking or wadding of twisted coir. The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "musoola . . . the Mahratta term for fish" (Morton's Life of Leyden, 61). As a matter of fact the Mahr. word for fish is maśhi, Konk. māśhi. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below); [and by the compiler of the Mideas Gloss., who gives Tel. māśhi, Hind. māchhi]. But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from the Ar. maṣāl, 'the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it.' Another suggestion is from the Ar. maṣāl, 'joined,' as opposed to 'dug-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from māṣāl, 'tax,' if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

c. 1560.—"Spaventosa cosa d' chi nō ha più vito, l'inalcare o sbarcar lo mercante o lo persone a San Tomè . . . adoperano certe barchette fatte aposte molto alto e larghe, ch' essi chiamano Masudi, e sono fatte con tauolo sottili, e con corde sottili usate insieme vna tauola con l'altre," &c. (there follows a very correct description of their use).—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1580.—"... where (Negapatam) they cannot land anything but in the Maçules of the same country."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 93.

c. 1582.—"... There is always a heavy sea there (San Thomé), from swell or storm; so the merchandise and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boatmen pull with great force, and so run ashore; and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the beach is covered with sand, and the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—cf. Balbi, f. 89.

1673.—"I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten Men paddle, the two aftermost of whom are Steersmen, using their Paddles instead of a Ruddor. The Boat is not strengthened with Keco-Timbers, as ours are; the bonded Planks are sowed together with Rope-Yarn of the Cocoe, and calked with Dammar (see DAMMER) (a sort of Resin taken out of the Sea), so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Fryer, 37.

[1677.—"Mesullas." See MUCOA.]

1678.—"Three Englishmen drowned by upsetting of a Mussoola boat. The fourth on board saved with the help of the Muscous" (see MUCOA).—Ft. St. Geo. Comm., Aug. 13. Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 78.

1679.—"A Mussoolee being overturned, although it was very smooth water and no surf, and one Englishman being drowned, a Dutchman being with difficulty recovered, the Boatmen were seized and put in prison, one escaping."—Ibid. July 14. In No. ii. p. 16.

[1683.—"This Evening about seven a Clock a Musulla coming ashore . . . was oversett in the Surf and all four drowned."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 51.]

1685.—"This morning two Mussoolas and two Cutlamarrus came off to yo Shippe."—Helges, Diary, Feb. 3; [Blak. Soc. i. 182].

1760.—"As soon as the yaws and pinnaces reached the surf they dropped their grapplings, and cast off the massoolas, which immediately rowed ashore, and landed the troops."—Orme, iii. 617.

1762.—"No European boat can land, but the natives make use of a boat of a particular construction called a Maussolo," &c.—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, April 1.

[1773.—" . . . the governor . . . sent also four Mossulas, or country boats, to accommodate him. . . ."—Jes. 182.]

1783.—"The want of Massoola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colebrooke, 9.

1826.—"The masuli-boats (which first word is merely a corruption of 'muchli,' fish) have been often described, and except that they are sowed together with coco-nut twine, instead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats . . . on the Ganges."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 174.

1879.—"Madras has no harbour; nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Masulah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Saty. Review, Sept. 20.

MUSSUCK, s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, stript of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhishti (see BHEESTY). Hind. maskak, Skt. masaka.

[1610.—"Mussocke." See under RUPEE.]

[1751.—"7 hands of Musuk" (probably meaning Bhusia).—In Fule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. II. xi.]

1842.—"Might it not be worth while to try the experiment of having 'mussocks' made of waterproof cloth in England!"—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 220.

MUSSULMAN, adj. and s. Mahomedan. Muslim, 'resigning' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahommed to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is Muslimân, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word Muslimân or Musalman thus formed. [Others explain it as either from Ar. pl. Muslimîn, or from Muslim-mân, 'like a Muslim,' the former of which is adopted by Platts as most probable.]

c. 1540.—" . . . disse por tres vezes, Lah, hilah, hilah, lah Muhammad roqol halah, o Massoleymoens e homes justos da santa ley de Mafumede."—Pinto, ch. lix.

1559.—"Although each horde (of Tartars) has its proper name, e.g. particularly the horde of the Savolhonsians . . . and many others, which are in truth Mahomotans; yet do they hold it for a grievous insult and reproach to be called and styled Turks; they wish to be styled Besermanni, and by this name the Turks also desire to be styled."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii. f. 171.

[1668.—"I have noted here before that if any Christian will become a Beserman, . . . and be a Mahometan of their religion, they give him any gifts . . ."—A. Edvard, in Hall, i. 442.]

c. 1680.—"Tutti sopradotti Tartari seguitano la fede de' Turchi et alla Turchesca credono, ma se tégono a gran vergogna, o molto si corrociano l'esser detti Turchi, secondo che all' incontro godono d'esser Besurmani, cioè gèto eletta, chiamati."—*Descrizione della Sarmatia Europea del magn. caval. 1619.—". . . i Musulmani, cioè i salvati: che cosa pazamento si chiamano fra di loro i maomettiani"—P. della Valle, i. 791.

"The precepts of the Moslemans are first, circumcision . . ."—Gabriel Sionita, in Purchas, ii. 1601.

1653.—". . . son infanterio d'Indistannis Mansulmans, ou Indiens de la secte des Sonniss."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 233.

1673.—"Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an odd, drunken Beggars of the Musslemen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse . . . are presently upon their Punctilio's with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rage, and this Coffery (see CAFFER) (Un-believer) to vaunt it thus?"—Fryer, 91.

1788.—"We escape an ambiguous termination by adopting Moslem instead of Musulman in the plural number."—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

MUST, adj. Pers. mast, 'drunk.' It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

[1882.—"Fits of Must differ in duration in different animals (elephants); in some they last for a few weeks, in others for even four or five months."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed., 59.]

MUSTEES, MESTIZ, &c., s. A half-caste. A corruption of the Port. mestizo, having the same meaning; "a mixing; applied to human beings and animals born of a father and mother of different species, like a mule" (Bluteau); French, metis and metif.

1546.—"The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu) ordered that all the mestigos who were in Dio should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them,—subject to the King's confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestigo of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it."—Correa, iv. 580.

1552.—". . . the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them a number of the natives, Moors in belief, and Negroes with curly hair in appearance, and some of them only swarthy, as being misticos."—Barros, i. ii. 1.

1598.—". . . an Interpretour . . . which was a Mestizo, that is halfo an Indian, and halfo a Portugall."—Candlish, in Hall, iv. 337.

c. 1610.—"Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestifs, les autres Indiens Christianisez."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 78; also see i. 240]. This author has also Métifs (ii. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 373]), and again: ". . . qu'ils appellent Métices, c'est à dire Métifs, meslez" (ii. 23; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38]).

"Le vy vne moustro generale de tous les Habitans portans armes, tant Portugais que Métices of Indiens, and se trounerent environ 4000."—Moguel, 352.

[1615.—"A Mestizo came to demand passage in our junk."—Cool's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 216.]

c. 1665.—"And, in a word, Dengale is a country abounding in all things; and 'tis for this very reason that so many Portuguese, Mesticks, and other Christians are fled thither."—Bernier, E.T. 140; [ed. Constable, 438].

[1673.—"Beyond the Outworks live a few Portugals Musteroses or Misteradoes."—Fryer, 57.]

1678.—"Noo Roman Catholick or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 fanams per mensem, as private centinalls, and the pay of those of the Portuguez nation, as Europeans, Musteesses, and Topasees, is from 70 to 40 fanams per mensem."—*Articles and Orders . . . of Ft. 1699.—"Wives of Freemen, Musteess."—Census of Company's Servants on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 350.

1727.—"A poor Seaman had got a pretty Mustice Wife."—A. Hamilton, ii. 10; [ed. 1744, ii. 8].

1781.—"Eloped from the service of his Mistress a Slavo Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of Musty, tall and slender."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799.—"August 13th. . . . Visited by appointment . . . Mrs. Caroy, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole of Calcutta. . . . This lady, now fifty-eight years of age, as she herself told me, is . . . of a fair Mesticia colour. . . . She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said. . . ."—Note by Thomas Boileau (an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-Generals John Theophilus and A. H. E. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal)), quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 31.

1834.—"You don't know these Baboos. . . . Most of them now-a-days have their Misteesa Bebees, and their Moosulmaunees, and not a few their Gora Boobees likewise."—The Baboo, &c., 167-168.

1863.—"These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perhaps been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people . . . and have their own places of amusement . . . and Mestiza balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 296.

MUSTER, s. A pattern, or a sample. From Port. mostra (Span. muestra, Ital. mostra). The word is current in China, as well as India. See Wells Williams's Guide, 237.

c. 1441.—"Vierão as nossas Galés por commissão sua com algumas amostras do açúcar da Madeira, do Sangue do Drago, e do outras cousas."—Cadamostra, Navegação primeira, 6.

1663.—"And they gave me a mostra of amomum, which I brought to Goa, and showed to the apothecaries here; and I compared it with the drawings of the simples of Dioscorides."—Garcia, f. 15.

1601.—"Musters and Shewes of Gold."—Old Transl. of Galvano, Hak. Soc. p. 83.

1612.—"A Moore came aboard with a muster of Cloves."—Sari, in Purchas, i. 357.

[1612-13. — "Mustraes." See under CORGE.]

1673.—"Merchants bringing and receiving Musters."—Fryer, 84.

1702.—" . . . Packing Stuff, Packing Materials, Musters."—Quinquapartito Indenturo, in Charters of the B.I. Co., 325.

1727.—"He advised me to send to the King . . . that I designed to trade with his Subjects . . . which I did, and in twelve Days received an Answer that I might, but desired me to send some person up with Musters of all my Goods."—A. Hamilton, ii. 200; [ed. 1744].

c. 1760.—"He (the tailor) never measures you; he only asks master for muster, as he terms it, that is for a pattern."—Ire, 62.

1772.—"The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price's Travels, i. 39.

[1846.—"The above muster was referred to a party who has lately arrived from . . . England. . . ."—J. Agri. Hort. Soc., in Wat. Econ. Dict. vi. pt. ii. 601.]

MUTLUB, s. Hind. from Ar. matlab. The Ar. from ṭalab, 'he asked,' properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian use it always means 'purpose, gist,' and the like. Illiterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into matbal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, matbali, 'opinionated,' and the like.

MUTT, MUTH, s. Skt. maṭha; a sort of convent where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession, one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

[1856.—" . . . a Gosween's Mut in the neighbourhood . . ."—Ra. Mala, ed. 1878, p. 627.]

1874.—"The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree erratic and mendicant, but has anchorage places and head-quarters in the mathes."—Calc. Review, cxvii. 212.

MUTTONGOSHT, s. (i.e. 'Mutton-flesh.') Anglo-Indian domestic Hind. for 'Mutton.'

MUTTONGYE, s. Sen-Hind. matangai, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

MUTTRA, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jumna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Μαδοῦρα ἢ τῶν Θεῶν. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under MADURA. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 240) calls it Matura, and Bernier (ed. Constable, 66), Maturas.]

MUXADABAD, n.p. Ar.—P. Makṣaddābād, a name that often occurs in books of the 18th century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Murshidabad, the capital of the Nawabs of Bengal since the beginning of the 18th century. The town Maksûdâbâd is stated by Tiefenthaler to have been founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khân (also called in English histories Jafier Khan), moved the seat of Government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muxadavad in the early English records down to 1760 (Sir W. W. Hunter).

[c. 1670.—“Madeson Bazarki,” in Tavernier, ed. Bail, i. 132.]

1684.—“Dec. 26.—In ye morning I went to give Bulohund a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muxoodavad. . . .”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 59.

1703-4.—“The first act of the Nuwab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Makhsûsabad to Moorshudabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace . . . to render it the capital of the Province.”—Stewart, H. of Bengal, 309.

1728.—“Muxadabath.”—Valentijn, Chorom., &c., 147.

1727.—“Muxadabaud is but 12 miles from it (Cosmubazar), a Place of much greater Antiquity, and the Mogul has a Mint there; but the ancient name of Muxadabaud has been changed for Rajahmal, for above a Century.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; [ed. 1744]. (There is great confusion in this.)

1751.—“I have heard that Ram Kissen Seat, who lives in Calcutta, has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxidavad Syro (see SAYER) Chowky duties. I am greatly surprised, and send a Chubdar to bring him, and desire you will be speedy in delivering him over.”—Letter from Nawab Allypoodi Cawn to the Pres. of Council, dated Muxidavad, May 20.

1753.—“En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Mocsudabad. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnaie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe celle du pays; et un grand fauxbourg de cette ville, appelé Azingong, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement.”—D'Auville, 63.

1756.—“The Nabob, irritated by the disappointment of his expectations of immense wealth, ordered Mr. Holwell and the two other prisoners to be sent to Muxadavad.”—Orme, iii. 79.

1782.—“You demand an account of the East Indies, the Mogul's dominions and Muxadabad. . . . I imagine when you made the above requisition that you did it with a view rather to try my knowledge than to increase your own, for your great skill in geography would point out to you that Muxadabad is as far from Madras, as Constantinople is from Glasgow.”—T. Munro to his brother William, in Life, &c. iii. 41.

1884.—It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that “Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Moorshedabad.” But there is no ground for this statement. So far as I can trace, it does not appear that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagore, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hoogly even was the Bridgewater of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

MUZBEE, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low caste, vulg. mazbi, apparently machabi from Ar. mazhab, ‘religious belief.’ Cunningham indeed says that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahomedanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now. [“When the sweepers have adopted the Sikh faith they are known as Mazhabis. . . . When the Chuhra is circumcised and becomes a Musulman, he is known as a Musalli or a Kotana” (MacLagan, Panjab Census Rep., 1891, p. 202).] The original corps of Muzbees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N.I. (Pioneers) was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Doab Canal.

1858.—“On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzz-bees. . . . The idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers.”—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwards to R. Montgomery, Esq., March 23.

“To the same destination (Delhi) was sent a strong corps of Muzhubees (low-caste) Sikhs, numbering 1200 men, to serve as pioneers.”—Letter from R. Temple, Secretary to Punjab Govt., dd. Lahore, May 25, 1858.

MYDAN, MEIDAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. maidân. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazza (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chaugân (see CHICANE) ground; a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or race-course.

c. 1330.—“But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e., the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cuthay, 63.

1618.—"When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade, and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business this is, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, i. 707.

c. 1665.—"Celui (Quervan-ora) des Étrangers est bien plus spacieux que l'autre et est quarre, et tous deux font face au Meidan."—Theriot, v. 214.

1670.—"Before this house is a great square meidan or promenade, planted on all sides with great trees, standing in rows."—Andriess, 36.

1673.—"The Midan, or open Space before the Caun's Palace, is an Oblong and Stately Pintzo, with real not belied Cloisters."—Fryer, 249.

1823.—"All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the meidan."—The Kuzul-bash, i. 223.

[1852. —"A 21-pound howitzer, hoisted on to the maintop of the Shannon, looked menacingly over the Meidan (at Calcutta) . . ."—Olipphant, Narrative of Ld. Elgin's Mission, i. 60.

MYNA, MINA, &c. s. Hind. mainā. A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn.; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Eulabes religiosa of Linn.; the Northern Hill-Myna, Eulabes intermedia of Hay (see Jarlon's Birds, ii. Pt. i. 325, 337, 339). Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly's nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakable truth. There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An. xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shāmā, and under that head the quotation will be found. [Mr. McCrindle (Invasion of India, 186) is in favour of the Myna.]

[1890.—"The Mynah is twice the size of the Shārah, with glossy black plumage, but with the bill, wattles and tail coverts yellow.

It imitates the human voice and speaks with great distinctness."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 121.]

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pica, seu potius Sturnus Indicus. "The owner, an old Mussulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that the beloved bird should get no swine's flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis pessima immediately began to chaunt: Orang Nasarani cator macan babi! i.e. 'Dog of a Christian, eater of swine!'"—Lib. v. cap. 14, p. 67.

[1681.—"In the Duke's chamber there is a bird, given him by Mr. Pierco, the surgeon, comes from the East Indys, black the greatest part, with the finest collar of white about the neck; but talks many things and noyes like the horse, and other things, the best almost that ever I heard him in my life."—Pepys, Diary, April 25. Prof. Newton in Mr. Wheatley's ed. (iv. 118) is inclined to identify this with the Myna, and notes that one of the earliest figures of the bird is by Eleazar Albin (Nat. Hist. of Birds, ii. pl. 33) in 1738.

[1703. — "Among singing birds that which in Bengall is called the Minaw is the only one that comes within my knowledge."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxiv.]

1803.—"During the whole of our stay two minaws were talking almost incessantly, to the great delight of the old lady, who often laughed at what they said, and praised their talents. Her hookah filled up the interval."—Ld. Valentui, i. 227-8.

1813.—"The myneh is a very entertaining bird, hopping about the house, and articulating several words in the manner of the starling."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32.]

1817.—"Of all birds the chiong (miner) is the most highly prized."—Raffles, Java, i. 280.

1876.—"A talking mina in a cage, and a rat-trap, completed the adornments of the veranda."—The Dilemma, ch. xii.

1878.—"The myna has no wit. . . . His only way of catching a worm is to lay hold of its tail and pull it out of its hole, —generally breaking it in the middle and losing the bigger half."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 28.

1879.—"So the dog went to a mainā, and said: 'What shall I do to hurt this cat!'"—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 18.

" . . . beneath Striped squirrels raced, the mynas perked and picked.

The nine brown sisters chattered in the thorn . . ."

See SEVEN SISTERS in Gloss. Mr. Arnold makes too many!

MYROBALAN, s. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of astringent flavour, but of several species, and not even all belonging to the same Natural Order, which were from an early date exported from India, and had a high reputation in the medieval pharmacopoeia. This they appear (some of them) to retain in native Indian medicine; though they seem to have disappeared from English use and have no place in Hanbury and Fluckiger's great work, the Pharmacographia. They are still, to some extent, imported into England, but for use in tanning and dyeing, not in pharmacy.

It is not quite clear how the term myrobalan, in this sense, came into use. For the people of India do not seem to have any single name denoting these fruits or drugs as a group; nor do the Arabic dictionaries afford one either (but see further on). Myrobalan is spoken of by some ancient authors, e.g. Aristotle, Dioscorides and Pliny, but it was applied by them to one or more fruits* entirely unconnected with the subjects of this article. This name had probably been preserved in the laboratories, and was applied by some early translator of the Arabic writers on Materia Medica to these Indian products. Though we have said that (so far as we can discover) the dictionaries afford no word with the comprehensive sense of Myrobalan, it is probable that the physicians had such a word, and García de Orta, who is trustworthy, says explicitly that the Arab practitioners whom he had consulted applied to the whole class the name delegi, a word which we cannot identify, unless it originated in a clerical error for alelegi, i.e. ihlilaj. The last word may perhaps be taken as covering all myrobalans; for according to the Glossary to Rhazes at Leyden (quoted by Dozy, Suppl. i. 43) it applies to the Kibuli, the yellow, and the black (or Indian), whilst the Emblie is also called ihlilaj amlaj.

In the Kashmir Customs Tariff (in Punjab Trade Report, cxcvi.) we have entries of

- "Julela (Myrobalan).
Bulela (Bellorick ditto).
Amla (Embliea Phyllanthus)."

* One of them is generally identified with the seeds of Morone pterygerma—see HORSE RADISH TREE—the Ben-nuts of old writers, and affording Oil of Ben, used as a basis in perfumery.

The kinds recognised in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz. :—

(1) The Emblie myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anacardium, amula of Hind., the Embliea officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L., N. O. Euphorbiaceae). The Persian name of this is amlah, but, as the Arabic amlaj suggests, probably in older Persian ambuj, and hence no doubt Embliea. García says it was called by the Arab physicians embelgi (which we should write ambalji).

(2) The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Bellerica, Roxb. (N.O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind. The Arabic name given in Ibn Baithar is balilij, in the old Latin version of Avicenna belilegi; and in Persian it is called bulil and bulila. García says the Arab physicians called it beleregi (balirij, and in old Persian probably balirig) which accounts for Bellerica.

(3) The Chebulic Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under CHEBULI is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Halila-i-Kabuli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as caliceos got their name from Calicut. García says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs quebulgi. Ibn Baithar calls them halilaj, and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kabuli.

(4) and (5). The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called 'Indian,' and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37), were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognised, and nine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions.* One kind

* This article we have been unable to find. Dr. Hunter in As. Res. (xl. 182) quotes from a Persian work of Mahommed Husain Shirazi, communicated to him by Mr. Colebrooke, the names of 6 varieties of Halila (or Myrobalan) as afforded in different stages of maturity by the Terminalia Chebula:—1. H. Zira, when just set (from Zira, cummin-seed). 2. H. Jawi (from Jaw, barley). 3. Zangi or Hindi (The Black M.). 4. H. Chel. 5. H. Asfur, or Yellow. 6. H. Kabuli, the mature fruit. called Sui or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authorities of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobalans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Medieval Greek authors, referred to by Royle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobalan called Tryphera or Tryphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the triphalā ("Three-fruits") of Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royle, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebulic; but Garcia, who calls it tin-phala (tin-phal in Hind. = "Three-fruits"), seems to imply that it consisted of the three kinds known in Goa, viz. citrine (or yellow), the Indian (or black), and the belleric. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 32 seqq.] The emblic, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumach. The Myrobalans imported in the Middle Ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup ?).

But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. † This is surely not what we now call Cassia Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, affording a mild laxative? But Hanbury and Flückiger (pp. 165, 475) show that some Cassia bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as cassia styraciflua and cassia fistularis; whilst the drug now called Cassia Fistula, L., is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantinople towards A.D. 1300. Pegolotti, at p. 360, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of cassia fistula: "It ought to be black, and thick, and unbroken (alida), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside end is, the riper and better it is; and it retains its virtue well for 2 years." This is not very decisive, but on the whole we should suppose Pegolotti's cassia fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid twigs of a like plant (H. & F. 470).

The city which was the capital of the Hindu kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) dynasty. C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Maisi-ār, Maisi being the name of a local goddess like Pomona or Flora; ār, 'town, village.' It is however usually said to be a corruption of Mahish-āsura, the buffalo demon slain by the goddess Durga or Kali. NABOB, s. Port. Nabábo, and Fr. Nabab, from Hind. Narāb, which is the Ar. pl. of sing. Nayab (see NAIB), 'a deputy,' and was applied in a singular sense* to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz. to a Viceroy or chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e.g. the Narāb of Surat, the Narāb of Oudh, the Narāb of Arcot, the Narāb-Nāzim of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahomedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Rāi and Rājā are upon Hindus.

Nabob is used in two ways: (a) simply as a corruption and representative of Narāb. We get it direct from the Port. nabábo, see quotation from Bluteau below. (b) It began to be applied in the 18th century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Nabob' (Nábob) (1768) aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense miswritten Nawab; thus:

1878. — "These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878. — "If . . . the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our aid of their friends the Turks would have taken the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levies to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashi-Bouzouks, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11, p. 470. In this passage in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob=Naboth, and Naboth=Uriah.

NACODA, NACODER, &c., s. Pers. na-khuda (navis dominus) 'a skipper'; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo.) It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this a "Malay word . . .

NAGA, n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilised clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachār and the basin of the Surma. A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Naga clans is still independent. The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Nāga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. nagna, Hind. nangā, Beng. nengā, &c.), which, curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shihabuddin also indicates. [The word is also used for a class of ascetics of the Dādupanthī sect, whose head-quarters are at Jaypur.]

NAIB, s. Hind. from Ar. ndayāh, a deputy; (see also under NABOB).

[c. 1610.—In the Maldives, "Of these are constituted thirteen provinces, over each of which is a chief called a Nāybe."—Pyrard de Larat, Hak. Soc. i. 195.]

1682.—"Before the expiration of this time we were overtaken by yo Cuddie's Nelp, yo Meribar's (see NEAREBAR) deputy, and yo Dutch Director's Valitt (see VAKEEL) (by the way it is observable yo DUKE omit no opportunity to do us all the prejudices that lies in their power)."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 11; [Hak. Soc. i. 35].

* The word Nāgd is spelt with a nasal n, "Nāngi" (p. 76).

1765.—" . . . this person was appointed Niab, or deputy governor of Orissa."—Hobbes, Hist. Events, i. 53.

[1856.—"The Nalb gave me letters to the chiefs of several encampments, charging them to provide me with horses."—Ferrier, Curatan Journeys, 237.]

NAIK, NAIQUE, &c. s. Hind. naiyak. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. naiyaka, 'a leader, chief, general.' The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour among Hindus in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to a corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

c. 1538.—"Mandon tambem hu Nayque com vinti Ahescins, que nos veio guardando dos ladrões."—Pinto, ch. iv.

1548.—"With these four captains there are 12 naiques, who receive as follows—to wit, for 7 naiques who have 37 pardaos and 1 tanga a year . . . 11,160 reis. For Cidi naique, who has 30 pardaos, 4 tangas . . . and Madguar naique the same . . . and Salgy naique 24 pardaos a year, and two nafars [Ar. nafar, 'servant'] who have 8 vintens a month, equal to 12 pardaos 4 tangas a year."—S. Hoteho, Tombo, 216.

1653.—"To guard against these he established some people of the same island of the Canareses Gentoos with their Naiques, who are the captains of the footmen and of the horsemen."—Barros, Dec. II. Liv. v. cap. 4.

c. 1565.—"Occorse l'anno 1565, se mi ricordo bene, che il Nalc cioè il Signore della Città li mandò a domandami certi cavalli Arabi."—O. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1610.—"Je priay donc ce capitaine . . . qu'il me fit bailler vne almadie ou basteau avec des mariniers et vn Nalque pour truchement."—Mocquet, 289.

1648.—"Il s'appelle Nalque, qui signifie Capitaine, doutant que c'est vn Capitaine du Roy du Narzingue."—Barretto, Rel. du Prov. de Malabar, 255.

(b)—

1698.—"The Kings of Decan also have a custome when they will honour a man or 1787.—"A Troop of Native Cavalry on the present Establishment consists of 1 European subaltern, 1 European sergeant, 1 Subidar, 3 Jemidars, 4 Havildars, 4 Naiques, 1 Trumpeter, 1 Farrier, and 68 Privates."—Regns. for H. Co.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel, &c., 6.

1834.—" . . . they went gallantly on till every one was shot down except the one nalk, who continued hacking at the gate with his axe . . . at last a shot from above . . . passed through his body. He fell, but in dying hurled his axe against the enemy."—Mrs. Maclezie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 37-38.

We may add as a special sense that in West India Naik is applied to the head-man of a hamlet (Kāri) or camp (Tinda) of Brinjarries (q.v.). [Bhangī and Jhangī Naiks, the famous Banjara leaders, are said to have had 180,000 bullocks in their camp. See Benar Gazetteer, 196.]

NAIR, s. Malayal. naiyar; from the same Skt. origin as Naik. Name of the ruling caste in Malabar. [The Greek ναύα as a tract stood for the country of the Nairs. For their customs, see Logan, Malabar, i. 131.]

1510.—“The first class of Pagans in Calicut are called Brahmins. The second are Naeri, who are the same as the gentlefolks amongst us; and these are obliged to bear sword and shield or bows and lances.”—Varkema, pp. 141-142.

1516.—“These kings do not marry . . . only each has a mistress, a lady of great lineage and family, which is called nayro.”—Dutbois, 165.

1553.—“And as . . . the Gentiles of the place are very superstitious in dealing with people foreign to their blood, and chiefly those called Brammanes and Naires.”—Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1563.—“... The Naires who are the Knights.”—Garcia.

1582.—“The Mon of Warre which the King of Calicut and the other Kings have, are Nayres, which be all Gentlemen.”—Cassateia (by N. L.), f. 35b.

1611.—“We have much Christian people throughout his territory, not only the Christians of St. Thomas, who are the best soldiers that he (the King of Cochín) has, but also many other vassals who are converts to our Holy Catholick Faith, through the preaching of the Gospel, but none of these are Nayres, who are his fighting men, and his nobles or gentlemen.”—Socarro, MS., f. 315.

1755.—“The king has disciplined a body of 10,000 Naires; the people of this denomination are by birth the Military tribe of the Malabar coast.”—Orme, i. 400.

1781.—“The soldiers preceded the Nairs or nobles of Malabar.”—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

It may be added that Nayar was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nayar and Nayaka are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see Garcia, 85c).

NALKEE, s. Hind. nalikī. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. [It is still the name of the bride's litter in Behar (Grierson, Bihar Peasant Life, 45).] The name was perhaps a facetious imitation of palikī? [Platts suggests Skt. nalika, ‘a tube.’]

1780.—“A naleky is a paleky, either opened or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders.”—Note by Tr. of Srir Mutaqherin, iii. 269.

[1844.—“This litter is called a ‘nalikī.’ It is one of the three great insignia which the Mogul emperors of Delhi conferred upon independent princes of the first class, and could never be used by any person upon whom, or upon whose ancestors, they had not been so conferred. These were the nalikī, the order of the Fish, and the fan of peacock's feathers.”—Sleeman, Ramiles, ed. T. A. Smith, i. 105.]

NAMBEADARIM, s. Malayal. nambiyadiri, nambiyattiri, a general, a prince. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 121.]

1503.—“Afterwards we were presented to the King called Nambiadara; who received us with no small gladness and kindness.”—Gior. da Empoli, in Ramusio, i. f. 146.

1552.—“This advice of the Nambeadarim was disapproved by the kings and lords.”—Cassanhala; see also Transl. by N. L., 1582, f. 147.

1557.—“The Nambeadarim who is the principal governor.”—D'Albuquerque, Flak. Soc. i. 9. The word is, by the translator, erroneously identified with Nambādīri (see NAMBOOREE), a Malabar Brahman.

1631.—“Entra em Cochim no thalano secreto Aonde Nambodera dormo quieto.” Malaca Conquist. i. 60.

NAMBOOREE, Malayal. nanbādiri, Tam. nambūri; [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. cexi.) gives nambūrtiri, nambūrti, from Drav. nambula, ‘to trust,’ tiri, Skt. śrī, ‘blessed.’ The Madras Gloss. has Mal. nambu, ‘the Veda,’ āthu, ‘to teach,’ tiri, ‘holy.’] A Brahman of Malabar. (See Logan, i. 118 seqq..)

1611.—“No more than any of his Nambures (among Christian converts) who are his padres, for you would hardly see any one of them become converted and baptized because of the punishment that the king has attached to that.”—Bocarro, MS., f. 313.

1727.—“The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both.”—A. Hamilton, i. 312; [ed. 1744].

[1800.—“The Namburis eat no kind of animal food, and drink no spirituous liquors.”—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 420.]

NANKEEN, s. A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from China, and derived its name from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was, however, imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China. Nankeen appears to be known in the Central Asia markets under the modified name of Nanka (see below).

1793-4.—“The land in this neighbourhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe . . . in that growing in the provinces of Kiangnan, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth.”—Stawnton's Narr. of Ld. Macartney's Embassy, ii. 425.

1794-5.—“The colour of Nam-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade. . . The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Nam-King of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler.”—Van Braam's Embassy, E.T. ii. 141.

1797.—“China Investment per Upton Castle. . . Company's broad and narrow Nankeens, brown Nankeen.”—In Seton-Karr, ii. 805.

c. 1809.—“Cotton in this district (Purniya or Purnea) is but a trifling article. There are several kinds mentioned. . . The Kulti is the most remarkable, its wool having the colour of nankeen cloth, and it seems in fact to be the same material which the Chinese use in that manufacture.”—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 244. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 16, 29.]

1838.—“Nanka is imported in the greatest quantity (to Kabul) from Russia, and is used for making the outer garments for the people, who have a great liking to it. It is similar to nankeen cloth that comes to India from China, and is of a strong durable texture.”—Report by Baines, in Punjab Trade Report, App. p. ix. See also p. clxvii.

1848.—“Don't be trying to deprecate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss, Mr. Hammerdown said; 'let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to nature, the gentleman in a nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a banyan tree (see BANYAN-TREE) and a pagoda.”—Vanity Fair, i. 178.

NANKING, n.p. The great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtse-kiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or ‘South Court.’ Peking (‘North Court’) was however re-occupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since. Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chelim) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Conti (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor: “Hinc prope XV. dierum itinere (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking), alia civitas Nemptai nomine, ab imperatore condita, cujus ambitus patet triginta milliariis, eaque est populosissima omnium.” This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix's translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemnai. The form Lankin, &c., is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fuhkien form.

c. 1520.—“After that follows Great China, the king of which is the greatest sovereign in the world. . . The port of this kingdom is called Guanatan, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Comlaka (read Combalal), where the king usually resides.”—Pigafetta's Magellan (Hak. Soc.), p. 156.

c. 1540.—“Thereunto we answered that we were strangers, natives of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the port of Liampo to go to the fishing of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea . . . that we purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rowers in the first Lantea (see LANTEAS) that should put to sea, for to pass unto Cantan. . . .”—Pinto, E.T. p. 99 (orig. cap. xxxi.).

1553.—“Further, according to the Cosmographies of China . . . the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run therefrom in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanqui, Xanton (Shantung), and Quincei” (Kingze or capital, i.e. Pecheli).—Barros, l. ix: 1.

1558.—“Ogni anno va di Persia alla China una grossa Carauana, che camina sei mesi prima ch'arrivi alla Città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte.”—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391e.

NARCONDAM, n.p. The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narkandam one cannot but recognise Narak, 'Hell'; perhaps Naraka-kundam, 'a pit of hell'; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognised in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group" of the Andamans? We have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitous encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell,' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. [See the account of both islands in Ball, Jungle Life, 307 sugg.] The name Barren Island is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Iha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 feet high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E.I. Pilot or Oriental Navigator (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese" in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Iha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are of Narcondam, N. lat.

13° 24', E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 16', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (18 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E.I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island" and "Ayronda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded. The form Ayconda is nearer that found in the following:

1698.—". . . as you put off from the Ilandes of Andaman towards the Coast . . . there lyeth onely in the middle way an Ilande which the inhabitants call Viacondam, which is a small Iland having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linnehoten, p. 323.

The discrepancy in the position of the islands is noticed in D'Anville:

1763.—"Je n'oublierai pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce quo j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne répond point à la position que nos cartes lui donnent. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Reys indique l'île Narcondão ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des îles Cocos, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman; et le rhumb du vent à l'égard de ce point le determine, teste quartu da nordeste, nreya quartu nora para les nordestes, c'est à dire à peu-près 17 degrés de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Françaises, Narcondam s'écarte environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman; et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette île baïse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Eclairc., 141-142.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine depuis Suratte jusqu'au Détroit de Malacca, par le Père P. P. Taclard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam, Isle Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

NARD, s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Jatamansi, D.C., a native of the loftier Himālaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nalāda through Semitic media, whence name of Narsinga, which they learned to apply to the kingdom from his name, continued to be applied to it for nearly two centuries.

1505.—“Hasse notizia delli maggiori Re che hanno nell' India, che è el Re de Narsin, indiano zentil; confina in Estremadura con el regno de Comj (qu. regno Deconij?), el qual Re si è Moro. El qual Re de Narsin tien grande regno; sarà (harà?) ad ogni suo comando 10 mila elefanti, 30 mila cavalli, e infinito numero di genti.”—Lionardo Cu' Maier, 35.

1510.—“The Governor . . . learning of the embassy which the King of Bisnaga was sending to Cananore to the Viceroy, to offer firm friendship, he was most desirous to make alliance and secure peace . . . principally because the kingdom of Narsinga extends in the interior from above Calecut and from the Balagato as far as Cambaya, and thus if we had any wars in those countries by sea, we might by land have the most valuable aid from the King of Bisnaga.”—Correa, ii. 30.

1513.—“Aderant tunc apud nostrū profectū a Narsingae rege legati.”—Emanuel. Reg. Epist. f. 3r.

1516.—“45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very large city which is called Bijanaguer, very populous. . . . The King of Narsinga always resides there.”—Burboa, 65.

c. 1538.—“And she (the Queen of Onor) swore to him by the golden sandals of her yagad that she would rejoice as much should God give him the victory over them (the Turks) as if the King of Narsinga, whose slave she was, should place her at table with his wife.”—F. Mendez Pinto, ch. ix.; see also Cogan, p. 11.

1553.—“And they had learned besides from a Friar who had come from Narsinga to stay at Cananor, how that the King of Narsinga, who was as it were an Emperor of the Gentiles of India in state and riches, was appointing ambassadors to send him . . .”—Barros, I. viii. 9.

1572.—
“ . . . O Reyno Narsinga poderoso Mais de ouro e de pedras, que de forte gento.”—Camões, vii. 21.

By Burton :

“Narsinga's Kingdom, with her rich display Of gold and gems, but poor in martial vein . . .

1580.—“In the Kingdom of Narsingua to this day, the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands; all other wives are burnt at their husbands' funerals.”—Montaigne, by Cotton, ch. xi. (What is here said about priests applies to Lingaits, q.v.).

1611.—“ . . . the Dutch President on the coast of Oloromandell, shewed us a Caul (see COWLE) from the King of Narsinga, Nencapati, Rata, wherein was granted that it should not be lawfull for any one that came out of Europe to trade there, but such as brought Prince Maurice his Patent, and therefore desired our departure.”—P. W. Floris, in Purchas, i. 320.

1681.—“Coromandel. Ciudad muy grande, sugota al Rey de Narsinga, el qual Reyno e llamado por otro nombre Bisnaga.”—Martinez de la Fuente, Compendio, 16.

NASSICK, n.p. Nāsik; Nasika of Ptolemy (vii. i. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavery R., and the head-quarter of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog. Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India. Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1857) have been called by him Nasik squares, and Nasik cubes, from his residence in that ancient place (see Encyc. Britan. 9th ed. xv. 215).

NAT, s. Burmese nat, [apparently from Skt. natha, ‘lord’]; a term applied to all spiritual beings, angels, elfs, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

[1878.—“Indeed, with the country population of Pegu the worship, or it should rather be said the propitiation of the ‘Nāts’ or spirits, enters into every act of their ordinary life, and Buddha’s doctrine seems kept for sacred days and their visits to the kyounng (monastery) or to the pagoda.”—Forbes, British Burma, 222.]

NAUND, s. Hind. nānd. A coarse earthen vessel of large size, resembling in shape an inverted bee-hive, and useful for many economic and domestic purposes. The dictionary definition in Fallon, ‘an earthen trough,’ conveys an erroneous idea.

[1832.—“The ghuri (see GHURRY), or copper cup, floats usually in a vessel of coarse red pottery filled with water, called a nān.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 250.

[1899.—“To prevent the crickets from wandering away when left, I had a large earthen pan placed over them upside down. These pans are termed nānds. They are made of the coarsest earthenware, and are very capacious. Those I used were nearly a yard in diameter and about eighteen inches deep."—Thorahill, Haunts and Hobbies of an Indian Official, 70.]

NAUTCH, s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ball. Hind. and Mahr. natch, from Skt. nritya, dancing and stage-playing, through Prakrit nacheha. The word is in European use all over India. [A poggly nautch (see POGGLE) is a fancy-dress ball. Also see POOTLY NAUTCH.] Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly. In the first of the quotations below he calls Filine the 'European nautch,' which is like calling some Hindu dancing-girl 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

[1809.—"You Europeans are apt to picture to yourselves a Natch as a most attractive spectacle, but once witnessed it generally dissolves the illusion."—Broughton, Letters from a Malabatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 142.]

1823.—"I joined Lady Macmughten and a large party this evening to go to a natch given by a rich native, Kouy-hill Mullich, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, ed. 1814, i. 37.

[1829.—"... a dance by black people which they call a Natch. . . ."—Oriental Sport. Mag. ed. 1873, i. 129.]

c. 1831.—"Elle (Regum Sumrou) fit enterrer vivante une jeune e-clave, dont elle t'ait jalouse, et donna à son mari un nautch (bal) sur cette horrible tonile."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 221.

1872.—

"... let be there was no worst Of degradation spared t'innoc; obtained from first To last, in body and soul, for one lifelong debauch,
The Pariah of the North, the European Nautch!"

T'fine at the Fair, 31.

1876.—

At this bolt which I draw. . . ."
Natural Magic, in Pacchiarotto, &c.

NAUTCH-GIRL, s. (See BAYADERE, DANCING-GIRL.) The last quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

[1809.—"Natch Girls are exempted from all taxes, though they pay a kind of voluntary one monthly to a Mufti."—Broughton, Letters from a Malabatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 113-4.]

1825.—"The Natch women were, as usual, ugly, huddled up in huge bundles of red petticoats; and their exhibition as dull and insipid to an European taste, as could well be conceived."—Heber, ii. 102.

1836.—"In India and the East dancing-girls are trained called Natch, and they give a fascinating entertainment called a natch, for which they are well paid."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 322.

NAVAIT, NAITEA, NEVOYAT, &c., n.p. A name given to Mahomedans of mixt race in the Konkani and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Moplahs (q.v.) and Lubbys of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. [The head-quarters of the Navayats are in N. Canara, and their traditions state that their ancestors fled from the Persian Gulf about the close of the 7th century, to escape the cruelty of a Governor of Iran. See Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 161.] It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. nara, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.' [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Pers. naifi, from Nail, the name of an Arab clan.]

1552.—"Sons of Moors and of Gentile women, who are called Naiteas. . . ."—Covarrubias, iii. 21.

1553.—"Naiteas quosão mestiços: quanto aos padres de geração dos Arabes . . . e perparte das mães das Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

"And because of this fertility of soil, and of the trade of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Naiteas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan. . . ."—Ibid. i. viii. 9.

c. 1612.—"From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowayits (literally the New Race). . . ."—Firishta, by Briggs, iv. 633.

1615.—"... et passim infiniti Mahometani reperiebantur, tum indigenas quos naiteas vocabant, tum externi. . . ."—Jarric, i. 57.

1628.—"There are two sorts of Moors, one Mesticos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethniko-mothers, called Naiteani, Mungrels also in their religion, the other Forreiners. . . ."—Pereira, Pilgrimage, 151.

NAZIR, s. Hind. from Ar. nāzir, 'inspector' (nāzr, 'sight'). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered 'sheriff,' because he serves processes, &c.

1670.—"The Khan . . . ordered his Nassir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants. . . ."—Andrieux, 41.

[1708.—"He especially, who is called Nader, that is the chief of the Mahal . . ."—Catrou, II. of the Mogul Dynasty, E.T. 295.

[1826.—"The Nazir is a perpetual sheriff, and executes writs and summonses to all the parties required to attend in civil and criminal cases."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 118.]

1878.—"The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 204.

[In the following the word represents nak-kāra, 'a kettle-drum.'

1763.—"His Excellency (Nawab Meer Cossim) had not eaten for three days, nor allowed his Nazir to be beaten."—Diary of a Prisoner at Patna, in Wheeler, Early Records, 323.]

NEELĀM, LEELĀM, s. Hind. nīlām, from Port. leilão. An auction or public outcry, as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch roup; comp. Germ. rufen, and outroop of Linschoten's translator below). The word is, however, Oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Ar. nīlām (al-nīlām), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1515.—"Pero d'Alpoym came full of sorrow to Cochin with all the apparel and servants of Afonso d'Albuquerque, all of which Dom Gracia took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the wardrobe, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracia said to D. Aleixo in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old wardrobe of Afonso d'Albuquerque. I can't praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuffs, and that he despised everything but to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 469.

Letter of Fernando Nunes to the King, Sept. 7.

[1554.—"All the spoil of Mombasa that came into the general stock was sold by leilão."—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 13.]

1598.—"In Goa there is holden a daylie assemblie . . . which is like the meeting upō the burse in Andwarpe . . . and there are all kindes of Indian commodities to sell, so that in a manner it is like a Faire . . . it beginneth in y^e morning at 7 of the clocke, and continueth till 9 . . . in the principal streete of the citie . . . and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroop . . . and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought thother and sold to the last pennieworth, in the same outroop, who-soever they be, yea although they were the Viceroyes goodes. . . ."—Linschoten, ch. xxix; [Hak. Soc. i. 184; and compare Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 52, who spells the word Laylon].

c. 1610.—" . . . le mary vient frapper à la porte, dont la femme faisant fort l'estonnée, prie le Portugais de se cacher dans vne petite cuue à porcelaine, et l'ayant fait entror là dedans, et ferme tres bien à clef, ouurt la porte a son mary, qui . . . le laisse tremper là jusqu'au lendemain matin, qu'il fit porter ceste cuue au marché, ou lallan ainsi qu'ils appellent. . . ."—Mequet, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: "O Leilao que se faz cada dia pola menhã na Rua direita de Goa." The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form yelang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form lê-lang and Swatow loylang (see Giles; also Denny's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

NEELGYE, NILGHAU, &c., s. Hind. nīlgāi, nīlgāi, nīlgāi, i.e. 'blue cow'; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antelope tragocamelus (Porax pictus, of Jerdon, [Boselaphus tragocamelus of Blanford, Mammalia, 517]), given from the slaty blue which is its predominant colour. The proper Hind. name of the animal is rojh (Skt. ṛiṣya, or ṛiṣhya).

1663.—"After these Elephants are brought divers tamed Gazelles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Nilgaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elands, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffalos of Bengala . . . to combat with a Leon or Tiger."—Bernier, E.T. p. 84; [ed. Constable, 262; in 218 nilsgaux; in 364, 377, nil-gaux].

1778.—"Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is called neelgow, and is, I believe, unknown in Europe, which he will deliver to you in my name."—Warren Hastings to Sir G. Colbrooke, in Gleig, i. 238.

1821.—"There are not only neelghaus, and the common Indian deer, but some noble red-deer in the park" (at Lucknow).—Heber, ed. 1811, i. 214.

1852.—"All officers, we believe, who have served, like the present writers, on the canals of Upper India, look back on their peripatetic life there as a happy time . . . occasionally on a winding part of the bank one intruded on the solitude of a huge nilgai."—Memo. of General Sir W. L. Baker, p. 11.

NEEM, s. The tree (N.O. Meliaceae) Azadirachta indica, Jussieu; Hind. nim (and nib, according to Playfair, Tales of Sherreef, 170), Mahr. nimb, from Skt. nimbā. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a reputation for various remedial uses. Thus poultices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bahm (see BUCKYNE), on which it grafts readily.

1663.—"R. I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it.

"O. You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great reputation as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with, and the name among them all is nimbo. I came to know its virtue in the Balaghat, because with it I there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal; and these sores were cured very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entirely with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixt with lemon-juice. . . ."—Garriss, i. 153.

1678.—"There is another tree highly medicinal . . . which is called nimbo; and the Malabars call it Bepole [Malayāl. ippu]."—Acosta, 283.

[1813.—". . . the principal square . . . regularly planted with beautiful nym or lym-trees."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445.

[1856.—"Once on a time Guj Singh . . . said to those around him, 'Is there any one who would leap down from that limb tree into the court!'"—Forbes, Rās Mala, ed. 1878, p. 465.]

1877.—"The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints."—Maddox Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

NEGAPATAM, n.p. A seaport of Tanjore district in S. India, written Ndgai-ppattanam, which may mean 'Snake Town.' It is perhaps the Nyaga Nytrópolis of Ptolemy; and see under COROMANDEL.

1531.—"From this he (Cunhall Marcar, a Mahommedan corsair) went plundering the coast as far as Negapatão, where there were always a number of Portuguese trading, and Moorish merchants. These latter, dreading that this pirate would come to the place and plunder them, to curry favour with him, sent him word that if he came he would make a famous haul, because the Portuguese had there a quantity of goods on the river bank, where he could come up. . . ."—Correa, iii. 551.

[1598.—"The coast of Choramandel beginneth from the Cape of Negapatan."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 82.

NEGOMBO, n.p. A pleasant town and old Dutch fort nearly 20 miles north of Colombo in Ceylon; formerly famous for the growth of the best cinnamon. The etymology is given in very different ways. We read recently that the name is properly (Tamil) Nir-Kolumbu, i.e. 'Colombo in the water.' But, according to Emeron Tennent, the ordinary derivation is Mi-gumot, the 'Village of bees'; whilst Burnouf says it is properly Naga-thu, 'Land of Nagas,' or serpent worshippers (see Tennent, ii. 630).

1613.—"On this he cast anchor; but the wind blowing very strong by daybreak, the ships were obliged to weigh, as they could not stand at their moorings. The vessel of Andrea Coelho and that of Nuno Alvarez Teixeira, after weighing, not being able to weather the reef of Negumbo, ran into the bay, where the storm compelled them to be beached; but as there were plenty of people there, the vessel was run up by hand and not wrecked."—Docarro, 42.

NEGRAIS, CAPE, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan. In the charts the extreme south point of the mainland is called Pagoda Point, and the seaward promontory, N.W. of this, Cape Negrais. The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of the native name which the Burmese express as Naga-rit, 'Dragon's whirlpool.' The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old times by some name like Nāgardaśtra. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilised people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Barangūr. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negrais, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negrais, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224-228).

1553.—"Up to the Cape of Negrais, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues."—Burros, i. ix. 1.

1583.—"Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the N.E., and running our course till morning we found ourselves close to the Bar of Negrais, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu."—Caspare Balbi, i. 92.

1586.—"We entered the larre of Negrais, which is a braue barro," &c. (see COSMIN).—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 390.

1613.—"Philip de Brito having sure intelligence of this great armament . . . ordered the arming of seven ships and some ranguicels, and appointing as their commodore Paulo de Rego Pinheiro, gave him precise orders to engage the prince of Arracan at sea, before he should enter the Barra rivers of Negrais, which form the mouth of all those of the kingdom of Pegu."—Boraro, 137.

1727.—"The Sea Coast of Arakan reaches from Xatigam (see CHITTAGONG) to Cape Negrais, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited . . ." (after speaking of "the great Island of Negrais") . . . he goes on, . . . "The other Island of Negrais, which makes the Point called the Cape . . . is often called Diamond Island, because its Shape is a Rhombus. . . . Three Leagues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long . . . conspicuous at all Times by the Sea breaking over them . . . the Rocks are called the Legarit, or in English, the Lizard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20. This reef is the Alagada, on which a noble lighthouse was erected by Capt. (afterwards Lieut.-Gen.) Sir A. Fraser, C.B., of the Engineers, with great labour and skill. The statement of Hamilton suggests that the original name may have been Lagarto. But Alagada, "overflowed," is the real origin. It appears in the old French chart of d'Après as Ile Noÿte. In Dunn it is Negada or Nejada, or Leguado, or Sunkon Island (N. Dir. 1780, 325).

1759.—"The Dutch by an Inscription in Teutonic Characters, lately found at Negrais, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (qu. if not 1627 ?), appear then to have had Possession of that Island."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 93.

1763.—"It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmah, who caused our people at Negrais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition."—Fort William Correspondence, Feb. 18. In Long, 288.

[1819.—"Negraglia." See under MUN-NEEPORE.]

NELLY, NELE. s. Malayāl. nel, 'rice in the husk'; [Tel. and Tam. nelli, 'rice-like']. This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1606.—". . . when they sell nole, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two grains for himself for luck (com superstição), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop."—Gouten, Synodo, i. 52b.

1651.—"NII, that is unpounded rice, which is still in the husk."—Rogeria, p. 95.

1760.—"Champs de nella." See under JOWAUR.

[1796.—"75 parais Nelly."—List of Export Duties, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 265.]

NELLORE, n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil. Nall-ār, 'Good Town.' But the local interpretation is from nel (see NELLY); and in the local records it is given in Skt. as Dhānya-puram, meaning 'rice-town' (Seshagiri Satri). (The Madras Man. (ii. 214) gives Nall-ār, 'Good-town'; but the Gloss. (s.v.) has nellu, 'paddy,' āru, 'village.' Mr. Boswell (Nellore, 687) suggests that it is derived from a nelli chell tree under which a famous lingam was placed.]

c. 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulam to Milāwar, nearly 300 perasangs along the sea coast."—Wandys, in Elliot, iii. 32.

NERBUDDA R., n.p. Skt. Narmada, 'causing delight'; Ptol. Nāmadros; Periplus, Ναμαδρος (amended by Fabricius to Νάμαδος). Dean Vincent's conjectured etymology of Nahr-Budda, 'River of Buddha,' is a caution against such guesses.

c. 1020.—"From Dhār southwards to the R. Nerbadda nine (parasangs); thence to Mahrat-dos . . . eighteen . . ."—Al-Birānī, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerbadda is however doubtful.

c. 1310.—"There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerbadda was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, i. 79.

[1616.—"The King rode to the river of Darbadath."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 413. In his list (n. 539) he has Narbadah.]

1727.—"The next Town of Note for Commerce is Baroach . . . on the Banks of the River Nerdaba."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 145.]

NERCHA, s. Malayūl. nerchcha, 'a vow,' from verb neriya, 'to agree or promise.'

1606.—"They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together . . . and thus they call nercha."—Goutrea, Synodo, f. 63. See also f. 11. This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindus a common form is to feed a lamp before an idol with ghee instead of oil.

NERRICK, NERRUOK, NIRK, &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirakh, vulgarly nirakh, nirikh. A tariff, rate, or price-current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. [The provincial Gazettes still publish periodical lists of current prices, but no attempt is made to fix such by authority.] It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1799.—"I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrick of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of skroffing (see SHROFF). . . ."—Wellington, i. 56.

1800.—"While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrick of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris . . . and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras."—Ibid. i. 67.

[. . .] "Here is established a nirac, or regulation, by which all coins have a certain value affixed to them; and at this rate they are received in the payment of the revenue;

but in dealings between private persons attention is not paid to this rule."—P. Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 279.]

1878.—"On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar 'nerik' or market-rate, had so risen."—Life in the Mafussil, i. p. 33.

NGAPEE, s. The Burmese name, ngapi, 'pressed fish,' of the odorous delicacy described under BALACHONG. [See Forbes, British Burma, 83.]

1855.—"Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngapē at Amarpōora exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubère mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 160.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the Βάπωνες of Ptolemy, and the Lankha Bālus of the oldest Arab Relation. [Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with the Island of the Bell (Nakās) to which Sindbad, the Seaman, is carried in his fifth voyage. (Report on Old Records, 108; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 368).] The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of the 18th century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the Voyage of the Norara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement. Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nakkavāram, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (naṅgā). [Mr. Man (Journ. Anthropol. Institute, xviii. 359) writes: "A possible derivation may be suggested by the following extract from a paper by A. de Candolle (1885) on 'The Origin of Cultivated Plants': 'The presence of the coconut in Asia three or four thousand years ago is proved by several Sanskrit names . . . The Malays have a name widely diffused in the Archipelago, kalapa, klapa, klopa. At Sumatra and Nicobar we find the name njior, nieor, in the Philippines nioq, at Bali, niok, njo. . . While the Nicobars have long been famed for the excellence of their coconuts, the only words which bear any resemblance to the forms above given are ngou, 'a ripe nut,' and ni-nu, 'a half-ripe nut.'"]

c. 1050.—The name appears as Nakkavaram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century.

c. 1282.—"When you leave the island of Java (the Less) and the Kingdom of Lambri, you sail north about 160 miles, and then you come to two islands, one of which is called Necuveran. In this island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 12.

c. 1300.—"Opposite Lamuri is the island of Lakwaram (probably to read Nakwaram), which produces plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover the pudenda with coconut leaves. They are all subject to the Kadn."—Rashid-ud-din, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1322.—"Departing from that country, and sailing toward the south over the Ocean Sea, I found many islands and countries, where among others was one called Nicoveran . . . both the men and women there have faces like dogs, etc. . . ."—Friar Olon, in Calley, &c., 97.

1510.—"In front of the before named island of Samatra, across the Gulf of the Ganges, are 5 or 6 small islands, which have very good water and ports for ships. They are inhabited by Gentiles, poor people, and are called Niconvar (Nacalar in Lisbon ed.), and they find in them very good amber, which they carry thence to Malacca and other parts."—Barbosa, 185.

1514.—"Seeing the land, the pilot said it was the land of Nicubar. . . . The pilot was at the top to look out, and coming down he said that this land was all cut up (i.e. in islands), and that it was possible to pass through the middle; and that now there was no help for it but to chance it or turn back to Cochin. . . . The natives of the country had sight of us and suddenly came forth in great boats full of people. . . . They were all Caffres, with fish-bones inserted in their lips and chin: big men and frightful to look on; having their boats full of bows and arrows poisoned with herbs."—Nicor da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. pp. 71-72.

NIGGER, s. It is an old brutality of the Englishman in India to apply this title to the natives, as we may see from Ives quoted below. The use originated, however, doubtless in following the old Portuguese use of negros for "the blacks" (q.v.), with no malice prepense, without any intended confusion between Africans and Asiatics.

1639.—See quot. from Pinto under COBRA DE CAPELLO, where negroes is used for natives of Sumatra.

1648.—"Moreover three blacks (negros) in this territory occupy lands worth 3000 2 R or 4000 pardaos of rent; [they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts."—S. Jotelho, Cartas, 111.

1582.—"A negroo of John Cambrayes, Pilot to *Pau*lo de la Gama, was that day run away to the Moorees."—Castaneda, by N. L., f. 19.

[1603.—"The King and people niggers."—Danvers, Letters, i. 10.]

1622.—Ed. Grant, purser of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoer of negers, which was derided bytwick the Duch and the English."—Sainsbury, iii. p. 78.

c. 1755.—"You cannot affront them (the natives) more than to call them by the name of negroes, as they conceive it implies an idea of slavery."—Ives, Voyage, p. 23.

c. 1757.—"Gli Gesuiti sono missionarii o parocchi de' negri detti Malabar."—Della Tomba, 3.

1760.—"The Dress of this Country is entirely linnen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned Hides as in England . . . only that they are no thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negroes, and sold for about 10d. a Pr. each of which will last two months with care."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, Sept. 30.

1868.—"Now the political creed of the frequenters of dawk bungalows is too uniform . . . it consists in the following tenets . . . that Sir Mordaunt Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you."—The Dark Bungalow, p. 225.

NILGHERRY, NEILGHERRY, &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malai-ndu, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill sanatoria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nilagiri, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nilu or Nildri (synonymous with Nilagiri) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Puranic Cosmogony (see Vishnu Purana, in Wilson's Works, by Hall, ii. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range about 1820, by some European. [The name was undoubtedly applied by natives to the range before the appearance of Europeans, as in the Kongu-desa Rajakul, quoted by Grigg (Nilagiri Man. 363), and the name appears in a letter of Col. Mackenzie of about 1816 (Ibid. 278). Mr. T. M. Horsfall writes:

"The name is in common use among all classes of natives in S. India, but when it may have become specific I cannot say. Possibly the solution may be that the Nilgiris being the first large mountain range to become familiar to the English, that name was by them caught hold of, but not coined, and stuck to them by mere priority. It is on the face of it improbable that the Englishmen who early in the last century discovered these Hills, that is, explored and shot over them, would call them by a long Skt. name."

Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

"One of the English ships was called the Nellegree, the name taken from the Nello-gree Hills in Bengal, as I have heard."—Dampier, ii. 115.

1652.—"In ye morning early I went up the Nilligree Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley."—Hedges, Diary, March 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

The following also refers to the Orissa Hills.

1762.—"Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Maharrattas, who, 800 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the Nelligree Hills."—In Long, 12.

NIPA, c. Malay nipah.

a. The name of a stemless palm (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastward, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. "In the Philippines," says Crawford, "but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the Nipa. . . is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government" (Desc. Dict. p. 301). But this fact is almost enough to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

b. Arrack made from the sap of a palm tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The

1611.—"Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called Nipa (growing in watery places), and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tanassarim, Malacca, and the Philippine, or Manila; but that of Tanassarim exceeds all in goodness."—Teixeira, Relaciones, i. 17.

1613.—"And then on from the marsh to the Nypeltras or wild-palms of the rivulet of Puet China."—Gedinho de Lerdia, 6.

"And the wild palms called Nypeltras. . . from these flowers is drawn the liquor which is distilled into wine by an alembic, which is the best wine of India."—Ibid. 16.

[1817.—"In the maritime districts, nay, or thatch, is made almost exclusively from the leaves of the nipa or baya."—Raffles, II. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 155.]

1818.—"Steamer amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunds. . . the puddles of the steamer tread up the large fruits of the Nipa fruticans, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey."—Hooks, Himalayan Journals, i. 1-2.

1860.—"The Nipa is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar."—Mason's Burmah, p. 603.

1871.—"It (sugar) is also got from Nipa fruticans, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-regions, extensively cultivated in Tavoy."—Hanbury and Flockiger, 635.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the Nipa spirit.

b.—

c. 1567.—"Every yeere is there lade (at Tenasserim) some ships with Verzino, Nipa, and Benjamin."—Ces. Federici (E.T. in Hall), ii. 359.

1568.—"Nipa, qual' è vn Vno eccellentissimo che nasce nel fior d'un arbore chiamato Niper, il cui liquor si distilla, e so no fa vna beuanda eccellentissima."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, fil. 392r.

1583.—"I Portoghesi e noi altri di questo bando di qua non mangiamo nel Regno di Pegu grano di grano . . . no si beve vino; ma una certa acqua lambiccata da vn albero detto Annippa, ch' è alla bocca assai gustevole; ma al corpo giova o nuoce, secondo le complessioni de gli huomini."—G. Balbi, f. 127.

1591.—"Those of Tannasari are chiefly freighted with Rice and Nipar wine, which is very strong."—Barker's Account of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. ii. 592.

In the next two quotations nipe is confounded with coco-nut spirit.

1598.—"Likewise there is much wine brought thither, which is made of Cocus or Indian Nattes, and is called Nype de Tanasaria, that is Aqua-Composita of Tanasaria."—Linchoten, 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

"The Sura, being distilled, is called Fula" (see FOOL'S RACK) or Nipe, and is an excellent Aqua Vitæ as any is made in Dort."—Ibid. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

[1616.—"One jar of Neepo."—Foster, Letters, iv. 162].

1623.—"In the daytime they did nothing but talk a little with one another, and some of them got drunk upon a certain wine they have of raisins, or on a kind of aqua vitæ with other things mixt in it, in India called nippa, which had been given them."—P. della Valle, ii. 669; [Hak. Soc. ii. 272].

We think there can be little doubt that the slang word nip, for a small dram of spirits, is adopted from nipa. [But compare Dutch nippen, 'to take a dram.' The old word nippitatum was used for 'strong drink'; see Stanh. Dict.]

NIRVĀNA, s. Skt. nirvāna. The literal meaning of this word is simply 'blown out,' like a candle. It is the technical term in the philosophy of the Buddhists for the condition to which they aspire as the crown and goal of virtue, viz. the cessation of sentient existence. On the exact meaning of the term see Childers's Pali Dictionary, s.v. nibbāna, an article from which we quote a few sentences below, but which covers ten double-column pages. The word has become common in Europe along with the growing interest in Buddhism, and partly from its use by Schopenhauer. But it is often employed very inaccurately, of which an instance occurs in the quotation below from Dr. Draper. The oldest European occurrence of which we are aware is in Purchas, who had met with it in the Pali form common in Burma, &c., nibban.

1628.—"After death they (the Talapoyes) beleve three Places, one of Pleasure Scuun (perhaps sukham) like the Mahumitate Paradise; another of Torment Naxac (read Narac); the third of Annihilation which they call Niba."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 506.

c. 1815.—". . . the state of Niban, which is the most perfect of all states. This consists in an almost perpetual extacy, in which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Dangermann, Burmese Empire, p. 6.

1838.—". . . Transience, Pain, and Unreality . . . these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is exemption from these in the attainment of nirvāna, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, absolute nothingness; or whether it be, as Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the ubi or the modus in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognizant of."—Fule, Mission to Ava, 236.

"When from between the sad trees at Kusināra he passed into nirvāna, he (Buddha) ceased, as the extinguished fire ceases."—Ibid. 239.

1869.—"What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular view of the Nirvāna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul into itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvāna suggests rather a kind of Mohanmodan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Lecture on Buddhistical Nihilism, in Tribner's Or. Record, Oct. 16.

1875.—"Nibbānam. Extinction; destruction; annihilation; annihilation of being, Nirvāna; annihilation of human passion, Arhatship or final sanctification. . . . In Tribner's Record for July, 1870, I first propounded a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvāna is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhatship ends."—Childers, Pali Dictionary, pp. 205-206.

"But at length reunion with the universal intellect takes place; Nirvāna is reached, oblivion is attained . . . the state in which we were before we were born."—Draper, Conflict, &c., 122.

1870.—
 "And how—in fulness of the times—it fell
 That Buddha died . . .
 And how a thousand thousand eons since then Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvāna where the Silence lives."
Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, 237.

NIZAM, THE, n.p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizam,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizam-ul-Mulk, was the title of Asaf Jah, the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzeb, who became Subadar (see SOUBADAR) of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamaluco. And the circumstances originating the Hyderabad dynasty were parallel. At the death of Asaf Jah (in 1748) he was independent sovereign of a large territory in the Deccan, with his residence at Hyderabad, and with dominions in a general way corresponding to those still held by his descendant.

NIZAMALUCO, n.p. Izam Maluco is the form often found in Correa. One of the names which constantly occur in the early Portuguese writers on India. It represents Nizam-ul-Mulk (see NIZAM). This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bahmani king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamaluco. Their own title was Nizam Shah, and this also occurs as Nizamozza. [Linschoten's etymology given below is an incorrect guess.]

1521.—"Meanwhile (the Governor Diego Lopes do Sequoira) . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamaluco, Lord of the lands of Choul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cambaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamaluco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, li. 623.

c. 1539. — "Tratado do Contrato que o V. Mo. Rey Dom Garcia do Noronha fez com Ju Niza Muxaa, que d'antes se chamava Ju Niza Maluquo."—Tombo, in Subsídios, 115.

1543. — "Izam maluco." See under COTAMALUCO.

1553. — "This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamaluco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Decan (which we corruptly call Dequena). . . . The Nizamaluco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Decan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar. . . ."—Barros, li. ii. 7.

1563. — ". . . This King of Dely conquered the Decan (see DECCAN) and the Canem (see CONCAM); and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Rumis, Coraonis, and Arabs, and he divided his kingdom into captaincies, bestowing upon Ad-tham (whom we call Adalam—see IDALCAN) the coast from Angediva to Cufardam . . . and to Nizamaluco the coast from Cufardam to Negotana. . . ."—Garcia, f. 31r.

"F. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamozza, as you often use that term to me.

"O. At once I tell you he is a King in the Balaghat (see BALAGHAUT) (Bazila for Balaghat), whose father I have often attended, and sometimes also the son. . . ."—Ibid. f. 33r.

[1591-5. — "Nizám-ul-Mulkhiya." See under IDALCAN.

[1598. — "Maluco is a Kingdome, and Niza a Lance or Speare, so that Niza Maluco is as much as to say as the Lance or Speare of the Kingdom."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172. As if Niza-ul-mulki, 'spear of the kingdom.')

NOKAR, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants' Hind. naukar, from Pers. and naukar-log. Also naukar-chakar, 'the servants, one of those jingling double-barrelled phrases in which Orientals delight even more than Englishmen (see LOOTY). As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, highly-tightly, higgledy-piggledy, hocus-pocus, tit for tat, topsy-turvy, harum-scarum, roly-poly, fiddle-faddle, rump and stump, slip-slop. In this case chäkur (see CHACKUR) is also Persian. Naukar would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz. According to I. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der Völker Mittel Asiens, p. 96, nükur is in Mongol, 'a comrade, dependent, or friend.'

c. 1407.—"L'Emir Khodaidad fit partir avec ce député son serviteur (naukar) et celui de Mirza Djihanghir. Ces trois personages joignent la cour auguste. . . ."—Abdurrazak, in Notices et Extraits, XIV. i. 146.

c. 1660.—"Mahmūd Sultān . . . understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his 'naukars' (apparently armed followers)."—Abulghāzi, by Desmaisons, 271.

[1810.—"Noker." See under CHACKUR.

[1831.—"Its (Balkh) present population does not amount to 2000 souls; who are chiefly . . . the remnant of the Kara Nukur, a description of the militia established here by the Afghans."—Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, i. 238.]

1810.—"Noker, 'the servant'; this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chinghiz Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration."—Hammr, Golden Horde, 460.

NOL-KOLE, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as Kol-rabi, kohl-rabi, 'cabbage-turnip.' It is the Brassica oleracea, var. caulorapa. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part. I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his Bombay Products spells it Knolkhol. It is apparently Dutch, 'Knollkool,' 'Turnip-cabbage; Choucrure of the French.'

NON-REGULATION, adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department), in which the ordinary Laws (or Regulations, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable. The original theory of administration in such Provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the hands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between Regulation and Non-regulation Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:—"La Non-intervention est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin à-peu-près la même chose que l'Intervention."

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie's visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: "It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be Non-regulation."

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a Non-regulation Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1860.—" . . . Nowo what ye ffolke of Bengala worscheypen Sir Jhono discourseth lityl. This mocho weo gadero. Somo worscheypin ano Idole yeloit Regulationn and some worscheypen Non-regulation (seluti Gog et Hagog). . . ."—Ext. from a MS. of The Travels of Sir John Munderill in the E. Indies, lately discovered.

1867.—" . . . We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicily wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great mensura as a 'non-regulation' province."—Quarterly Review, Jan. 1867, p. 135.

1883.—"The Delhi district, happily for all, was a non-regulation province."—Life of Ed. Lawrence, i. 44.

NORIMON, s. Japanese word. A sort of portable chair used in Japan.

[1615.—"He kept himself close in a noromon."—Cock's Diary, i. 161.]

1618.—"As we were going out of the towne, the street being full of hackneymen and horses, they would not make no way to passe, but fell a quarrelling with my noremmoners, and offered me great abuse. . . .—Cock's Diary, ii. 99; [noremmoners in ii. 23].

1768-71.—“Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like them, and is called a norimon.”—Starovius, E.T. i. 321.

NOR-WESTER, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a ‘dust-storm’ at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. (See TYPHOON.)

1810.—“... the violent squalls called ‘north-westers,’ in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter. . . . The force of these north-westers is next to incredible.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 35.

[1827.—“A most frightful nor’ wester had come on in the night, every door had burst open, the peals of thunder and torrents of rain were so awful. . . .”—Mrs. Panton, Diary, 93.]

NOWBEHAR, n.p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus in the early history of the Mahomedans in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Naurihar (Nara-rihara, ‘New Monastery’). And the same name occurs at Balkh, near the Oxus. (See VIHARA.)

NOWROZE, s. Pers. nan-rōz, ‘New (Year’s) Day’; i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees. [For instances of such celebrations at the vernal equinox, see Frazier, Pausanias, iv. 75.]

c. 1590.—“This was also the cause why the Nauruz i Jalali was observed, on which day, since his Majesty’s accession, a great feast was given. . . . The New Year’s Day feast . . . commences on the day when the Sun in his splendour moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Farvardin).”—Atw., ed. Hockmann, i. 183, 270.

[1614.—“Their Noroose, which is an annual feast of 20 days continuance kept by the Moors with great solemnity.”—Foster, Letters, iii. 65.

[1615.—“The King and Prince went a hunting . . . that his house might be fitted against the Noroose, which began the first Newe Moon in March.”—Sir T. Roe, Hink. Soc. i. 138; also see 142.]

1638.—“There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies; one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Naurus, Nauros, or Norose, which signifies nine days, though now it lasts eight or at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries.”—Mandavilo, 41.

1673.—“On the day of the Vernal Equinox, we returned to Gombroon, when the Moors introduced their New-Year Feet (see EED) or Noe Rose, with Banqueting and great Solemnity.”—Fryer, 306.

1712.—“Nestat Naurus, i.e. vertentis anni initium, incidens in diem aequinoctii vernali. Non legalis est, sed ab antiquis Persis haereditate accepta festivitas, omnium caeterarum maxima et sollemnissima.”—Kaempfer, Am. Exot. 162.

1815.—“Jemshed also introduced the solar year; and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Nauroze, or new year’s day, and is still the great festival in Persia.”—Malcolm, II. of Persia, i. 17.

1832.—“Now-roz (new year’s day) is a festival or eed of no mean importance in the estimation of Mus-ulman society. . . . The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days’ previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled paper; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for now-roz.”—Mrs. Mier Hassan Ali, Obs., on the Musulmans of India, 283-4.

NOWSHADDER, s. Pers. naushādar (Skt. naṁśāra, but recent), Sal-ammoniac, i.e. chloride of ammonium.

c. 1500.—We find this word in a medieval list of articles of trade contained in Capmany’s Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App. 74) under the form nozadro.

1543.—“Salarmoniaco, cioè liaciadro, o non si dà nè sacco ne cassa con esso.”—Pegolotti, p. 17; also see 67, &c.

[1831.—“Sal ammoniac (nowchadr) is found in its native state among the hills near Juzak.”—Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, ii. 166.]

NUDDEEA RIVERS, n.p. See under HOOGLY RIVER, of which these are branches, intersecting the Nadiya District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Ganges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.

NUGGURKOTE, n.p. Nagarkot. This is the form used in olden times, and even now not obsolete, for the name of the ancient fortress in the Punjab Himalaya which we now usually know by the name of Kot-kāgra, both being substantially the same name, Nagarkot, 'the fortress town,' or Kot-kā-nagara, 'the town of the fortress.' [If it be implied that Kāngra is a corruption of Kot-kā-nagara, the idea may be dismissed as a piece of folk-etymology. What the real derivation of Kāngra is is unknown. One explanation is that it represents the Hind. khunkhara, 'dried up, shrivelled.'] In yet older times, and in the history of Mahmūd of Ghazni, it is styled Bhim-nagar. The name Nagarkot is sometimes used by older European writers to designate the Himalayan mountains.

1003.—"The Sultan himself (Mahmūd) joined in the pursuit, and went after them as far as the fort called Bhim-nagar, which is very strong, situated on the promontory of a lofty hill, in the midst of impassable waters."—Al-Utbi, in Elliot, i. 34.

1337.—"When the sun was in Cancer, the King of the time (Mahmūd Tughlak) took the stone fort of Nagarkot in the year 738. . . . It is placed between rivers like the pupil of an eye . . . and is so impregnable that neither Sikandar nor Dara were able to take it."—Badr-i-chuch, ibid. iii. 570.

c. 1370.—"Sultan Firoz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot, and passing by the valleys of Nākhach-nuhgarhi, he arrived with his army at Nagarkot, which he found to be very strong and secure. The idol Jwāmukhi (see JOWAULLA MOOKHEE), much worshiped by the infidels, was situated in the road to Nagarkot. . . ."—Shams-i-Sirdi, ibid. iii. 317-318.

1398.—"When I entered the valley on that side of the Siwālik, information was brought to me about the town of Nagarkot, which is a large and important town of Hindustān, and situated in these mountains. The distance was 30 kos, but the road lay through jungles, and over lofty and rugged hills."—Autobiog. of Timur, ibid. 465.

1553.—"But the sources of these rivers (Indus and Ganges) though they burst forth separately in the mountains which Ptolemy calls Imaur, and which the natives call Julanguer and Nangracot, yet are these mountains so closely joined that it seems as if they sought to hide these springs."—Jarrois, i. iv. 7.

c. 1690.—"Nagerkote is a city situated upon a mountain, with a fort called Kanagrah. In the vicinity of this city, upon a lofty mountain, is a place called Mahamāy (Mahāmāyā), which they consider as one of the works of the Divinity, and come in pilgrimage to it from great distances, thereby obtaining the accomplishment of their wishes. It is most wonderful that in order to effect this, they cut out their tongues, which grow again in the course of two or three days. . . ."—Agen, ed. Gladden, ii. 119; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 312].

1609.—"Bordering to him is another great Raias called Tulburk Chand, whose chiefs City is Negerecoat, 80 c. from Lahor, and as much from Syrinan, in which City is a famous Pagod, called Je or Durga, unto which worlds of People re-sort out of all parts of India. . . . Divers Moors also resort to this Peor. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 433.

1616.—"27. Nagra Cutt, the chiefs Citie so called. . . ."—Terry, in Purchas, ii.; [ed. 1777, p. 82].

[c. 1617.—"Nakarkutt."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 531.]

c. 1676.—"The caravan being arriv'd at the foot of the Mountains which are call'd at this day by the name of Naugrocot, abundance of people come from all parts of the Mountain, the greatest part whereof are women and maids, who agree with the Merchants to carry them, their Goods and provisions cross the Mountains. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 183; [ed. Bail, ii. 293].

1788.—"Koto Kangrah, the fortress belonging to the famous temple of Nagorecote, is given at 49 royal coses, equal to 99 G. miles, from Sirhind (northward)."—Rennell, Memoir, ed. 1793, p. 107.

1809.—"At Patanacote, where the Padshah (so the Sikhs call Ranjee) is at present engaged in preparations and negotiations for the purpose of obtaining possession of Coto Caungrah (or Nagar Cote), which place is besieged by the Raja of Nepaul. . . ."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 217.

NUJEEB, s. Hind. from Ar. najīb, 'noble.' A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native Governments; also at one time a kind of militia under the British; receiving this honorary title as being gentlemen volunteers.

[c. 1790.—"There were 1000 men, nud-jeaves, sword men. . . ." Evidence of Sheikh Mohammed, quoted by Mr. Plumer, in Trial of W. Hastings, in Bomb. iii. 393.

1796.—"The Nezibs are Matchlock men."—W. A. Tonn, A Letter on the Mahratta People, Bombay, 1798, p. 50.]

1813.—"There are some corps (Mahratta) styled Nujeob or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 46; [2nd ed. i. 343].

[" " "A corps of Nujeobs, or infantry with matchlocks. . . ."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 11.

[1817.—"In some instances they are called Nujeeb (literally, Noble) and would not design to stand sentry or perform any fatiguing duty."—V. Blacker, Mem. of the Operations in India in 1817-18, p. 22.]

NULLAH, s. Hind. nallā. A watercourse; not necessarily a dry watercourse, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian use.

1778.—"When the water falls in all the nullahs. . . ."—Halhed's Code, 52.

c. 1785.—"Major Adams had sent on the 11th Captain Hebbert . . . to throw a bridge over Shinga nullah."—Carraccioli, Life of Clive, i. 93.

1789.—"The ground which the enemy had occupied was entirely composed of sandhills and deep nullahs. . . ."—Munro, Narrative, 22A.

1799.—"I think I can show you a situation where two embrasures might be opened in the bank of the nullah with advantage."—Wellington, Despatches, i. 26.

1817.—"On the same evening, as soon as dark, the party which was destined to open the trenches marched to the chosen spot, and before daylight formed a nullah . . . into a large parallel."—Mull's Hist. v. 377.

1843.—"Our march tardy because of the nullahs. Watercourses is the right name, but we get here a slip-slop way of writing quite contemptible."—Life of Sir C. Napier, ii. 310.

1860.—"The real obstacle to movement is the depth of the nullahs hollowed out by the numerous rivulets, when swollen by the rains."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 574.

NUMDA, NUMNA, s. Hind. namda, namdā, from Pers. namad, [Skt. namata]. Felt; sometimes a woollen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as Ar. namat, 'a coverlet,' spread on the seat of a sovereign, &c.

[1774.—"The apartment was full of people seated on Namets (felts of camel hair) spread round the sides of the room. . . ."—Hanway, Hist. Account of British Trade, i. 226.]

1815.—"That chief (Temugin or Chingiz), we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or nummud, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 410.

[1819.—"A Kattie throws a numda on his mare."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 278.]

1823.—"In a two-poled tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woollen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Koollee Khan, upon a coarse numud. . . ."—The Kuzilbash, i. 254.

[1850.—"The natives use (for their tents) a sort of woollen stuff, about half an inch thick, called 'numbda'. . . . By the bye, this word 'numbda' is said to be the origin of the word nomade, because the nomade tribes used the same material for their tents" (1)—Letter in Notes and Queries, 1st ser. i. 342.]

NUMERICAL AFFIXES, CO-EFFICIENTS, or DETERMINATIVES.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawfurd:

"In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Alai, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, &c.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Bantal, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Biji, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks," and so on. Crawfurd names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 file of soldiers, 100 sail of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; inasmuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!

To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages, including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tête (de bœuf), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese piec. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikaner!'

* Other terms applied have been Numeralia, Quantitative Auxiliaries, Numeral Auxiliaries, Segregatives, &c.

The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawford as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oos, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, 'divinities,' priests, &c.; Yauk, 'a male,' to rational beings not divine; Gauug, 'a brute beast,' to irrational beings; Pya implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, &c.; Lun, implying rotundity, to eggs, loaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboos, hands, feet, &c.; Treng and Gyaung, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, &c.

The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numeral-affix* (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the piec, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numerical affix ("Two piec cooly," "three piec dollar," &c.).

This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Korean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese.

It is found in several languages of C. America; i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahuatl of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the co-efficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahuatl or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Tell (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g. eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, &c., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things; also for walls and furrows:

Tlamantli (from mana, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, &c., also for speeches and sermons:

Olalt (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see IV. r. Humboldt, Kairi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here. I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages. In Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Korean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 40; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such an extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz. difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern book, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes speedily apparent that he is unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of two dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, as far as number is concerned, with that of two fingers."—(Wilson's Pre-historic Man, 1st ed. ii. 470.) [Also see Taylor, Primitive Culture, 2nd ed. i. 232 seq.].

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numeral co-efficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of mumchis, who delight in what seemed to me, before my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the wilful surplussage (e.g.) of two 'sheets' (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, &c.; three 'persons' (nafar) of bar-kandāzes; five 'rope' (rat) of buffaloes; ten 'chains' (zanjir) of elephants; twenty 'grips' (labza) of swords, &c. But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the mumchi's repertory till I found it displayed in Mr. Carnegie's Kachahri Technicalities, under the head of Muhāwara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find adad ('number') used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; dāna ('grain') with pearls and coral beads; dast ('hand') with falcons, &c.; shields, and robes of honour; jild (volume, lit. 'skin') with books; muhār ('nose-bit') with camels; kita ('portion,' 'piecey') with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; manzil ('a-stage on a journey, an alighting place') with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdās, &c.; siz ('an instrument') with guitars, &c.; silk ('thread') with necklaces of all sorts, &c. Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmanli Turki-h.*

NUNCATIES, s. Rich cakes made by the Mahommedans in W. India chiefly imported into Bombay from Surat. [There is a Pers. word, nūn-hatāi, 'bread of Cathay or China,' with which this word has been connected. But Mr. Weir, Collector of Surat, writes that it is really nūn-hatāi, Pers. nūn, 'bread,' and Mahr. Hat, hat, 'six'; meaning a special kind of cake composed of six ingredients—wheat-flour, eggs, sugar, butter or ghee, leaven produced from toddy or grain, and almonds.]

[1819.—"An old-fashioned nuth or nose-ring, stuck full of precious or false stones."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Ind. i. 231.

[1832.—"The nut (nose-ring) of gold wire, on which is strung a ruby between two pearls, worn only by married women."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Ohsa i. 45.]

NUT PROMOTION, s. From its supposed indigestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite desert dish. [See Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 29.]

NUZZER, s. Hind. from Ar. nazr or nazar (prop. nadhār), primarily 'a vow or votive offering'; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of in'ām. The root is the same as that of Nazārite (Numbers, vi. 2).

[1765.—"The congratulatory nazra, &c., shall be set opposite my ordinary expenses; and if ought remains, it shall go to Poplar, or some other hospital."—Letter of Id. (Vive, Sept. 30, in Perele, Vie de Bengal, 127.

* Some details on the subject of these denominatives, in reference to languages on the eastern border of India, will be found in Prof. Max Müller's letter to Bunsen in the latter's Outlines of the Phil. of Universal History, i. 390 seq.; as well as in W. von Humboldt, quoted above. Prof. Max Müller refers to Humboldt's Complete Works, vi. 402; but this I have not been able to find, nor, in either writer, any suggested rationale of the idiom.

[c. 1775.—"The Governor lays before the board two bags . . . which were presented to him in mizzers. . . ."—Progs. of Council, quoted by Fox in speech against W. Hastings, in Donn, iv. 201.]

1782.—"Col. Monson was a man of high and hospitable household expenses; and so determined against receiving of presents, that he would not only not touch a nazier (a few silver rupees, or perhaps a gold mohor) always presented by country gentlemen, according to their rank. . . ."—Price's Tracts, ii. 61.

1785.—"Presents of ceremony, called nuzzers, were to many a great portion of their subsistence. . . ."—Letter in Life of Colbrook, 16.

1786.—Tippoo, even in writing to the French Governor of Pondichery, whom it was his interest to conciliate, and in acknowledging a present of 500 muskets, cannot restrain his insolence, but calls them "sent by way of nuzz."—Select Letters of Tippoo, 377.

1809.—"The Aumil himself offered the nuzzur of fruit."—Ld. Valentia, i. 453.

[1832.—"I . . . looked to the Meer for explanation; he told me to accept Muckabeg's 'nuzza.'"—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observers, i. 193.]

1870.—"The Standard has the following curious piece of news in its Court Circular of a few days ago:—

'Sir Salar Jung was presented to the Queen by the Marquis of Salisbury, and offered his Muggur as a token of allegiance, which her Majesty touched and returned.'"—Punch, July 15.

For the true sense of the word so deliciously introduced instead of Nuzzer, see MUGGUR.

O

OART, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. ortu (now more usually horta). "Any man's particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahim or Girgaum is spoken of as his oart." (Sir G. Birdwood).

1561.—" . . . o mo praz de fazer moreo a dita cidade emfatiada para sempre que a ortaliça dos ortas dos moradores Portuguezes o christãos que nesta cidade de Goa a ilha té . . . possam vender. . . ." &c.—Proclamation of Dom Sebastian, in Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 2, 157.

c. 1610.—"Il y a vn grand nombre de Palmiers ou ortas, comme vous diriez ici de nos vergers, pleins d'arbres de Cocos, plantez bien pres à pres; mais ils ne viennent qu'à lieux aquatiques et laç. . . ."—Pgrart de Laval, ii. 17-18; [Hak. Soc. ii. 28].

1613.—"E os naturaes habitão ao longo do ryo do Malaca, em seus pomares e orthas."—Godinho de Erediu, 11.

1673.—"Old Goa . . . her Soil is luxurious and Campaign, and abounds with Rich Inhabitants, whose Rural Palaces are immured with Groves and Hortos."—Eryer, 151.

[1749.—" . . . as well Yargens (Port. vargem, 'a field') lands as Hortas."—Letter in Logan, Malabar, iii. 48.]

c. 1760.—"As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grove, i. 47.

1793.—"For sale. . . That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Beal; it is situated in a most lovely Oart. . . ."—Hyndby Courier, Jan. 12.

OBANG, s. Jap. Oh'o-ban, lit. 'greater division.' The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the kobang (q.v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 gr. troy. First issued in 1680, and last in 1860. Tavernier has a representation of one.

[1662.—"A thousand Oobans of gold, which amount to forty seven thousand Thaïs, or Crowns."—Mandelslo, i. T. Bk. ii. 117 (Stanf. Dict.).

[1859.—"The largest gold coin known is the Obang, a most inconvenient circulating medium, as it is nearly six inches in length, and three inches and a half in breadth."—Elephant, Narrative of Mission, ii. 232.]

OLD STRAIT, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salat Tambran, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor's Straits (q.v.).

1727.—" . . . Jokort Lami, which is sometimes the Place of that King's Residence, and has the Benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeans the Straights of Singapore, but by the Natives Salata de Brea" (i.e. Salat Tambran, as above).—A. Hamilton, ii. 92; [ed. 1744].

1800.—“The Old Straits, through which formerly our Indianmen passed on their way to China, are from 1 to 2 miles in width, and except where a few clearings have been made . . . with the shores on both sides covered with dense jungle . . . doubtless, in old times, an isolated vessel . . . must have kept a good look out against attack from piratical prahus darting out from one of the numerous creeks.”—Cunnagh, Rem. of an Indian Official, 285-6.

OLLAH, s. Tam. olai, Mal. ola. A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed cadjan (q.v.). In older books the term ola generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order. A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barbosa as follows:—

1516.—“The King of Calicut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king's revenue, and his army, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same time, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens of iron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and where-over they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands . . . and amongst these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men hold in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of paper under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves.”—Pp. 110-111, Hak. Soc., but translation modified.

1653.—“All the Gentiles of India . . . when they wish to commit anything to written record, do it on certain palm-leaves which they call olla, of the breadth of two fingers.”—Barros, l. ix. 3.

“All the rest of the town was of wood, thatched with a kind of palm-leaf, which they call ola.”—Ibid. l. iv. vii.

1561.—“All this was written by the king's writer, whose business it is to prepare his olas, which are palm-leaves, which they use for writing-paper, scratching it with an iron point.”—Correa, i. 212-213. Correa uses the word in three applications: (a) for a palm-leaf as just quoted; (b) for a palm-leaf letter; and (c) for (Coco) palm-leaf thatch.

1663.—“ . . . in the Maldiva Islands they make a kind of vessel which with its nails, its sails, and its cordage is all made of palm; with the fronds (which we call olla in Malavar) they cover houses and vessels.”—Garcia, l. 67.

1590.—“I answered that I was from Venice, that my name was Gasparo Balbi . . . and that I brought the emeralds from Venice expressly to present to his majesty, whose fame for goodness, courtesy, and greatness flow through all the world . . . and all this was written down on an olla, and read by the aforesaid 'Master of the Word' to his Majesty.”—G. Balbi, l. 101.

“But to show that he did this as a matter of justice, he sent a further order that nothing should be done till they received an olla, or letter of his sign manual written in letters of gold; and so he (the King of Pegu) ordered all the families of those nobles to be kept prisoners, even to the women big with child, and the infants in bands, and so he caused the whole of them to be led upon the said scaffolding; and then the king sent the olla, ordering them to be burnt; and the Decagiri executed the order, and burned the whole of them.”—Ibid. l. 112-113.

[1509.—“Savles which they make of the leaves, which leaves are called Olla.”—Laticheten, Hak. Soc. ii. 45.

[1611.—“Two Ollahs, one to Gimya Rajan. . . .”—Danvers, Letters, i. 164.]

1626.—“The writing was on leaves of Palme, which they call Olla.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 551.

1673.—“The houses are low, and thatched with ollas of the Cocoo-Trees.”—Fryer, 66.

c. 1690.—“ . . . Ola peculiariter Malabarica dicta, et inter alia Papyri loco adhibetur.”—Rumphius, i. 2.

1718.—“ . . . Damulian Leaves, commonly called Olen.”—Prop. of the Gospel, &c., iii. 37.

1760.—“He (King Alompra) said he would give orders for Ollas to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to me.”—Capt. Altes, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. l. 377.

1806.—“Many persons had their Ollahs in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand.”—Berhanan, Christian Res. 2nd ed. 70.

1860.—“The books of the Singalese are formed to-day, as they have been for ages past, of olas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm.”—Tenney, Ceylon, i. 512.

1870.—“ . . . Un manuscrit sur ollas. . . .”—Revue Critique, June 11, 374.

OMEDIWAUR, s. Hind. from Pers. ummedwār (ummed, umed, ‘hope’); literally, therefore, ‘a hopeful one’; i.e. ‘an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request.’ (Wilson.)

1810.—"The thoughts of being three or four years an omeedwar, and of staying out here till fifty doteded mo."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 344.

OMLAH, s. This is properly the Ar. pl. 'amalut, 'amald, of 'amil (see AUMIL). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

c. 1778.—"I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Mon. J. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 167.

1866.—"At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fast which it is necessary they shall keep with great solemnity."—Erskine, The Jewel Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 390.

The use of an English plural, omlahs, here is incorrect and unusual; though omlahs is used (see next word).

1878.—"... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Mofessil, ii. 6.

OMRAH, s. This is properly, like the last word, an Ar. pl. (Umar, pl. of Amir—see AMEER), and should be applied collectively to the higher officials at a Mahomedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that Court; and indeed in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a Hind. plural umardaydn, 'omrahls.' From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Mansabddrs (see MUNSUBDAR), from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umard-i-kabir, or umara-i-'izdn, 'Great Amirs'; and these would be the Omrahs properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amir-ul-Umar (Ain, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

1616.—"Two Omrahs who are great Commanders."—Sir T. Roe.

[" " "The King lately sent out two Vmbras with horse to fetch him in."—Ibid. Hist. Soc. ii. 417; in the same page he writes 'mreis, and in ii. 445, 'mraes.]

c. 1630.—"Howbeit, out of this prodigious rent, goes yearly many great payments: to his Leiftenants of Provinces, and Vmbrayes of Townes and Ports."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 55.

1638.—"Et sous le commandement de plusieurs autres seigneurs de ceux qu'ils apellent Ommeraues."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, p. 174.

1653.—"Il y a quantité d'elephants dans les Indes . . . les Omras s'en enrent par grandeur."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1661.—"It is not to be thought that the Omrahs, or Lords of the Mogul's Court, are sons of great Families, as in France . . . these Omrahs then are commonly but Adventurers and Strangers of all sorts of Nations, some of them slaves; most of them without instruction, which the Mogul thus raiseth to Dignities as he thinks good, and degrades them again, as he pleaseth."—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 211].

c. 1666.—"Les Omras sont les grands seigneurs du Royaume, qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Thevenot, v. 307.

1673.—"The President . . . has a Noise of Trumpets . . . an Horse of State led before him, a Mirchal (see MORCHAL) (a Fan of Ostrich Feathers) to keep off the Sun, as the Ombrahs or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

1678.—

"Their standard, planted on the battlement, Despair and death among the soldiers sent;

You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall,
And shouts of victory pursued the fall."

1727.—"You made several complaints against former Governors, all of which I have here from several of my Umbras."—Firmán of Aurangzib, in A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1714, i. 231].

1791.—"... les Omrahs ou grands seigneurs Indiens. . . ."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chauxvêtre Indienne, 32.

OMUM WATER, s. A common domestic medicine in S. India, made from the strong-smelling carminative seeds of an umbelliferous plant, Carum copticum, Benth. (Ptychotis coplica, and Ptych. Ajowan of Decand.), called in Tamil omam, [which comes from the Skt. yamadni, yavini, in Hind. ajwain.] See Hanbury and Flückiger, 209.

OOJYNE, n.p. Ujjayani, or, in the modern vernacular, Ujjain, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.

The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglio in the interpretation of the Arabian geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Azin, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Arin, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the "Cupola of Arin or Arym," or the "Cupola of the Earth" (Al-kubba al-ardh) became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth's circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Arin bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Isles, it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Arin (or of Lanka, i.e. Ceylon). (See quotation from the Aryabhatta, under JAVA.) They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Arin along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below), a confusion between Arin and Syene. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the Ἑσπρία ἑμπόριον of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Arin. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Azin. Many conjectures were vainly made as to the origin of Arym, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned of it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Arin was simply a corruption of Ujjain. Even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, inasmuch that the word Arin had been adopted as a generic name for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Torjani, quoted below).

c. A.D. 150.—"Ὁ Ἰννὴ βασιλεὺς Τισσαροῦ."—Ptol. VII. i. 63.

c. 930.—"The Equator passes between east and west through an island situated between Hind and Habash (Abyssinia), and a little south of these two countries. This point, half way between north and south is cut by the point (meridian) half way between the Eternal Islands and the extremity of China; it is what is called The Cupola of the Earth."—Maṣ'ūdī, i. 180-181.

c. 1020.—"Les Astronomes . . . ont fait correspondre la ville d'Odjein avec le lieu qui dans le tableau des villes inséré dans les tables astronomiques a reçu le nom d'Arin, et qui est supposé situé sur les bords de la mer. Mais entre Odjein et la mer, il y a près de cent yodjanus."—Al-Birānī, quoted by Reinaud, Intro. to Abulfeda, p. ccxlv.

c. 1267.—"Meridianum vero latus Indiae descendit a tropico Capricorni, et secat aequinoctialem circulum apud Montem Maleum et regiones ei continentes et transit per Syene, quae nunc Arym vocatur. Nam in libro cursuum planetarum dicitur quod duplex est Syene; una sub solstitio . . . alia sub aequinoctiali circulo, de qua nunc est sermo, distans per 10 gradus ab occidentale, sed magis ab oriente elongatur propter hoc, quod longitudo habitabilis major est quam medietas coeli vel terrae, et hoc versus orientem."—Roger Bacon, Opus Majus, ed. OOLOOBALLONG, s. Malay, Ulu-balang, a chosen warrior, a champion. [Mr. Skeat notes: "ulu or ulu certainly means 'head,' especially the head of a Raja, and balang probably means 'people'; hence ulu-balang, 'men of the head,' or 'body-guard.'"]

c. 1516.—"Four of twelve gates that were in the Town were opened, thorough each of the which sallied forth one of the four Captaines with his company, having first sent out for Spies into the Camp six Orobalons of the most valiant that were about the King. . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 260.

OOPLAH, s. Cow dung patted into cakes and dried and stacked for fuel. Hind. vplā. It is in S. India called bratty (q.v.).

1672.—"The allowance of cowdung and wood was—for every basket of cowdung, 2 cakes for the Gentu Pagoda; for Peddingag the watchman, of every baskett of cowdung, 5 cakes."—Orders at Ft. St. Geo., Notes and Exts. i. 56.

[Another name for the fuel is kupit.]

[1809.—" . . . small flat cakes of cow-dung, mixed with a little chopped straw and water, and dried in the sun, are used for fuel; they are called kundhas. . . ."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 168.]

This fuel which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus:—

1789.—"We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do dirals (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.

1863.—A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 212, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

[For the use of this fuel, in Tartary under the name of argols, see Huc, Travels, 2nd ed. i. 23. Numerous examples of its use are collected in 8 ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 226, 277, 377, 417.

OORDOO, s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urdā means properly the 'camp of a Tartar Khān, and is, in another direction, the original of our word horde (Russian orda), [which, according to Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 30, note), "is now commonly used by the Russian soldiers and Cossacks in a very amusing manner as a contemptuous term for an Asiatic"]. The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littré) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khāns of the House of Batu at Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into French by Voltaire in his Orphelin de la Chine. But Littré quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urda is now used in Turkistan, e.g. at Tashkend, Khokhand, &c., for a 'citadel' (Schuyler, loc. cit. i. 30). The word urda, in the sense of a royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Delhi was styled urda-i-mu'alka, 'the Sublime Camp.' The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zaban-i-urda, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urdū. On the Peshawar frontier the word urda is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

OORIAL, Panj. arial, Ovis cycloceros, Hutton, [Ovis vignei, Blanford (Mam-malia, 497), also called the Shā]; the wild sheep of the Salt Range and Sulimāni Mountains.

OORIYA, n.p. The adjective 'pertaining to Orissa' (native, language, what not); Hind. Ūṛiya. The proper name of the country is Ōdra-dēśa, and Ōr-dēśa, whence Ōr-īya and Ūr-īya.
["The Ooryah bearers were an old institution in Calcutta, as in former days palankeens were chiefly used.

is stated that they were in the habit of carrying to their homes every year sums of money sometimes as much as three lakhs made by their business"] (Carey, Good Old Days of Honble. John Company, ii. 148).]

OOTACAMUND, n.p. The chief station in the Neigherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hottaga-mand (see Metz, Tribes of the Neigherries, 6). [Mr. Grigg (Man. of the Nilagiris, 6, 189), followed by the Madras Gloss., gives Tam. Ottagamandu, from Can. ottai, 'dwarf bamboo,' Tam.
kay, 'fruit,' mandu, 'a Toda village.']

OPAL, s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek, ὀπάλιος, Skt. upala, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Skt.
word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

OPIUM, s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. [The etymology accepted by Platts, Skt. akhipheni, 'snake venom' is not probable.] But from the Greek ὄπιον the Arabs took afyān which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The collection of the σπῆς, or juice of the poppy-capsules, is mentioned by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 77), and Pliny gives a pretty full account of the drug as opion (see Hambury and Plüchiger, 40). The Opium-poppy was introduced into China, from Arabia, at the beginning of the 9th century, and its earliest Chinese name is A-fu-yung, a representation of the Arabic name. The Arab. afyān is sometimes corruptly called afin, of which afin, 'imbecile,' is a popular etymology. Similarly the Bengalees derive it from afi-heno, 'serpent-home.' [A number of early references to opium smoking have been collected by Burnell, Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 113.]

c. A.D. 70.—" . . . which juice thus drawne, and thus prepared, hath power not onely to provoke sleepe, but if it be taken in any great quantitie, to make men die in their sleepe: and this our Physicians call opion. Certes I have knowne many come to their death by this meanes; and namely, the father of Licinius Ceeinna late deceased, a man by calling a Pretour, who not being able to endure the intolerable pains and torments of a certaine disease, and being wearie of his life, at Bilbil in Spaine, shortened his owne daies by taking opium." —Pliny, in Holland's transl. ii. 68.

"Quod vomit a Thobis, opio laudem perhibebis; Naribus horrorendum, rufum laus dictat emendum."

Otho Cremonensis.

1511.—"Next day the General (Albuquerque) sent to call me to go ashore to speak to the King; and that I should say on his part . . . that he had got 8 Guzarate ships that he had taken on the way because they were enemies of the King of Portugal; and that there had many rich stuffs and much merchandize, and arfiun (for so they call opio lebaico) which they eat to cool themselves; all which he would sell to the King for 300,000 ducats worth of goods, cheaper than they could buy it from the Moors, and more such matter." —Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Storico Italiano, 65.

1516.—"For the return voyage (to China) they ship there (at Malacca) Sumatra and Malabar pepper, of which they use a great deal in China, and drugs of Cambay, much ansam, which we call opium. . . ." —Barbosa, 206.

1563.—"N. I desire to know for certain about amfiao, what it is, which is used by the people of this country; if it is what we call opium, and whence comes such a quantity as is expended, and how much may be eaten every day!

"O . . . that which I call of Cambaia come for the most part from one territory which is called Malvi (Malwa). . . . I know a secretary of Nizamoxa (see NIZAMALUCO), a native of Coricou, who every day eat three tollas (see TOLA), or a weight of 101 cruzados . . . though he was a well educated man, and a great scribe and notary, he was always dozing or sleeping; yet if you put him to business he would speak like a man of letters and discretion; from this you may see what habit will do." —Garcia, 153r to 155r.

1568.—"I went then to Cambaya . . . and there I bought 60 parcels of Opium, which cost me two thousand and a hundred duckets, every ducket at four shillings two pence." —Master C. Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 371. The original runs thus, showing the looseness of the translation: " . . . comprai sesenta man d'Anfion, che mi costò 2100 ducati sorafini (see XERAPHINE), che a nostro conto possono valere 5 lire l'uno." —In Ramusio, iii. 396r.

1598.—"Amfion, so called by the Portingales, is by Arabians, Moors, and Indians called Affion, in Latine Opio or Opium. . . . The Indians use much to eat Amfion. . . . Hee that useth to cate it, must cate it daylie, otherwise he dieth and consumeth himselfe . . . likewise hee that hath never eaten it, and will venture at the first to cate as much as those that dayly use it, it will surely kill him. . . ." —Linschoten, 124; [Hakl. Soc. ii. 112].

1639.—"Turcae opium exportantur, etiam in bona quantitate, innoxium et confortativum; adeo ut etiam ante praelia ad fortitudinem illud sumant; nobis vero, nisi in parva quantitate, et cum bonis correctivis lethalis est." —Bacon, II. Vitae et Mortis (ed. Montagu) x. 188.

1641.—"The principal cause that this monarch, or rather say, this tyrant, is so powerful, is that he holds in his territories, and especially in the kingdom of Cambaya, those three plants of which are made the Ansam, and the anil (see ANILE), and that which gives the Atgodam (Cotton). —Docarro, 188.

1694.—"This people, that with amphioea or opium, mixed with tobacco, drink themselves not merely drunk but mad, are wont to fall furiously upon any one whom they meet, with a naked kris or dagger in the hand, and to stab him, though it be but a child, in their mad passion, with the cry of Amock (see A MUCK), that is 'strike dead,' or 'fall on him.' . . ." —Valentijn, iv. (China, &c.) 124.

1726.—"It will hardly be believed . . . that Java alone consumes monthly 350 packs of opium, each being of 136 catis (see CATTY), though the E. I. Company make 145 catis out of it. . . ."—Valentijn, iv. 61.

1727.—"The Chiefs of Calcutt, for many years had vended between 500 and 1000 chests of Bengal Ophium yearly up in the inland Countries, where it is very much used."—A. Hamilton, i. 315; [ed. 1744, i. 317 seq.].

1770.—"Patna . . . is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 lbs. . . . An excessive fondness for opium prevails in all the countries to the east of India. The Chinese emperors have suppressed it in their dominions, by condemning to the flames every vessel that imports this species of poison."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 424.

ORANGE, s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is in fact an ingenious medieval fabrication. The word doubtless came from the Arab. nāranj, which is again a form of Pers. nārang, or nāraŋgi, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Skt. nāgarāṅga, and nāraṅga, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanscritized from some southern term. Sir W. Jones, in his article on the Spikenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamul dictionary, most words beginning with nar have some relation to fragrance; as narukeradu, to yield an odour; nārtum pillei, lemon-grass; nārtai, citron; nārtā manum (read mārum), the wild orange-tree; nārum panai, the Indian jasmine; nārum alleri, a strong smelling flower; and nārtu, which is put for nard in the Tamul version of our scriptures." (See As. Res. vol. ii. 414). We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam naṛu is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. E. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vii. 114 seqq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwāl and Sikkim, as well as in the Kāsiā (see COSSYA) country, the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 336 seqq.] It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 111-112).

From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got repārřiow, the Spaniards naranja, old Italian narancia, the Portuguese laranja, from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article), we have the Ital. arancio, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupantur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first place from Hehn, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulce) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a re-introduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Abulfeda extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lisbonne est la ville de Schintara; à Schintara on recueille des pommes admirables pour la grosseur et le gout" (244†). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1873, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Lahore, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Punjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

doubted. For Baber (Autobiog. 328) describes an orange under the name of Sangtarah, which is, indeed, a recognised Persian and Hind. word for a species of the fruit. And this early propagation of the sweet orange in Portugal would account not only for such wide diffusion of the name of Cintra, but for the persistence with which the alternative name of Portugals has adhered to the fruit in question. The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is portogallo, and nothing else; in Greece propoyada, in Albanian protokale, among the Kurds portoghāl; whilst even colloquial Arabic has burūkān. The testimony of Mas'ūdi as to the introduction of the orange into Syria before his time (c. A.D. 930), even if that were (as it would seem) the Seville orange, renders it quite possible that better qualities should have reached Lisbon or been developed there during the Saracenic occupation. It was indeed suggested in our hearing by the late Sir Henry M. Elliot that sangtarah might be interpreted as sang-tar, 'green stones' (or in fact 'moist pips'); but we hardly think he would have started this had the passage in Abulfeda been brought to his notice. [In the Āin (ed. Gladwin, 1800, ii. 26) we read: "Sircar Silhet. . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Sontara, in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form." This passage reads in Col. Jarrett's translation (ii. 124): "There is a fruit called Santarah in colour like an orange but large and very sweet." Col. Jarrett disputes the derivation of Sangtarah from Cintra, and he is followed by Mr. H. Beveridge, who remarks that Humayun calls the fruit Sanatra. Mr. Beveridge is inclined to think that Santra is the Indian hill name of the fruit, of which Sangtarah is a corruption, and refers to a village at the foot of the Bhutan Hills called Santra-batī, because it had orange groves.]

A.D. c. 930.—"The same may be said of the orange-tree (Shajr-ul-nāranj) and of the round citron, which were brought from India about the year (A.H.) 300, and first sown in 'Omnan. Thence they were transplanted to Basra, to 'Irāk, and to Syria. . . but they lost the sweet and penetrating odour and beauty that they had in India, having no longer the benefits of the climate, soil, and water peculiar to that country."—Ma'ādi, ii. 433-4.

c. 1220.—"In parvis autem arboribus quoadam crescent alia poma citrina, minoris quantitatis frigida et acidi seu pontici (bitter) saporis, quae poma orengeas ab indigenis nuncupantur."—Jacobus Vitricus, in Dongars. These were apparently our Seville oranges.

c. 1290.—"In the 18th of Edward the first a large Spanish Ship came to Portsmouth; out of the cargo of which the Queen bought one frail (see FRAZALA) of Seville figs, one frail of raisins or grapes, one bale of dates, two hundred and thirty pomegranates, fifteen citrons, and seven oranges (Poma de orenge)."—Manners and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th Centuries, Roxb. Club, 1811, p. xlviii. The Editor deigns only to say that 'the MS. is in the Tower.' [Prof. Skeat writes (9 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 321): "The only known allusion to oranges, previously to 1400, in any piece of English literature (I omit household documents) is in the 'Alliterative Poems,' edited by Dr. Morris, ii. 1044. The next reference, soon after 1400, is in Lydgate's 'Minor Poems,' ed. Halliwell, p. 15. In 1440 we find orange in the 'Promptorium Parvulorum,' and in 1470 we find oranges in the 'Paston Letters,' ed. Gairdner, ii. 301."] 1481.—"Item to the galeman (galley man) brought the lampreis and oranges. . . ibid."—Household Book of John D. of Norfolk, Roxb. Club, 1814, p. 33.

c. 1526.—"They have besides (in India) the nāranj [or Seville orange, Tr.] and the various fruits of the orange species. . . It always struck me that the word nāranj was accented in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so; the men of Bajour and Siwād call nāranj, nārānk (or perhaps rather nārang).—Baber, 328. In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was nārang, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into nāranj.

1883.—"Sometimes the foreign products thus cast up (on Shetland) at their doors were a new revelation to the islanders, as when a cargo of oranges was washed ashore on the coast of Delting, the natives boiled them as a new kind of potatoes."—Saty. Review, July 14, p. 57.

ORANG-OTANG, ORANG-OUTAN, &c. s. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simia Satyrus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, ōrang-ūdan, 'homo sylvaticus.' The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mias. Crawford says that it is never called orang-utan by 'the natives.' But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognised specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a tame hooluck belonging to a gentleman in E. Bengal, which was habitually known to the natives as jangli dilmi, literally = orang-utan. [There seems reason to believe that Crawford was right after all. Mr. Scott (Malayan Words in English, p. 87) writes: "But this particular application of orang-utan to the ape does not appear to be, or ever to have been, familiar to the Malays generally; Crawford (1852) and Swettenham (1889) omit it, Pijnappel says it is 'Low Malay,' and Klinkert (1893) denies the use entirely. This uncertainty is explained by the limited area in which the animal exists within even native observation. Mr. Wallace could find no natives in Sumatra who 'had ever heard of such an animal,' and no 'Dutch officials who knew anything about it.' Then the name came to European knowledge more than 260 years ago; in which time probably more than one Malay name has faded out of general use or wholly disappeared, and many other things have happened." Mr. Skeat writes: "I believe Crawford is absolutely right in saying that it is never called orang-utan by the natives. It is much more likely to have been a sailor's mistake or joke than an error on the part of the Malays who know better. Throughout the Peninsula orang-utan is the name applied to the wild tribes, and though the mauras or mias is known to the Malays only by tradition, yet in tradition the two are never confused, and in those islands where the mauras does exist he is never called orang-utan, the word orang being reserved exclusively to describe the human species."]

1668.—"Erat autem hic satyrus quadrupes: sed ab humana specie quam prae se fert, vocatur Indus Orang-outang: sive homo silvestris."—Licetus de Monstris, 338.

[1701. — "Orang-outang sive Homo Sylvestris: or the Anatomy of a Pygmie compared with that of a Monkey, an Ape, and a Man. . . ."—Title of work by R. Tyson (Scott).]

1727.—"As there are many species of wild Animals in the Woods (of Java) there is one in particular called the Oran-Outang."—A. Hamilton, ii. 131; [ed. 1744, ii. 136].

1783.—"Were we to be driven out of India this day, nothing would remain to tell that it had been possessed, during the inglorious period of our dominion, by any thing better than the ourang-outang or the tiger."—Burle, Sp. on Fox's E. India Bill, Works, ed. 1852, iii. 468.

1802.—"Man, therefore, in a state of nature, was, if not the ourang-outang of the forests and mountains of Asia and Africa at the present day, at least an animal of the same family, and very nearly resembling it."—Rilton, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, pp. 13-14.

1811.—"I have one slave more, who was given me in a present by the Sultan of Pontiana. . . . This gentleman is Lord Monboddoo's genuine Orang-outang, which in the Malay language signifies literally wild man. . . . Some people think seriously that the oran-outang was the original patriarch and progenitor of the whole Malay race."—Lord Minto, Diary in India, 268-9.

1868.—"One of my chief objects . . . was to see the Orang-utan . . . in his native haunts."—Wallace, Malay Archip. 33.

In the following passage the term is applied to a tribe of men:

1881.—"The Jacoons belong to one of the wild aboriginal tribes . . . they are often styled Orang Utan, or men of the forest."—Carewagh, Rem. of an Indian Official, 291.

ORANKAY, ARANGKAIO, &c.
s. Malay Orang kaya. In the Archipelago, a person of distinction, a chief or noble, corresponding to the Indian omrah; literally 'a rich man,' analogous therefore to the use of riche-homme by Joinville and other old French authors. [Mr. Skeat notes that the terminal o in arangkaio represents a dialectical form used in Sumatra and Java. The Malay leader of the Pahang rising in 1891-2, who was supposed to bear a charmed life, was called by the title of Orang Kaya Pahlawan (see PULWAUN).]

c. 1612.—"The Malay officers of state are classified as 1. Bandahara; 2. Perdana Mantri; 3. Pungulu Bandari; 4. the chief Ulu-balang or champion (see OOLOO-BALLONG); 5. the Paramantri; 6. Orang Kayas; 7. Chatriyas (Kahatriyas); 8. Seda Sidahs; 9. Pentaras or heralds; 10. Mulu-balangs."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 216.

1711.—“Two Pieces of Callico or Silk to the Shabander (see SHABUNDER), and head Orankoy or Minister of State.”—Lockyer, 36.

1727.—“As he was entering at the Door, the Orankay past a long Lance through his Heart, and so made an end of the Beast.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 97; [ed. 1744, ii. 96].

“However, the reigning King not expecting that his Customs would meet with such Opposition, sent an Orangkaya aboard of my Ship, with the Linguist, to know why we made War on him.”—Ibid., 106; [ed. 1744].

1784.—“Three or four days before my departure, Posally signified to me the King meant to confer on me the honour of being made Knight of the Golden Sword, Orang Kayo derry piddang mas” (orang kaya duri piddang mas).—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 61.

1811.—“From amongst the orang kayas the Sultan appoints the officers of state, who as members of Council are called mantri (see MUNTREE, MANDARIN).”—Marsden, II. of Sumatra, 350.

[ORGAN, s. An Oriental form of mitrailleuse. Steingass (Dict. 38) has Pers. arghan, arghon, from the Greek ὀργανον, ‘an organ.’

1790.—“A weapon called an organ, which is composed of about thirty-six gun barrels so joined as to fire at once.”—Letter from De Boigne's Camp at Mairha, dated Sept. 13, in H. Compton, A particular Account of the European Military Adventures of Hindustan, from 1784 to 1803, p. 61.]

ORISSA, n.p. [Skt. Odrashtu, ‘the land of the Odras’ (see OORIYA). The word is said to be the Prakrit form of uttara, ‘north,’ as applied to the N. part of Kalinga.] The name of the ancient kingdom and modern province which lies between Bengal and the Coromandel Coast.

1516.—“Kingdom of Orisa. Further on towards the interior there is another kingdom which is conterminous with that of Narsynga, and on another side with Bengala, and on another with the great Kingdom of Dely. . . .”—Barbosa, in Lisbon ed. 306.

c. 1568.—“Orisa fu già vn Regno molto bello e sicuro . . . , sinà che regnò il suo Rd legitimo, qual era Gentile.”—Ces. Federici, Ramusio, iii. 392.

[c. 1616.—“Vdeza, the Chief City called Iekanat (Juggernaut).”—Sir T. Roe, II. Soc. ii. 538.]

ORMESINE, s. A kind of silk texture, which we are unable to define. The name suggests derivation from Ormus. [The Draper's Dict. defines “Armozeen, a stout silk, almost invariably black. It is used for handkerchiefs and scarfs at funerals by those not family mourners. Sometimes sold for making clergymen's gowns.” The N.E.D. s.v. Armozeen, leaves the etymology doubtful. The Stanf. Dict. gives Ormuzine, “a fabric exported from Ormuz.”]

c. 1566.—“... a little Island called Tana, a place very populous with Portugals, Moores and Gentiles: these have nothing but Rice; they are makers of Armesie and weavers of pirdles of wooll and bumbast.”—Ces. Federici, in Hakl. ii. 341.

1726.—“Velvet, Damasks, Armosyn, Sattyn.”—Valentijn, v. 183.

ORMUS, ORMUZ, n.p. Properly Harmuz or Hurmuz, a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbas or Gombroon (q.v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerūn or Jerūn, which may be identified with the Organa of Nearchus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Albuquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1516, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shāh 'Abbās, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1622. The place was destroyed by the Persians, and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain. The islands of Hormuz, Kishm, &c., as well as Bandar 'Abbās and other ports on the coast of Kerman, had been held by the Sultans of Omān as fiefs of Persia, for upwards of a century, when in 1854 the latter State asserted its dominion, and occupied those places in force (see Badger's Imams of Omān, &c., p. xciv.).

n.c. c. 325.—"They weighed next day at dawn, and after a course of 100 stadia anchored at the mouth of the river Anamis, in a country called Hormozela."—Arrian, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxxiii., tr. by M'Grindle, p. 202.

c. A.D. 150.—(on the coast of Carmania)

"Ἀρμουζα πόλις."

"Ἀρμουζον ἄκρον."

Pol. VI. viii. 5.

c. 540.—At this time one Gabriel is mentioned as (Nestorian) Bishop of Hormuz (see Assemani, ii. 147-8).

c. 655.—"Nobis . . . visum est nihilominus velut ad sepulchrum mortuorum, quales vos esse video, geminos hosce Dei Sacerdotes ad vos allegare; Theodorum videlicet Episcopum Hormuzdadschir et Georgium Episcopum Susatrae."—Syriac Letter of the Patriarch Jesajabus, ibid. 133.

1298.—"When you have ridden these two days you come to the Ocean Sea, and on the shore you find a City with a harbour, which is called Hormos."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xix.

c. 1330.—". . . I came to the Ocean Sea. And the first city on it that I reached is called Ormes, a city strongly fenced and abounding in costly wares. The city is on an island some five miles distant from the main; and on it there grows no tree, and there is no fresh water."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 56.

c. 1331.—"I departed from 'Omān for the country of Hormuz. The city of Hormuz stands on the shore of the sea. The name is also called Moghistān. The new city of Hormuz rises in face of the first in the middle of the sea, separated from it only by a channel 3 parangs in width. We arrived at New Hormuz, which forms an island of which the capital is called Jaraun. . . . It is a mart for Hind and Sind."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 230.

1442.—"Ormus (qu. Hurmāz), which is now called Djerin, is a port situated in the middle of the sea, and which has not its equal on the face of the globe."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XV. Cent. p. 5.

c. 1470.—"Hormuz is 4 miles across the water, and stands on an Island."—Athan. Nikitin, ibid. p. 8.

1503.—"Habitant autem ex eorum (Francorum) gento homines fere viginti in urbe Cananoro: ad quos profecti, postquam ex Hormizda urbe ad eam Indorum civitatem Cananorum venimus, significavimus illis nos esse Christianos, ne-tramque conditionem et gradum indicavimus; et ab illis magno cum gaudio suscepti sumus. . . . Eorundem autem Francorum regio Portugallus vocatur, una ex Francorum regionibus; eorumque Rex Emanuel appellatur; Emmanuelem oramus ut illum custodiat."—Letter from Nestorian Bishops on Mission to India, in Assemani, iii. 551.

1505.—"In la bocha di questo mare (di Persia) è vn altra insula chiamata Agramuzo douo sono perlo infinite: (e) caualli che per tutto quello parti sono in grua precio."—Letter of K. Emanuel, p. 14.

1572.—

"Mas vò a illa Gerum, como discobro O quo fazem do tempo os intervallos; Quo da cidade Armaza, que alli estere Kila o nome depois, e gloria tovo."

Cambes, x. 103.

By Burton:

"But see yon Gerum's isle the tale unfold of mighty things which Time can make or mar; for of Armaza-town yon shore upon the name and glory this her rival won."

1575.—"Touchant le mot Ormuz, il est moderne, et luy a esté imposé par les Portugais, le nom venant de l'accident de ce qu'ils cherchoient que c'estoit que l'Or; tellement qu'e-tant arrivés là, et voyans le trafic de tous biens, auquel le pais abonde, ils dirent l'esi esta Or mucho, c'est à dire, Il y a force d'Or; et pource ils donnerēt le nom d'Ormucho à la dite isle."—A. Thuret, Cosmographie Univ., liv. x. i. 329.

1623.—"Non volli lasciar di andare con gl' Inglesi in Hormuz a veder la forteza, la città, e ciò che vi era in fine di notabile in quell' isola."—P. della Valle, ii. 463. Also see ib. 61.

1667.—

"High on a throne of royal state, which far Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind,
Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold."

Paradise Lost, ii. 1-4.

OROMBARROS, s. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-baharu, or orang bharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India. [Mr. Skeat remarks that the form of the word shows that it came from the Malay under Portuguese influence.]

1711.—At Madras . . . "refreshments for the Men, which they are presently supply'd with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Pony at the first coming of Orombarros, as they call those who have not been there before."—Lockyer, 28.

ORTOLAN, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandrella brachydactyla, Temin., in Hind. bargel and bageri, [Skt. varga, 'a troop']. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pyrrhalanda grisea, Scopoli.

OTTA, OTTER, s. Corruption of ātā, 'flour,' a Hindi word having no Skt. original; [but Platts gives Skt. ādra, 'soft']. Popular rhyme:

"At tori Shokhawnti Adhā ātā ādhā matti!"

"Confound this Shokhawnti land,
My bread's half wheat-meal and half sand."

Boileau, Tour through Rajecara,
1837, p. 274.

[1853.—"After travelling three days, one of the prisoners bought some ottah. They prepared bread, some of which was given him; after eating it he became insensible. . . ."—Lane Report, in Chester, Ind. Mtd. Jurispr. 166.]

OTTO, OTTER, s. Or usually 'Otto of Roses,' or by imperfect purists 'Attar of Roses,' an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Ghazipur on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. 'itr, 'perfume.' From this word are derived 'attār, a 'perfumer or druggist,' 'attārī, adj., 'pertaining to a perfumer.' And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Lattarini, 'the street of the perfumers' shops.' We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1573.—"Issuing thence to the Cayzerio by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called of the Atarin, which is the Spicery."—Marmal, Africa, ii. f. 88.

[Itr of roses is said to have been discovered by the Empress Nūr-jahān on her marriage with Jahāngīr. A canal in the palace garden was filled with rose-water in honour of the event, and the princess, observing a scum on the surface, caused it to be collected, and found it to be of admirable fragrance, whence it was called 'itr-i-Jahāngiri.]

1712.—Known for enumerating the departments of the Royal Household in Persia names: "Pharmacoporia . . . Atthar chonak, in qua medicamenta, et praesertim variae virtutis opiata, pro Majestate et aulicis praeparantur. . . ."—Am. Exot. 124.

1769.—"To presents given, &c.

"1 otter box set with diamonds
"Sicca Rs. 3000 . . . 3222 3 6," Acts. of Entertainment to Juggel Set, in Long, 89.

c. 1790.—"Elles ont encore une prédilection particulière pour les huiles odoriférantes, surtout pour celle de rose, appelée otta."—Haugner, ii. 122.

1821.—"The attar is obtained after the rose-water is made, by setting it out during the night and till sunrise in the morning in large open vessels exposed to the air, and then skimming off the essential oil which floats at the top."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 151.

OUDE, OUDE, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhya (Skt. 'not to be warred against'), the capital of Rāma, on the right bank of the river Sarayu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow for about 170 years (from c. 1732) has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawābs, and from 1814 kings, of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country reconquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Lieut.-Governorship of the N.W. Provinces. (See JUDEA.)

n. c. x.—"The noble city of Ayodhya crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and besprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Rāma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow's sun."—Rāmāyana, Bk. iii. (Ayodhya Kanda), ch. 3.

636.—"Departing from this Kingdom (Kanyākubja or Kannauj) he (Hwen Tsang) travelled about 600 li to the S.E., crossed the Ganges, and then taking his course southward he arrived at the Kingdom of Oyut'o (Ayodhya)."—P'ieris Bonaldh. ii. 267.

1255.—"A peremptory command had been issued that Malik Kutlug Khān . . . should leave the province of Awadh, and proceed to the fief of Bharā'ij, and he had not obeyed. . . ."—Tabaqāt-i-Nāsiri, E.T. by Racerty, 107.

1289.—"Mu'izzu-d dīn Kai-Kubād, on his arrival from Dohli, pitched his camp at Oudh (Ajudhya) on the bank of the Ghagra. Nasiru-d din, from the opposite side, sent his chamberlain to deliver a message to Kni-Kubad, who by way of intimidation himself discharged an arrow at him. . . .—Amir Khusrû, in Elliot, iii. 530.

c. 1335.—“The territories to the west of the Ganges, and where the Sultan himself lived, were afflicted by famine, whilst those to the east of it enjoyed great plenty. These latter were then governed by ‘Ain-ul-Mulk . . . and among their chief towns we may name the city of Awadh, and the city of Farrukhabad and the city of Lalnau, et cetera.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 342.

c. 1340.—The 23 principal provinces of India under Mahommed Tughlak are thus stated, on the authority of Sirajuddin Abul-fatah Omah, a native of Awadh: “(1) Aklm Dihlî, (2) Multan, (3) Kahrin (Guhram), and (4) Samân (both about Sirhind), (5) Sicavastân (Sehwan in Sind), (6) Waju (Uja, i.e. Uch), (7) Hûsi (Hûnsi), (8) Sarsati (Sirsa), (9) Ma’bar (Coromandel), (10) Tiling (Kalinga), (11) Gujrât, (12) Baddân, (13) Awadh, (14) Kanauj, (15) Lahnauti (N. Bengal), (16) Bahr, (17) Karra (Lower Doab), (18) Malawa (Malwa), (19) Lahaur (Lahore), (20) Kalanâr (E. Punjab), (21) Jajnagar (Orissa), (22) Tiling (4), (23) Durrâmand (Mysore).—Shihabuddin, in Notices et Exts. xiii. 167-171.

OUTCRY, s. Auction. This term seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England. (See NEELAM). The old Italian expression for auction seems to be identical in sense, viz. gridaggio, and the auctioneer gridatore, thus:

c. 1343.—“For jewels and plate; and (other) merchandise that is sold by outcry (gridaggio), i.e. by auction (oncanto) in Cyprus, the buyer pays the crier (gridatore) one quarter carat per bezant on the price bid for the thing bought through the crier, and the seller pays nothing except,” &c.—Pegolotti, 74.

1627.—“Out-cric of goods to be sold. G(allic) Enfant. Incant. (I) talicob.—Incanto. . . . Hispanicet. Almoneda, ab Al. articulus, et Arab. mdrne, clamare, vocare. . . . B(atavice). Clif-torp.—Minshu, s.v.

[1700.—“The last week Mr. Proby made a outcry of lace.”—In Fule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. celix.]

1782.—“On Monday next will be sold by Public Outcry . . . large and small China silk Kittisals (KITTYSOL). . . .”—India Gazette, March 31.

1787.—“Having put up the Madras Galley at Outcry and nobody offering more for her than 2300 Rupees, we think it more for the Company’s Int. to make a Sloop of her than let her go at so low a price.”—Pt. William M.S. Reports, March.

[1841.—“When a man dies in India, we make short work with him; . . . an ‘outcry’ is held, his goods and chattels are brought to the hammer. . . .”—Society in India, ii. 227.]

OVERLAND. Specifically applied to the Mediterranean route to India, which in former days involved usually the land journey from Antioch or thereabouts to the Persian Gulf; and still in vogue, though any land journey may now be entirely dispensed with, thanks to M. Lesseps.

1612.—“His Catholic Majesty the King Philip III. of Spain and II. of Portugal, our King and Lord, having appointed Dom Hieronymo de Azavedo to succeed Ray Lourenço de Tavira . . . in January 1612 ordered that a courier should be despatched overland (por terra) to this Government to carry these orders and he, arriving at Ormuz at the end of May following. . . .”—Decarra, Deana, p. 7.

1629.—“The news of his Exploits and Death being brought together to King Philip the Fourth, he writ with his own hand as follows. Considering the two Pinks that were fitting for India may be gone without an account of my Concern for the Death of Nunno Alvarez Botello, an Express shall immediately be sent by Land with advice.”—Faria y Sousa (Stevens), iii. 373.

1673.—“French and Dutch Jewellers coming overland . . . have made good Purchase by buying Jewels here, and carrying them to Europe to Cut and Set, and returning thence sell them here to the Ombrah” (see OMRAH), among whom were Monsieur Tavernier. . . .—Fryer, 89.

1675.—“Our last to you was dated the 17th August past, overland, transcripts of which we herewith send you.”—Letter from Court to Ft. St. Geo. In Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 5.

1676.—“Docket Copy of the Company’s General Overland.

“Our Agent and Council Fort St. George.

“The foregoing is copy of our letter of 28th June overland, which we sent by three several conveyances for Aleppo.”—Ibid. p. 12.

1684.—“That all endeavors would be used to prevent my going home the way I intended, by Persia, and so overland.”—Hedges’ Diary, Aug. 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 155].

c. 1686.—“Those Gentlemen’s Friends in the Committee of the Company in England, acquainted them by Letters over Land, of the Danger they were in, and gave them Warning to be on their guard.”—A. Hamilton, i. 186; [ed. 1744, i. 195].

1737.—“Though so far apart that we can only receive letters from Europe once a year, while it takes 18 months to get an answer, we Europeans get now almost every year over land by Constantinople, through Arabia or Persia. . . . A few days ago we received the news of the Peace in Europe; of the death of Prince Eugene; of the marriage of the P. of Wales with the Princess of Saxo-Gotha. . . ."—Letter of the Germ. Missionary Sutorius, from Madras, Feb. 16. In Notices of Madras, and Cuddalore, &c. 1858, p. 168.

1703.—"We have received Overland the news of the taking of Havannah and the Spanish Fleet, as well as the defeat of the Spaniards in Portugal. We must surely make an advantageous Peace, however I'm no Politician."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, June 1, fr. Madras.

1774.—"Les Marchands à Bengale envoyèrent un Vaisseau à Suès en 1772, mais il fut endommagé dans le Golfe de Bengale, et obligé de retourner; en 1773 le Sr. Holford entreprit encore ce voyage, réussit cette fois, et fut ainsi le premier Anglois qui eut conduit un vaisseau à Suès. . . . On s'est déjà servi plusieurs fois de cette route comme d'un chemin de poste; car le Gouvernement des Indes envoie actuellement dans ces cas d'importance ses Couriers par Suès en Angleterre, et peut presque avoir plutôt réponse de Londres que leurs lettres ne peuvent venir en Europe par le Chemin ordinaire du tour du Cap de bonne espérance."—Nitshur, Voyage, li. 10.

1776.—"We had advices long ago from England, as late as the end of May, by way of Suéz. This is a new Route opened by Govr. Hastings, and the Letters which left Marseilles the 3rd June arrived here the 20th August. This, you'll allow, is a ready communication with Europe, and may be kept open at all times, if we chuse to take a little pains."—MS. Letter from James Rennell, Oct. 16, "from Islamabad, capital of Chittigong."

1781.—"On Monday last was Married Mr. George Greenley to Mrs. Anna Barrington, relict of the late Capt. William B——, who unfortunately perished on the Desert, in the attack that was made on the Caravan of Bengal Goods under his and the other Gentlemen's care between Suéz and Grand Chiro."—India Gazette, March 7.

1782.—"When you left England with an intention to pass overland and by the route of the Red Sea into India, did you not know that no subject of these kingdoms can lawfully reside in India . . . without the permission of the United Company of Merchants? . . ."—Pride, Tracts, i. 130.

1783.—" . . . Mr. Paul Benfield, a gentleman whose means of intelligence were known to be both extensive and expedition, publicly declared, from motives the most benevolent, that he had just received overland from England certain information that Great Britain had finally concluded a peace with all the belligerent powers in Europe."—Murray's Narratives, 317.

1786.—"The packet that was coming to us overland, and that left England in July, was cut off by the wild Arabs between Aleppo and Busora."—Lord Cormacutis, Dec. 23, in Correspondence, &c., i. 217.

1793.—"Ext. of a letter from Poonama ec, dated 7th June.

'The dispatch by way of Suéz has put us all in a commotion.'"—Bombay Courier, June 29.

1803.—"From the Governor General to the Secret Committee, dated 24th Decr. 1802. Recd. Overland, 9th May 1803."—Mahratta War Papers (Parliamentary).

OVIDORE, s. Port. Ovidor, i.e. 'auditor,' an official constantly mentioned in the histories of Portuguese India. But the term is also applied in an English quotation below to certain Burmese officials, an application which must have been adopted from the Portuguese. It is in this case probably the translation of a Burmese designation, perhaps of Nekhan-dau, 'Royal Ear,' which is the title of certain Court officers.

1500.—"The Captain-Major (at Molinde) sent on board all the ships to beg that no one when ashore would in any way misbehave or produce a scandal; any such offence would be severely punished. And he ordered the managers of the ships to land, and his own Provost of the force, with an Ovidor that he had on board, that they might keep an eye on our people to prevent mischief."—Corrae, i. 165.

1507.—"And the Viceroy ordered the Ovidor General to hold an inquiry on this matter, on which the truth came out clearly that the Holy Apostle (Sanctiago) showed himself to the Moors when they were fighting with our people, and of this he sent word to the King, telling him that such martyrs were the men who were serving in these parts that our Lord took thought of them and sent them a Helper from Heaven."—Ibid. i. 717.

1699.—(At Syriam) "Ovidores (Persons appointed to take notice of all passages in the Runday (office of administration) and advise them to Ayn. . . . Three Ovidores that always attend the Runday, and are sent to the King, upon errands, as occasion obliges."—Florinck's Diary, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 355, 360.

[OWL, s. Hind. aul, 'any great calamity, as a plague, cholera,' &c.

[1767.—"At the foot of the hills the country is called Toriani (see TERAI) . . . and people in their passage catch a disorder, called in the language of that country aul, which is a putrid fever, and of which the generality of persons who are attacked with it die in a few days. . . ."—Asiat. Res. ii. 307.

1816.—" . . . rain brings along with it the local malady called the Owl, so much dreaded in the woods and valleys of Nepal."—Asiatic Journal, li. 405.

1858.—“I have known European officers, who were never conscious of having drunk either of the waters above described, take the fever (owl) in the month of May in the Tarao.”—Steeleman, Journey in Oudh, ii. 103.]

P

PADDY, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty (see BATTA) used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canarese batta or bhatta, ‘rice in the husk,’ which is also found in Mahr. as bhāt with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to ‘cooked rice.’ The last meaning is that of Skt. bhaktā, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay pādi [according to Mr. Skeat, usually pronounced pādi] Javan. pārī, is ‘rice in the straw.’ And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles, Java, i. 239-240, and Crawford’s Hist. iii. 345, and Descript. Dict., 368). Crawford, (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is impossible, for as he himself has shown (Desc. Dict., u.s.), the word pārī, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

1680.—“Certain Words of the natural language of Java . . . Paree, ryce in the huske.”—Sir F. Drake’s Voyage, in Hall, iv. 246.

1593.—“There are also divers other kinds of Rice, of a lesse price, and slighter than the other Ryce, and is called Batte . . .”—Linschoten, 70; [Hak. Soc. i. 246].

1600.—“In the fields is such a quantity of rice, which they call bate, that it gives its name to the kingdom of Calou, which is called on that account Batcalon.”—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 121.

1615.—“ . . . oryzae quocuo agri feraces quam Batum incolae dicunt.”—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 461.

1673.—“The Ground between this and the great Breach is well ploughed, and bears good Batty.”—Fryer, 67, see also 125. But in the Index he has Paddy.

1793.—“The paddie which is the name given to the rice, whilst in the husk, does not grow . . . in compact ears, but like oats, in loose spikes.”—Stororius, tr. i. 231.

1837.—“Parrots brought 900,000 loads of hill-paddy daily, from the marshes of Chandata, —mice husking the hill-paddy, without breaking it, converted it into rice.”—Turnour’s Malacanos, 22.

1871.—“In Ireland Paddy makes riots, in Bengal raiyats make paddy; and in this lies the difference between the paddy of green Bengal, and the Paddy of the Emerald Isle.”—Gorinda Samanta, ii. 25.

1878.—“Il est établi un droit sur les riz et les paddys exportés de la Colonie, excepté pour le Cambodge par la voie du fleuve.”—Courrier de Saigon, Sept. 20.

PADDY-BIRD, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidae or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European’s name for the Ardeola leucopetra, Boddaert, and andā bagla (‘blind heron’) of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white bird—Herodias alba, L., or Ardea Torra, Buch. Ham., and Herodias egrettoïdes, Temminck, or Ardea putea, Buch. Ham.

1727.—“They have also Store of wild Fowl; but who have a Mind to eat them must shoot them. Flamingoes are large and good Meat. The Paddy-bird is also good in their season.”—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162-3].

1868.—“The most common bird (in Formosa) was undoubtedly the Padi bird, a species of heron (Ardea prasinoscelus), which was constantly flying across the padi, or rice-fields.”—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 44.

PADDY-FIELD, s. A rice-field, generally in its flooded state.

1759.—“They marched onward in the plain towards Preston’s force, who, seeing them coming, halted on the other side of a long morass formed by paddy-fields.”—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 430.

1800.—“There is not a single paddy-field in the whole county, but plenty of cotton ground (see REGUR) swamps, which in this wet weather are delightful."—Wellington to Munro, in Despatches, July 3.

1809.—"The whole country was in high cultivation, consequently the paddy-fields were nearly impassable."—Lt. Valencia, i. 350.

PADRE, s. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Roman Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padre to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religious or regulars. In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide application, has now in that country a still wider, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century. A bishop is known as Lord (see LAT) padre. See LAT Sahib.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form pa-ti-li.

1541.—"Chegando á Porta da Igreja, o sahino a receber oito Padres."—Pinto, ch. lxi. (see Cogan, p. 85).

1581.—"It was the will of God that we found there two Padres, the one an Englishman, and the other a Flemming."—Fitch, in Hall, ii. 381.

"... had it not pleased God to put it into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres of Jesuits of S. Paul's Colledge to stand our friends, we might have rotted in prison."—Newberry, ibid. ii. 380.

c. 1600.—"Learned monks also come from Europe, who go by the name of Padre. They have an infallible head called Pápa. He can change any religious ordinances as he may think advisable, and kings have to submit to his authority."—Baddont, in Blockmann's Asia, i. 182.

c. 1606.—"Et ut adesso Patres comperiunt, minor exclamat Padrigi, Padrigi, id est Domine Pater, Christianus sum."—Jarric, iii. 155.

1614.—"The Padres make a church of one of their Chanibors, where they say Mass twice a day."—H. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 486.

1616.—"So seeing Master Terry whom I brought with me, he (the King) called to him, Padre you are very welcome, and this house is yours."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 561; [Hak. Soc. ii. 385].

1623.—"I Portoghesi chiamano anche i preti secolari padri, come noi i religiosi..."—P. della Valle, vi. 586, [Hak. Soc. i. 142].

1665.—"They (Hindu Jogis) are impertinent enough to compare themselves with our Religious Men they meet with in the Indies. I have often taken pleasure to catch them, using much ceremony with them, and giving them great respect; but I soon heard them say to one another, This Frangius knows who we are, he hath been a great while in the Indies, he knows that we are the Padrys of the Indians. A fine comparison, said I, within myself, made by an impertinent and idolatrous rabble of Men!"—Bernier, E.T. 104; [ed. Constabl., 323].

1675.—"The Padre (or Minister) complains to me that he hath not that respect and place of preference at Table and elsewhere that is due unto him. . . . At his request I promised to move it at yo next meeting of yo Council. What this little Spark may enkindle, especially should it break out in yo Pulpit, I cannot foresee further than the inflaming of yo dynling Roome wch sometimes is made almost intolerable hot upon other Acc^{ts}."—Mr. Puell's Diary at Matchlapatam, MS. in India Office.

1676.—"And whiles the French have no settlement near hand, the keeping French Padrys here instead of Portuguese, destroys the encroaching growth of the Portugall interest, who used to entail Portugalism as well as Christianity on all their converts."—Madras Correspondence, Feb. 20, in Notes and Exts. i. p. 46.

1680.—" . . . where as at the Dedication of a New Church by the French Padrys and Portugez in 1675 guns had been fired from the Fort in honour thereof, neither Padry nor Portugez appeared at the Dedication of our Church, nor as much as gave the Governor a visit afterwards to give him joy of it."—Ibid. Oct. 28. No. III. p. 37.

c. 1692.—"But their greatest net of tyranny (at Goa) is this. If a subject of these misbelievers dies, leaving young children, and no grown-up son, the children are considered wards of the State. They take them to their places of worship, their churches . . . and the padris, that is to say the priests, instruct the children in the Christian religion, and bring them up in their own faith, whether the child be a Mussulman sayid or a Hindd bráhma."—Kháfí Khán, in Elliot, vii. 345.

1711.—"The Danish Padre Bartholomew Ziegenbalg, requests leave to go to Europe in the first ship, and in consideration that he is head of a Protestant Mission, espoused by the Right Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury . . . we have presumed to grant him his passage."—In Wheeler, ii. 177.

1726.—"May 14. Mr. Leeke went with me to St. Thomas's Mount. . . . We conversed with an old Padre from Silesia, who had been 27 years in India. . . ."—Diary of the Missionary Schultze (in Notices of Madras, &c., 1853), p. 14.

"May 17. The minister of the King of Pegu called on me. From him I learned, through an interpreter, that Christians of all nations and professions have perfect freedom at Pegu; that even in the Capital two French, two Armenian, and two Portuguese Padres, have their churches. . . ."—Ibid. p. 15.

1803.—"Lord Lake was not a little pleased at the Begum's loyalty, and being a little elevated by the wine . . . he gallantly advanced, and to the utter dismay of her attendants, took her in his arms, and kissed her. . . . Receiving courteously the proffered attention, she turned calmly round to her astonished attendants—'It is,' said she, 'the salute of a padre (or priest) to his daughter.'"—Skinner's Mil. Mem. i. 293.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentia, i. 329.

1830.—"Two fat naked Brahmans, bedaubed with paint, had been importuning me for money . . . upon the ground that they were padres."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, iii.

1876.—"There is Padre Blunt for example, — we always call them Padres in India, you know, — makes a point of never going beyond ten minutes, at any rate during the hot weather."—The Dilemma, ch. xliii.

PADSHAW, PODSHAW, s. Pers. —Hind. pādīshāh (Pers. pād, pād 'throne, shāh, 'prince'), an emperor; the Great Mogul (q.v.); a king.

[1653.—"Patxiah." See under POORUB.

[1612.—"He acknowledges no Faden-shawe or King in Christendom but the Portugals' King."—Danvers, Letters, i. 176.]

c. 1630.—". . . round all the rooms were placed tacite Mirzoos, Chauns, Sultans, and Beglerbegs, above threescore; who like so many inanimate Statues sat crosse-legged . . . their backs to the wall, their eyes to a constant object; not daring to speak to one another, sneeze, cough, spit, or the like, it being held in the Potshaw's presence a sinne of too great presumption."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 169. At p. 171 of the same wo have Potshaugh; and in the edition of 1677, in a vocabulary of the language spoken in Hindustan, we have "King, Patchaw." And again: "Is the King at Agra? . . . Punshaw Agramcha!" (Pādīshāh Agrā men hai?)—99-100.

1673.—"They took upon them without controul the Regal Dignity and Title of Pedeshaw."—Fryer, 166.

1727.—"Aureng-zeb, who is now saluted Pautshaw, or Emperor, by the Army, notwithstanding his Father was then alive."—A. Hamilton, i. 175, [ed. 1744].

PAGAR, s.

a. This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702.—"Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Bencoolen."—Charters of the E.I. Co. p. 324.

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind.—Arab. word ihāta, 'a fence, enclosure,' in the sense of Presidency: Bombay ki [kā] ihāta, Bangāl ki [kā] ihāta, a sense not given in Shakespeare or Forbes; [it is given in Fallon and Platts. Mr. Skeat points out that the Malay word is pāgar, 'a fence,' but that it is not used in the sense of a 'factory' in the Malay Peninsula. In the following passage it seems to mean 'factory stock':

[1615.—"The King says that at her arrival he will send them their house and pagarr upon rafts to them."—Foster, Letters, iii. 151.]

b. (pagar). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for wages, Mahr. pagar. It is obviously the Port. verb pagar, 'to pay,' used as a substantive.

[1875.—". . . the heavy-browed sultana of some Gangetic station, whose stern look palpably interrogates the amount of your monthly paggar."—Wilson, Abode of Snor, 46.]

PAGODA, s. This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.

a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous "Porcelain tower" of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical. In the 17th century we find the word sometimes misapplied to places of Mahommedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the "Pagoda of Mecca."

b. An idol.

c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the varāha or hān of the natives (see HOON); the former name (fr. Skt. for 'boar') being taken from the Boar avatar of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying 'gold,' no doubt identical with sonā, and an instance of the exchange of h and s. (See also PARDAO.)

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kās (see CASH); 8 kās = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda. In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.* The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 3½ rupees.

In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deducible from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-t'ah, 'precious pile,' and Poh-kuh-t'ah ('white-bones-pile').† Anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouth of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing—see NEELAM); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barbosa set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese pagão, 'a pagan.' It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of da- goba. The latter is a genuine word, used in Ceylon, but known in Continental India, since the extinction of Buddhism, only in the most rare and exceptional way.

A fourth suggestion connects it with the Skt. bhagavat, 'holy, divine,' or Bhagarati, applied to Durgā and other goddesses; and a fifth makes it a corruption of the Pers. but-kadah, 'idol-temple'; a derivation given below by Ovington. There can be little doubt that the origin really lies between these two.

The two contributors to this book are somewhat divided on this subject:—

(1) Against the derivation from bhagavat, 'holy,' or the Mahr. form bhagarant, is the objection that the word pagode from the earliest date has the final c, which was necessarily pronounced. Nor is bhagavat a name for a temple in any language of India. On the other hand but-kadah is a phrase which the Portuguese would constantly hear from the Mahomedans with whom they chiefly had to deal on their first arrival in India. This is the view confidently asserted by Renaud (Mémoires sur l'Inde, 90), and is the etymology given by Littré.

As regards the coins, it has been supposed, naturally enough, that they were called pagoda, because of the figure of a temple which some of them bear; and which indeed was borne by the pagodas of the Madras Mint, as may be seen in Thomas's Prinsep, pl. xlv. But in fact coins with this impress were first struck at Ikkeri at a date after the word pagode was already in use among the Portuguese. However, nearly all bore on one side a rude representation of a Hindu deity (see e.g. Krishnarāja's pagoda, c. 1620), and sometimes two such images. Some of these figures are specified by Prinsep (Useful Tables, p. 41), and Varthema speaks of them: "These parlat . . . have two devils stamped upon one side of them, and certain letters on the other" (116-116). Here the name may have been appropriately taken from bhagarat (A. B.).

On the other hand, it may be urged that the resemblance between but-kadah and pagode is hardly close enough, and that the derivation from but-kadah does not easily account for all the uses of the word. Indeed, it seems admitted in the preceding paragraph that bhagavat may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now it is not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.* We thus have four separate applications of the word pacauta, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz. to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hindu idol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, 'sacred,' or to Bhagavat and Bhagavati, used as names of divinities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durgā in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavati as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson's work on the Mackenzie MSS., we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xvi. (vol. ii.) note of an account "of a temple of Bhagavati"; at p. cii. "Temple of Mannadi Bhagavati goddess . . ."; at p. cix. "Temple of Mangombu Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of Paddeparkave Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of the goddess Pannuayennar Kave Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of the goddess Patāli Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of Bhagavati . . ."; p. cvii., "Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. . ."; p. cviii., "Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati," "Acc. of the goddess Vallur Bhagavati." The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paulino, p. 79 and p. 67, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on "Coorg Superstitions," Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadrā Kālī (i.e. Durgā) is "also called Pogōdi, Paradi, a tadbhava of Bagavati" (Ind. Antig. ii. 170)—an incidental remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagoda. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was current in the mouths of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bhagavati and but-ludah which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple; the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term (—(H. Y.)

Since the above was written, Sir Walter Elliot has kindly furnished a note, of which the following is an extract:—

"I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., Bhagavat, 'god'; bhagavati, 'goddess'."

"Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopuram or propylon at once attracts attention, and a stranger enquiring what it was, would be told, 'the house or place of Bhagavat.' The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durga, or, as she is commonly called, simply 'Devi' (or Bhagavati, 'the goddess'). . . . In like manner a figure of Durga is found on most of the gold Huns (i.e. pagoda coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was 'the goddess,' i.e., it was 'Bhagavati.'"

As my friend, Dr. Burnell, can no longer represent his own view, it seems right here to print the latest remarks of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated March 10, 1880:—

* "The prayer that they say daily consists of these words: 'Pacauta! Pacauta! Pacauta!' And this they repeat 101 times."—(Jlk. iii. ch. 17.) The word is printed in Itanuso furuwa; but no one familiar with the constant confusion of c and t in medieval manuscript will reject this correction of St. Paulmier. Bishop Caldwell observes that the word was probably pagadi, or Paradi, the Tamil form of Bhagavata, "Lord"; a word reiterated in their sacred formula by Hindus of all sorts, especially Vaishnava devotees. The words given by Marco Polo, if written "pagoda! pagoda! pagoda!" would be almost undistinguishable in sound from Pacauta.

"I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the c in Pagode was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavat. In modern Portuguese c is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Pagoda, it must come from Bhagavati; but though the goddess is and was worshipped to a certain extent in S. India, it is by other names (Amma, &c.). Gundert and Kittel give 'Pagodi' as a name of a Durga temple, but assuredly this is no corruption of Bhagavati, but Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

"Bhagavat can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagavān (Tamil paṇṇin). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Siva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagavān; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagavant, &c., there is the difficulty about the c, to say nothing about the n."

The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516.—"There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Cingari [Kushari, Logun, Malabar, i. 115]. . . . Their business is to work at baked clay, and tiles for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed. . . . Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of the others; and in their houses of prayer they perform a thousand acts of witchcraft and necromancy; they call their temples pagodes, and they are separate from the others." Barbosa, 135. This is from Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro orationi fanno molte strigherie o necromantie, lo quali chiamano Pagodes, differenti assai dall' altro" (Ramusio, i. f. 303r.). In the Portuguese MS. published by the Lisbon Academy in 1812, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

1516.—"In this city of Goa, and all over India, there are an infinity of ancient buildings of the Gentiles, and in a small island near this, called Dinari, the Portuguese, in order to build the city, have destroyed an ancient temple called Pagode, which was built with marvellous art, and with ancient figures wrought to the greatest perfection in a certain black stone, some of which remain standing, ruined and shattered, because these Portuguese care nothing about them. If I can come by one of these shattered images I will send it to your Lordship, that you may perceive how much in old times sculpture was esteemed in every part of the world."—Letter of Andrea Corsali to Giuliano de' Medici, in Ramusio, i. f. 177.

1513.—"And with this fleet he anchored at Coulão (see QUILON) and landed there with all his people. And the Governor (Martin Afonso do Sousa) went thither because of information he had of a pagode which was quite near in the interior, and which, they said, contained much treasure. . . . And the people of the country seeing that the Governor was going to the pagode, they went to offer him 50,000 pardaos not to go."—Correa, iv. 325-326.

1551.—"And for the monastery of Santa Feo 815,000 reis yearly, besides the revenue of the Pagodes which His Highness bestowed upon the said House, which gives 600,000 reis a year. . . ."—Duvelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 70.

1563.—"They have (at Baqaim) in one part a certain island called Salote, where there are two pagodes or houses of idolatry."—Barbosa, i. 211r.

1582.—" . . . Pagodo, which is the house of priests to their Idols."—Custodia (by N. L.), f. 31.

1591.—"And as to what you have written to me, viz., that although you understand how necessary it was for the increase of the Christianity of those parts to destroy all the pagodes and mosques (pagodes e mesquitas), which the Gentiles and the Moors possess in the fortified places of this State. . . ." (The King goes on to enjoin the Viceroy to treat this matter carefully with some theologians and canonists of those parts, but not to act till he shall have reported to the King).—Letter from the K. of Portugal to the Viceroy, in Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, p. 417.

1676.—“For in regard these Pagoda are very thick, and cannot be elipt, those that are Masters of the trade, take a Pierceer, and pierce the Pagod through the side, halfway or more, taking out of one piece as much (gold as comes to two or three Sous.”—Tavernier, E.T. 1681, ii. 4; [Ball, ii. 92].

1780.—“Sir Thomas Rumbold, Bart., resigned the Government of Fort St. George on the Mg. of the 9th inst., and immediately went on board the General Barkor. It is confidently reported that he has not been able to accumulate a very large Fortune, considering the long time he has been at Madras; indeed people say it amounts to only 17 Laeks and a half of Pagodas, or a little more than £600,000 sterling.”—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 15.

1785.—“Your servants have no Trade in this country, neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many laes of pagodas.”—Nalob of Arcot, in Nalob's Speech on the Nalob's Debts, Works, ed. 1852, iv. 18.

1796.—“La Bhagavadi, moneta d'oro, che ha l'immagine dolla dea Bhagavadi, nome corrotto in Pagodi o Pagodo dagli Europei, è moneta rotonda, convessa in una parte . . .”—Fra Paolino, 67.

1803.—“It frequently happens that in the bazaar, the star pagoda exchanges for 4 rupees, and at other times for not more than 3.”—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 375.

PAGODA-TREE. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India. [For the original meaning, see the quotation from Ryklof Van Goens under BO TREE. Mr. Skeat writes: “It seems possible that the idea of a coin tree may have arisen from the practice, among some Oriental nations at least, of making cash in moulds, the design of which is based on the plan of a tree. On the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula the name cash-tree (poko' pitis) is applied to cash cast in this form. Gold and silver tributary trees are sent to Siam by the tributary States: in these the leaves are in the shape of ordinary tree leaves.”]

1877.—“India has been transferred from the regions of romance to the realms of fact . . . the mines of Golconda no longer pay the cost of working, and the pagoda-tree has been stripped of all its golden fruit.”—Blackwood's Magazine, 675.

1891.—“It might be mistaken . . . for the work of some modern architect, built for the Nalob of a couple of generations back, who had enriched himself when the pagoda-tree was worth the shaking.”—Sat. Review, Sept. 3, p. 307.

PAHLAVI, PEHLVI. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahlavi was adopted by Europeans from the Parsi use. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflections agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolution of inflectional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avesta; but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian language during the time of the Arsacidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardakhshir-i-Pāpakān (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardashir Babagān of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But, strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet. Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written. The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or logograms, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write malkān malkā, 'King of Kings,' but they would read shāhān shāh. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz' is a mode of writing 'namely' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them" (E. W. West, Introd. to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii.; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.).†

tions from the Avesta, and others almost entirely of a religious character. Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand (see PAZEND); a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, paitizanti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthia of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name. It is apparently the same word that in the form pahlav and pahlavān, &c., has become the appellation of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armenian, originally derived from that most warlike people the Parthians. (See PULWATON.) Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava, which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still unsettled.

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Parsis), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted above, and from Haug's Essays, ed. London, 1878.)

has shown the construction to have been derived from India with Buddhism (see Indian and Eastern Architecture, pp. 700-702). [So the Torii of Japan seem to represent Skt. torana, 'an archway' (see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 407 seq.).]

PĀLAGILĀSS, s. This is domestic Hind. for 'Asparagus' (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 180).

PALANKEEN, PALANQUIN, s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men—4 always in Bengal, 6 sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Bupum (W'sai), and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. paryāṅka, or palyāṅka, 'a bed,' from which we have Hind. and Mahr. palang, 'a bed,' Hind. pālki, 'a palanquin,' [Telugu pallakī, which is perhaps the origin of the Port. word], Pali pallanka, 'a couch, bed, litter, or palanquin' (Childers), and in Javanese and Malay palangki, 'a litter or sedan' (Crawford).^{*}

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Lat. phalanga) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz. 'a cowlestaff' (see N.E.D.). It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

The thing appears already in the Rāmāyana. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and John Marignolli (both c.

1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of pālki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 515, and Atn, i. 254).

As drawn by Linschoten (1597), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1760), the palanquin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. Williamson (V. M., i. 316 seqq.) gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of the 18th century. Up to 1840-50 most people in Calcutta kept a palanquin and a set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa—see OORIYA), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palanquin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 8000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor journeys) after this fashion. But in the decade named, the palanquin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the dark-garry (a Palkoe-garry or palankin-carriage, horsed by ponies posted along the road, under the post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palanquin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

c. 1350. — "Some time afterwards the pages of the Mistress of the Universe came to me with a dōka. . . . It is like a bed of state . . . with a pole of wood above . . . this is curved, and made of the Indian cane, solid and compact. Light men, divided into two relays, are employed in turn to carry one of these; four carry the palanquin whilst four rest. These vehicles serve in India the same purpose as donkeys in Egypt; most people use them habitually in going and coming. If a man has his own slaves, he is carried by them; if not he hires men to carry him. There are also a few found for hire in the city, which stand in the bazars, at the Sultan's gate, and also at the gates of private citizens."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 386.

1616.—"And so assembling all the people made great lamentation, and so did throughout all the streets the women, married and single, in a marvellous way. The captain lifted him (the dead Alhoquerque), seated as he was in a chair, and placed him on a palanquin, so that he was seen by all the people, and João Mendes Botelho, a knight of Afonso d'Alhoquerque's making (who was) his Ancient, bore the bier before the body."—Current, Lendas, II. i. 460.

1696.—"The palanquins covered with curtains, in the way that is usual in this Province, are occasion of very great offence against God our Lord" . . . (the Synod therefore urges the Viceroy to prohibit them altogether, and) . . . "enjoins on all ecclesiastical persons, on penalty of sentence of excommunication, and of forfeiting 100 paras to the church court * not to use the said palanquins, made in the fashion above described."—11th Act of 5th Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 1. (See also under BOY.)

The following is the remonstrance of the city of Goa against the ecclesiastical action in this matter, addressed to the King.

1696.—"Last year this City gave your Majesty an account of how the Archbishop Primate proposed the issue of orders that the women should go with their palanquins uncovered, or at least half uncovered, and how on this matter were made to him all the needful representations and remonstrances on the part of the whole community, giving the reasons against such a proceeding, which were also sent to Your Majesty. Nevertheless in a Council that was held this last summer, they dealt with this subject, and they agreed to petition Your Majesty to order that the said palanquins should travel in such a fashion that it could be seen who was in them.

"The matter is of so odious a nature, and of such a description that Your Majesty should grant their desire in no shape whatever, nor give any order of the kind, seeing this place is a frontier fortress. The reasons 1698-9.—"If coming forth of his Pallace, hee (Jahingir) got vp on a Horro, it is a signe that he goeth for the Warre; but if he be vp vpon an Elephant or Palanke, it will bee but an hunting Voyage."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 219.

1616.—". . . Aldala Chinn, the great governour of Amadava, being sent for to Court in disgrace, coming in Pilgrim's Clothes with fortie servants on foote, about sixtie miles in counterfeit humiliation, finished the rest in his Pallanke."—*Sir T. In Terry's account, in Purchas, ii. 1475, we have a Pallanke, and (p. 1481) Palanka; in a letter of Tom Coryate's (1615) Palankeen.

1623.—"In the territories of the Portuguese in India it is forbidden to men to travel in palankin (Palanchino) as in good sooth too effeminate a proceeding; nevertheless as the Portuguese pay very little attention to their laws, as soon as the rains begin to fall they commence getting permission to use the palankin, either by favour or by bribery, and so, gradually, the penalty is relaxed, until at last nearly everybody travels in that way, and at all seasons."—P. della Valle, i. 611; (comp. Hak. Soc. i. 31).

1659.—"The designing rascal (Siraj) . . . conciliated Afzal Khan, who fell into the snare. . . . Without arms he mounted the palki, and proceeded to the place appointed under the fortress. He left all his attendants at the distance of a long arrow-shot. . . . Siraj had a weapon, called in the language of the Dikhin bich'd (i.e. 'scorpion'), on the fingers of his hand, hidden under his sleeve. . . ."—Khasi Khân, in Ellis, vii. 259. See also p. 509.

c. 1660.—". . . From Goleonda to Maslipatan there is no travelling by waggons. . . . But instead of Cachies they have the convenience of Pallekies, wherein you are carried with more speed and more ease than in any part of India."—Tucernier, I.T. ii. 70; (ed. Hall, i. 175). This was quite true up to our own time. In 1810 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 25 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by sixes.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldass as Pallinkijn. Tucernier writes Palleki and sometimes Pallanquin (Hall, i. 45, 175, 390, 392); Bernier has Paleky [ed. Constable, 211, 253, 372].

1673.—". . . ambulating after these a great pace, the Palankeen-boys support them four of them, two at each end of a Bumbo, 1726.—“ . . . Palangkyn dragers” (palanquin-bearers).—Valentin, Ceylon, 45.

1730.—“Palanquin, a kind of chaise or chair, borne by men on their shoulders, much used by the Chinese and other Eastern peoples for travelling from place to place.”—Hailly's Diet. 2nd ed.

1750-52.—“The greater nobility are carried in a palokee, which looks very like a hammock fastened to a pole.”—Touren's Voyage to Suralle, China, &c., ii. 201.

1754-59.—In the former year the Court of Directors ordered that Writers in their Service should “lay aside the expence of either horse, chair, or Palankeen, during their Writership.” The Writers of Fort William (4th Nov. 1766) remonstrated, begging “to be indulged in keeping a Palankeen for such months of the year as the excessive heats and violent rains make it impossible to go on foot without the utmost hazard of their health.” The Court, however, replied (11 Feb. 1766): “We very well know that the indulging Writers with Palankeens has not a little contributed to the neglect of business we complain of, by affording them opportunities of rambling”; and again, with an obduracy and fervour too great for grammar (March 3, 1758): “We do most positively order and direct (and will admit of no representation for postponing the execution of) that no Writer whatsoever be permitted to keep either palankeen, horse, or chaise, during his Writership, on pain of being immediately dismissed from our service.”—In Long, pp. 64, 71, 130.

1780.—“The Nawab, on seeing his condition, was struck with grief and compassion; but . . . did not even bend his eyebrow at the sight, but lifting up the curtain of the Palkee with his own hand, he saw that the eagle of his (Ali Ruza's) soul, at one flight had winged its way to the gardens of Paradise.”—H. of Hydr. p. 420.

1781.—

“The Sun in gaudy palanqueen

Firing no more heav'n's vault serene, Retir'd to sup with Ganges old.”

Plassy Plain, a ballad by Sir W. Jones; in Life and Works, ed. 1807, ii. 503.

1801.—“Give orders that a palanquin may be made for me; let it be very light, with the pannels made of canvas instead of wood, and the poles fixed as for a dooley. Your Bengally palanquins are so heavy that they cannot be used out of Calcutta.”—Wellington (to Major Shaw), June 20.

The following measures a change in ideas. A palankin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1808.—“Palkee. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankeen. A Guzerat punster (aware of no other) hazards the Etymology Pa-lakher (pal-lakhi) a thing requiring an annual income of a quarter Lack to support it and corresponding luxuries.”—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

“The conveyances of the island (Madeira) are of three kinds, viz.: horses, mules, and a litter, cycloped a palanquin, being a chair in the shape of a bathing-tub, with a pole across, carried by two men, as doolees are in the east.”—Welsh, Reminiscences, i. 232.

1809.—

“Woo! Woo! around their palankeen,
As on a bridal day
With symphony and dance and song,
Their kindred and their friends come on,
The dance of sacrifice! The funeral song!”
Kehama, i. 6.

c. 1830.—“Un curieux indiscret regut un galot dans la tête; on l'emporta laigné de sang, couché dans un palanquin.”—Jacquemont, Corr. i. 67.

1880.—“It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General sometimes condescended to be carried in a Palanquin—a mode of conveyance which, except for long journeys away from railroad, has long been abandoned to portly Baboos, and Eurasian clerks.”—Sat. Rev., Feb. 14.

1881.—“In the great procession on Corpus Christi Day, when the Pope is carried in a palanquin round the Piazza of St. Peter, it is generally believed that the cushions and furniture of the palanquin are so arranged as to enable him to bear the fatigue of the ceremony by sitting whilst to the spectator he appears to be kneeling.”—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 231.

PALAVERAM, n.p. A town and cantonment 11 miles S.W. from Madras. The name is Pallavaram probably Palla-puram, Pallavapura the 'town of the Pallas'; the latter a caste claiming descent from the Pallava who reigned at Conjevaram (Seshagiri Sastri). [The Madras Gloss. derives their name from Tam. pullam, 'low land,' as they are commonly employed in the cultivation of wet lands.]

PALEMPORE, s. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes made of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe has become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain,—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponymic,—and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-posh, 'a bed-cover,' which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of Salempore as a kind of stuff. The probability that the word originated in a perversion of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Bluteau's Dict. (Suppl. 1727.)

"CHAUDUS or CHAUREUS são huns panos grandes, que servem para cobrir camas o

outras cousas. São pintados de cores muy vistosas, e alguns mais finos, a que chamão palangapuzes. Fabricação-se de algodão em Bengala e Choromandel,"—i.e. "Chaudus ou Chareus" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the same as Choutar among Piece-goods) "are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palang-poshes," &c.

[For the mode of manufacture at Masulipatam, see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 14. Mr. Pringle (Madras Selections, 4th ser. p. 71, and Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 173) has questioned this derivation. The word may have been taken from the State and town of Pallanpur in Guzerat, which seems to have been an emporium for the manufactures of N. India, which was long noted for chintz of this kind.]

1618. — "Int Governo van Raja mandraga . . . werden veel . . . Salamporij . . . gemaect."—Van den Broeke, 87.

1673. — "Staple commodities (at Masulipatam) are calicut white and painted, Palempores, Carpets."—Fryer, 34.

His breast with wounds unnumber'd riven,
His back to earth, his face to heaven . . ."
Byron, The Giaour.

1814. — "A variety of tortures were inflicted to extort a confession; one was a sofa, with a platform of tight cordage in network, covered with a palampore, which concealed a bed of thorns placed under it: the collector, a corpulent Banian, was then stripped of his jama (see JAMMA), or muslin robe, and ordered to lie down."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 420; [2nd ed. ii. 54].

1817. — ". . . these cloths . . . serve as coverlids, and are employed as a substitute for the Indian palampore."—Rayles, Java, 171; [2nd ed. i. 101].

1880. — ". . . and third, the celebrated palampores, or 'bed-covers,' of Masulipatam, Fatehgarh, Shikarpur, Hazara, and other places, which in point of art decoration are simply incomparable."—Birdwood, The Industrial Arts of India, 260.

PALI, s. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently well-founded tradition Magadhi, the dialect of what we now call South Bahar, in which Sakya Muni discoursed. It is one of the Prākṛits (see PRACRIT) or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearly 2000 years. Pālī in Skt. means 'a line, row, series'; and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pālī-bhāṣā is then 'the language of the Sacred Texts,' i.e. Magadhi; and this is called elliptically by the Singhalese Pālī, which we have adopted in like use. It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon. Pālī is "a sort of Tuscan among the Prākṛits" from its inherent grace and strength (Wilders). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallelism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pālī, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pālī language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the 'Books' of Religion as "being in an eloquent style which the vulgar people do not understand" (p. 75); and in another passage says: "They have a language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their books are writ in" (p. 103).

1692.—"Les uns font valoir le style de leur Alcoran, les autres de leur Pālī."—Lettres Indes, xxv. 61.

1799.—"... this doubt proceeds from the Sanscrit understanding two Languages, viz. the Vulgar, which is a single Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monosyllables, without Conjunction or Dependence; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Letters, which is called the Bālī Tongue, and which is enriched with the inflexions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Officers, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borrowed from the Bālī."—De la Langue des Sins, L.T. 1693, p. 9.

1795.—"Of the ancient Pālī, whose language constitute at the present day the sacred text of Ava, Pegu, and Siam, as well as of several other countries eastward of the Ganges; and of their migration from India to the banks of the Ganges, the Nile of Ethiopia, we have but very imperfect information."... It has been the opinion of some of the most enlightened writers on the language of the East, that the Pālī, the sacred language of the priests of Booth, is nearly allied to the Sanscrit of the Bramins; and there certainly is much of that holy idiom engrafted on the vulgar language of Ava, by the introduction of the Hindoo religion."—Spex, 337-8.

1818.—"The Talapoins... do apply themselves in some degree to study, since according to their rules they are obliged to learn the Sādā, which is the grammar of the Pālī language or Marāṭh, to read the Vinā, the Padimot... and the sermons of Gotama... All these books are written in the Pālī tongue, but the text is accompanied by a Burmese translation. They were all brought into the kingdom by a certain Brahmin from the island of Ceylon."—Sargam's Burmese Lore, p. 141.

[1822.—"... the sacred books of the Buddhists are composed in the Bālī tongue."—Wallis, Fifteen Years in India, 187.]

1827.—"Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and eternal language, the Magadhi or Pālī, is of greater antiquity than the Sanscrit, and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which, in their judgment, are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word Pālī signifies eternal, text, regularity, and there is scarcely a Buddhist scholar in Ceylon, who in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse,—

81 Alambhā, niṣīṭṭhā (i.e.).

There is a language which is the root; men and bramins at the commencement of the creation, who never before heard nor uttered a human accent, and even the Supreme Buddha, spoke it: it is Magadhi."

"This verse is a quotation from Kachchāyana's grammar, the oldest referred to in the Pālī literature of Ceylon. ... Let us ... at once know, that, exclusive of all philological considerations, I am inclined, on prima facie evidence external as well as internal, to entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the Buddhists on this particular point."—George Turnon, I. Ind. 6. Mahābhāṣā, p. xxv.

1871.—"The spoken language of Italy was to be found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the most and most cultivated of the vernaculars, raised it at once to the position of dignity which it still retains. Read Sanskrit for Latin, Magadhi for Tuscan, and the Three Baskets for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete. ... Like Italian Pālī is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, omission, or crasis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought."—Chillers, Preface to Pals Diet. pp. xlii-xlv.

PALKEE-GARRY, s. A 'palankin-coach,' as it is termed in India; i.e. a carriage shaped somewhat like a palankin on wheels; Hind. paliki-gadi. The word is however one formed under European influences. ["The system of conveying passengers by palkee carriages and trucks was first established between Cawnpore and Allahabad in May 1843, and extended to Allyghur in November of the same year; Delhi was included in June 1845, Agra and Meerut about the same time; the now-going line not being, however, ready till January 1846" (Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91).]

1878.—"The Governor-General's carriage . . . may be jolted by the hired 'palki-garry,' with its two wretched ponies, rattle-horned, nearly naked driver, and whois whose anxious motions impress one with the idea that they must come off at the next revolution."—Life in the Mofessil, i. 28.

This description applies rather to the cranchee (q.v.) than to the palkee-garry, which is (or used to be) seldom so rudely equipped. [Mr. Kipling's account of the Calcutta palki-gari (Blunt and Mar, 1892) is equally uncomplimentary.]

PALMYRA, s. The fan-palm (Borassus flabelliformis), which is very commonly cultivated in S. India and Ceylon (as it is also indeed in the Ganges valley from Farrukhabad down to the head of the Delta), and hence was called by the Portuguese palmeira for excellence, palmeira or 'the palm-tree.' Sir J. Hooker writes: "I believe this palm is nowhere wild in India; and have always suspected that it, like the tamarind, was introduced from Africa." [So Watt, Econ. Diet. i. 501.] It is an important tree in the economy of S. India, Ceylon, and parts of the Archipelago as producing jaggery (q.v.) or 'palm-sugar'; whilst the wood affords rafters and laths, and the leaf gives a material for thatch, mat, umbrellas, fans, and a substitute for paper. Its minor uses are many: indeed it is supposed to supply nearly all the wants of man, and a Tamil proverb ascribes to it 801 uses (see Ferguson's Palmyra-Palm of Ceylon, and Tennent's Ceylon, i. 111, ii. 519 seqq.; also see DRAB).

1563.—" . . . A ilha do Crilho . . . ha muitas palmeiras."—Garca, R. 65-68.

1673.—"Their Buildings suit with the Country and State of the inhabitants, being mostly contrived for Convenience; the People are made of Roughs and of the Palmeroen."—Fryer, 169.

1718.—" . . . Leaves of a Tree called Palmeira."—Prop. of the Gospel in the East, iii. 85.

1756.—"The interval was planted with rows of palmeira, and coco-nut trees."—Croze, ii. 19, ed. 1803.

1860.—"Here, too, the beautiful palmyra palm, which abounds over the north of the island, begins to appear."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 51.

PALMYRA POINT, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro, (a corruption of the Port. Punta das Pedras, 'the rocky cape,' a name descriptive of the natural features of the coast (Tennent, ii. 535)). This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmyra trees on which are conspicuous.

PALMYRAS, POINT, n.p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brahmani delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hooghly, all the more for the dangerous shoal off it. A point of the Mahanadi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called Fate Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmyras.

1553.—" . . . o Cabo Sepégora, a que se no os chamam das Palmeiras por humas que alli estam, as quizes os navegantes notam por lhe dar conhecimento da terra. E deste cabo . . . fazemos fim do Reyno Orizá."—Bornas, I. ix. 1.

1598.—" . . . 2 miles (Dutch) before you come to the point of Palmerias, you shall see certaine blacke houses standing upon a land that is higher than all the land thereabouts, and from thence to the Point it becometh againe to be low ground and . . . you shall see some small (but not over white) randle Downes . . . you shall finde being right against the point de Palmerias . . . that upon the point there is neither tree nor bush, and although it hath the name of the Point of Palm-trees, it hath notwithstanding right forth, but one Palme tree."—Lins Holen, 3d Book, ch. 12.

[c. 1665.—"Even the Portuguese of Orizá (see HOOGLY), in Benagale, purchased without scruple these wretched captives, and the horrid traffic was transacted in the vicinity of the island of Galles, near Cape das Palmas."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 176.]

1823.—"It is a large delta, formed by the mouths of the Maha-Nuddes and other rivers, the northernmost of which insulates Cape Palmas."—Holer, ed. 1811, i. 88.

[PAMBRE, s. An article of dress which seems to have been used for various purposes, as a scarf, and perhaps as a turban. Mr. Yusuf Ali (Monograph on Silk Fabrics, 81) classifies it among 'fabrics which are simply wrapped over the head and shoulders by men and women'; and he adds: "The Pamri is used by women and children, generally amongst Hindus." His specimens are some 3 yards long by 1 broad, and are made of pure silk or silk and cotton, with an ornamental border. The word does not appear in the Hind. dictionaries, but Molesworth has Mahr, pamari, 'a sort of silk cloth.'

For some of the following quotations and notes I am indebted to Mr. W. Foster.

[1627.—"Lon y (Kashmir) travaille au i plusieurs Vomeris (misprint for Pomeris, which he elsewhere mentions as a stuff from Kashmir and Lahore), qui sont des pieces d'estoffes longues de trois aulnes, et larges de deux, faite de laine de moutons, qui croit au derriere de ces betes, et qui est aussi fine que de la soye; on tient ces estoffes exposees au froid pendant l'hyver: elles ont un beau lustre, semblables aux tabis de nos cartiers."—Fruer de Pelout, in Théorie des Relations de divers Voyages, vol. i. pt. 2.

[1631.—A letter in the India Office of Dec. 29 mentions that the Governor of Surat presented to the two chief factors a horse and "a coat and pamorine" apiece.

[O. C., No. 1513A (I. O. Records) mentions the presentation to the President of Surat of a "coat and pamorine."

[1673.—"A couple of pamerins, which are fine mantles."—Fruer's New Account, p. 79; also see 177; in 112 pamerin.

1766.—"... a lungee (see LOONGHEE) or clout, barely to cover their nakedness,

* Query (i.) nibaca (Hind.) or nun (Tibetan) called the run (special variety of goat)-coat; (ii.) or is Sallank, mixing mona-shal (goat-shawl), the product, with the name of the animal producing the raw material?

and a pamore or loose mantle to throw over their shoulders, or to lay on upon the ground."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 81.]

PANCHĀNGAM, s. Skt. = 'quinque-partite.' A native almanac in S. India is called so, because it contains information on five subjects, viz. Solar Days, Lunar Days, Asterisms, Yogas, and karanas (certain astrological divisions of the days of a month). Panchanga is used also, at least by Buchmann below, for the Brahman who keeps and interprets the almanac for the villagers. [This should be Skt. pañcāṅgi.]

1612.—"Every year they make new almanacs for the eclipses of the Sun and of the Moon, and they have a perpetual one which serves to pronounce their auguries, and thus they call Panchangio."—Couto, V. ii. 1.

1651.—"The Bramins, in order to know the good and bad days, have made certain writings after the fashion of our Almanacks, and these they call Panjangam."—Rogers, 55. This author gives a specimen (pp. 63-69).

1690.—"No one without consulting the Panchanga, or almanac kept, knows when he is to perform the ceremonies of religion."—Buchanan's Memoirs, &c., i. 231.

PANDAL, PENDAUL, s. A shed. Tamil. pental, [Skt. bandh, 'to bind'].

1651.—"... it is the custom in this country when there is a Bride in the house to set up before the door certain stakes somewhat taller than a man, and these are covered with lighter sticks on which foliage is put to make a shade. . . . This arrangement is called a Pandal in the country speech."—Rogers, 12.

1717.—"Water-Bandels, which are little sheds for the Convenience of drinking Water."—Phillips's Account, 19.

1745.—"Je suivis la procession d'un peu loin, et arrivai aux sépultures, j'y vis un pandal ou tente de paille, sur la fosse du défunt; elle étoit ornée de branches de figuier, de toiles peintes, &c. L'intérieur étoit garni de petites lampes allumées."—Norbert, Mémoires, iii. 32.

1781.—"Les gens riches font construire devant leur porte un autre pandal."—Senarath, ed. 1782, i. 131.

1809.—"I told the farmer that, as I meant to make him pay his full rent, I could not take his fowl and milk without paying for them; and that I would not enter his pandul, because he had not paid the labourers who made it."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 283.

1811.—"There I beheld, assembled in the same pandal, or repository under the friendly banian-tree, the Goumna (see GOSAIN) in a state of nudity, the Yōgee (see JOGEE) with a lark or paroquet his sole companion for a thousand miles."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 465; [2nd ed. ii. 72. In ii. 109 he writes Penda].

1815.—"Pandaules were erected opposite the two principal fords on the river, where under my medical superintendence skilful natives provided with cau-de-luce and other remedies were constantly stationed."—Dr. M'Kenzie, in Asiatic Researches, xii. 329.

PANDĀRAM, s. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Śūdra, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, paṇḍaram. C. P. Brown says the Paṇḍaram is properly a Vaiṣṇava, but other authors apply the name to Śaiva priests. [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Skt. paṇḍu-ranga, 'white-coloured.' Messrs. Cox and Stuart (Man of N. Arcot, i. 199) derive it from Skt. bhāṇ-dugāra, 'a temple-treasury,' wherein were employed those who had renounced the world. "The Pandārāms seem to receive numerous recruits from the Śaivite Śūdra castes, who choose to make a profession of piety and wander about begging. They are, in reality, very lax in their modes of life, often drinking liquor and eating animal food furnished by any respectable Śūdra. They often serve in Śiva temples, where they make up garlands of flowers to decorate the lingam, and blow brass trumpets when offerings are made or processions take place" (ibid.).]

1711.—". . . But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain . . . and killing the Pandārūm; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them."—Letter in Waverley, ii. 163.

1717.—". . . Bramans, Pantarongal, and other holy men."—Phillips's Account, 18. The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1718.—"Abundance of Bramanes, Pantares, and Poets . . . flocked together."—Propn. of the Gospel, ii. 18.

1745.—"On voit ici quelquefois les Pandārāms ou Penitens qui ont été en pèlerinage à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent ici avec grand soin de l'eau du Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés."—Norbert, Mém. iii. 28.

c. 1760.—"The Pandārāms, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth."—Grose, i. 252.

1781.—"Les Pandārāms ne sont pas moins révévés que les Saniāsis. Ils sont de la secte de Chiven, se barbouillent toute la figure, la poitrine, et les bras avec des cendres de bouze de vache," &c.—Sonnerat, 8vo ed., ii. 113-114.

1798.—"The other figure is of a Pandārām or Senassey, of the class of pilgrims to the various pagodas."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, preface.

1800.—"In Chera the Pājāris (see POO-JAREE) or priests in these temples are all Pandārāms, who are the Śāstras dedicated to the service of Śiva's temples. . . ."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., ii. 338.

1809.—"The chief of the pagoda (Rameswaram), or Pandārām, waiting on the beach."—Ld. Valentia, i. 338.

1860.—"In the island of Nainativoe, to the south-west of Jafna, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naga Tambiran, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared by the Pandārāms, and daily fed at the expense of the worshippers."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 373.

PANDARĀNI, n. p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the Middle Ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema's statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the "Sacrifice Rock" of our charts. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with Collam.] The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalāni (approx. lat. 11° 26'), a little way north of Kollandi. It is seen below in Ibn Batuta's notice that Pandarāni afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sankey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feby., 1881: "One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes. . . . Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junks, such as Pandarāni, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your 'Pandarāni' was nothing but the roadstead of Coulete (Coulandi or Quelande of our Atlas). The Master Attendant who accompanied me, appears to have a good opinion of it as an anchorage, and as well sheltered." [See Logan, Malabar, i. 72.]

c. 1150.—"Fandarina is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Manikar (see MALABAR), where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor. The inhabitants are rich, the markets well supplied, and trade flourishing."—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. 60.

1296.—"In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Mayjarh (Ma'bar or Coromandel), Poi-nan (?) and Fantalaina, three foreign kingdoms, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 tung in paper money."—Chinese Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, 532.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindabur, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjarh, then the country of Hill, then the country of (Fandaraina*)." —Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1321.—"And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrina, and the other Cingila" (see SHINKALI). — Friar Odoric, in Cuthay, &c., 75.

c. 1313.—"From Bodifattan we proceeded to Fandaraina, a great and fine town with gardens and bazars. The Muslims there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. . . . It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter" (i.e. the S.W. monsoon). — Ibn Batuta, iv. 88. (Compare Notre below.)

c. 1412.—"The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dismissal departed from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bendimanah (read Bandarānah, and see MANGALORE, a) situated on the coast of Malabar, (he) reached the port of Mungalar. . . ." — Abulrazzāl, in India in XVth Cent., 20.

1493.—" . . . hum lugar que se chama Pandarany . . . por que ali estava bom porto, e que ali nos amarramosos . . . e que era costume que os navios que vinham a esta terra poucassem ali por estarem seguros. . . ." — Notre de Vasco da Gama, 53.

1503.—"Da poi feciono vela et in vn porto do dicto lta chiamato Fundarane amazzono molta gente et artelaria et deliberorno andare verso il regno de Cuchin. . . ." — Letter of King Emanuel, p. 5.

c. 1506.—"Questo capitano si trovò nave 17 de mercandanti Mori in uno porto se chiama Pandarani, e combattè con questo lo quali se messono in terra; per modo che questo capitano mandò tutti li sol copani ben armati con un haril de polvere per endann copano, e mise fuoco dentro detto navi de Mori; e tutto quello brasolo, con tutto quello spozioro che erano carge per la Mecha, e s'intende ch' erano molto ricco. . . ." — Leonardo Cu' Masser, 20-21.

1510.—"Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day's journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port." — Vartema, 153.

1516.—"Further on, south south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which also there are many ships." — Barbosa, 152.

In Rowland-on's Translation of the Tuhfat-ul-Majzidin (Or. Transl. Fund, 1833), the name is habitually mis-read Pendrerah for Fundaraina.

1536.—"Martim Afonso . . . ran along the coast in search of the peruos, the galleys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunhalemarcar with 25 partes, which the others had sent to collect rice; and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Fandarane, Diogo de Roynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother . . . and Diogo Corvo . . . set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunhale, when he knew it was Martim Afonso, laid all pressure on his ears to double the Point of Tiracole. . . ." — Correa, iii. 775.

PANDY, s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pandē [Skt. Pandita] was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jot [got, gotra] or subdivisional branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. "The first two men hung" (for mutiny) "at Barrackpore were Pandies by caste, hence all sepoys were Pandies, and ever will be so called" (Bourchier, as below). "In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gunda Pandy" (M.-G. Keatinge). Ghandi, 'a gong or bell.'

1857.—"As long as I feel the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this iniquitous combination, I cannot feel gloom. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion." — H. Grattard, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 99.

"We had not long to wait before the line of guns, howitzers, and mortar carts, chiefly drawn by elephants, soon have in sight. . . . Poor Pandey, what a pounding was in store for you! . . . —Bonrekar, Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army, 47.

PANGARA, PANGAIA, s. From the quotations, a kind of boat used on the E. coast of Africa. [Pyrard de Laval (i. 53, Hak. Soc.) speaks of a "kind of raft called a panguaye," on which Mr. Gray comments: "As Rivara points out, Pyrard mistakes the use of the word panguaye, or, as the Portuguese write it, pangato, which was a small sailing canoe. . . . Rivara says the word is still used in Portuguese India and Africa for a two-masted barge with lateen sails. It is mentioned in Lancaster's Voyage (Hak. Soc. pp. 5, 6, and 26), where it is described as being like a barge with one mat sail of coco-nut leaves. 'The barge is sowed together with the rindes of trees, and pinned with wooden pinnes.' See also Alb. Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. p. 60, note; and Dr. Burnell's note to Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. p. 32, where it appears that the word is used as early as 1605, in Dom Manoel's letter."]]

[1513.—Pandejada and Panguagada are used for a sort of boat near Malacca in D'Andrade's Letter to Albuquerque of 22 Feb'y; and we have "a Pandejada laden with supplies and arms" in India Office MS. Corpus Chronologicum, vol. I.]]

1591.—" . . . divers Pangaras or boates, which are pinned with wooden pinnes, and sowed together with Palmuto corde." —Barker, in Halliwell, ii. 558.

1698.—"In this fortress of Sofala the Captaine of Mozambique hath a factor, and twice or thrice every yere he sendeth certaine boats called Pangaiois, which saile along the shore to fetch gold, and bring it to Mossambique. These Pangaiois are made of light planks, and rowed together with corde, without any nailes." —Linschoten, ch. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

1616.—"Each of these bars, of Quilimano, Cumama, and Luabo, allows of the entrance of vessels of 100 tons, viz., galleots and pangaiois, loaded with cloth and provisions; and when they enter the river they discharge cargo into other light and very long boats called almadinas. . . ." —Bocarro, Dracada, 631.

[1766.—"Their larger boats, called panguays, are raised some feet from the sides with reeds and branches of trees, well bound together with small-cord, and afterwards made water-proof, with a kind of bitumen, or resinous substance." —Tross, 2nd ed. ii. 13.]]

PANGOLIN, s. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Pangulany, 'the creature that rolls itself up.' [Scott says: "The Malay word is peng-guling, transcribed also peng-guling; Katingan pengiling. It means 'roller,' or, more literally, 'roll up.' The word is formed from guling, 'roll, wrap,' with the denominative prefix pr-, which takes before g the form peng." Mr. Skeat remarks that the modern Malay form is teng-giling or senggiling, but the latter seems to be used, not for the Manis, but for a kind of centipede which rolls itself up. "The word pangolin, to judge by its form, should be derived from guling, which means to 'roll over and over.' The word panguling or peng-guling in the required sense of Manis, does not exist in standard Malay. The word was either derived from some out-of-the-way dialect, or was due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Europeans who first adopted it." Its use in English begins with Pennant (Synopsis of Quadrupeds, 1771, p. 329). Adam Burt gives a dissection of the animal in Asiat. Res. ii. 353 seqq.] It is the Manis pentadactyla of Linn.; called in Hind. bajrekt (i.e. Skt. vajrakuta 'adamant reptile'). We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Imbreck below); was not this also the creature that Bertrandon de la Broquerie met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued, "it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vaudreil struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon." A.D. 1432. (The Right's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 200) (Bohn). It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeck, with an interval of nearly 2000 years! We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus. ["It is now understood that the gold-digging ants were neither, as anciently supposed, an extraordinary kind of real ants, nor, as many learned men have since supposed, large animals mistaken for ants, but Tibetan miners who, like their descendants of the present day, preferred working their mines in winter when the frozen soil stands well and is not likely to trouble them by falling in. The Sanskrit word pipilika denotes both an ant and a particular kind of gold" (McCrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander the Great, p. 341 seq.)

c. A.C. 415.—"Here in this desert, there live amid the sand great ants, in size somewhat less than dogs, but bigger than foxes. The Persian King has a number of them, which have been caught by the hunters in the land whereof we are speaking. . . ."—Herod. iii. 102 (Ravetson's tr.).

1562.—Among presents to the G. Turk from the King of Persia: "in his invivati generis animantes, quoniam monum dictum fuisse allatum formicam Indiarum medicorum canis magnitudine, mordacem admodum et sacram."—Burbequi Opera, Etzer., 1633, p. 313.

PANICALE, s. This is mentioned by Bluteau (vi. 223) as an Indian disease, a swelling of the feet. Côte is here probably the Tamil kal, 'leg.' [Anakkal is the Tamil name for what is commonly called Cochin Leg.]

PANIKAR, PANYCA, &c., s. Mulhyāl. panikan, 'a fencing-master, a teacher' [Mal. pany, 'work,' karan, 'doer']; but at present it more usually means 'an astrologer.'

1518.—"And there are very skillful men who teach this art (fencing), and they are called Panikars."—Barlow, 128.

1553.—"And when (the Naire) comes to the age of 7 years he is obliged to go to the fencing-school, the master of which (whom they call Panical) they regard as a father, on account of the instruction he gives them."—Barrow, i. ix. 3.

1551.—"To the panical (in the Factory at Cochin) 200 reis a month, which are for the year 3600 reis."—S. Bredho, Tombo, 21.

1556.—". . . aho Rei arna cauallero ho Panica ñ ho ensinon."—D. de Goco, Chron. 51.

1583.—"The masters which teach them, the graduates in the weapons which they teach, and they are called in their language Panycaes."—Custatanta (by N. L.), f. 36v.

1599.—"L'Archidiacre pour assurer sa personne fit appeller quelques-uns des principaux Maîtres d'Armes de sa Nation. On appello ces gens-là Panicales. . . Ils sont extrêmement redoutez."—La Croix, 101.

1601.—"The deceased Panical had engaged in his pay many Nayres, with obligation to die for him."—Querrero, Relacion, 90.

1606.—"Panicales is the name by which the same Malanures call their masters of fence."—Gouvea, f. 28.

1641.—"To the cost of a Panical and 4 Nayres who serve the factory in the conveyance of the pepper on rafts for the year 12,960 reis."—Bocarro, MS. 316.

PANTHAY, PANTHÉ, s. This is the name applied of late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahomedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Tahaif, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahomedan is Pathi, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthé to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Fyche has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297-8). But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: 'Panthé, I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying 'native or indigenous.' It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahomedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for sale as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samsui (see SAMSHOO) and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pu-thi again is the old Burmese word for 'Mahomedan.' It is applied to all Mahomedans other than the Chinese Panthé. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but is, I believe, a corruption of Pārsi or Fārsi, i.e. Persian." He adds—"The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahomedans 'Pathi-Kulā,' and Hindus 'Hindu-Kulā,' when they wish to distinguish between the two" (see KULā). The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Pasai in Sumatra, which was during part of the later Middle Ages a kind of metropolis of Islam, in the Eastern Seas.*

We may mention two possible origins for Panthé, as indicating lines for enquiry:—

* See Journ. As., Ser. II., tom. viii. 352.

a. The title Pathi (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Cambodia, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Rémusat, there is a notice of a sect in Cambodia called Pa-see. The author identifies them in a passing way, with the Tao-see, but that is a term which Fuh-hian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-see, the Chinese writer says, "wear a red or white cloth on their head, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnitude with those of the Buddhists. . . . In their temples there are no images . . . they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-see never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine," &c. (Rémusat, Nouv. Mém. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahomedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahomedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Panthé a Shan term for Mahomedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectic variation of the Paw-see of Cambodia, the Pathi of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? (Cushing, in his Shan Dict. gives Pasi for Mahomedan. We do not find Panthé). There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

["The name Panthay is a purely Burmese word, and has been adopted by us from them. The Shan word Pang-hso is identical, and gives us no help to the origin of the term. Among themselves and to the Chinese they are known as Hui-hui or Hui-tzu (Mahomedans)."]—J. G. Scott, Gazetteer Upper Burma, i. i. 606.]

b. We find it stated in Lient. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ti (see Garnier, L'op. d'Expl. i. 518). This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Panthé. But we find that Pen-ti ('root-soil') is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for 'aborigines'; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahomedans.

PANWELL. n.p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in pre-railway times a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. [Hamilton (Descr. ii. 151) says it stands on the river Pan, whence perhaps the name]. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese; e.g.

1611.—"This Island of Caranja is quite near, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Melique, viz. Caranth, Druga, Perra, Sabaya, Abitta, and Panoel."—Bosario, M.S. f. 227.

1801.—"P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Wellington, from "Candolla," March 8.

PAPAYA, PAPAW, s. This word seems to be from America like the insipid, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Carica papaya, L.). A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malacca. [The Malay name, according to Mr. Skeat, is b-tih, which comes from the same Ar. form as pateca, though papaya and kapaya have been introduced by Europeans.] Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners arand-kharbūza, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Moodeen Sheriff it has a Perso-Arabic name 'anbah-i-Hindi; in Canarese it is called Parangi-hannu or -mara ('Frank or Portuguese fruit, tree'). The name papaya according to Orvedo as quoted by Littré ("Oriedo, t. i. p. 333, Madrid, 1851,"—we cannot find it in Ramusio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was ababai.* [Mr. J. Platt, referring to his article in 9th Ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 515, writes: "Malay papaya, like the Accra term kpakpa, is a European loan word. The evidence for Carib origin is, firstly, Oviedo's Historia, 1535 (in the ed. of 1851, vol. i. 323): 'Del arbol que en esta isla Española llaman papaya, y en la tierra firme los llaman los Españoles los higos del mastuerzo, y en la provincia de Nicaragua llaman a tal arbol olacaton.' Secondly, Breton, Dictionnaire Caraïbe, lms: 'Ababai, papayer.' PAPUA, n.p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word papueah, or sometimes pucah-pucah, meaning 'frizzle-haired,' and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1523.—"And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Magalhães,"* where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God's mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papuas, and then the east wind began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered."—Corrao, iii. 173-174.

PARABYKE, s. Burmese para-brik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of daphne, which is agglutinated into a kind of pasteboard and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screen-fashion, into a note-book and written on with a slate-pencil. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara; and from La Loubère we see that it is or was used also in Siam. The Camara books are called lathapum, and are described by Col. Wilks under the name of cudduttum, carattum, or carut (Hist. Sketch, Pref. I. xii.) They appear exactly to resemble the Burmese para-belka, except that the substance blackened is cotton cloth instead of paper. "The writing is similar to that on a slate, and may be in like manner rubbed out and renewed. It is performed by a pencil of the lathapum [Cin. lathip] or lathapillar; and this mode of writing was not only in ancient use for records and public documents, but is still universally employed in Mysore by merchants and shopkeepers. I have even seen a bond, regularly witnessed, entered in the cudduttum of a merchant, produced and received in evidence."

* "F. soy dar no gollam do estreito do Magalhães." I cannot explain the use of this name. It must be applied here to the Sea between Banda and Timor.

* See also De Candolle, Plantes Cultivées, p. 231.

"This is the word laret, (translated 'palm-leaf' (of course conjecturally) in Mr. Crisp's translation of Tipu's regulations. The Sultan prohibited its use in recording the public accounts; but altho' liable to be expunged, and affording facility to permanent entries, it is a much more durable material and record than the best writing on the best paper. . . . It is probable that this is the linen or cotton cloth described by Arrian, from Nearchus, on which the Indians wrote." (Strabo, XV. i. 67.)

1688.—"The Siamese make Paper of old Cotton rags, and likewise of the bark of a Tree named Tua . . . but these Papers have a great deal less Equality, Body and Whiteness than ours. The Siamese cease not to write thereon with China Ink. Yet most frequently they black them, which renders them smoother, and gives them a greater body; and then they write thereon with a kind of Charcoal, which is made only of a clayish earth dry'd in the Sun. Their Books are not bound, and consist only in a very long Leaf . . . which they fold in and out like a Fan, and the way which the Lines are wrote, is according to the length of the folds. . . ."—De la Louvère, Narr. II. p. 12.

1855—"Booths for similar goods are arrayed against the corner of the palace palisades, and at the very gate of the Palace is the principal mart for the stationers who deal in the para-belka (or black books) and statite pencils, which form the only ordinary writing materials of the Burmese in their transactions."—Trav. Mission to Ava, 139.

PARANGHEE, s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to sypilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, while the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe. The word is apparently firinghee, 'European,' or (in S. India) 'Portuguese'; and this would point perhaps to a variation with sypilis.

PARBUTTY, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the patel, sometimes the village-crier, &c., also in some places a superintendent or manager. It is a corruption of Telugu and Canarese parapatti, paripatti, Mahe, and Komkani, paripatti, from Skt. paravatti, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Port. documents in such forms as parpatti, &c. We presume that the first Duke (and his parpatti) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explanation of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Patell." [See below.]

1567.—". . . That an interpreter shall serve as scrivener, shroff (parpatti), modcadum, naique (see NAIK), peon, parpatrim, collector (modcad), constable (parpatti) interpreter, procurator, or solicitor in court, nor in any other case or charge by which they may in any way whatever exercise authority over Christians. . . ."—Decree of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Decret. fasc. 4.

1590.—"In case of failure in the payment of the instalments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parputty or accountant of the division."—Buchanan's Mysore, ii. 1512. The word is elsewhere explained by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Halla in Mysore." A Halla (Canarese and Malay. halah) is a subdivision of a talook (i. 270).

[1603.—"Neither has any one a right to compel any of the inhabitants, much less the particular servants of the government, to attend him about the country, as the soulahular (see SOUBADAR) obliged the parbutty and patel (see PATEL) to do, running before us here."—Wellington, Desp. i. 323. (Nasir. Dict..)

1878.—"The staff of the village officials . . . in most places comprises the following members . . . the crier (parpatti). . . ."—Fonseca, Sketch of Goa, 21-22.

PARDAO, s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardão runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help in such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying myself regarding the errors alluded to. The subject is in itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appends, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Albuquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardão is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. pratāpa, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr.

D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Pratāpa krishna-rāja.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardão was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote—on the one hand Abdurrazzāk, the Envoy of Shāh Rukh, makes the partāh (or pardāo) half of the Varāha ('boar,' so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), hān, or what we call pagoda;— whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardão with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name of pardão d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurrazzāk and Varthema respectively are as follows: *

ABDURRAZZAK (A.D. 1413).

3 Itals (copper) . . .	1 Tar (silver).
6 Tars . . .	1 Fannam (gold).
10 Fannams . . .	1 Partāb .
2 Partābs . . .	1 Varāha .

And the Varāha weighed about 1 Mithlāl (see MISCALL), equivalent to 2 dinārs Koppāh.

VARTHEMA (A.D. 1501-5).

18 Cas (see CASH) . . .	1 Tare (silver).
16 Tars . . .	1 Fannam (gold).
20 Fannams . . .	1 Pardão .

And the Pardão was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim (see XERAPHINE) of Cairo (gold dinār), but thicker.

The question arises whether the varāha of Abdurrazzāk was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his partāh therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varāha was the pagoda, and his partāh a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varāha, "about one mīthlāl," a weight which may be taken at 73 grs., does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) hān or pagoda, given in Princeps's Tables, to be 43 grs., the

* Antonio Nunes, "Comendador da Casa del Rey novo Senhor," who in 1554 compiled the Libro das Peças da Yndia e das Medidas e Moedas, reis de Dia in particular.

"The moneys here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write any thing certain about them; for every month, & very 8 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place" (p. 25).

* I insert the similar table given by Dr. Badger in his notes to Varthema.

maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varāha and the Italian traveller's pardao contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.*

In further illustration that the pardao was recognised as a half hān or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note "the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept" in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, illustrated, &c.†

Moreover, Dr. D'Acunha states that in the "New Conquests," or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, "the accounts were kept until lately in sanvoy and mazane pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratāps . . ." &c. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pardao d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa currency by Albuquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it "was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6½d. † English." Yet he accepts the identity of this pardao d'ouro with the hān current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanged representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings. And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pardao. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the (imaginary) rei. Seeing that a milrei is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d., we have a single rei = ½d., and 370 reis = 1s. 6½d. It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda, the Venetian sequin, and the dollar.* Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere stares him in the face. Correa tells us that the crúzado which Albuquerque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was indubitably the same as the crúzado of the mother country, and indeed A. Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the crúzado d'ouro de Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin, and for the sultani or Egyptian gold dinār. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambaya, which he calls Madrafaxao (q.v.), was worth 1260 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and exchange. We have seen that this must have been the gold-mohr of Muzaffar-Shāh II. of Guzarat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52.27 grs. value 111d. †) the value of the rei at 111d. will be 264d.

From the Muzaffar Shāhi mohr (weight 185 grs. value, if pure gold, 392.52d.) value of rei at 1440 0.272d.

Mean value of rei in 1513 . . . 0.268d. i.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us (p. 56) that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst

* Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterling, has come down to one-third of that value; but if the value of silver goes on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!

† I have remarked elsewhere: "Everybody seems to be tickled at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence. Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian Livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!" I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the maravedi entered life as a gold piece, equivalent to the Saracen mithqāl, and ended—

† I calculate all gold values in this paper at those of the present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portugal rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a reduction of the rei locally below the rei of Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8. I do not know the history or understand the object of such a change, nor do I see that it affects the calculations in this article. In a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Annaes Maritimos of 1844, each coin is valued both in Reis of Goa and in Reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, Dr. J. N. Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has yet found no document throwing light upon it. It is a matter quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.

* The issues of fanams, q.v. have been infinite; but they have not varied much in weight, though very greatly in alloy, and therefore in the number reckoned to a pagoda.

† "2 gunjās = 1 duḡla

2 duḡlas = 1 chavula (= the panam or fanam),

2 chavalas = 1 hona (= the pratapa, māda, or half pagoda),

2 honas = 1 Varāha (the hūn or pagoda ").

"The ganj or unit (= ½ fanam) is the ratī, or Sanskrit raktika, the seed of the cōrus."—Op cit. p. 224, note. See also Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India, p. 54.

† 360 reis is the equivalent in the authorities, so far as I know.

the pagoda was worth 570 to 600 reis (mean 585 reis).

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pagoda, enable us to calculate the value of the rei of about 1600 at . . . 0.16*d*. Values of the milrei given in Milburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Cambist, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the last century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows :

Value of rei in the beginning of the 16th century	0.268 d .
Value of rei in the beginning of the 17th century	0.16 d .
Value of rei in the beginning of the 19th century	0.06 to 0.066 d .
Value of rei at present	0.06 d .

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.*

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardaos or pagodas. The gold coin of Albuquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a crúzado (or manuel), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de Sá in 1548-9, who issued coins called San Thomé, worth 1000 reis, say about £1, 2*s*. 4*d*.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1650, and the coins then issued were silver San Thomés, called also patacões (see PATACA). Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardaos, which represented 5 silver tangas, or 300 reis, and these D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in account so many tangas of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Balbi (1580), Barrett* (1584), and Linschoten (1583-89), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called xerafin (see XERAFINE) and pardao-xerafin, which was worth 5 tangas, each of 60 reis. (So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the reis, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account). The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or xerafin at this time as worth 4*s*. 2*d*. to 4*s*. 6*d*.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge; we then find the tanga gone down to 6*d*. and the pardao or xerafin to 2*s*. 6*d*. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to 1½ perdo. Calculat-

* Thus Albuquerque, returning to Europe in 1504, gives a "Moorish" pilot, who carried him by a new course straight from Cannanore to Mozambique, a backshish of 50 crúzados; this is explained as £5—a mild munificence for such a feat. In truth it was nearly £21, the crúzado being about the same as the sequin (see i. p. 17).

The mint at Goa was farmed out by the same great man, after the conquest, for 600,000 reis, amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £670 (iii. 41).

Albuquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat "10,000 xerafins of gold." And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £825. The coin in question is the ashraf, or gold dirah, as much as, or more than the sequin in value, and the sum more than £6000 (i. p. 82).

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the crúzado is "a silver coin (formerly gold), now equivalent to 480 reis, or about 2*s*. English money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Albuquerque." "Much more relatively" means of course that the 2*s*. had much more purchasing power.

This is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The change in purchasing power in India generally till the beginning of last century was probably not very great. There is a curious note by Gen. Briggs in his translation of Firishhta, comparing the amount stated by Firishhta to have been paid by the Bāhmāni King, about A.D. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of irregular horse of the same strength in Briggs's own time (say about 1815). The Bāhmāni charge was 350,000 Rs.; the British charge 219,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 267,300 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1350.

The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1550, was 8000 crúzados, or nearly £4000 a year; and the salaries of the commandants of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Diu, and of Bassain, 600,000 reis, or about £670.

The salary of Ibn Batuta, when Judge of Delhi, about 1340, was 1000 silver tankas or dirahs as he calls them (practically 1000 rupees) a month, which was in addition to an assignment of villages bringing in 5000 tankas a year. And yet he got into debt in a very few years to the tune of 55,000 tankas—say £5,500!

* Dr. D'Acunha has not this English traveller down to 1684, and introduces a quotation from him in illustration of the coinage of the later period, in his quasi-chronological notes, a new element in the confusion of his readers.

ing the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depreciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the denomination of pardao. And the half-rupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valuation of the Goa Rupee than that in Prinsep's Tables (Thomas's ed p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company's Rupee at 2s., would make it 21d. The pardao therefore would represent a value of 10½d., and there we leave it.

[On this Mr. Whiteway writes: "Should it be intended to add a note to this, I would suggest that the remarks on coinage commencing at page 67 of my Rise of the Portuguese Power in India be examined, as although I have gone to Sir H. Yule for much, some papers are now accessible which he does not appear to have seen. There were two pardaos, the pardao d'ouro and the pardao de tanga, the former of 360 reals, the latter of 300. This is clear from the Foal of Goa of Dec. 18, 1758 (India Office MSS. Conselho Ultramarino), which passage is again quoted in a note to Fasc. 5 of the Archiv. Port. Orient. p. 326. Apparently patecoons were originally coined in value equal to the pardao d'ouro, though I say (p. 71) their value is not recorded. The patecoon was a silver coin, and when it was tampered with, it still remained of the nominal value of the pardao d'ouro, and thus was the cause of the outcry and of the injury the people of Goa suffered. There were monies in Goa which I have not shown on p. 69. There was the tanga branca used in revenue accounts (see Nunes, p. 31), nearly but not quite double the ordinary tanga. This money of account was of 4 barganims (see BARGANY) each of 24 bazarucos (see BUDGROOK), that is rather over 111 reals. The whole question of coinage is difficult, because the coins were continually being tampered with. Every ruler, and they were numerous in those days, stamped a piece of metal at his pleasure, and the trader had to calculate its value, unless as a subject of the ruler he was under compulsion."]

1444. — "In this country (Vijayanagar) they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloys: one called varahah weighs about one mithkal, equivalent to two dinars lopeki; the second, which is called pertab, is the half of the first; the third, called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last-mentioned coin. Of these different coins the fanom is the most useful. . . ."—Abdurrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 26.

c. 1504-5; pubd. 1510. — "I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island, which . . . is called Goga (Goa) and which pays annually to the King of Decan 12,000 gold ducats, called by them pardai. These pardai are smaller than the seraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped on one side, and certain letters on the other."—Varlhem, pp. 115-116.

" . . . his money consists of a pardao, as I have said. He also coins a silver money called taro (see TARA), and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom. . . ."—Ibid. p. 130.

1510. — "Meanwhile the Governor (Albuquerque) talked with certain of our people who were goldsmiths, and understood the alligation of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country pardaos of gold, worth in gold 360 reys, and also a money of good silver which they call barganyni (see BARGANY) of the value of 2 uintens, and a money of copper which they call bazarucos (see BUDGROOK), of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assayed. And he caused to be made crúzados of their proper weight of 420 reys, on which he figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel, and he ordered that this crúzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reys, to prevent their being exported . . . and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargany; on this money he caused to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espeia; it was worth 2 uintens; also there were half esperas worth one uintem, and he made bazarucos of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaruco he divided into 4 coins which they called cepayguas (see SAPECA), and gave the bazarucos the name of taes. And in changing the crúzado into these smaller coins it was reckoned at 480 reis."—Correa, n. 76-77.

1516. — "There are current here (in Baticala—see BATCUL) the pardaos, which are a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reys, and there is another coin of silver, called dama, which is worth 20 reis. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 293.

1516.—“There is used in this city (Bisnagar) and throughout the rest of the Kingdom much pepper, which is carried hither from Malabar on oxen and asses; and it is all bought and sold for pardaos, which are made in some places of this Kingdom, and especially in a city called Hora (1), whence they are called horados.”—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 297.

1552.—“Hic Sinam mercatorem indies expecto, quo cum, propter atrocem poenas propositas hic qui advenam sine fide publica introduxerint, Pirdais ducentis transegi, ut me in Cantonem trajiciat.”—Scti. Franc. Xaverii Epist., Prague, 1667, IV. xiv.

“R. Let us mount our horses and take a ride in the country, and as we ride you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizamora (see NIZAMALUCO), as you have frequently mentioned such a person.

“O. I can tell you that at once; it is the name of a King in the Bagalat (read Balagat, Balaghaut), whose father I often attended, and the son also not so often. I received from him from time to time more than 12,000 pardaos; and he offered me an income of 40,000 piradas if I would pay him a visit of several months every year, but this I did not accept.”—Garcia, l. 33r.

1594.—“For the money of Goa there is a kind of money made of lead and tin mingled, being thick and round, and stamped on the one side with the sphere or globe of the world, and on the other side two arrows and five rounds; * and this kind of money is called basaruchi, and 15 of them make a vinton of naughty money, and 5 vintons make a tanga, and 4 vintons make a tanga of base money . . . and 5 tangas make a seraphine of gold† (read ‘of silver’), which in merchandize is worth 5 tangas good money: but if one would change them into basaruchis, he may have 5 tangas, and 16 basaruchies, which matter they call crasfoggio, and when the bargain of the pardao is gold, each pardaur is meant to be 6 tangas good money,‡ but in merchandize, the use is not to demand pardaurs of gold in Goa, except it be for jewels and horses, for all the rest they take of seraphins of silver, per aduiso. . . . The duet of gold is worth 9 tangas and a halfe good money, and yet not stable in price, for that when the ships depart from Goa to Cochim, they pay them at 9 tangas and 3 fourth partes, and 10 tangas, and that is the most that they are worth. . . .”—W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410. I retain this for the old English, but I am sorry to say that I find it is a mere translation of the notes of Gaspari Balbi, who was at Goa in 1580. We learn from Balbi that there were at Goa tangas not only of good money worth 75 basaruchi, and of bad money worth 60 basaruchi, but also of another kind of bad money in buying wood, worth only 50 basaruchi!

1598.—“The principall and commonest money is called Pardaus Xeraphins, and is silver, but very base (read ‘base’), and is cointed in Goa. They have Saint Sebastian on the one side, and three or four arrows in a bundle on the other side, which is as much as three Testones, or three hundred Rents Portingall money, and sixeth or falleth little lesse or more, according to the exchange. There is also a kind of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such cointed, but are so named onely in telling; five Tangas is one Pardaw or Xeraphin, badde money, for you must understande that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde. . . . Wherefore when they buy and sell, they bargain for good or badde money,” &c. — Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hakl. Soc. i. 241, and for another version see XERAPHINE].

“They have a kind of money called Pagodes which is of Gold, of two or three sortes, and are above 8 tangas in value. They are Indian and Heathenish money, with the featuro of a Devil upon them, and therefore they are called Pagode. There is another kind of gold money, which is called Penculadars; some of Venice, and some of Turkish come, and are commonly (worth) 2 Pardaws Xeraphins. There is yet another kind of golde called S. Thomas, because Saint Thomas is figured thereon and is worth about 7 and 8 Tangas. There are likewise Rialles of 8 which are brought from Portingall, and are Pardaws de Rial, . . . They are worth at their first coming out 450 Reyes of Portingall; and after are rayssed by exchange, as they are sought for when men travell for China. . . . They use in Goa in their buying and selling a certaine maner of reckoning or telling. There are Pardaws Xeraphins, and these are silver. They name likewise Pardaws of Gold, and those are not in kinde or in cointure, but onely so named in telling and reckoning: for when they buy and sell Pearles, stones, golde, silver and horses, they name but so many Pardaws, and then you must understand that one Pardaw is sixe Tangas; but in other ware, when you make not your bargain before hand, but plainly name Pardaws, they are Pardaws Xeraphins of 5 Tangas the peece. They use also to say a Pardaw of Lorins (see LARIN), and are five Lorins for every Pardaw. . . .”—Ibid.; [Hakl. Soc. i. 187].

This extract is long, but it is the completest picture we know of the Goa currency. We gather from the passage (including a part that we have omitted) that in the latter part of the 16th century there were really no national coins there used intermediate between the basaruchi, worth at this time 0.1321, and the pardao xerafin worth 60L.* The rotules and linges that were nominally interposed were mere excuses for certain quantities of luxuries, or rather of rot represented by luxuries. And our interpretation of the statement about payment of gold in a note above is here expressly confirmed.

† “Seraphino di argento” (Ibid.).
‡ “Quanto si parla di pardau d’oro s’intende, tangas 6, di buona moneta” (Balbi). This does not mean the old pardao d’ouro or golden pagoda, a sense which apparently had now become obsolete, but that in dealing in jewels, &c., it was usual to settle the price in pardaos of 6 good tangas instead of 5 (as we give doctors guineas instead of pounds). The actual pagodas of gold are also mentioned by Balbi, but these were worth, new ones 7½ and old ones 8 tangas of good money.

PARELL, n.p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Journal de la that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parell requires examination, as it appears to have been occupied in Groux's time. The 2nd edition of Groux, which was issued 1772, but he appears to have left India about 1763. It seems probable that in the following passage Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published till 1771, there is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parell was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

"Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau couvent auprès du Village de Parell au radeau de Pile, mais il y a déjà plusieurs années, qu'elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l'Eglise est actuellement une synagogue où l'on va manger et de danser, qu'en n'en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes." — Niebuhr, 1772, li. 12.

[Mr. Douglas (Bombay and II) India, ii. 7, note] writes: "High up and outside the dining room, and which was the chapel when Parell belonged to the Jesuits, is a plaque on which is printed: — 'Built by Honourable Hornby, 1771.'"] 1554. — Parell is mentioned as one of 4 alders, "Parell, Varella, Varel, and Sira, attached to the Karrah (Cavalry) CUS-BAR) of Malin." — Hotellu, Turkey, 157, in Subsidia.

c. 1750-60. — "A place called Parell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but converted about the year 1719, for some foul practices, and the English interested." — Travels, i. 16; [1st ed. 1757, p. 72].

PARIAR, PARRIAR, &c., &c.

a. The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly 'a drummer,' Tamil parai is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary bearers of it are called (sing.) paraiyer, (pl.) paraiyars. [Dr. Oppert's theory (Orig. Indolatrie, 32 seq.) that the word is a form of Polaris, 'a mountaineer' is not probable.] In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestic in European service in that part of India. As with other caste-low in caste rank they are also low in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objects considered food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar caste, the name Pariar has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lower castes, or even to denote out-caste or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariars, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariar deals out the same disparaging treatment to those that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariars "constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has 'subdivisions' of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu people." — Dr. Caldwell, u. i., p. 515. Sir Walter Elliot, however, in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Pariars all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not conclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar (pp. 540-554). That scholar's deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognises force in, arguments for believing that they may have descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians. This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adduces a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.*

Thus, in the celebration of the Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a sort of Saturnalia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: 'My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order amongst themselves.' [The view taken in the Madras Gloss, is that "they are distinctly Dravidian without fusion, as the Hinduised castes are Dravidian with fusion."]

The mistaken use of pariah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann, in his School Geography of India: "Outcasts are called pariahs." The name first became generally known in Europe through Sonnerat's Travels

(pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Parias figure as the lowest of castes. The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to the appearance in the Abbé Raynal's famous Hist. Philosophique des Établissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre's preposterous though once popular tale, La Chaumière Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name. It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly: "The word Paria is unknown" (in our sense?) "to all natives, unless as learned from us."

b. See PARIAH-DOG.

1516.—"There is another low sort of Gentiles, who live in desert places, called Pareas. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the devil, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated. . . . They live on the umane (umane, i.e. yams), which are like the root of uca or batate found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 310. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Parani, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parrens. So we are not quite sure that Pareas is the proper reading, though this is probable.

1626.—" . . . The Pareas are of worse estocme."—(W. Metcalf, in) Purchas Pilgrimage, 553.

" . . . the worst whereof are the abhorred Piriawes . . . they are in publicke Justice the hateful executioners, and are the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seene."—Ibid. 993-9.

1618.—" . . . the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, notwithstanding there is a caste called Pareyass (they are the most contemned of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dipped in the water) who eat it freely."—Ivan de Broecke, 82.

1672.—"The Parreas are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat mice and rats), in a word a contemned and stinking vile people."—Baldaens (Gorm. ed.), 410.

1711.—"The Company allow two or three Peons to attend the Gate, and a Farrear Fellow to keep all clean."—Lockyer, 20.

"And there . . . is such a resort of basket-makers, Scavengers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Parrriars,

* Sir W. Elliot refers to the Asoka Inscription (Edict II.) as bearing Palaya or Paraya, named with Choda (or Chola), Kemla, &c., as a country or people "in the very centre of the Dravidian group . . . a reading which, if it holds good, supplies a satisfactory explanation of the origin of the Paria name and nation" (in J. Ethnol. Soc. N.S., 1869, p. 103). But apparently the reading has not held good, for M. Sonart reads the name Pūndya (see Ind. Ant. ix. 287). (Mr. V. A. Smith writes: "The Girnar text is very defective in this important passage, which is not in the Dhauli text; that text gives only 11 out of the 14 edicts. The capital of the Pūndiyen Kingdom was Madura. The history of the kingdom is very imperfectly known. For a discussion of it see Smith, Hist. of Antiquities, Madras, vol. II. Of course it has nothing to do with Parias.")

PARSEE, n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and, retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahomedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Parsi, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Farsi. The Portuguese have used both Parseo and Perseo. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Persee; from the former doubtless we got Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see PANTHAY), a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahomedan.

c. 1323.—"There be also other pagan-folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain rootless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. 1813.—"These writers at Bombay are generally called Purvoes; a faithful diligent class."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 156-157; [2nd ed. i. 100].

1833.—"Every native of India on the Bombay Establishment, who can write English, and is employed in any office, whether he be a Brahman, Goldsmith, Parvary, Portuguese, or of English descent, is stiled a Purvoe, from several persons of a caste of Hindoos termed Prubhoes having been among the first employed as English writers at Bombay."—Macintosh on the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 77.

PASADOE, s. A marlin-spike. Sea-Hind., from Port. passador.—Roebuck.

PASEI, PACEM, n.p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Majapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Basma of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

c. 1292.—"When you quit the kingdom of Ferlec you enter upon that of Basma. This also is an independent kingdom, and the people have a language of their own; but they are just like beasts, without laws or religion."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 9.

1511.—"Next day we departed with the plunder of the captured vessel, which also we had with us; we took our course forward until we reached another port in the same island Trapobana (Sumatra), which was called Pazze; and anchoring in the said port we found at anchor there several junks and ships from divers parts."—Entopoli, p. 53.

1553.—"In the same manner he (Diogo Lopes) was received in the kingdom of Pacem. . . . and as the King of Pedir had given him a cargo of popper . . . he did not think well to go further . . . in case . . . they should give news of his coming at Malaca, those two ports of Pedir and Pacem being much frequented by a multitude of ships that go there for cargoes."—Barros, II. iv. 31.

1726.—“Next to this and close to the East-point of Sumatra is the once especially famous city Pasi (or Pacem), which in old times, next to Magapahit and Malakka, was one of the three greatest cities of the East . . . but now is only a poor open village with not more than 4 or 500 families, dwelling in poor bamboo cottages.”—Valentijn, (v.) Sumatra, 10.

1727.—“And at Pissang, about 10 Leagues to the Westward of Diamond Point, there is a fine deep River, but not frequented, because of the treachery and bloody disposition of the Natives.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 125; [ed. 1744].

PĀT, s. A can or pot. Sen-Hind. from English.—Roebuck.

PATACA, PATACON, s. Ital. putaceo; Provenc. patuc; Port. putaca and patacão; also used in Malayalam. A term, formerly much diffused, for a dollar or piece of eight. Littré connects it with an old French word putard, a kind of coin, “du reste, origine inconnue.” But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abūṭāka (or corruptly būtāka, see also Dozy & Eng. s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning ‘father of the window, or niche’; the scutcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillar-dollars are called in modern Egypt abū medfa, ‘father of a cannon’; and the Maria Theresa dollar abū tēra, ‘father of the bird.’ But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof, still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abū nulāt, ‘father of dots,’ from certain little points which mark the right issue.

[1528.—“Each of the men engaged in the attack on Purakkat received no less than 800 gold Pattaks (ducats) as his share.”—Logan, Malabar, i. 329.

[1550.—“And afterwards while Viceroy Dom Alfonso Noronha ordered silver coins to be made, which were patecoons (patecoes).”—Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. ii. No. 51 of 1569.]

PATCH, s. “Thin pieces of cloth at Madras” (Indian Vocabulary, 1788). Wilson gives patch as a vulgar abbreviation for Telug. paṭṭachadamu, ‘a particular kind of cotton cloth, generally 24 cubits long and 2 broad; two cloths joined together.’

[1667.—“Pray if can procurer a good Pallenkeen bambo and 2 patch of ye finest with what colours you thinke handsome for my own wear, chockholes and susses (see SOOSIE).”—In Pule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. colidi.]

PATCHARÉE, PATCHERRY, PARCHERRY, s. In the Bengal Presidency, before the general construction of ‘married quarters’ by Government, patcharée was the name applied in European corps to the cottages which used to form the quarters of married soldiers. The origin of the word is obscure, and it has been suggested that it was a corruption of Hind. picheh'hāri, ‘the rear,’ because these cottages were in rear of the barracks. But we think it most likely that the word was brought, with many other terms peculiar to the British soldier in India, from Madras, and is identical with a term in use there, parcherry or patcherry, which represents the Tam. parash'hēri, paraiṣṣeri, ‘a Pariah village,’ or rather the quarter or outskirts of a town or village where the Pariahs reside. Mr. Whitworth (s.v. Patcherry) says that “in some native regiments the term denotes the married sepoys’ quarters, possibly because Pariah sepoys had their families with them, while the higher castes left them at home.” He does not say whether Bombay or Madras sepoys are in question. But in any case what he states confirms the origin ascribed to the Bengal Presidency term Patcharée.

1781.—“Lours maisons (c. à. d. des Pariahs) sont des cahutes où un homme peut à peine entrer, et elles forment de petits villages qu'on appelle Parotheris.”—Sonnerat, ed. 1782, i. 98.

1878.—“During the greater portion of the year extra working gangs of scavengers were kept for the sole purpose of going from Farcherry to Farcherry and cleaning them.”—Report of Madras Municipality, p. 24.

c. 1880. — “Experience obtained in Madras some years ago with reconstructed parcherries, and their effect on health, might be imitated possibly with advantage in Calcutta.”—Report by Army Sanitary Commission.

PATCHOULI, PATCH-LEAF, also PUTCH and PUTCHA-LEAF, s. In Beng. paṭṭapāt; Deccani Hind.

pacholi. The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Heyneanus, Benth., a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazar in Hindustan. The pacha-pât is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying among clothes as we use lavender. In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson's Nomenclature to be Bengali. Littré says the word patchouli is patchey-elley, 'feuille de patchey'; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pachcha, 'green,' and éla, élam, an aromatic perfume for the hair. [The Madras Gloss gives Tamil pacçilai, pacçai, 'green,' ilai, 'leaf.'] 1673.—"Note, that if the following Goods from Achen hold out the following Rates, the Factor employed is no further responsible.

PATECA, s. This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris, Schrader; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.). It is from the Ar. al-battikh or al-bitikh. F. Johnson gives this 'a melon, musk-melon. A pumpkin; a cucurbitaceous plant.' We presume that this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucurbitaceous nomenclature, both vulgar and scientific, is universal (see A. De Candolle, Origine des Plantes cultivées). In Lane's Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word butteekh is rendered explicitly 'water-melon.' We have also in Spanish albadeca, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as 'espèce de melon'; and we have French pastèque, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Graeco-Roman world about the beginning of our era; whilst Hehn carries it to Persia from India, 'whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, through that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.'

The name pateca, looking to the existence of the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia de Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquio XXXVI. the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia's housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Diu, and in the Balaghât, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal but "those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds—not sweet (dœce) like the Portugal melons, but bland (suave), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestions of the liver and kidneys, &c." Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it batiec indi, i.e. melon of India (F. Johnson gives 'bitikh-i-hindî, the citrul'; whilst in Persian hinducana is also a word for water-melon) but that the real Indian country name was (calangari Mahr. kalingar, [perhaps that known in the N.W.P. as kalinda, 'a water-melon']). Ruano then refers to the budiecas of Castille of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese at that time (1563; see Colloquios, f. 141v. segg.).

[A friend who has Burnell's copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on bateca: "i.e. the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahomedans." I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that sense) in either Shakespear or Fallon. [Platts gives: A. bittikh, s.m. The melon (Khurbāza); the water-melon, Cucurbita citrullus.] The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is Pers. tarbāz, whilst the musk-melon is Pers. khurbāza. And these words are so rendered from the Ain respectively by Blochmann (see his E.T. i. 66, "melons. . . water-melons," and the original i. 67, "Khurbāza. . . tarbuz"). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as "water-melon." And according to Hehn the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbus and in Mod. Greek aprotēsa, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish Arpuz, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropt in modern pronunciation.—H. Y.]

We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson-Smith:

"(1) The classical form of the Ar. word is bittikh. Battikh is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don't think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an i.

"(2) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Jane); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus "the wild bittikh" is the coccynth, and with other adjectives it may be used of very various cucurbitaceous fruits (see examples in Dozy's Suppl.)

"(6) The biblical form is abattikh (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has 'melons'). But this is only the 'water-melon'; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek μυρσίνων. Low justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For battikh Syriac has patikh, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Hehn's view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Miklol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budicus."

1598.—" . . . ther is an other sort like Melons, called Patecas or Angurias, or Melons of India, which are outwardlie of a darke greene colour; inwardlie white with blacke kernels; they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyest, that as a man eateth them his mouth is full of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat, wherefore manie of them are eaten after dinner to coole men."—Linschoten, 97; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1610.—"Toute la campagne est couverte d'arbres fruitiers . . . et d'arbres de coton, de quantité de melons et de pateques, qui sont espèces de citrouilles de prodigieuse grosseur. . . ."—L'grand de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 286; [Hak. Soc. i. 399, and see i. 33].

" A few pages later the word is written Pasteques.—Ibid. 301; [Hak. Soc. i. 417].

[1663.—"Pateques, or water-melons, are in great abundance nearly the whole year round: but those of Dolli are soft, without colour or sweetness. If this fruit be ever found good, it is among the wealthy people, who import the seed and cultivate it with much care and expence."—Hernier, ed. Constable, 250.]

1673.—"From hence (Elephanta) we sailed to the Pattichur, a Garden of Melons (Patacho being a Melon) were there not wild Rats that hinder their growth, and so to Bombaim."—Fryer, 76.

PATEL, POTAIL, s. The headman of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of Government. In Mahr. patil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat, Mahr. 'a roll or register,' Skt.—Hind. patṭa. The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, "and appears to be an essentially Marāṭhi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general" (Hilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a Government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Monigar (see MONEGAR) (Maniyaldram), adhikdri (see ADIGAR), &c., are appropriate synonyms in Tamil and Malabar districts.

1535.—"The Tanadars began to come in and gave in their submission, bringing with them all the patels (patels) and renters with their payments, which they paid to the Governor, who ordered fresh records to be prepared."—Costa, Dec. IV. Bk. ix. ch. 2 (description of the commencement of Portuguese rule in Bassem).

1614.—"I perceive that you are troubled with a bad commodity, wherein the desert of Patall and the rest appeareth."—Foster, Letters, ii. 231.

1801.—"The Patel of Betteulgaum, in the usual style of a Mahratta patel, keeps a band of plunderers for his own profit and advantage. You will inform him that if he does not pay for the horses, bullocks, and articles plundered, he shall be hanged also."—Wellington, March 27.

1809.—" . . . Pattells, or headmen."—Lord Valentia, i. 115.

1814.—"At the settling of the jumma-bunder, they pay their proportion of the village assessment to government, and then dispose of their grain, cotton, and fruit, without being accountable to the patell."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 419; [2nd ed. ii. 41].

1819.—"The present system of Police, as far as relates to the villagers may easily be kept up; but I doubt whether it is enough that the village establishment be maintained, and the whole put under the Mamladar. The Potall's respectability and influence in the village must be kept up."—Elphinstone, in Lyt. ii. 51.

1820.—"The Potall holds his office direct of Government, under a written obligation . . . which specifies his duties, his rank, and the ceremonies of respect he is entitled to; and his perquisites, and the quantity of freehold land allotted to him as wages."—T. Coats, in Tr. Bo. Lat. Soc. iii. 183.

1823.—"The heads of the family . . . have purchased the office of Potall, or headman."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 99.

1826.—"The potall offered me a room in his own house, and I very thankfully accepted it."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1877, p. 241; [ed. 1873, ii. 45].

1851.—"This affected humility was in fact one great means of effecting his elevation. When at Poonah he (Madhajeo Sindia) . . . instead of arrogating any exalted title, would only suffer himself to be called Potall. . . ."—Fraser, Mil. Mem. of Skinner, i. 33.

1870.—"The Potall accounted for the revenue collections, receiving the perquisites and percentages, which were the accustomed dues of the office."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 163.

PATNA, n.p. The chief city of Bahar; and the representative of the Patibothru (Pataliputra) of the Greeks. Hind. Patana, "the city." [See quotation from D'Anville under ALLAHABAD.]

1586.—"From Bynnam I went to Patenaw downe the river of Ganges. . . . Patenaw is a very long and a great towne. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zolabdin Echebar, the great Mogor. . . . In this towne there is a trade of cotton, and cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they carry from hence to Bengala and India, very much Opium, and other commodities."—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 383.

1616.—"Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful Province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large Provinces within it, Purb (see POORUB) and Patan, the one lying on the east, and the other on the west side of the River Ganges."—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 337.

1650.—"Patna is one of the largest towns in India, on the margin of the Ganges, on its western side, and it is not less than two coss in length."—Tavernier, ed. 1677, i. 121 seq.]

1673.—"Sir William Langham . . . is Superintendent over all the Factories on the coast of Coromandel, as far as the Bay of Bengala, and up Hugly River . . . viz. Fort St. George, alias Mulatu, Pattipol, Mechlapatan, Gurdore, Madapallon, Baboor, Bengala, Hugly, Castle Buzzer, Pattana."—Fryer, 38.

1723.—"If you go higher up the Ganges to the N. W. you come to the great and famous trading city of Pattana, capital of the Kingdom of Behar, and the residence of the Vice-roy."—Valentijn, v. 161.

1727.—"Patana is the next Town frequented by Europeans . . . for Saltpetre and raw Silk. It produces also so much Opium, that it serves all the Countries in India with that commodity."—A. Hamilton, ii. 21; [ed. 1741].

PATOLA, s. Canarese and Malayäl. patlada, 'a silk-cloth.' In the fourth quotation it is rather misapplied to the Ceylon dress (see COMBOY).

1516.—"Coloured cottons and silks which the Indians call patola."—Barbosi, 181.

1522.—" . . . Patolos of silk, which are cloths made at Cambay that are highly prized at Malaca."—Correa, Indas, ii. 2, 71.

1552.—"They go naked from the waist upward, and below it they are clothed with silk and cotton which they call patolas."—Custanbeda, ii. 78.

1605.—"Pattala."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 74.]

1614.—" . . . Patollas . . ."—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

PATTAMAR, PATIMAR, &c.
This word has two senses:

a. A foot-runner, a courier. In this use the word occurs only in the older writers, especially Portuguese.

b. A kind of lateen-rigged ship, with one, two, or three masts, common on the west coast. This sense seems to be comparatively modern. In both senses the word is perhaps the Konkani path-mār, 'a courier.' (C. P. Brown, however, says that patta-mar, applied to a vessel, is Malayāḷ, signifying "goose-wing." Molesworth's Malh. Diet. gives both patemāri and phatē-māri for "a sort of swift-sailing vessel, a patymar," with the etym. "tidings-bringer." Patta is 'tidings' but the second part of the word so derived is not clear. Sir J. M. Campbell, who is very accurate, in the Bo. Gazetteer writes of the vessel as pattimar, though identifying, as we have done, both uses with pathmār, 'courier.' The Moslem, he says, write phatē-māri quasi fath-mār, 'snake of victory' (?). [The Madras Gloss. gives Mal. pattamāri, Tam. pattimār, from patār, Hind. 'tidings,' (not in Platts), māri, Maḥr, 'carrier.'] According to a note in Notes and Extracts, No. 1 (Madras, 1871), p. 27, under a Ft. St. Geo. Consultation of July 4, 1673, Pattamar is therein used "for a native vessel on the Coromandel Coast, though now confined to the Western Coast." We suspect a misapprehension. For in the following entry we have no doubt that the parenthetical gloss is wrong, and that couriers are meant:

"A letter sent to the President and Council at Surat by a Pair of Pattamars (native craft) express, . . ."—Op. cit. No. ii. p. 8. [On this word see further Sir H. Yule's note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 165.]

1592.—". . . But Lorenzo de Brito, seeing thins come to such a pass that certain Captains of the King (of Cananor) with troops chased him to the gates, he wrote to the Viceroy of the position in which he was by Patamares, who are men that make great journeys by land."—De Barros, II. i. 6.

The word occurs repeatedly in Correia, Lendas, e.g. III. i. 108, 149, &c.

1593.—". . . There are others that are called Patamares, which serve on foot for Messengers or Posts, to carry letters from place to place by land in winter-time when men cannot travel by sea."—Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 230, and see ii. 165].

1606.—"The eight and twentieth, a Pattemar told that the Governor was a friend to us only in show, wishing the Portugalls in our room; for we did no good in the Country, but brought Wares which they were forced to buy. . . ."—Roger Haues, in Purchas, i. 605.

[1616.—"The Patamar (for so in this country they call poor footmen that are letter-bearers). . . ."—Foster, Letters, iv. 227.]

1666.—"Tranquelar, qui est éloigné de Saint Thomé de cinq journées d'un Courier à pié, qu'on appelle Patamar."—Therrien, v. 275.

1673.—"After a month's Stay here a Patamar (a Foot Post) from Fort St. George made us sensible of the Dutch being gone from thence to Ceylon."—Fraser, 36.

[1684.—"The Pattamars that went to Godaloor by reason of the deepness of the Rivers were forced to Return. . . ."—Pringle, Thurs. Pl. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 133.]

1689.—"A Pattamar, i.e. a Foot Messenger, is generally employ'd to carry them (letters) to the remotest Bounds of the Empire."—Owington, 251.

1705.—"Un Patemaro qui est un homme du Pais; c'est ce que nous appellons un exprès. . . ."—L. d'Her, 43.

1758.—"Yesterday returned a Pattamar or express to our Jew merchant from Aleppo, by the way of the Desert. . . ."—Ives, 26.

c. 1769.—"Between Bombay and Surat there is a constant intercourse preserved, not only by sea . . . but by Pattamars, or foot-messengers overland."—Grove, i. 119. This is the last instance we have met of the word in this sense, which is now quite unknown to Englishmen.

b.—

1600.—". . . Eservia quo hum barco pequeno, dos quo chamam patamares, o meteria. . . ."—Lorenço, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 165.

[1822.—"About 12 o'clock on the same night they embarked in Paddimars for Cochin."—Wallace, Fifteen Years, 295.]

1831.—A description of the Patamārs, with a plate, is given in Mr. John Edye's paper on Indian coasting vessels, in vol. i. of the R. As. Soc. Journal.

1860.—"Among the vessels at anchor lie the dows (see DHOW) of the Arabs, the petamares of Malabar, and the dhonys (see DONEY) of Coromandel."—Tenney's Ceylon, ii. 103.

PATTELLO, PATELLEE, &c. A large flat-bottomed boat on the Ganges; Hind. pateld. [Mr. Grierson gives among the Behar boats "the pateli or patali, also called in Siran latrā, on which the boards forming the sides overlap and are not joined edge to edge," with an illustration (Bihar Peasant Life, 42).]

[1680.—"The Patella; the boats that come down from Pattana with Saltpeeter or other goods, built of an Exceeding Strength and are very flat and burthensome."—Rule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 15.]

1685.—"We came to a great Godorne, where . . . this Nabob's Son has laid in a vast quantity of Salt, here we found divers great Patellos taking in their lading for Pattana"—Ibid. Jan 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 175].

1860.—"The Putelee (or Kutura), or Baggage-boat of Hindostan, is a very large, flat-bottomed, clinker-built, unwieldy-looking piece of rusticity of probably . . . about 35 tons burthen; but occasionally they may be met with double this size."—Colesworthy Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 6.

PAULIST, n.p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern re-establishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don't like them.

c. 1567.—". . . o vi sono assai Chiese dei padri di San Paolo i quali fanno in quei luoghi gran profitto in conuertire quei popoli."—Federic, in Ramusio, in. 300.

1623.—"I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Daman, at Bassaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paolisti than by that of Jesuits."—P. della Valle, April 27; [iii. 135].

c. 1650.—"The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paulists; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brims."—Tavernier, E.T. 77; [ed. Ball, i. 197].

1672.—"There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handsome convent, and Church of the Paulists, or disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola. . . ."—Baldæus, Germ., p. 110. In another passage this author says they were called Paulists because they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673.—"St. Paul's was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulistins."—Fryer, 150.

[1710.—See quotation under COBRA DE CAPELLO.]

1760.—"The Jesuits, who are better known in India by the appellation of Paulists, from their head church and convent of St. Paul's in Goa."—Grove, i. 50.

PAUNCHWAY, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dingy (q.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Beng. panši, and pansoi. [Mr. Grierson (Peasant Life, 43) describes the pansihi as a boat with a round bottom, but which goes in shallow water, and gives an illustration.]

[1757.—"He was then beckoning to his servant that stood in a Pansy above the Gaut."—A. Grant, Account of the Loss of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, p. 7.]

c. 1760.—"Pansways, Guard-boats."—Grose (Glossary).

1780.—"The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower."—Hodges, 39-40.

1790.—"Mr. Bridgwater was driven out to sea in a common paunchway, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Masulipatam."—Calcutta Monthly Review, i. 40.

1823.—". . . A panchway, or passage-boat . . . was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a snuffer-dish; a deck fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches. . . ."—Hcler, ed. 1844, i. 21.

1860.—". . . You may suppose that I engage neither pinnace nor bujra (see BUDGEROW), but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bhoutiya (see BOLIAH) . . . what is more likely at a fine weather season like this, a small native punsôee, which, with a double set of hands, or four oars, is a lighter and much quicker boat."—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10 [with an illustration].

PAWL, s. Hind. pāl, [Skt. pātala, 'a roof']. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole. I believe the statement 'no ridge-pole,' is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pawl and shooldarry. A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pawl, but is trimmer, tauter, better closed, and sometimes has two flies. [The names of tents are used in various senses in different parts. The Madras Gloss. defines a pawl as "a small tent with two light poles, a ridge-bar, and steep sloping sides; the walls, if any, are very short, often not more than 6 inches high. Sometimes a second ridge above carries a second roof over the first; this makes a common shooting tent." Mr. G. R. Danprier writes: "These terms are, I think, used rather loosely in the N.W.P. Sholdāri generally means a servant's tent, a sort of tente d'abri, with very low sides: the sides are generally not more than a foot high; there are no doors only flaps at one end. Pāl is generally used to denote a sleeping tent for Europeans; the roof slopes on both sides from a longitudinal ridge-pole; the sides are much higher than in the sholdāri, and there is a door at one end; the fly is almost invariably single. The Raoti (see ROWTEE) is incorrectly used in some places to denote a sleeping pāl; it is, properly speaking, I believe, a larger tent, of the same kind, but with doors in the side, not at the end. In some parts I have found they use the word pāl as equivalent to sholdāri and biltan (? bell-tent)."]

1785.—"Where is the great quantity of baggage belonging to you, seeing that you have nothing besides tents, pawls, and other such necessary articles?"—Tippoo's Letters, p. 40.

1793.—"There were not, I believe, more than two small Pauls, or tents, among the whole of the deputation that escorted us from Patna."—Kirpatrick's Nepal, p. 118.

[1809.—"The shops which compose the Bazar, are mostly formed of blankets or coarse cloth stretched over a bamboo, or some other stick for a ridge-pole, supported at either end by a forked stick fixed in the ground. These habitations are called pāl."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 20.]

1827.—"It would perhaps be worth while to record . . . the matériel and personnel of my camp equipment; an humble captain and single man travelling on the most economical principles. One double-poled tent, one routee (see ROWTEE), or small tent, a pāl or servants' tent, 2 elephants, 6 camels, 4 horses, a pony, a buggy, and 21 servants, besides mahouts, servants or camel-drivers, and tent-pitchers."—Mundy, Journal of a Tour in India, [3rd ed., p. 5]. We may note that this is an absurd exaggeration of any equipment that, even seventy-five years since, would have characterized the march of a "humble captain travelling on economical principles," or any one under the position of a highly-placed civilian. Captain Mundy must have been enormously extravagant.

[1819.—". . . we breakfasted merrily under a paul (a tent without walls, just like two cards leaning against each other)."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, II. 111.]

PAWN, s. The betel-leaf (q.v.)
Hind. palu, from Skt. paripa, 'a leaf.'

9

It is a North Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-sooparie (supāri, [Skt. supriya, 'pleasant,'] is Hind. for areca). "These leaves are not used to be eaten alone, but because of their bitterness they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit, which the Malabars and Portuguese call Areca, the Gusrates and Decanijns Suparijs. . ." (In Purchas, II. 1781).

1616.—"The King giving mee many good words, and two pieces of his Pawne out of his Dish, to eat of the same he was eating. . ."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, I. 576; [Hak. Soc. II. 453].

[1623.—". . . a plant, whose leaves resemble a Heart, call'd here pan, but in other parts of India, Botle."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. I. 36.]

1673.—". . . it is the only Indian entertainment, commonly called Pawn."—Fynes, p. 140.

1809.—"On our departure pawn and roses were presented, but we were spared the attar, which is every way detestable."—Ld. Valentia, I. 101.

PAWNEE, s. Hind. pāni, 'water.' The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilayutee pawnee, 'soda-water,' brandy-pawnee, Kush-bo pawnee (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindi ode to Water, on the Pindaric theme ἀπὸ τοῦ μὲν ὕδατος, or the Thaletic one ἀπὸ τοῦ δὲ τῶν πάντων ὕδατος!

"Pāni kūtā, pāni tāl;
Pāni ātā, pāni dāl;
Pāni bhīḥ, pāni ramā;
Pāni Gangā, pāni Jumnā;
Pāni hanṣā, pāni rotā;
Pāni jagat, pāni sotā;
Pāni hap, pāni mā;
Bārā nām Pāni kūtā!"

Thus rudely done into English:

"Thou, Water, stor'st our Wells and Tanks, Thou fillest Gunga's, Jumna's banks;
Thou Water, sendest daily food,
And fruit and flowers and needful wood;
Thou, Water, laugh'st, thou, Water,
weepest;
Thou, Water, wak'st, thou, Water,
askest;
—Father, Mother, in thee blent,— Hail, O glorious element!"

PAWNEE, KALLA. s. Hind. kālā pāni, i.e. 'Black Water'; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with especial reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it. "Hindu servants and sepoy used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kālā pāni. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of Aryavarta" (Note by Lt.-Col. J. M. Trotter).

1823.—"An agent of mine, who was for some days with Cheetoo" (a famous Pindari leader), "told me he raved continually about Kala Pamee, and that one of his followers assured him when the Pindarry chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat these dreaded words aloud."—Sir J. Malcolm, Central India (2nd ed.), i. 416.

1833.—"Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous nondescript animals."—Mackintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoones, 41.

PAYEN-GHAUT, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghaut is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula, from Hind. and Mahr. ghāt, combined with Pers. pāin, 'below.' [It is generally used as equivalent to Talaghat, "but some Musalmans seem to draw the distinction that the Pāyin-ghāt is nearer to the foot of the Ghāts than the Talaghat" (Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 338).]

1629-30.—"But ('Azam Khān found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dhārūr, had the design of descending the Pāyin-ghāt."—Abdu'l Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vii. 17.

1784.—"Peace and friendship . . . between the said Company and the Nabob Tippu Sultan Bahauder, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travencore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghaut."—Treaty of Mangalore, in Monro's Narr., 232.

1785.—"You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghaut . . . being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith. . . . It is known (or understood)."—Letters of Tippoo, p. 12.

PAZEND, s. See for meaning of this term s.v. Pahlavi, in connection with Zend. (See also quotation from Maṣṣūdi under latter.)

PECUL, PIKOL, s. Malay and Javanese pikul, 'a man's load.' It is applied as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 latís (see CATTY), called by the Chinese themselves shih, and = 133½ lb. avoird. Another authority states that the shih is = 120 kin or latís, whilst the 100 kin weight is called in Chinese tan.

1531.—"In China 1 tael weigh 7½ tanga larins of silver, and 16 taels = 1 caté (see CATTY); 100 catés = 1 pieco = 45 tangas of silver weigh 1 mark, and therefore 1 pieco = 133½ arratels (see ROTTLE)."—A. Nunes, 41.

"And in China anything is sold and bought by catés and piecos and taels, provisions as well as all other things."—Ibid., 42.

[1616.—"The wood we have sold at divers prices from 21 to 25 mas per Picoll."—Foster, Letters, iv. 259.]

PEDIR, n.p. The name of a port and State of the north coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1493.—It is named as Pater in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510.—"We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Pedir. . . . In this country there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Molaga. . . . in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathai."—Varthema, 233.

1511.—"And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Albuquerque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people . . . and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed;—into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me! . . . The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been for a long time noble and great in trade . . . that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security . . . that they were men and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 54.

1516.—"The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China."—Barbosa, 196.

1538.—"Furthermore I told him what course was usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pullo Tiquos and Pullo Quentm, which in time past were carried by the Bataas to Pazem (see PASEI) and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Strait of Meequa, and the Ships of Judaa (see JUDEA) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Cogan), 25.

1553.—"After the foundation of Malacca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Pocem began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbour of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Barros, iii. v. 1.

1615.—"Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Peedere 'he did not entreat' anything for Priaman and Tecoe, but only an answer to King James's letter. . . ."—Sainsbury, i. 411.

„ "Pedears."—Ibid. p. 415.

PEEÁDA. See under PEON.

PEENUS, s. Hind. pīnas; a corruption of Eng. pinnace. A name applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Roebuck gives as the marine Hind. for pinnace, pīnecz. [The word has been adopted by natives in N. India as the name for a sort of palankin, such as that used by a bride.]

[1615.—"See he sent out a Penissee to look out for them."—Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 22.]

1784.—"For sale . . . a very handsome Pinnace Budgerow."—In Seton-Karr, i. 45.

[1860.—"The Pinnace, the largest and handsomest, is perhaps more frequently a private than a hired boat—the property of the planter or merchant."—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 4 (with an illustration).]

PEEPUL, s. Hind. pipal, Skt. pīpāla, Ficus religiosa, L.; one of the great fig-trees of India, which often occupies a prominent place in a village, or near a temple. The Pipal has a strong resemblance, in wood and foliage, to some common species of poplar, especially the aspen, and its leaves with their long footstalks quaver like those of that tree. This trembling is popularly attributed to spirits agitating each leaf. And hence probably the name of 'Devil's tree' given to it, according to Rheede (Hort. Mal. i. 48), by Christians in Malabar. It is possible therefore that the name is identical with that of the poplar. Nothing would be more natural than that the Aryan immigrants, on first seeing this Indian tree, should give it the name of the poplar which they had known in more northern latitudes (popul-us, pappel, &c.). Indeed, in Kumāon, a true sp. of poplar (Populus ciliata) is called by the people gar-pipal (qu. ghar, or 'house'-peepul? [or rather perhaps as another name for it is pahārī, from gir, giri, 'a mountain'])). Dr. Stewart also says of this Populus: "This tree grows to a large size, occasionally reaching 10 feet in girth, and from its leaves resembling those of the pipal . . . is frequently called by that name by plainmen" (Punjab Plants, p. 204). A young peepul was shown to one of the present writers in a garden at Palermo as popolo delle Indie. And the recognised name of the peepul in French books appears to be peuplier d'Inde. Col. Tod notices the resemblance (Rajasthan, i. 80), and it appears that Vahl called it Ficus populifolia. (See also Geograph. Magazine, ii. 50). In Balfour's Indian Cyclopaedia it is called by the same name in translation, 'the poplar-leaved Fig-tree.' We adduce these facts the more copiously perhaps because the suggestion of the identity of the names pīpāla and populus was somewhat scornfully rejected by a very learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below. "I remember noticing among many Hindus, and especially among Hinduized Sikhs, that they often say Pipal la jattā hān ('I am going to the Peepul Tree'), to express 'I am going to say my prayers.'" (Lt.-Col. John Trotter) (See BO TREE.)

c. 1550.—"His soul quivered like a pipal leaf."—Rāmdāsa of Tulsi Dās, by Grave (1878), ii. 25.

[c. 1590.—"In this place an arrow struck Sri Kishn and buried itself in a pipal tree on the bank of the Sarasvati."—Ala, ed. Jarrett, ii. 216.]

1801.—"Au sortir du village un pipal (arbre à l'été mystérieux. . . Sa ombreuse postérité l'entoure au loin sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de péons qui entreprennent fraternellement leurs bras informés."—Hauger, i. 112. This writer seems to mean a banyan. The peepul does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817.—"In the second orchard, an excavation in the ground . . . is filled with a tree of pipal wood, into which the party must walk, barefoot, proving his guilt if he is burned, his innocence, if he escapes unhurt."—Mall (quoting from Halhed), ed. 1830, i. 2-9.

1826.—"A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepul tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, I could not well make out what."—Panderang Hari, 26, [ed. 1872, i. 36, reading Peopal].

1836.—"It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made inde war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepul tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country."—Letter from Court of China to Court of Ara. See Tulsi Mission to Ala, p. 265.

1854.—"Je ne puis passer sous silence deux beaux arbres . . . ce sont le peuplier d'Inde à larges feuilles, arbre réputé sacré."—Pallagon, Siari, i. 140.

1861.—
" . . . Yonder crown of umbrage hoar Shall shield her well; the Peepul whisper a dirge
And Caryota drop her tearlike store
Of beads; whilst over all slim Casuarino Points upwards, with her branches ever green,
To that remaining Rest where Night and Tears are o'er."
Barrackpore Parl, 18th Nov. 1861.

PEER, s. Pers. pīr, a Mahomedan Saint or Deatus. But the word is used elliptically for the tombs of such personages, the circumstance pertaining to them which chiefly creates notoriety or fame of sanctity; and it may be remarked that wālī (or Wely as it is often written), Imamzāda, Shaikh, and Murabbut (see ADJUTANT), are often used in the same elliptical way in Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Barbary respectively. We may add that Nabī (Prophet) is used in the same fashion.

[1690.—See under NUGGURCOTE.

[1623.—"Within the Mosque . . . is a kind of little Pyramid of Marble, and this they call Pir, that is Wālī, which they say is equivalent to Holy; I imagine it the Sepulchre of some one of their best accounted sikh."—P. de la Vallée, Hak, Soc. i. 69.]

1655.—"On the other side was the Garden and the chambers of the Mullahs, who with great convenience and delight spend their lives there under the shadow of the miracle-working Sanctity of this Pīr, which they are not waiting to celebrate; But as I am always very unhappy on such occasions, he did no Miracle that day upon any of the sick."—Bernier, 121, [ed. 1846, 115]

1673.—"Hard by this is a Peer, or Burial-place of one of the Prophets, being a costly monument."—Fryer, 210.

1802.—"Certains pīrs sont tellement renommés, qu'ainsi qu'on le verra plus loin, le peuple à d'anciens leurs noms aux mois lundis on se trouvent placés les Pīrs qu'on célèbre en leur honneur."—Gérard de Tassy, Rel. Musulm., p. 18.

The following are examples of the parallel use of the words named:

Wālī:

1511.—"The highest part (of Hermon) crowned by the Wely, is towards the western end."—Ribbans, Biblical Researches, iii. 113.

"In many of the villages of Syria the Traveller will observe small domed buildings, with grated windows and surmounted by the crescent. These are the so called Wellis, mausolea of saints, or tombs of sheikhs."—Baddeley's Egypt, Eng. ed. Pt. i. 150.

Imamzāda:

1861.—"We rode on for three farsakhs, or fourteen miles, more to another Imamzāda, called Kesh-giri. . . ."—Ericksen, Three Years' Residence in Persia, ii. 40.

1853.—"The few villages . . . have numerous walled gardens, with rows of poplar and willow-trees and stunted mulberries, and the inevitable Imamzadehs."—Col. Heresford Locell's Itinerary Notes of Route Surveys in N. Persia in 1851 and 1852, Proc. R.G.S. (N.S.) v. 73.

Shaikh :

1817.—“Near the ford (on Jordan), half a mile to the south, is a tomb called ‘Sheikh Daoud,’ standing on an apparent round hill like a barrow.”—Irbly and Mangles, Travels in Egypt, &c., 304.

Nabi :

1856.—“Of all the points of interest about Jerusalem, none perhaps gains so much from an actual visit to Palestine as the lofty-peaked eminence which fills up the north-west corner of the table-land. . . . At present it bears the name of Nebi-Samuel, which is derived from the Mussulman tradition—now perpetuated by a mosque and tomb—that here lies buried the prophet Samuel.”—Stanley's Palestine, 165.

So also Nabi-Yunus at Nineveh; and see Nebi-Mousa in De Sauley, ii. 73.

PEGU, n.p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irawadi, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Dagad. This name belongs to the Talaing language, and is popularly alleged to mean ‘conquered by stratagem,’ to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegu, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paigū. The first European mention that we know of is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Poggio has Latinized it as Pauco-nia; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1459) the exact Malay form Paigu. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronimo di S. Stefano (1499). The Roteiro of Vasco da Gama (1498) has Pegū, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kāfir by his Mahomedan informants (see under CAFFER). Varthema (1510) has Pego, and (Hov. da Empoli (1514) Peci; Barbosa (1516) again Paigu; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

1498.—“Pegū is a land of Christians, and the King is a Christian; and they are all white like us. This King can assemble 20,000 fighting men, i.e. 10,000 horsemen, as many footmen, and 400 war elephants; here is all the musk in the world . . . and on the main land he has many rubies and much gold, so that for 10 cruzado you can buy as much gold as will fetch 25 in Calcutt, and there is much lac (lacra) and benzoin. . . .”—Roteiro, 112.

1505.—“Two merchants of Cochín took on them to save two of the ships; one from Pegū with a rich cargo of lac (lacra), benzoin, and musk, and another with a cargo of drugs from Banda, nutmeg, mace, clove, and sandalwood; and they embarked on the ships with their people, leaving to chance their own vessels, which had cargoes of rice, for the value of which the owners of the ships bound themselves.”—Corra, i. 611.

1514.—“Then there is Pecū, which is a populous and noble city, abounding in men and in horses, where are the true mines of linoni (‘di luoni e perfetti rubini,’ perhaps should be ‘di buoni e perfetti’) and perfect rubies, and these in great plenty; and they are fine men, tall and well limbed and stout; as of a race of giants. . . .”—Empoli, 80.

[1516.—“Peigu.” (See under BURMA.)]

1511.—“Bagou.” (See under PEKING.)

1512.—“ . . . and for all the goods which came from any other ports and places, viz. from Pegua to the said Port of Malacca, from the Island of Samatra and from within the Straits. . . .”—Titulo of the Fortress and City of Malacca, in Tomba, p. 105 in Salsation.

1568.—“Concludo che non è in terra Ro di poezia maggiore del Re di Pegū, per ciòche ha sotto di se venti Ro di corona.”—Civ. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 324.

1572.—

“Olha o reino Arracão, olha o assento
Do Pegū, que já monstros povoaram, Monstros filhos do feo ajuntamento D’humia mulher e hum cão, que são os nehamm.” Cantares, x. 122.

By Burton :

“Arracan-realm behold, behold the cent of Pegu peopled by a monster-brood; monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of whelp and woman in the lonely wood. . . .”

1597.—“ . . . I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegū nor yet from that of Achin (do Dachen); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dachen since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense.”—Despatch from the King to Goa, 5th Feb. In Archiv. Port. Orient. Fasc. iii.

PEGU PONIES. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu commonly imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.

1880.—“For sale . . . also Bubble and Squeak, bay Pegues.”—Madras Mail, Feb. 19.

[1890.—“Ponies, sometimes very good ones, were reared in a few districts in Upper Burma, but, even in Burmese times, the supply was from the Shan States. The so-called Pegu Pony, of which a good deal is heard, is, in fact, not a Pegu pony at all, for the justly celebrated animals called by that name were imported from the Shan States.”—Report of Capt. Evans, in Times, Oct. 17.]

PEKING, n.p. This name means ‘North-Court,’ and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they dethroned the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kublar (1368) they removed the capital from Taitu or Khānbālgh (Cambaluc of Polo) to the great city on the Yangtze which has since been known as Nan-King or ‘South-Court.’ But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1520.—“Thomé Pres, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanquij, at its chief city called by the same name, where the King dwelt, and spent in coming thither always travelling north, four months; by which you may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentle prince. He sent word to Thomé Pres that he was to wait for him at Pequij, where he would despatch his affair. This city is in another province so called, much further north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars. . . .”—Barros, III. vi. 1.

1541.—“This City of Pequim . . . is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it. . . . For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantinople, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Seville, or Lisbon. . . . Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like to Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tauris in Persia, Amadaba (Amadabad, Avadavat) in Cambaya, Bianaga(r) in Narrainga, Goura (Gouro) in Bengala, Ava in Chalen, Timplan in Caluminkham, Martaban (Martavão) and Bagou in Pegu, Guimpel and Tintau in Siammon, Odia in the Kingdom of Sornau, Passayan and Dena in the Island of Java, Pangor in the Country of the Leguiens (no Lequio) Usanga (Uzigné) in the Grand Cauchin, Lancama (Lacamo) in Tartary, and Meuco (Micoo) in Jappun . . . for I dare well affirm that all those same are not to be compared to the least part of the wonderful City of Pequim. . . .”—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 136 (orig. cap. cvii.).

[c. 1586.—“The King maketh always his abode in the great city Paehin, as much as to say in our language . . . the towne of the kingdome.”—Reports of China, in Hakl. ii. 546.]

1614.—“Richard Cocks writing from Forando understands there are great cities in the country of Corea, and between that and the sea mighty bogs, so that no man can travel there; but great waggons have been invented to go upon broad flat wheels, under sail as ships do, in which they transport their goods . . . the deceased Emperor of Japan did pretend to have conveyed a great army in these sailing waggons, to assual the Emperor of China in his City of Paquin.”—In Sainsbury, i. 343.

“from the destined walls Of Cambalu, sent of Cathaian Can,
And Samarchand by Ouz, Teme’s throne,
To Paquin of Sinaean Kings. . . .”
Paradise Lost, xi. 387-390.

PELICAN, s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gagan-bher, i.e. ‘Sheep of the Sky,’ which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metathesis convert into the equally appropriate Gangā-bher or ‘Sheep of the Ganges.’ The name may be illustrated by the old term ‘Cape-sheep’ applied to the albatross.* But Pelican is habitually misapplied by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjutant (q.v.). We may remember how Prof. Max Müller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. “The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation.” 2nd ser. 1864, p. 35, [Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 421 segg.]. Now, by an analogous process, it is possible that some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place. It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only that "some ca'd them paylicans, some ca'd them audjutants."

1829.—"This officer . . . on going round the yard (of the military prison) . . . discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said,—'Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.' This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case. The moment the dinner-trumpet sounds, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 25.

PENANG, n.p. This is the proper name of the Island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo, properly Pulau, Pinang), which on its cession to the English (1786) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinang in Malay signifies an areca-nut or areca-tree, and, according to Crawfurd, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (vulgo, 'the betel-nut').

1592.—"Now the winter coming vpon vs with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Ilands of Pulo Pinaou (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malaiian tongue signifieth an Iland) . . . where we came to an anker in a very good harbororough betwene three Ilands. . . . This place is in 6 degrees and a halfe to the Northward, and some fve leagues from the maine betwene Malacca and Pegu."—Barker, in Hall, ii. 589-590.

PENANG LAWYER, s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore.

It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala acutifida, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire and polished (Balfour). The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that law-suits in Penang were decided by the lex baculina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang liyar, 'wild areca' [or pinang liyor, 'fire-dried areca,' which is suggested in N.E.D.], may almost be assumed to be the real name. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. s.v.) says from "Layor, a species of cane furnishing the sticks so named." But this is almost certainly wrong.]

1883.—(But the book—an excellent one—is without date—more shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it). "Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' to defend myself from dogs. . . ." The following note is added: "A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Gilmour, Among the Mongols, 14.

PENGUIN, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus. We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat.' See Littré. He quotes Clausius as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguedine. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert direct from Selden.

1578.—"In these Islands we found greates relief and plenty of good victuals, for infinite were the number of fowle which the Welsh men named Penguin, and Magilanus tearmed them gesso. . . ."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. p. 72.

1593.—"The penguin described."—Hawkins, V. to S. Sea, p. 111, Hak. Soc.

1608.—"The Pengwines bee as bigge as our greatest Capons we have in England, they have no winges nor cannot flye . . . they bee exceeding fatte, but their flesh is verie ranke. . . ."—Middleton, f. B. 4.

1609.—"Nous trouvâmes beaucoup de Chiés de Mer, et Oyseaux qu'on appelle Penguyns, dont l'Escueil en estait quasi couvert."—Moutman, p. 4.

c. 1610.—“... le resto est tout couvert
... d'une quantité d'Oyseaux nommez pinguy, qui sont là leurs oeufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une quantité si prodigieuse qu'on ne scauroit mettre ... le pied en quelque endroit que ce soit sans toucher.”
—Pyrard de Laval, i. 73; [Hak. Soc. i. 97, also see i. 16].

1612.—“About the year CIO. C.LXX.
Madoc brother to David ap Oren, prince of Wales, made this sea voyage (to Florida); and by probability these names of Capo de Briton in Norumbeg, and Pengwin in part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relics of this discovery.”— Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polyolbion, in Works (ed. 1726), iii. col. 1802.

1616.—“The Island called Pen-guin Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Pen-guin signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins.”—Terry, ed. 1605,
p. 334.

1638.—“... that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others, the Records of this Voyage writ by many Bardhs and Genealogists confirme it ... made more orthodoxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as ... Pengwyn, refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. ...”—Herbert, Some Yeares Travels, &c., p. 360.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M.
Roulin, quoted by Littré, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view. [So Prof.
Skeat (Concise Dict., s.v.): “In that case, it must first have been given to another bird, such as the auk (the puffin is common in Anglesey), since the penguin's head is black.”]

1674.—

“So Horses they affirm to be Mero Engines made by Geometry,
And were invented first from Engines,
As Indian Britons were from Penguins.”
Jhudibras, Pt. I. Canto ii. 57.

[1869.—In Lombeck ducks “are very cheap and are largely consumed by the crews of the rice ships, by whom they are called Baly-soldiers, but are more generally known elsewhere as penguin-ducks.”— Wallace, Malay Archip. ed. 1890, p. 135.]

PEON, s. This is a Portuguese word peño (Span. peon); from pe, ‘foot,’ and meaning a ‘footman’ (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind.
piyāda, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of ‘a foot-soldier’; thence as ‘orderly’ or messenger. The word Sepoy was used within our recollection, and perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of ‘orderly,’ peon is the word usual in S.

India, whilst chuprassy (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise very generally employed for men on police service (see BURKUNDAUZE).
[Mr. Skeat notes that Piyun is used in the Malay States, and Tambi or Tanby at Singapore]. The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manoel Correa, an early commentator on the Lusiads (d. 1613), thinks it necessary to explain piões by ‘gente de pé.’

1503.—“The Camorm ordered the soldier (pião) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it.”—Correa, Lendas, l. i. 421.

1510.—“So the Sabayo, putting much trust in this (Rumi), made him captain within the city (Goa), and outside of it put under him a captain of his with two thousand soldiers (piães) from the Balagate. ...”
—Ibid. II. i. 61.

1563.—“The pawn (pião) they call Piada, which is as much as to say a man who travels on foot.”—García, f. 37.

1575.—

“O Rey do Badajoz era alto Nouro

Camões, iii. 66.

By Burton :

“The King of Badajoz was a Moslem bold, with horse four thousand, fierce and furious knights, and countless Peons, armed and dight with gold, whose polish surface glanceth lustrous light.”

1609.—“The first of February the Capitaine departed with fiftie Peons. ...”

1705.—" . . . pions qui sont ce que nous appellons ici des Gardes, . . ."—Levillier, 218.

1745.—"Dès le lendemain j'ai été averti dans la Forteresse où je demourois en qualité d'Aumonier, le Chef des Pions, chez qui s'étoient fait les deux mariages."—Norbert, Mém. iii. 129.

1746.—"As the Nabob's behaviour when Madras was attacked by De la Bourdonnais, had caused the English to suspect his assurances of assistance, they had 2,000 Peons in the defence of Cuddalore. . . ."—Orme, i. 81.

c. 1760.—"Peon. One who waits about the house to run on messages; and he commonly carries under his arm a sword, or in his gash a kerrie, and in his hand a ratan, to keep the rest of the servants in subjection. He also walks before your palanquin, carries chits (q.v.) or notes, and is your body-guard."—Jess, 50.

1703.—"Europeans distinguish these undisciplined troops by the general name of Peons."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 80.

1772.—Hawley, writing in Bengal, spells the word punc; but this is evidently phonetic.

c. 1785.—" . . . Peons, a name for the infantry of the Deekan."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iv. 563.

1780-90.—"I sent off annually from Sylhet from 150 to 200 (elephants) divided into 4 distinct flocks. . . . They were put under charge of the common peon. These people were often absent 18 months. On one occasion my servant Manoo . . . after a twelve-month's absence returned . . . in appearance most miserable; he unfolded his girdle, and produced a scrap of paper of small dimensions, which proved to be a banker's bill amounting to 3 or 4,000 pounds, —his own pay was 30 shillings a month. . . . When I left India Manoo was still absent on one of these excursions, but he delivered to my agents as faithful an account of the produce as he would have done to myself. . . ."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 77.

1842.—" . . . he was put under arrest for striking, and throwing into the Indus, an inoffensive Peon, who gave him no provocation, but who was obeying the orders he received from Captain —. The Major General has heard it said that the supremacy of the British over the native must be maintained in India, and he entirely concurs in that opinion, but it must be maintained by justice."—Gen. Orders, &c., of Sir Ch. Napier, p. 72.

1873.—"Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer . . . and eventually a plunderer before an English Judge in a populous city."—Saturday Review, May 31, p. 728.

PEPPER, s. The original of this word, Skt. pippali, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce ('black pepper') but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have been classed sometimes in a different genus (Charica) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he misapprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalimūla, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopœia, is probably the πεπτεως βίβα of the ancients (Royle, p. 86).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly via Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Rhio, but a small quantity of fine quality comes from Telli-cherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit-spice gathered and dried when not quite ripe (Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia). All these kinds of pepper were, as has been said, known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D.—“The corns or grains . . . lie in certain little husks or cods . . . If that be plucked from the tree before they gape and open of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawno by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterward being parched in the Sunne, chaungeth colour and waxeth blacke, and therewith riveled also . . . Long pepper is soone sophisticated, with the senive or mustard seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fifteen Roman deniers. The white costeth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after foure deniers by the pound.”—Pliny, tr. by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. 80-90.—“And there come to these marts great ships, on account of the bulk and quantity of pepper and malabathrum. . . . The pepper is brought (to market) here, being produced largely only in one district near these marts, that which is called Kolonari.”—Periplus, § 56.

c. A.D. 100.—“The Pepper-tree (πέπερι δένδρον) is related to grow in India; it is short, and the fruit as it first puts it forth is long, resembling pods, and this long pepper has within it (grains) like small millet, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it opens and puts forth a cluster bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for theriacal potencies.”—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 515.—“This is the pepper-tree” (there is a drawing). “Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest tree, for it is weak and slum like the slender stems of the vine. And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of rue.”—Cosmas, Book xi.

c. 870.—“The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit.”—Ibn Khurdadba, in Journ. As. 6th ser. tom. v. 284.

1166.—“The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the towns, and every one knows his plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, but when they collect it they put it into basons and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried . . . in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour.”—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright, p. 114.

c. 1330.—“L'albore che fa il pepe è fatto como l'elera che nasce su per gli muri. Questo pepe sale su per gli arbori che l'uomini piantano a modo de l'elera, e sale sopra tutti li arbori più alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell' uvo; . . . o maturo si lo vendemiano a modo de l'uve e poi pongono il pepe al solo a seccare come uvo fusse, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe.”—Odwic, in Cutler, App. xlvii.

PERGUNNAH, s. Hind. pargana [Skt. pragay, ‘to reckon up’], a subdivision of a ‘District’ (see ZILLAH).

c. 1500.—“The divisions into sibas (see SOUBA) and parganas, which are maintained to the present day in the province of Tatta, were made by these people” (the Samma Dynasty).—Tārīkh-i-Tāhīrī, in Ellis, i. 273.

1535.—“Item, from the three praguanaes, viz., Anzor, Cairona, Panchena 133,200 fedas.”—S. Doletho, Tombo, 139.

[1611.—“I wrote him to stay in the Pregonas near Agra.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 106.]

[1617.—“For that Muckshad had also newly answered he had mist his priganay.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 415.]

1753.—“Masulipatnam . . . est capitale de ce qu'on appelle dans l'Inde un Sercar (see SIRCAR), qui comprend plusieurs Parganés, ou districts particuliers.”—D'Anville, 132.

1812.—“A certain number of villages with a society thus organised, formed a pergunnah.”—Fifth Report, 16.

PERGUNNAHS, THE TWENTY-FOUR, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and enclosing, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original ‘Zemindary of Calcutta’ granted to the English Company by a ‘Subadar’s Perwana’ in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jagheer (q.v.). The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips’ Million of Facts, illustrates the development of ‘facts’ out of the moral consciousness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765.—“The lands of the twenty-four Purgunnahs, ceded to the Company by the treaty of 1757, which subsequently became Colonel Clive's jagghier, were rated on the King's books at 2 lac and 22,000 rupees."—Holwell, Hist. Events, 2nd ed., p. 217.

1812.—"The number of convicts confined at the six stations of this division (independent of Zillah Twenty-four pergunnahs, is about 4,000. Of them probably nine-tenths are dacoits."—Fifth Report, 559.

c. 1831.—"Bengal is divided in 24 Pergunnahs, each with its judge and magistrate, registrar, &c."—Sur R. Phillips, Million of Facts, stereot. ed. 1843, 927.

PERI, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm's Law in the change of initial consonant. The Persian word is pəri, from 'par, 'a feather, or wing'; therefore 'the winged one'; [so F. Johnson, Pers. Dict.; but the derivation is very doubtful;] whilst the genealogy of fairy is apparently Ital. fata, French fée, whence fée-rie ('fay-dom') and thence fairy.

[c. 1500].—"I am the only daughter of a Jinn chief of noblest strain and my name is Peri-Banu."—Arab. Nights, Burton, x. 251.

1800.—

"From cluster'd henna, and from orange groves,
That with such perfumes fill the breeze
As Peris to their Sister bear,
When from the summit of some lofty tree
She hangs enaged, the captive of the Dives." Thalaba, xi. 21.

1817.—

"But nought can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary."
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

PERPET, PERPETUANO, s. The name of a cloth often mentioned in the 17th and first part of the 18th centuries, as an export from England to the East. It appears to have been a light and glossy twilled stuff of wool, [which like another stuff of the same kind called 'Lasting' took its name from its durability. (See Draper's Dict. s.v.)]. In France it was called perpetu-anne or sempiternne, in Ital. perpetuana.

[1609.—"Karsies, Perpetuanos and other woollen Commodities."—Birtwood, Letter Book, 298.

[1617.—"Perpetuano, 1 balo."—Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 293.

[1630.—"Perpetuanes."—Ibid. ii. 401.]

1711.—"Goods usually imported (to China) from Europe are Bullion Cloths, Clothraish Perpetuanos, and Camblets of Scarlet, black, blew, sad and violet Colours, which are of late so lightly set by; that to bear the Duty, and bring the prime Cost, is as much as can reasonably be hoped for."—Lockyer, 117.

[1717.—". . . a Pavilion lined with Imboss'd Perpetos."—In Fule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccix.]

1751.—"Being requested by the Trustees of the Charity Stock of this place to make an humble application to you for an order that the children upon the Foundation to the number of 12 or 14 may be supplied at the expense of the Honorable Company with a coat of blue Perpetos or some ordinary cloth. . . ."—Petition of Read, R. Maplethrift, in Long, p. 29.

1757.—Among the presents sent to the King of Ava with the mission of Ensign Robert Lester, we find:

"2 Pieces of ordinary Red Broad Cloth, 3 Do. of Perpetuanos of Opungay."
In Dalhousie, Str. Rep. i. 201.

PERSAIM, n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassein (q.v.) in Pegu. It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759.—"The Country for 20 mile round Persaim is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of CHOROMANDEL from Pondicherry to Mamuturam."—Letter in Indrapur, Or. Rep. i. 110. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1751.

1785.—"Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Serats, he referred the deputy . . . to the British Governor of Persaim for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty."—Symes, p. 40. But this author also uses Bassein (e.g. 32), and "Persaim or Bassara" (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Laing Wood.

PERSIMMON, s. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus (D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia. [The word became familiar in 1806 as the name of the winner of the Derby.]

1878.—"The finest fruit of Japan is the Kaki or persimmon (Diospyros Kaki), a large golden fruit on a beautiful tree."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 231.

PERUMBAUCUM, n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjevaram, in the district of Madras [Chingleput]. The name is perhaps perum-pukkam, Tam., 'big village.'

PESCARIA, n.p. The coast of Tinnevely was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl 'fishery' there.

[c. 1566.—See under BAZAAR.]

1600.—"There are in the Sea of the East three principal mines where they fish pearls. . . . The third is between the Isle of Ceylon and Cape Comory, and on this account the Coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramanancor and Manar is called, in part, Pescaria. . . ."—Lucena, 50.

[1616.—"Pesqueria." See under CHILAW.]

1615.—"Iam nonnihil de ora Piscariæ dicamus quæ iam inde a promontorio Comornio in Orientem ad usque brevia Ramaneoridæ extenditur, quod haud procul inde celererrimus, maximus, et copiosissimus toto Oriento Margaritarum piscatus instituitur. . . ."—Jurrie, Thes. i. 115.

1710.—"The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Camorn to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first declaration of this second conquest."—Smea, Orient. Conquest, i. 122.

PESHAWUR, n.p. Peshāwar. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kābul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshāwar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Ain, about the middle of the Sūba of Kābul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Ain as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tubakāt-i-Akbari of Nizām-d-din Ahmad (died 1594-95), in Elliot, we find the name transliterated variously as Peshāwar (v. 448), Parshāwar (293), Parshor (423), Peshor (424). We cannot doubt that the Chinese form Folau-sha in Fah-hien already expresses the name Parashāwar, or Parshāwar.

c. 400.—"From Gandhāra, going south 1 day's journey, we arrive at the country of Fo-lau-sha. In old times Buddha, in company with all his disciples, travelled through this country."—Fah-hien, by Beal, p. 31.

c. 630.—"The Kingdom of Kien-to-lo (Gandhāra) extends about 1000 li from E. to W. and 800 li from S. to N. On the East it adjoins the river Sīn (Indus). The capital of this country is called Pu-tu-sha-pu-lo (Purāshapura). . . . The towns and villages are almost deserted. . . . There are about a thousand convents, ruined and abandoned; full of wild plants, and presenting only a melancholy solitude. . . ."—Hsueh Tsang, Pil. Bond, ii. 101-105.

c. 1001.—"On his (Mahmūd's) reaching Parshaur, he pitched his tent outside the city. There he received intelligence of the bold resolve of Jaipal, the enemy of God, and the King of Hind, to offer opposition."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, ii. 25.

c. 1020. "The aggregate of these waters forms a large river opposite the city of Parshāwar."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, i. 47. See also 63.

1059.—"The Amir ordered a letter to be despatched to the minister, telling him 'I have determined to go to Hindustān, and pass the winter in Wāhind, and Marmināra, and Barshūr. . . ."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, ii. 150.

c. 1220.—"Farshābūr. The vulgar pronunciation is Barshāwūr. A large tract between Ghazna and Lahor, famous in the history of the Mussulman conquest."—Fakih, in Barber de Maynard, Dict. de la Perse, 418.

1510.—"We held a consultation, in which it was resolved to plunder the country of the Aseridī Afghāns, as had been proposed by Sultan Bayezid, to fit up the fort of Farshāwar for the reception of their effects and corn, and to leave a garrison in it."—Barber, 276.

c. 1555.—"We came to the city of Parshāwar, and having thus fortunately passed the Kotal we reached the town of Jeshāya. On the Kotal we saw rhinoceroses, the size of a small elephant."—Sidi Ali, in J. A. Ser. i. tom. ix. 201.

c. 1590.—"Tumān Bagrām, which they call Parshāwar; the spring here is a source of delight. There is in this place a great place of worship which they call Gorkhatrī, to which people, especially Jogis, resort from great distances."—Ain (orig.), i. 592; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 401. In iii. 69, Parshāwar].

1754.—"On the news that Peshāwar was taken, and that Nadir Shah was preparing to pass the Indus, the Moghol's court, already in great disorder, was struck with terror."—H. of Nadir Shah, in Hankey, ii. 363.

1781.—“The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted skreen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost insupportable.”—W. Forster, ed. 1808, ii. 57.

1663.—“Its present name we owe to Akbar, whose fondness for innovation led him to change the ancient Parashāwara, of which he did not know the meaning, to Peshāwar, or the ‘frontier town.’ Abul Fazl gives both names.”—Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 87. Gladwin does in his translation give both names; but see above.

PESHOUZ, s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, while the edge curves inwardly from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. resh-kabz, ‘fore-grip.’ The handle is usually made of shir-mahī, ‘the white bone (tooth?) of a large catfish’; probably more-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Sainsbury, ii. 65, 159, 201, 305; iii. 89, 162, 268, 267, &c.). [The reshkubz appears several times in Mr. Egerton’s Catalogue of Indian Arms, and one is illustrated, Pl. xv. No. 760.]

1767.—

“Received for sundry jewels, &c. . . . (Rs.) 7326 0 0 Ditto for knife, or peshcubz (mis-
Lant Clive’s Accounts, in Long, 497.

PESH-CUSH, s. Pers. resh-kash. Wilson interprets this as literally ‘first-fruits.’ It is used as an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent, a payment exacted on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary Government demand on land. Peshcush, in the old English records, is most generally used in the sense of a present to a great man.

1653.—“Peshkat est vn present en Turc.”—De la Boullay-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1657.—“As to the Pishcash for the King of Golconda, if it be not already done, we do hope with it you may obteyn our liberty to coyno silver Rupees and copper Pies at the Fort, which would be a great accomodation to our Trade. But in this and all other Pishcashes be as sparing as you can.”—Letter of Court to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Letters, No. i. p. 7.

1673.—“Sometimes sending Pishcashes of considerable value.”—Fryer, 166.

1675.—“Being informed that Mr. Mohun had sent a Pishcash of Persian Wine, Cases of Stronger Water, &c. to ye Great Governour of this Countrey, that is 2d. or 3d. p-on in ye kingdom, I went to his house to speake abt. it, when he kept me to dine with him.”—Purcell’s Diary, MS. in India Office.

[1693.—“Piscash.” (See under FIR-MAUN.)]

1689.—“But the Pishcashes or Presents expected by the Nalobs and Umrahs retarded our Enlargement for some time notwithstanding.”—Ovington, 415.

1751.—“After I have refreshed my army at DRLINE, and received the subsidy (Nat). —“This is called a Peshcush, or present from an inferior to a superior. The sum agreed for was 20 crores’) which must be paid, I will leave you in possession of his dominion.”—List. of Nadir Shah, in Hanover, ii. 371.

1761.—“I have obtained a promise from his Majesty of his royal confirmation of all your possessions and privileges, provided you pay him a proper pishcush. . . .”—Major Turner to the Governor and Council, in Van Sittart, i. 119.

1811.—“By the fiat or regulated sun . . . the Sultan . . . means the Pishcush, or tribute, which he was bound by former treaties to pay to the Government of Poona; but which he does not think proper to . . . designate by any term denotive of inferiority, which the word Pishcush certainly is.”—Kirkpatrick, Notes on Tipu’s Letters, p. 9.

PESH-KHĀNA, PESH-KHID-MAT, ss. Pers. ‘Fore-service.’ The tents and accompanying retinue sent on over-night, during a march, to the new camping ground, to receive the master on his arrival. A great personage among the natives, or among ourselves, has a complete double establishment, one portion of which goes thus every night in advance. [Another term used is peshkhaima Pers. ‘advance tents,’ as below.]

1665.—“When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps . . . to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design’d to encamp at; and ‘tis therefore that they are called Peshc-kanes, as if you should say, Houses going before. . . .”—Bernier, L.T. 115; [ed. Constable, 359].

[1738.—“Pesh-khanna is the term given to the royal tents and their appendages in India.”—Hamoy, iv. 163.

[1862.—"The result of all this uproarious bustle has been the erection of the Sardār's peshkhaima, or advanced tent."—Bellew, Journal of Mission, 409.]

PESHWA, s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Mahratta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Śivaji, became practically the prince of an independent State and chief of the Mahrattas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Bāji Rāo, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jāgir under his own jurisdiction, at Bhitār, near Cawnpore, till January 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Nānā Sāhib.

Mr C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshwān: "The princess Gangā Bāi was Peshwān of Purandhar." (MS. notes).

1673.—"He answered, it is well, and referred our Business to Moro Pundit his Peshua, or Chancellour, to examine our Articles, and give an account of what they were."—Eryer, 79.

1803.—"But how is it with the Peshwah? He has no minister; no person has influence over him, and he is only guided by his own caprices"—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 11.

In the following passage (quando-quidem dormitans) the Great Duke had forgotten that things were changed since he left India, whilst the editor perhaps did not know:

1841.—"If you should draw more troops from the Establishment of Fort St. George, you will place under arms the subsidiary force of the Nizam, the Peshwah, the force in Mysore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam in 1800-1801."—Letter from the D. of Wellington, in 1st Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 1874, (Dec. 29). The Duke was oblivious when he spoke of the Peshwa's Subsidiary Force in 1841.

PETERSILLY, s. This is the name by which 'parsley' is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for 'parsley,' viz. petersilie, from the Lat. petroselinum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French persil. In the Arabic of Avicenna the name is given as fatrasiṭiṭin.

PETTAH, s. Tam. pettai. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The pettah is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Mahratti peth is used in like manner; [it is Skt. petaka, and the word possibly came to the Tamil through the Mahr.]. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1630.—"Azam Khān, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-dūdā, encamped 3 lor from Dhārūr. He then directed Multān Khān . . . to make an attack upon . . . Dhārūr and its pettah, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling."—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 20.

1763.—"The pagoda served as a citadel to a large pettah, by which name the people on the Coast of Coromandel call every town contiguous to a fortress."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 147.

1791.—". . . The petta or town (at Bangalore) of great extent to the north of the fort, was surrounded by an indifferent rampart and excellent ditch, with an intermediate berm . . . planted with impenetrable and well-grown thorns. . . . Neither the fort nor the petta had drawbridges."—Wille, Hist. Sketches, iii. 123.

1803.—"The pettah wall was very lofty, and defended by towers, and had no rampart."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 193.

1809—"I passed through a country little cultivated . . . to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a pettah apparently well filled with inhabitants."—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

1839—"The English ladies told me this Pettah was 'a horrid place—quite native!' and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native."—Letters from Madras, 289.

PHANSEEGAR, s. See under THUG.

[PHOOLKAREE, s. Hind. phool-kārī, 'flowered embroidery.' The term applied in N. India to the cotton sheets embroidered in silk by village women, particularly Jats. Each girl is supposed to embroider one of these for her marriage. In recent years a considerable demand has arisen for specimens of this kind of needlework among English ladies, who use them for screens and other decorative purposes. Hence a considerable manufacture has sprung up of which an account will be found in a note by Mrs. F. A. Steel, appended to Mr.

H. C. Cookson's Monograph on the Silk Industry of the Punjab (1886-7), and in the Journal of Indian Art, ii. 71 seqq.

[1887.—"They (native school girls) were collected in a small inner court, which was hung with the pretty phulcarries they make here (Rawal Pindi), and which . . . looked very Oriental and gay."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 336.]

[PHOORZA, s. A custom-house; Gujarātī phurjā, from Ar. furzāt 'a notch,' then 'a light,' 'river-mouth,' 'harbour'; hence 'a tax' or 'custom-duty.'

[1791.—The East India Calendar (p. 131) has "John Church, Phoorza-Master, Surat."

[1727.—"And the Mogul's Furza or custom-house is at this place (Hughly)."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 19.

[1772.—"But as they still insisted on their people sitting at the gates on the Phoorza Coosky . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 386, and see 392. "Phoorza Master." Coosky = P.—Mahr. Khushki, "inland transit-duties."

[1813.—". . . idols . . . were annually imported to a considerable number at the Barocho Phoorza, when I was custom-master at that settlement."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 331.]

PIAL, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the verandah, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the N. Indian chabūtra (see CHABOOTRA). Wilson conjectures the word to be Telugu, but it is in fact a form of the Portuguese pojo and payal (Span. pojo), 'a seat or bench.' This is again, according to Diez (i. 326), from the Lat. podium, 'a projecting base, a balcony.' Bluteau explains payal as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scotice, 'a louping-on stone') [see Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 68]. The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1553.—". . . paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a payal."—Custanbeda, vi. 3.

1578.—"In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an infirm man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in his trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a pojo."—Acosta, Tractado, 432.

1602.—"The natives of this region who are called Iaos, are men no arrogant that they think no others their superiors . . . inasmuch that if a Iao in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a payal, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down, . . . until he is gone by, he will kill him."—Conto, IV. iii. 1. [For numerous instances of this superstition, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 380 seqq.]

1873.—"Built against the front wall of every Hindu house in southern India . . . is a bench 3 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands. . . . The posts of the veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform for the basement of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Pyal, and is the lounging-place by day. It also serves in the hot months as a couch for the night. . . . There the visitor is received; there the bargaining is done; there the beggar pleads his trade, and the Yogi (see JOGEE) sounds his conch; there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with beches and other frightful noises. . . ."—Pyal Schools in Madras, by E. C. Gover, in Ind. Antiq. n. 62.

PIOAR, s. Hind. piārār, [which again is a corruption of Pers. pi'e-kār, pi'e, 'a foot'], a retail-dealer, an intermediate dealer or broker.

1680.—"Picar." See under DUSTOOR.

1683.—"Ye said Naylor has always corresponded with Mr. Charnock, having been always his intimate friend; and without question either provides him goods out of the Hon. Comp.'s Warehouse, or connives at the Weavers and Piccars doing of it."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 133.

[1772.—"Pykārs (Dellols (see DELOLL) and Gomastahs) are a chain of agents through whose hands the articles of merchandize pass from the loom of the manufacturer, or the store-house of the cultivator, to the public merchant, or exporter."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.]

PICE, s. Hind. piśit, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is $\frac{1}{4}$ of an anna, $\frac{1}{8}$ of a rupee, and somewhat less than $\frac{1}{2}$ of a furling. Pier is used slangishly for money in general. By Act XXXIII. of 1870 (cl. 8) the following copper coins are current:—1. Double Pice or Half-anna, 2. Pice or $\frac{1}{2}$ anna, 3. Half-pice or $\frac{1}{4}$ anna, 4. Pie or $\frac{1}{8}$ anna. No. 2 is the only one in very common use. As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucka pice, and cutchia pice. The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper which did duty for small change (e.g. in the N.W. Provinces within memory), or between single and double pice, i.e. $\frac{1}{2}$ anna-pieces and $\frac{1}{4}$ anna-pieces. [Also see PIE.]

c. 1590.—“The dām . . . is the fortieth part of the rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah.—Ann, ed. Blochmann, i. 31.

[1614.—“Another coin there is of copper, called a Pize, whereof you have commonly 34 in the mamudo.—Foster, Letters, iii. 11.]

1615.—“Pice, which is a Copper Coyne; twelve Drammes make one Pice. The English Shilling, if weight, will yeeld thirtie three Pice and a halfe.”—W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 630.

1616.—“Bms-e money, which they call Pices, whereof three or thorenabouts counter-vail a Penny.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

1648.—“ . . . de Peyzen zyn kooper gelt. . . .”—Van Trist, 62.

1653.—“Peça est une monnoye du Mogol de la valeur de 6 deniers.”—De la Boullaye-le-Long, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1673.—“Pice, a sort of Copper Money current among the Poorer sort of People . . . the Company's Accounts are kept in Book-rate Pice, viz. 32 to the Mam. [i.e. Mamoodas, see GOSBECK], and 80 Pice to the Rupee.”—Fryer, 205.

1676.—“The Indians have also a sort of small Copper-money; which is called Pecha. . . . In my last Travels, a Roupy went at Surat for nine and forty Pecha's.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 22, [ed. Dall, i. 27].

1689.—“Lower than these (pice), bitter-Almonds here (at Surat) pass for Money, about Sixty of which make a Pice.”—Orington, 219.

1726.—“1 Ana makes 14 stuyvors or 2 peys.”—Valentyne, v. 179. [Also see under MOHUR GOLD.]

1768.—“Shall I risk my cavalry, which cost 1000 rupees each horse, against your cannon balls that cost two pice?—No—I will march your troops until their legs become the size of their bodies.”—Hyder Ali, Letter to Col. Wood, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 287; [2nd ed. ii. 300].

c. 1816.—“‘Here,’ said he, ‘is four pucker-pice for Mary to spend in the bazar; but I will thank you, Mrs. Browne, not to let her have any fruit. . . .’”—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 16, ed. 1863.

PICOTA, s. An additional allowance or percentage, added as a handicap to the weight of goods, which varied with every description,—and which the editor of the Subsidios supposes to have led to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farazolas (see FRAZALA), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormuz), or about $\frac{1}{7}$ additional; for cinnamon $\frac{1}{7}$ additional; for benzoin $\frac{1}{4}$ additional, &c. See the Pesos, &c. of A. Nunes (1564) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.

[1654.—“Picotaa.” (See under BRAZIL-WOOD, DOCCAUN.)]

PICOTTAH, s. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the ghenuli of Upper India, the shaduf of the Nile, and the old English swerp, swape, or sway-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese, picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a ‘pump-brake.’ The picota at sea was also used as a pillory, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa. The word is given in the Glossary attached to the “Fifth Report” (1812), but with no indication of its source. Fryer (1673, pub. 1698) describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following the word is used in the marine sense:

1624.—“He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday . . . and if he did, that it should be taken from him by the constables (he serra tomada pelos meirinhos), and the man put in the picota in disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers.”—Correa, Lendas, II. ii. 822.

1782.—“Pour cet effet (arroser les terres) on emploie une machine appelée Picôte. C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits on d'un réservoir d'eaux pluviales, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite où l'on veut.”—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 188.

c. 1780.—“Partout les pakoties, ou puits à bascule, étoient en mouvement pour fournir l'eau nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendoit les jardiniers égarer leurs travaux par des chansons.”—Macfuer, ii. 217.

1807.—“In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yalam, or Pacota, as it is called by the English.”—Buchanan, Journey through Mysore, &c., i. 15. [Here Yalam, is Can. yāla Tel. hamu, Mal. ēlam.]

[1871.—“Aye, e'en picotta-work would gain By using such bamboos.” Gover, Folk Songs of S. India, 184.]

PIE, s. Hind. paṭī, the smallest copper coin of the Anglo-Indian currency, being $\frac{1}{4}$ of an anna, $\frac{1}{16}$ of a rupee, = about $\frac{1}{2}$ a farthing. This is now the authorised meaning of pie. But paṭī was originally, it would seem, the fourth part of an anna, and in fact identical with pie (q.v.). It is the H.—Malhr. paṭī, 'a quarter,' from Skt. pad, pādika in that sense.

[1866.—" . . . his father has a one pie share in a small village which may yield him perhaps 21 rupees per annum."—Confessions of an Orderly, 201.]

PIECE-GOODS. This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which appears to have been deliberately killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India.* [In 1898 a duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on cotton goods was reimposed.]

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such lingering and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of "ancient history." But it is certain that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes: it was killed by prohibitory duties. These duties were so high in 1783 that they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and they were reduced to 16 per cent. ad valorem. In the year 1794-97 the value of piece-goods from India imported into England was £2,716,652, or one-third of the whole value of the imports from India, which was £8,252,509. And in the sixteen years between 1793-4 and 1809-10 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £20,171,127.

In 1793 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they were, I believe, at a maximum. The duties then, on "plain white calicoes," were:—

Warehouse duty . . .	4	0	0	0
War enhancement . . .	1	0	0	"
Customs duty . . .	10	0	0	"
Total . . .	67	10	0	0

There was an Excise duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 3½d. per square yard, and of twice that amount on foreign (Indian) calicoes and muslin printed in Great Britain, and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Custom-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 3½d. per square yard.

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn (i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading. [In the present edition these lists have been arranged in alphabetical order. The figures before each indicate that they fall into the following classes: 1. Piece-goods formerly exported from Bombay and Surat; 2. Piece-goods exported from Madras and the Coast; 3. Piece-goods: the kinds imported into Great Britain from Bengal. Some notes and quotations have been added. But it must be understood that the classes of goods now known under these names may or may not exactly represent those made at the time when these lists were prepared. The names printed in capitals are discussed in separate articles.]

1665.—"I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Cloth of all sorts, fine and others, tinged and white,

(See in the Statute, 43 Geo. III. cap. 69, 70, 71; 54 Geo. III. cap. 26; 6 Geo. IV. cap. 3, also Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, iv. 139.)

In Sir A. Arbuthnot's publication of Sir T. Munro's Minutes (Memor., p. cxviii.) he quotes a letter of Munro's to a friend in Scotland, written about 1825, which shows him surprisingly before his age in the matter of Free Trade, speaking with reference to certain measures of Mr. Huskisson's. The passage ends thus:—"India is the country that has been worst used in the new arrangements. All her products ought undoubtedly to be imported freely into England, upon paying the same duties, and no more, which English duties [manufactures] pay in India. When I see what is done in Parliament against India, I think that I am reading about Edward III. and the Flemings."

Sir A. Arbuthnot adds very appropriately a passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James Mill's History of India (1847, vol. i. pp. 539-559), a passage which we also gladly insert here:

"It was stated in evidence (in 1813) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for a profit in the British market at a price from 50 to 60 per cent. lower than those fabricated in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 70 or 80 per cent. on their value, or by positive prohibition. Had this not been the case, had not such prohibitory duties and decrees existed, the mills of Paisley and of Manchester would have been stopped in their outset, and could hardly have been again set in motion, even by the powers of steam. They were created by the sacrifice of the Indian manufacturers. Had India been independent, she would have retaliated; would have imposed protective duties upon British goods, and would thus have preserved her own productive industry from annihilation. This act of self-defence was not permitted her; she was at the mercy of the stranger. British goods were forced upon her without paying any duty; and the foreign manufacturer employed the arm of political injustice to keep down and ultimately strangle a competitor with whom he could not contend on equal terms."

which the Hollanders alone draw from thence and transport into many places, especially into Japan and Europe; not to mention what the English, Portugal and Indian merchants carry away from those parts."—Bernier, I.T. 141; [ed. Constable, 439].

1785.—(Resn. of Court of Directors of the I.C., 8th October) "... that the Captains and Officers of all ships that shall sail from any part of India, after receiving notice hereof, shall be allowed to bring 8000 pieces of piece-goods and no more ... that 6000 pieces and no more, may consist of white Muslin and Calicoes, stitched or plain, or either of them, of which 6000 pieces only 2000 may consist of any of the following sorts, viz., Alliballies, Stricks (H), Cavars, Dorias, Jandannis, Mutais, Nannools, Neelecloths, Tanjels, and Terrindams, and that 3000 pieces and no more, may consist of coloured piece-goods. . . . &c., &c.—In Ston-Karr, i. 83.

[Abrawan, P. ab-ravān, 'flowing water', a very fine kind of Dacca muslin. 'Woven air' is the name applied in the Arabian Nights to the Pitha gauze, a term originally used for the produce of the Coan looms (Burton, x. 217). "The Hindoos amuse us with two stories, as instances of the fineness of this muslin. One, that the Emperor Aurangzeb was angry with his daughter for exposing her skin through her clothes; whereupon the young prince's remonstrated in her justification that she had seven javahs (see JAMMA) or suits on; and another, in the Nabob Allaverry Khawn's time a weaver was christened and turned out of the city for his neglect, in not preventing his cow from eating up a piece of abrooan, which he had spread and carelessly left on the grass."—Bolt, Considerations on Affairs of India, 206.

3. ADATIS.

3. Alliballies = "Ataballie (signifying according to the weavers' interpretation of the word 'very fine') is a muslin of fine texture."—(J. Taylor, Account of the Cotton Manufacture at Dacca, 45). According to this the word is perhaps from Ar. d'la, 'superior', H. dhalā, 'good'.

3. Allibanees.—Perhaps from d'la, 'superior', bānā, 'wool'.

1. Annabatchies.

3. Arrabs.—Perhaps from the place of that name in Shahāūd, where, according to Duchanan Hamilton (Eastern India, i. 548) there was a large cloth industry.

3. Aurbahs.

2. Annacketchies.

3. BAFYAS.

3. BANDANNAS.

1. Bejutapants.—H. bē-jūḍā, 'without join', pāt, 'a piece'.

1. BETEELAS.

3. Blue cloth.

1. Bombay Stuffs.

1. Brawl.—The N.E.D. describes Brawl as a 'blue and white striped cloth manufactured in India.' In a letter of 1616 (Foster, iv. 300) we have "Lolweo champyell and Bural." The editor suggests H. bīrā, 'open in texture, fine.' But Roquefort (s.v.) gives: "Bure, Burel, grosso étoffe en laine de couleur rouille ou grisâtre, dont s'habillent ordinairement les ramoneurs; cette étoffe est faite de bravis noirs et bruns, sans aucune autre teinture." And see N.E.D. s.v. Borrel.

3. Byrampants. (See BEIRAMEE.)

2. Callawapores.

3. Callipatties.—H. Kālī, 'black,' pattī, 'strip.'

3. CANBAYS.

3. Cambrics.

3. Carpets.

3. Carridaries.

2. Catiaketchies.

1. Challas. (See under SHALEE.)

3. Charconnas.—H. chār-khānā, 'chequered.' "The charlana, or chequered muslin, is, as regards manufacture, very similar to the Doreas (see DOREAS below). They differ in the breadth of the stripes, their closeness to each other, and the size of the squares." (Forbes Watson, Textile Man. 78). The same name is now applied to a silk cloth. "The word chārkhāna simply means 'a check,' but the term is applied to certain silk or mixed fabrics containing small checks, usually about 8 or 10 checks in a line to an inch." (Tunstall, Mon. on Silk, 93. Also see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 6.)

1633.—"20 yards of charconnas."—In Fulke, Hedges' Diary, Ind. Soc. i. 94.

2. Chavonis.

1. Chelloes. (See SHALEE.)

3. Chinechuras.—Probably cloth from Chinsura.

1. CHINTZ, of sorts.

3. Chittabullies.

3. Chowtars.—This is almost certainly not identical with Chudder. In a list of cotton cloths in the Min. (i. 94) we have chawtar, which may mean 'made with four threads' or 'wires', Chundālī, 'four-fold,' is a kind of cloth used in the Punjab for counterpanes (Francis, Man. Cotton, 7). This cloth is frequently mentioned in the early letters.

1610.—"Chautares are white and well requested."—Immers, Letters, i. 76.

1614.—"The Chauters of Agra and fine bastas nyll doth not here vend."—Foster, Letters, ii. 45.

1615.—"Four pieces fine white Cowter."—Ibid. iv. 51.

3. Chuclaes.—This may be H. chālā, chakri, which Platts defines as 'a kind of cloth made of silk and cotton.'

3. Chunderbannies.—This is perhaps H. chandra, 'the moon,' bānā, 'wool.'

3. Chundraconnas.—Forbes Watson has: "Chundālana, second quality muslin for handkerchiefs"; "Main white bleached muslin called Chundālora." The word is probably chandrakhāna, 'moon checks.'

3. Clouts, common coarse cloth, for which see N.E.D.

3. Coopées.—This is perhaps H. kappin, kopin, 'the small langooty worn by Fakirs.'

3. Corahs.—H. kora, 'plain, unbleached, undyed.' What is now known as Kora silk is woven in pieces for waist-cloths (see Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 76).

3. Cossaes.—This perhaps represents Ar. khāṣṣa 'special.' In the Āin we have khāṣṣa in the list of cotton cloths (i. 91). Mr. Taylor describes it as a muslin of a close fine texture, and identifies it with the fine muslin which, according to the Āin (ii. 124), was produced at Sopūrgāon. The finest kind he says is "jungle-khasa." (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Cushtaes.—These perhaps take their name from Kushtin, a place of considerable trade in the Nadiya District.

3. Cuttannees. (See COTTON.)

1. Dhooties. (See DHOTY.)

3. Diapers.

3. Dimities.

3. Doreas.—II. doriya, 'striped cloth,' dor, 'thread.' In the list in the Āin (i. 95), Doriya appears among cotton stuffs. It is now also made in silk: "The simplest pattern is the stripe; when the stripes are longitudinal the fabric is a doriya. . . . The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tawar, and other combinations." (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 57, 91.)

1683. — "3 pieces Dooreas." — Hedgrs, Diary, II. k. Soc. i. 94.

3. DOSOOTIES.

3. DUNGAREES.

3. Dysuckasays.

3. Elatches.—Platts gives H. Nācha, 'a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardamoms (ilātkā).' But it is almost certainly identical with alleja. It was probably introduced to Agra, where now alone it is made, by the Moghuls. It differs from doriya (see DOREAS above) in having a substantial texture, whereas the doriya is generally flimsy. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

3. Emmerties.—This is H. amratī, imratī, 'sweet as nectar.'

2. GINGHAMS.

2. Gudeloor (dimities).—There is a place of the name in the Nalgerry District, but it does not seem to have any cloth manufacture.

1. GUINEA STUFFS.

3. Gurrās.—This is probably the H. gurrā: "unbleached fabrics which under names varying in different localities, constitute a large proportion of the clothing of the poor. They are used also for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead, for which last purpose a large quantity is employed both by Hindus and Mahomedans. These fabrics in Bengal pass under the name of gurrā and guzee." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 83.)

3. Habassies.—Probably P. abbāsī, used of cloths dyed in a sort of magenta colour. The recipe is given by Hadi, Mon. on Dying in the N.W.P., p. 16.

3. Herba Taffeties.—These are cloths made of Grass-cloth.

3. Humhums, from Ar. hammām, 'a Turkish bath' (apparently so named from its having been originally used at the bath), is a cloth of a thick stout texture, and generally worn as a wrapper in the cold season." (Taylor, op. cit. 63.)

2. Izarees.—P. izār, 'drawers, trousers.' Watson (op. cit. 57, note) says that in some places it is peculiar to men, the women's drawers being Turwar. Herkots (Qanoon-e-Islam, App. xiv.) gives ezar as equivalent to shulwaur, like the pyjamama, but not so wide.

3. Jamdannies.—P.-H. jāmdānī, which is said to be properly jāmahdānī, 'a box for holding a suit.' The jāmdānī is a loom-figured muslin, which Taylor (op. cit. 48) calls "the most expensive productions of the Dacca looms."

3. Jamwars. H. jāmwār, 'sufficient for a dress.' It is not easy to say what stuff is intended by this name. In the Āin (ii. 210) we have jāmahār, mentioned among Guzerat stuffs worked in gold thread, and again (i. 95) jāmahār Purnanari among woollen stuffs. Forbes Watson gives among Kashmir shawls: "Jamwara, or striped shawl pieces"; in the Punjab they are of a striped pattern made both in pashm and wool (Johnstone, Mon. on Wool, 9), and Mr. Kipling says, "the stripes are broad, of alternate colours, red and blue, &c." (Mukharji, Art Manufactures of India, 374.)

3. Kincha cloth.

3. Kissorays.

3. Laccowries.

1. Lemmannees.

3. LONG CLOTHS.

3. LOONGHEES, HERBA. (See GRASS-CLOTH.)

1. LOONGHEE, MAGHRUB. Ar. maghrīb, maghrab, 'the west.'

3. Mamoodentis.

3. Mammoodes. Platts gives Mahmūdī, 'praised, fine muslin.' The Āin (ii. 91) classes the Mahmūdī among cotton cloths, and at a low price. A cloth under this name is made at Shāhābād in the Hardoi District. (Oudh Gazetteer, ii. 25.)

2. Monepore cloths. (See MUNNE-FORE.)

2. Moorees.—"Moories are blue cloths, principally manufactured in the districts of Nellore and at Canatur in the Chingleput collectorate of Madras. . . . They are largely exported to the Straits of Malacca." (Batfour, Cycl. ii. 982.)

1681-5. — "Moorees superfine, 1000 pieces." — Pringle, Diary F. S. Co. iv. 41.

3. Muggadooties. (See MOONGA.)

3. MULMULS.

3. Mushruces.—P. mashrū, 'lawful.' It is usually applied to a kind of silk or satin with a cotton back. "Pure silk is not allowed to men, but women may wear the most sumptuous silk fabrics" (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 90, seq.). "All Mushroos wash well, especially the finer kinds, used for bodices, petticoats, and trousers of both sexes." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 97.)

1832. — ". . . Mussheroo (striped washing silk) manufactured at Benares" . . . — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 106.

1. MUSTERS.

3. Nalbabies.

3. Nainsooks.—H. nainsukh, 'pleasure of the eye.' A sort of fine white calico. Forbes Watson (op. cit. 76) says it is used for neckerchiefs, and Taylor (op. cit. 46) defines it as "a thick muslin, apparently identical with the tunsook (tunsook, Stechmann, i. 91) of the Ayren." A cloth is made of the same name in silk, imitated from the cotton fabric. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

1. Neganepauts.

1. Nicannees.—Quoting from a paper of 1633, Orme (Fragment, 237) has "6000 Nicanneers, 13 yards long."

3. Nillies.—Some kind of blue cloth, H. nild, 'blue.'

1. Nunsareen—There is a place called Nunsari in the Bhadrara District (Central Provinces Gazetteer, 216).

2. Oringal (cloths). Probably take their name from the once famous city of Warangal in Hyderabad.

3. PALAMPORES.

3. Ponacooes.—In a paper quoted by Birdwood (Report on Old Records, 40) we have Ponacoo, which he says are stuff made of uno apple fibres.

2, 3. Percaulaz.—H. pridala, 'a spark, a piece of glass.' These were probably some kind of spangled robe, set with pieces of glass, as some of the modern Phoolkari are. In the Madras Diaries of 1631-5 we have "Percolleas," and "percolles, blue" (Pringle, i. 15, iii. 119, iv. 41.)

3. Photaez.—In a letter of 1615 we have "Lunze" (see LOONGHEE) and Footae of all sorts." (Patel's Letters, v. 306), where the editor suggests H. phid, 'variegated.' But in the Ain we find "Footals (loin-bands)" (i. 93), which is the P. fo'a, and this is from the connection the word probably meant.

3. Palecat handkerchiefs. (See MADRAS handkerchiefs and BANDANNA.)

2. Punjam.—The Madras Gloss, gives Tel. punjam, Tam. puñam, lit. 'a collection.' "In Tel. a collection of 60 threads and in Tam. of 120 threads, cleaned, ready for the formation of the warp for weaving. A cloth is denominated 10, 12, 14, up to 40 puñam, according to the number of times 60, or else 120, is contained in the total number of threads in the warp. Punjam thus also came to mean a cloth of the length of one puñam as usually skinned, this usual length is 36 cubits, or 18 yards, and the width from 33 to 44 inches, 14 lbs. being the common weight; pieces of half length were formerly exported as Salempoory. Writing in 1811, Heyno (Tracts, 347) says, "Horo (in Salem) two puñams are designated by 'first call,' so that twelve puñams of cloth is called 'six call,' and so on."

3. Puteahs. (See PUTTEE.) In a letter of 1610 we have "Patta, katuyenen, with red stripes over thwart through." (Davies's Letters, i. 72.)

2. Putton Ketchies.—Cloths which possibly took their name from the city of Anhilwara Patan in Cutch.

1727.—"That country (Tegnapatam) produces Pepper, and coarse Cloth called catches."—A. Hamilton, i. 335.

3. Rainga.—"Rainga is a muslin which resembles ghumi in its irregular gauze or net-like texture. It is made by passing a single thread of the warp through each division of the reed" (Taylor, op. cit. 41.) "1 Piece of Raingins."—Holtz, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 91.

1. Saloopauts. (See SHALEE.)

3. Sannoes.

2. Sassergates.—Some kind of cloth called 'that of the 1099 knots,' H. sahara granthi. "Sassergates," (Birdwood, Rep. on Old Records, 63).

2. Sastracundees.—These cloths seem to take their name from a place called Sastrakunda, 'Pool of the Law.' This is probably the place named in the Ain (ed. Jarrett, ii. 121): "In the township of Kygra Swadar is a large reservoir which gives a peculiar whiteness to the cloths washed in it." (Birdwood reads the name Cutara Kundala, or Cutara Kundler (see Taylor, op. cit. 91).)

3. Seerbands, Seerbottes.—These are names for turbans, H. serband, serbatti. Taylor (op. cit. 47) names them as Decca turbans under the names of serband and serbatti.

3. Seershauds.—This is perhaps P. ser-shad, 'head-delighting,' some kind of turban or veil.

3. Seersuckers.—Perhaps, ser, 'head,' suck, 'pleasure.'

3. Shalbaff.—P. shalbaff, 'shawl-weaving' (See SHAWL.)

3. Sickterays.

3. SOOSIES.

1. Subnooms, Subloms.—"Subnam is a thin pellucid muslin to which the Persian figurative name of 'evening dew' (shabnam) is given, the fabric being, when spread over the bleaching-field, scarcely distinguishable from the dew on the grass." (Taylor, op. cit. 15.)

3. Succatoons. (See SUCLAT.)

3. Taffaties of sorts. "A name applied to plain woven silks, in more recent times signifying a light thin silk stuff with a considerable lustre or glow" (Drapers' Dict. s.v.). The word comes from P. tistat, 'to twist, spin.' The Ain (i. 91) has tistak in the list of silks.

3. Tainsooks.—H. tainsukh, 'taking ease.' (See above under NAINSOOKS.)

3. Tanjeebs P. tanzab, 'body-adorning.'—"A tolerably fine muslin" (Taylor, op. cit. 16); Forbes Watson, op. cit. 76). "The silk tanzab seems to have gone out of fashion, but that in cotton is very commonly used for the chicken work in Lucknow." (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 96.)

1. Tapsells. (See under ALLEJA.) In the Ain (i. 91) we have: "Tafz ilah (a stuff from Mecca)."

1670.—"So that in your house are only left some Tapselles and cotton yarn."—In Yule, Holtz's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxvi. Birdwood in Report on Old Records, 33, has Topsalls.

2. Tarnatannees.—"There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal, betelles (see BETTEELA) tarnatans . . ." (Chambers' Cycl. of 1788, quoted in 3rd ser. N. & Q.

iv. 135). It is suggested (ibid. 3rd ser. iv. 135) that this is the origin of English carletan, Fr. carletane, which is defined in the Drapers' Dict. as "a fine open muslin, first imported from India and afterwards imitated here."

3. Tartoreas.

3. Tepoys.

3. Terindams.—"Turundam (said by the weavers to mean 'a kind of cloth for the body,' the name being derived from the Arabic word turuk (tarh, tarah) 'a kind,' and the Persian one undam (andam) 'the body,' is a muslin which was formerly imported, under the name of terendam, into this country." (Taylor, op. cit. 46.)

2. Ventepollams.

PIGDAUN, s. A spittoon; Hind. pikdān. Pik is properly the expectorated juice of chewed betel.

[c. 1665.—"... servants . . . to carry the Picquedent or spittoon. . . ."—Berners, ed. Constable, 214. In 283 Piquedans.]

1673.—"The Rooms are spread with Carpets as in India, and they have Pigdams, or Spitting pots of the Earth of this Place, which is valued next to that of China, to void their Spittle in."—Fryer, 223.

[1684.—Hedgcs speaks of purchasing a "Spitting Cup."—Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 149.]

PIGEON ENGLISH. The vile jargon which forms the means of communication at the Chinese ports between Englishmen who do not speak Chinese, and those Chinese with whom they are in the habit of communicating. The word "business" appears in this kind of talk to be corrupted into "pigeon," and hence the name of the jargon is supposed to be taken. [For examples see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. pp. 321 seqq.; Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 430 seqq. (See BUTLER ENGLISH.)]

1880.—"... the English traders of the early days . . . instead of inducing the Chinese to make use of correct words rather than the misshapen syllables they had adopted, encouraged them by approbation and example, to establish Pigeon English—a grotesque gibberish which would be laughable if it were not almost melancholy."—Capt. W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 156.

1893.—"The 'Pidjun English' is revolting, and the most dignified persons demean themselves by speaking it. . . . How the whole English-speaking community, without distinction of rank, has come to communicate with the Chinese in this baby talk is extraordinary."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 37.

PIG-STICKING. This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called among a people delighting more in lofty expression, 'the chase of the Wild Boar.' When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the short-comings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they threw the spear at the boar. The two last charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the 18th century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen from the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson's Oriental Field Sports (1807), [and much later (see below)]. There is, or perhaps we should say more diffidently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 6½ feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar's charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the armpit like a dragoon's lance. Judging from Elphinstone's statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengal practice originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Qui-his adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

1679.—"In the morning we went a hunting of wild Hogs with Kisna Reddy, the chief man of the Islands" (at mouth of the Kistna) "and about 100 other men of the island (Dio) with lances and Three score dogs, with whom we killed eight Hogs great and small, one being a Bore very large and fatt, of greates weight."—Consn. of Agent and Council of Fort St. Geo. on Tour. In Notes and Exts. No. II.

The party consisted of Streynham Master "Agent of the Coast and Bay," with "Mr. Timothy Willes and Mr. Richard Mohun of the Council, the Minister, the Chyrurgeon, the Schoolmaster, the Secretary, and two Writers, an Ensign, 6 mounted soldiers and a Trumpeter," in all 17 Persons in the Company's Service, and "Four Freeman, who went with the Agent's Company for their own pleasure, and at their own charges." It was a Tour of Visitation of the Factories.

1773.—The Hon. R. Lindsay does speak of the "Wild-boar chase"; but he wrote after 35 years in England, and rather oschews Anglo-Indianisms:

"Our weapon consisted only of a short heavy spear, three feet in length, and well poised; the boar being found and unkenelled by the spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin. . . ."—Lives of the Lindsays, ii. 161.

1807.—"When (the hog) begins to slacken, the attack should be commenced by the horseman who may be nearest pushing on to his left side; into which the spear should be thrown, so as to lodge behind the shoulder blade, and about six inches from the backbone."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, p. 9. (Left must mean hog's right.) This author says that the bamboo shafts were 8 or 9 feet long, but that very short ones had formerly been in use; thus confirming Lindsay.

1816.—"We hog-hunt till two, then tiff, and hawk or course till dusk. . . we do not throw our spears in the old way, but poke with spears longer than the common ones, and never part with them."—Elphinstone's Life, i. 311.

[1823.—". . . the boar who had made good the next came with only a slight scratch from a spear thrown as he was charging the hedge."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 116.]

1848.—"Swankey of the Body-Guard himself, that dangerous youth, and the greatest buck of all the Indian army now on leave, was one day discovered by Major Dobbin, tête-à-tête with Amelia, and describing the sport of pigsticking to her with great humour and eloquence."—Vanity Fair, ii. 288.

1866.—"I may be a young pig-sticker, but I am too old a sportsman to make such a mistake as that."—Trevelyan, The Days Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxii. 337.

1873.—"Pigsticking may be very good fun. . . ."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1876.—"You would perhaps like tiger-hunting or pig-sticking; I saw some of that for a season or two in the East. Everything here is poor stuff after that."—Daniel De-ronda, ii. ch. xi.

1878.—"In the meantime there was a 'pig-sticking' meet in the neighbouring district."—Life in the Mafussil, i. 140.

PIG-TAIL, s. This term is often applied to the Chinaman's long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandfathers, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was "long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and Swatow districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day" (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32). Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven back hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5) says of the people of Tongking, that "like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat."

1879.—"One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinamen in front of him, having knotted their pigtails together for reins."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 283.

PILAU, PILOW, PILÁF, &c., s. Pers. pulāo, or pilāv, Skt. pulāka, 'a ball of boiled rice.' A dish, in origin purely Mahommedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklots, ed. 1863, App. xxix.; and in the Ain-i-Albārī (ed. Blochmann, i. 60), we have one for kīma puldo (kīma='hash') with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing. It was an odd circumstance, some 45 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pilleau.

1616.—"Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hons, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pillaw. As they order it they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

c. 1630.—"The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of peño and candied dried meats."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 133, [and for varieties, p. 310].

[c. 1660.—"... my elegant hosts were fully employed in crannining their mouths with as much Pelau as they could contain."—Hennier, ed. Ousabille, 121.]

1673.—"The most admired Dainty whereof they stuff themselves is Pullow whereof they will fill themselves to the Throat and receive no hurt, it being so well prepared for the Stomach."—Fraser, 339. See also p. 93. At p. 401 he gives a recipe.

1682.—"They ate their pillaw and other spoon-meats without spoons, taking up their portion in the hollow of their fingers."—Edwin, Diary, June 19.

1687.—"They took up their Mess with their Fingers, as the Moors do their Pillaw, using no Spoons."—Deranger, i. 159.

1689.—"Palau, that is Rice boiled . . . with Spice, intermixt, and a boild Fowl in the middle, is the most common Indische Dish."—Deranger, 197.

1711.—"They cannot go to the Price of a Pillaw, or boild Fowl and Rice, but the better sort make that their princely Dish."—Levyer, 231.

1781.—"On a certain day . . . all the Merchant officers belonging to your department shall be entertained at the charge of the Sirar, with a public repast, to consist of Pullaw of the first sort."—Select Letters of Tipu Sultan, App. xiii.

c. 1821.—
"And never as they eat, a gentle favour Of certain stews, and sweetmeats, and pillaws,
Things which in hungry mortals' eyes and favour."—Dart Jean, v. 47.

1818.—"There's a pillaw, Joseph, just as you like it, and Papa has brought home the best turbot in Billingsgate."—Fanny Fair, i. 23.

PINANG, c. This is the Malay word for Arenac, and it is almost always used by the Dutch to indicate that article, and after them by some Continental writers of other nations. The Chinese word for the same product—pin-ban—is probably, as Brocadeur says, a corruption of the Malay word. (See PERANG.)

[1681.—"They (the Javans) are very great eaters—and they have a certain beetle called betule (see BETELE) which they usually have carried with them wherever they go, in boxes, or wrapped up in a cloth like a sugar loaf, and also a nut called Pinange, which are both in operation very hot, and they eat them continually to warm them within, and keep them from the fluxe. They do likewise take much tobacco, and also opium."—E. Smith, in East Deserve, &c., of the East India, 1696, Sir. N. 2.

[1685.—"Their ordinary food . . . is Rice, Wheat, Pinange . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, Travels, 1677, p. 355 (Stanf. Dict.).]

1724.—"But Shah Souda gave him (Sir Van der Broek, an envoy to Rajmahal in 1656) good words, and regaled him with Pinang (a great favour), and promised that he should be amply paid for everything."—Valentijn, v. 166.

PINDARRY, s. Hind. pandri, pindārā, but of which the more original form appears to be Malir. penhdri, a member of a band of plunderers called in that language pandhār and penhdār. The etymology of the word is very obscure. We may discard as a curious coincidence only, the circumstance observed by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, in the work quoted below (i. 37, note), that "Pindara seems to have the same reference to Pandour that Kudlak has to Cornel." Sir John Malcolm observes that the most popular etymology among the natives—acribis—the name to the dissolute habits of the class, leading them to frequent the shops dealing in an intoxicating drink called pindar. (One of the names of penhdār, according to Mole-worth's Malir Dict., is 'a drink for cattle and men, prepared from Helvæ exhalans' (see JOWAUR) 'by steeping it and causing it to ferment.') Sir John adds: "Kurroon Khan (a famous Pindarry leader) 'told me he had never heard of any other reason for the name; and Major Hensley had the etymology confirmed by the most intelligent of the Pindaries of whom he enquired' (Central India, 2nd ed. i. 433). Wilson again considers the most probable derivation to be from the Malir, prodhar, but in the sense of a 'bundle of rice-straw' and harā, 'who takes,' because the name was originally applied to horsemen who hung on to an army, and were employed in collecting forage. We cannot think either of the etymologies very satisfactory. We venture another, as a plausible suggestion merely. Both pind-pandri in Hindi, and pindar-bachā in Malir, signify 'to follow'; the latter being defined 'to stick closely to; to follow to the death; used of the adherence of a disagreeable fellow.' Such phrase would apply to these hangers-on of an army in the field, looking out for prey. [The question has been discussed by Mr. W. Irvine in an elaborate note published in the Indian Antiquary, of 1900. To the above three suggestions he adds two made by other authorities: 4. that the term was taken from the Deder race; 5. from Pindārd, pind, 'a lump of food,' ār, 'bringer,' a plunderer. As to the fourth suggestion, he remarks that there was a Beder race dwelling in Mysore, Belary and the Nizam's territories. But the objection to this etymology is that as far back as 1748 both words, Bedar and Pindāri, are used by the native historian, Rām Singh Munshī, side by side, but applied to different bodies of men. Mr. Irvine's suggestion is that the word Pindāri, or more strictly Pandhār, comes from a place or region called Pandhār or Pandhār. This place is referred to by native historians, and seems to have been situated between Burhānpur and Handiya on the Nerbudda. There is good evidence to prove that large numbers of Pindāris were settled in this part of the country. Mr. Irvine sums up by saying, "If it were not for a passage in Grant Duff (H. of the Mahrattas, Bombay reprint, 157), I should have been ready to maintain that I had proved my case. My argument requires two things to make it irrefutable: (1) a very early connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris; (2) that the Pindhāris had no early home or settlement outside Pandhār. As to the first point, the recorded evidence seems to go no further back than 1794, when Sendhiah granted them lands in Nimār; whereas before that time the name had become fixed, and had even crept into Anglo-Indian vocabularies. As to the second point, Grant Duff says, and he if anybody must have known, that "there were a number of Pindhāris about the borders of Mahārāshtra and the Carnatic. . . ." Unless these men emigrated from Khandesh about 1726 (that is a hundred years before 1826, the date of Grant Duff's book), their presence in the South with the same name tends to disprove any special connection between their name, Pindhār, and a place, Pandhār, several hundred miles from their country. On the other hand, it is a very singular coincidence that men known as Pindhāris should have been newly settled about 1794 in a country which had been known as Pandhār at least ninety years before they thus occupied it. Such a mere fortuitous connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris is so extraordinary that we may call it an impossibility. A fair inference is that the region Pandhār was the original home of the Pindhāris, that they took their name from it, and that grants of land between Burhānpur and Handiya were made to them in what had always been their home-country, namely Pandhār."

The Pindāris seem to have grown up in the wars of the late Mahommedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurangzib; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep below. During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley's time many of the Pindāri leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sindia and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extended from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Kadapa on the S., and Orissa on the S.E., to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindāris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £250,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindāris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.

1706-7. — "Zoolfear Khan, after the rains pursued Dinnab, who fled to the Bejapore country, and the Khan followed him to the banks of the Kistnah. The Pinderrehs took Velore, which however was soon retaken. . . . A grant caravan, coming from Aurangabad, was totally plundered and everything carried off, by a body of Mharattas, at only 12 coss distance from the imperial camp."—Narrative of a Bonded Officer, app. to Scott's Tr. of Firishita's H. of Decan, ii. 122. [On this see Malabar, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 426. Mr. Irvine in the paper quoted above shows that it is doubtful if the author really used the word. "By a strange coincidence the very copy used by J. Scott is now in the British Museum. On turning to the passage I find 'Pella Badar,' a well-known man of the period, and not Pindard or Pindereh at all."]

1762.—"Sivace Mathoo Ran . . . began to collect troops, stores, and heavy artillery, so that he at length assembled near 100,000 horse, 60,000 Pindarehs, and 50,000 matchlock foot. . . . In reference to the Pindarehs, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hindur Nait, by Meer Hasan Ali Khan, 149. [Mr. Irvine suspects that this may be based on a misreading as in the former quotation. The earliest undoubted mention of the name in native historians is by Kim Singh (1748). There is a doubtful reference in the Tarikh-i-Malabar (1722-23).]

1784.—"Bindarras, who receive no pay, but give a certain monthly sum to the commander-in-chief for permission to maraud, or plunder, under sanction of his banners."—Indian Vocabulary, s.v.

1803.—"Depend upon it that no Pindaries or stragglers' horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check; and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1823.—"On asking an intelligent old Pindarry, who came to me on the part of Kurreem Khan, the reason of the absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrewd answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the one virtue and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'"—Sir John Malcolm, Central India, i. 136.

["He had ascended on horse-back . . . being mounted on a Pindares pony, an animal accustomed to climbing."—Havel, Personal Narrative, 292.]

1825.—"The name of Pindara is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindostan by the Mahabattas. . . . The designation was applied to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them much the same service as the Cossacks perform for the armies of Russia. . . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers. . . . The rivers generally became fordable by the close of the Dussera. The horsemen then were rhod, and a leader of tried courage and conduct having been chosen as Lukburee, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Lukbur, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400: the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . . but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common lookers (see LOOTY), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the Lukbur in the best manner they could."—Primary Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions (1813-1823), i. 37, note.

1829.—"The person of whom the asked this question said 'Brumaree' (see BRIN JARRY) . . . but the lady understood him Pindaree, and the name was quite sufficient. She jumped out of the palanquin and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees, Pindarees.'"—Mrs. J. of John Shopp, ii. 2-1.

[1861.— "So I took to the hills of Malwa, and the free Pindaree life."]
—Sir A. Lyall, The old Pindaree.

PINE-APPLE. (See ANANAS)
[The word has been corrupted by native weavers into pinaphal or minaphal, as the name of a silk fabric, so called because of the pine-apple pattern on it. (See Yarns & Silk, Mon. on Silk, 99.)]

PINJRAPOLE, s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Gujarat, is so called. Guj. pinjrapur or pinjrapol, [properly a cage (pinjra) for the sacred bull (pola) released in the name of Siva]. See Hibber, ed. 1811, ii. 120, and Orrington, 306-301, [P. delle Vall, Hak. Soc. i. 67, 70. Forbes (Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 156) describes "the Banian hospital" at Surat; but they do not use this word, which Molesworth says is quite modern in Mahr.]

1803.—"Every marriage and mercantile transaction among them is taxed with a contribution for the Pinjrapole ostensibly."—R. Doornmond.

PINTADO. From the Port.

n. A 'painted' (or 'spotted') cloth, i.e. chintz (q.v.). Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

1579.—"With cloth of diverse colours, not much unlike our usual pentadoes."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 143.

[1602.—" . . . some fine pinthadoes."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 31.]

1602-3.—“... about their loynes, a fine Pintadoe.”—Scot's Discourse of Iland, in Purchas, i. 164.

1606.—“Heare the Generall deliuered a Letter from the KINGS MAIESTIE of ENGLAND, with a fayre standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt. with diuers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hee kindly accepted of.”—Middleton's Voyage, E. 3

[1610.—“Pintadoes of diuers sorts will sell. . . The names are Saras-a, Berumpury, large Chaudes, Selematt Cambata, Selematt white and black, Cheat Betime and diuers others.”—Daniels, Letters, i. 75.

c. 1630.—“Also they stam Linnen cloth, which we call pantadoes.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1665.—“To Woodcott . . . where was a rooma hung with Pintado, full of figures greite and small, prettily reprenting sundry trades and occupations of the Indians.”—Eliza's Diary, i. Dec 30.

c. 1759.—“The chintz and other fine painted goods, will, if the market is not overstocked, and immediate rent, and sell for 100 p. cent.”—Letter from Peja, in Dairyside, Or. Rep. i. 120

b. A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guinea-fowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chintz. But in fact pinta in Portuguese is ‘a spot,’ or fleck, so that probably it only means speckled. This is the explanation of Blutau. [The word is more commonly applied to the cape Pigeon. See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 21, who quotes from Fryer, p. 12.]

PISACHEE, Skt. piśācī, a she-demon, m. piśāca. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil piy. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Piśāchīs were (as in the case of Rākṣasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: ‘The Piśācī dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognised in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.’ There is, however, in the Hindu drama a Piśāchā bhāṣā, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced. [This at the present day has been applied to English.] The term piśācī is also applied to the small circular storms commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v.). We do not know where Archdeacon Hale (see below) found the Piśācī to be a white demon.

1610.—“The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Piśāchā-vidhā, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of talismans, incantations, and such like magical practice, and then marries her. Pisach, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name.”—The Dabistān, ii. 72; [See Munir, ii. 34].

c. 1780.—“‘Que demandez-vous?’ leur cria je d'un ton de voix rude. ‘Pourquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre? et d'où vient que ces autres femmes se sont enfuies, comme si j'étois un Pêchaseh (esprit malin), ou une Lait sauvage qui voulut vous devorer!’”—Haafner, ii. 287.

1801.—“They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Pysachi, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises, in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women.”—F. Buchanani's Memoirs, ii. 17.

1816.—“Whirlwinds . . . at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives peshashes or devils.”—Asiatic Journal, ii. 367.

1819.—“These demons or peisaches are the usual attendants of Shiva.”—Erskine on Elephanta, in Do. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 219.

1827.—“As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white frock over her head, I laughingly called her Pisashée, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying out to every one she met, I am the Pisashée I am the Pisashée. Would she have done so, had she been wrapt in black, and called teitsh or devil instead? No: for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour overruling.”—J. C. Hare, in Lives of the T. B. by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1833, p. 7.

PISANG, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (q.v.v.). It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among the Germans, [Norwegians and Swedes, who probably got it through the Dutch.]

c. 1785.—“Nous arrivâmes au grand village de Colla, où nous vîmes de belles allées de bananiers ou pisang. . .”—Haafner, ii. 85

[1876.—“Of the pisang or plantain . . . there are over thirty kinds, of which, the Pising-mas, or golden plantain, so named from its colour, though one of the smallest, is nevertheless most deervedly prized.”—Thomson, The Straits of Malacca, 8.]

PISHPASH, s. Apparently a factitious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery. [It is apparently P. pash-pash, ‘shivered or broken in pieces’; from Pers. pashidan.]

1831.—“They found the Secretary disengaged, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pishpash on the other, can be called disengaged.”—The Dialist, &c. i. 85.

PITARBAH, s. A collar or box used in travelling by palankin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a banghy (q.v.). Hind. pitārd, pitāra, Skt. pitaka, ‘a basket.’ The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

1833.—“ . . . he sat in the palankin, which was filled with water up to his neck, whilst everything he had in his batara (or ‘trunk’) was soaked with wet. . . .” — Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 183.]

1849.—“The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting their *pitara*hs and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. ‘My dear Sir,’ was the reply, ‘we are quite safe; we have nothing.’” — Dolhi Gazette, Nov. 7.

1852.—“It was very soon settled that Oakfield wd. to send to the d. g. bungalow for his *petaraha*s, and stay with Staunton for about three weeks.” — W. D. Arnold, Outfield, i. 223.

PLANTAIN, s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisica or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite.

The botanical name Musa represents the Ar. mauz, and that again is from the Skt. mocha. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisica is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated by the Mahommedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix. Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or ‘Fig of Paradise,’ or sometimes ‘Fig of India,’ and to this day in the W. Indies the common small plantains are called ‘figs.’ The Portuguese also habitually called it ‘Indian Fig.’ And thus perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus Indica of Pliny, as of modern botanists) the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that ficus.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira, [and more recently from Jamaica. Mr. Skeat adds that in the Straits Settlements the name plantain seems to be reserved for those varieties which are only eatable when cooked, but the word banana is used indifferently with plantain, the latter being on the whole perhaps the rarer word].

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platano, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516; the first edition of his book was published in 1526. That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platanus described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. [Mr. Guppy (8 ser. Notes de Querius, viii. 87) suggests that “the Spaniards have obtained platano from the Carib and Galibi words for banana, viz., bolatanna and palatana, by the process followed by the Australian colonists when they converted a native name for the casuarina trees into ‘she-oak’; and that we can thus explain how platano came in Spanish to signify both the plane-tree and the banana? Prof. Skeat (Gloss. Dict., s.v.) derives plantain from Lat. p'lantia, 'a plant'; properly 'a spreading sucker or shoot'; and says that the plantain took its name from its spreading leaf. The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the ananas in the Old World of Asia. It would seem from the translation of Mendoza that in his time (1565) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantain and plantum. But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey's Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of the Latin platanus, the mulberry known by the former name. Platano and Plantano are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

1205.—"Sunt in Syria et Aegyptio pomis

—De la Bible, Mary, in Cl. Mag., &c., p. 552.

1511.—"And there is on a fruit which we call plantain, which our father Adam loved, and the fruit they call Mor. . . in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you

'citrons', limes, plantanos, and jolinas."—
—De la Bible, Mary, in Cl. Mag., &c., p. 552.

1588.—"Our General made their wives to fetch vs Plantans, Jammons, and Oranges, these apples, and other fruits."—Walter, R. of the Spanish Islands, &c., p. 61.

1588 (tr. 1591).—" . . . the first that shall be needfulle to treat of is the Plantain (Plantano), or Plantano, as the vulgar call it. . . . The reason why the Spaniards call it platano (for the Indians had no such name), was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some frutes pines, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castille.
The thing wherein was most resemblance, in my opinion, between the plantanos at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatness of the leaves. . . .
But, in truth, there is no more comparison for resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverb saith, betwixt an egge and a cheenut."—De la Bible, Mary, in Cl. Mag., &c., p. 552.

1593.—"The plantane is a tree found in most parts of Afrique and America, of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe."—Walter, R. of the Spanish Islands, &c., p. 61.

1610.—" . . . and every day filled not

c. 1635.—
 "Oh how I long my careless Limbs to lay Under the Plantain's Shade; and all the Day
 With amorous Airs my Fancy entertain." Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

c. 1660.—
 "The Plant (at Brasil Bacone call'd) the Name
 Of the Eastern Plane-tree takes, but not the same:
 Bears leaves so large, one single Leaf can Sometimes two Hundred on a single Bough. . . ."

Cowley, of Plants, Bk. v.

1664.—
 "Wako, Wako Quavera! Our soft rest

 And opening buds drive falling fruits away."
Dryden, Prologue to the Indian Queen.

1673.—"Lover than these, but with a Leaf far broader, stands the curious Plantain, loading its tender Body with a Fruit, whose clusters emulate the Grapes of Canaan, which burthened two men's shoulders."— Fryer, 19.

1686.—"The Plantain I take to be King

Granger, Bk. iv.

1805.—"The plantain, in some of its kinds, supplies the place of bread."—Orme, Fragments, 470.

PLASSEY, n.p. The village Palāsī, which gives its name to Lord Clive's famous battle (June 23, 1757). It is said to take its name from the pālas (or dhawak) tree.

1748.—". . . that they have great reason not waiting at Placy . . . and that if he had staid another day at Placy, as Tullerooy Caun was marching with a large force towards Cutway, they presume the Mahrattas would have retreated inland on their approach and left him an open passage. . . ."—Letter from Council at Cassim- bazar, in Long, p. 2.

[1757.—Clive's original report of the battle is dated on the "plain of Plasias."—Bird- wood, Report on Old Records, 57.]

1768-71. — "General CLIVE, who should have been the leader of the English troops in this battle (Plassy), left the command to Colonel COOTE, and remained hid in his palankeen during the combat, out of the reach of the shot, and did not make his appearance before the enemy were put to flight."—Saxorinus, E.T. i. 436. This stupid and inaccurate writer says that several English officers who were present at the battle related this "anecdote" to him.
 This, it may be hoped, is as untrue as the rest of the story. Even to such a writer one would have supposed that Clive's motto would be familiar.

PODĀR, s. Hind. poddār, corn. of Pers. foladār, from fota, 'a bag of money.' A cash-keeper, or especially an officer attached to a treasury, whose business it is to weigh money and bullion and appraise the value of coins.

[c. 1590.—"The Treasurer. Called in the language of the day Fotadar."—Ain, ed.
Jarrett, ii. 49.]

1630.—"Podar." (See under DUSTOOR.)

1683.—"The like losses in proportion were preferred to be proved by Ramchurns Podar, Bendura bun Podar, and Mamoo-bishwns who produced their several books for evidence."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc.
i. 84.

[1772. — "Podār, a money-changer or teller, under a shroff."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s. v.]

POGGLE, PUGGLY, &c., s. Properly Hind. pāgal; 'a madman, an idiot'; often used colloquially by Anglo-Indians. A friend belonging to that body used to adduce a maca-ronic adage which we fear the non-Indian will fail to appreciate: "Pagal et pecunia jaldē separantur!" [See NAUTCH.]

1829.—"It's true the people call me, I know not why, the pugley."—Mem. John Shipp, ii. 255.

1866.—"I was foolish enough to pay these budmashees beforehand, and they have thrown me over. I must have been a paugul to do it."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, 385.

[1885. — "He told me that the native name for a regular picnic is a 'Poggie-lhamu, 'that is, a fool's dinner.' — Lady Duffrin, Viceregal Life, 83.]

POISON-NUT, s. Strychnos nux vomica, L.

POLEA, n.p. Mal. pulayan, [from Tam. pulam, 'a field,' because in Malabar they are occupied in rice cultivation]. A person of a low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance. [The rules which regulate their meeting with other people are given by Mr. Logan (Malabar, i. 118).] From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs empolear-se, 'to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,' and desempolear-se, 'to purify oneself after such pollution' (Gouvea, f. 97, and Synod, f. 62v), superstitions which Meneses found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar. (See HIRAVA.)

1510.—"The fifth class are called Pollar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts . . . the Pollar may not approach either the Nairi (see NAIR) or the Brahmins within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them. . . ." — Varthema, 142.

1516.—"There is another lower sort of gentiles called puler. . . . They do not speak to the nairs except for a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice. . . . And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing. . . ." — Barbosa, 143.

1672 —
"A loy, da gente toda, rica o pobre,
De fabulas composta se imagina:
Andão nus, o semento hum pano cobro
As partes que a cubrir natura ensina.
Dous modos ha do gente; porque a nobre

Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga
A loy não misturar a casta antiga."
Cambré, vii. 37.

By Burton:

"The Law that holds the people high and low, is fraught with false phanta-tick tales long past;
they go unclothed, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist."

Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayras, who call the lower caste

Poleas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain. . . .

1698.—"When the Portugales came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayras desired that men should give them place, and turne out of the Way, when they mette in the Streets, as the Polyas . . ." (used to do). — Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 251; also see i. 279]

1696.—" . . . he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Polean, which is one of the lowest castes of Malabar." — Gouvea, f. 76.

1626.—"These Puler are Theeves and Sorcerers." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

[1727.—"Poulas." (See under MUGOA.)

[1754.—"Niaddo and Pullie are two low castes on the Malabar coast. . . ." — Ives, 26.

[1766.—" . . . Poolighees, a cast hardly sufered to breathe the common air, being driven into the forests and mountains out of the commerce of mankind. . . ." — Gros, 2nd ed. ii. 161 seq.]

1770.—"Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariah) are called Pondlats." — Raynal, E.F. 1799, i. 6.

1865.—"Further south in India we find polyandry among . . . Poleares of Malabar." — McLennan, Primitive Marriage, 179.

POLIGAR, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the highest use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tam. palaiaikkaran, 'the holder of a palaiaim, or feudal estate; Tel. pulegadu; and thence Mahr. pdlegar; the English form being no doubt taken from one of the two latter. The southern Poligars gave much trouble about 100 years ago, and the "Poligar wars" were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Panjā-lamkurichi, one of their forts in Tinnevely, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 16 British officers. Much regarding the Poligars of the south will be found in Nelson's Madure, and in Bishop Caldwell's very interesting History of Tinnevely. Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Mahratta boundary.

1681.—"They pulled down the Polegar's houses, who being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself." — Heeler, i. 118.

1701.—"Le lendemain je me rendis à Tailur, c'est une petite ville qui appartient à un autre Palegarez." — Let. Edif. x. 269.

1745.—"J'espère que Votre Eminence agréera l'établissement d'une nouvelle Mission près des Montagnes appellées vulgairement des Palleagares, où aucun Missionnaire n'avait paru jusqu'à présent. Cette contrée est soumise à divers petits Rois appelés également Pallagars, qui sont indépendans du Grand Mogul quoique placés presque au milieu de son Empire."—Nisbet, Mémoires, ii. 406-7.

1754.—"A Polygar . . . undertook to conduct them through defiles and passes known to very few except himself."—Orme, i. 373.

1750.—"Ho (Hyder) now moved towards the pass of Changan, and encamped upon his side of it, and sent ten thousand polygars to clear away the pass, and make a road sufficient to enable his artillery and stores to pass through."—Hon. James Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 233.

"The matchlock men are generally accompanied by polygars, a set of fellows that are almost savage, and make use of no other weapon than a pointed bamboo spear, 18 or 20 feet long."—Munro's Narrative, 131.

1783.—"To Mahomet Ali they twice sold the Kingdom of Tanjore. To the same Mahomet Ali they sold at least twelve sovereign Princes called the Polygars."—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, in Works, iii. 458.

1800.—"I think Pournaya's mode of dealing with these rajahs . . . is excellent. He sets them up in palankins, elephants, &c., and a great sowarry, and makes them attend to his person. They are treated with great respect, which they like, but can do no mischief in the country. Old Hyder adopted this plan, and his operations were seldom impeded by polygar wars."—J. W. Wesley to T. Munro, in Arbuthnot's Memoirs, xcii.

1801.—"The southern Polygars, a race of rude warriors habituated to arms of independence, had been but lately subdued."—Wells, i. 67.

1809.—"Tondiman is an hereditary title. His subjects are Polygars, and since the late war . . . he is become the chief of those tribes, among whom the singular law exists of the female inheriting the sovereignty in preference to the male."—Ld. Valentia, i. 361.

1808.—"There are 72 bastions to the fort of Madura; and each of them was now formally placed in charge of a particular chief, who was bound for himself and his heirs to keep his post at all times, and under all circumstances. He was also bound to pay a fixed annual tribute; to supply and keep in readiness a quota of troops for the Governor's armies; to keep the Governor's peace over a particular tract of country. . . . A grant was made to him of a tract of a country . . . together with the title of Palaia Kuran (Polygar). . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 99.

"Some of the Polygars were placed in authority over others, and in time of war were answerable for the good conduct of their subordinates. Thus the Sethupati was chief of them all; and the Pollgar of Dindigul is constantly spoken of as being the chief of eighteen Polygars . . . when the levying of troops was required the Dalavny (see DALAWAY) sent requisitions to such and such Polygars to furnish so many armed men within a certain time. . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 157.

The word got transferred in English parlance to the people under such Chiefs (see quotations above, 1780-1809); and especially, it would seem, to those whose habits were predatory:

1869.—"There is a third well defined race mixed with the general population, to which a common origin may probably be assigned. I mean the predatory classes. In the south they are called Polygars, and consist of the tribes of Marawars, Kallars (see COLLERY), Bedars (see BYDE), Ramuseas (see RAMOOSY); and in the North are represented by the Kolis (see COOLY) of Guzerat, and the Gajars (see GOOJUR) of the N.W. Provinces."—Sir Walter Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. L., N.S., i. 112.

[POLIGAR DOG, s. A large breed of dogs found in S. India. "The Polygar dog is large and powerful, and is peculiar in being without hair" (Balfour, Cyc., i. 568).]

[1853.—"It was evident that the original breed had been crossed with the bull-dog, or the large Polygar dog of India."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. p. 12.]

POLLAM, s. Tam. pollaiyam, Tel. pollenu; (see under POLIGAR).

1783.—"The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the polygars (see POLIGAR) was that the waters were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warmed in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection."—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, in Works, iii. 488.

1795.—"Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Polygars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. . . ."—Report on Dindigul, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson's Madura, Pt. iv. p. 15.

POLO, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game. The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in various forms) from Provence to the borders of China (see CHICANE). It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himalaya, viz. at Manipur in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Ladak, Balti, Astor and Gilgit, and extending into Chitral). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmir, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phoenix Park. The next year it was played in many places*. But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-bridge, July 11, 1874, in the next day's paper. There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1872, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India. [According to the author of the Badminton Library treatise on the game, it was adopted by Lieut. Sherer in 1854, and a club was formed in 1859. The same writer fixes its introduction into the Punjab and N.W.P. in 1861-62. See also an article in Daily's Magazine on "The Early History of Polo" (June 1890). The Central Asian form is described, under the name of Baiga or Kok-bura, 'grey wolf,' by Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 268 seq.) and that in Dardistan by Biddulph (Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh, 84 seq.)] In Ladak it is not indigenous, but an introduction from Baltistan. See a careful and interesting account of the game of those parts in Mr. F. Drew's excellent book, The Jummoo and Kashmir Territories, 1876, pp. 380-392.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo racket, just as that described by

Jo. Cinnamus in the extract under CHICANE has survived there. [See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 333 seqq.]

1835.—"The ponies of Munciepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants. . . . The national game of Hockey, which is played by every male of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all expert equestrians; and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Munciepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmahs, but to save the whole country . . . and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawattoe."—Pemberton's Report on the L. Frontier of Br. India, 31-32.

1838.—"At Shighpur I first saw the game of the Chauguan, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. . . . It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibeti 'Pulu.' . . . I can conceive that the Chauguan requires only to be seen to be played. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation . . . The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries . . . Ladakh, Yessen, Chitral, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrome at Bayswater. . . ."—Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, Ladakh, Iskardo, &c. (1842), ii. 259-302.

1848.—"An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iskardo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. . . . I was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the chaugan, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigne as hockey on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Balti, often surrounded by rows of beautiful willow and poplar trees."—Dr. T. Thomson, Hivalaya and Tibet, 260-261.

1876.—
"Polo, Tent-pegging, Hurlingham, the Rink, I leave all these delights."

Browning, Inn Album, 23.

POLLOCK-SAUG, s. Hind. palak, palak-sag; a poor vegetable, called also 'country spinach' (Beta vulgaris, or B. Bengalensis, Roxb.). [Riddell (Domest. Econ. 579) calls it 'Bengal Beet.']

POLONGA, TIC-POLONGA, s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bungarus? or Daboia elegans?); Singh. polongard. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with the Daboia elegans, and calls it 'Chain viper,' 'Necklace snake,' 'Russell's viper,' or cobra manilla. The Singh. name is said to be titpolanga, tit, 'spotted,' polangu, 'viper.']

* See details in the Field of Nov. 15, 1864, p. 667, courteously given in reply to a query from the present writer.

1681.—"There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattle. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about five or six feet long."—Knox, 29.

1825.—"There are only four snakes ascertained to be poisonous; the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tit polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Haber, in H.'s Journal, ed. 1811, li. 167.

POMFRET, POMPHRET, &c. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reducible to Stromateus sinensis, 'the white Pomfret,' Str. cirreus, which is, when immature, 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature, 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.' The French of Pondicherry call the fish pamplé. We cannot connect it with the porpax of Aelian (xv. 23) and Athenæus (Lib. VII. cap. xviii. regg.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Nautærales duclor of Day). The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pampano, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

[1593.—"The best fish is called Mordexiin, Pampano, and Tatilingo."—Leunshoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 11.]

[1703.—" . . . Albacore, Dolphins, Pamphlets."—In Pulr, Hedges Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxiv.]

1727.—"Between Gunnara and Mallalore Rivers . . . a very delicious Fish called the Pampico, come in Shoals, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—J. Hamilton, i. 396; [ed. 1741].

1810.—
"Another face look'd broad and bland
Like pamphlet floundering on the sand;
Whene'er she turned her piercing stare,
She seemed alert to spring in air."
Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, 201.

1813.—"The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of a more delicate flavour; and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 52-53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

[1822.—" . . . the lad was brought up to catch pamphlets and bombaloes. . . ."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 106.]

1874.—"The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rev., 30th May, 690.

[1896.—"Another account of this sort of seine fishing, for catching pomfret fish, is given by Mr. Guoritz."—Ling Roth, Natives of Saracal, i. 455.]

POMMELO, PAMPELMOOSE, &c., s. Citrus decumana, L., the largest of the orange-tribe. It is the same fruit as the shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommele seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as "the Forbidden fruit." The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Baldri nimbi (i.e. Citrus Balauriana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ain. According to Bretschneider the Pommele is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomo-melone). Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Tavernier calls it pompone (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24; [ed. Hall, ii. 360]), but the usual French name is pampel-mousse. Dampier has Pumplesose (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pumplemuse (51); Forrest, Pummele-nose (32); Ives, 'pimple-nose', called in the West Indies Chadocks! [16]. Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompoleon is a form unknown to us, but given in the King Cyclopaedia. Molesworth's Marathi Dict. gives "papannas, papannas, or papanis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littre says boldly "Tamoul, bambolinas." Ainslie (Mat. Medica, 1813) gives Poomlinas as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cycl. of India) gives Pumpalinas and Bambulinas as Tamil, Bamburimasa and Pampara-payasa = Telugu, Bambali naringi = Malayālim. But if these are real words they appear to be corruptions of some foreign term. [Mr. F. Brandt points out that the above forms are merely various attempts to transliterate a word which is in Tamil pambalimsu, while the Malayālim is bambali-ndrahām 'bambili tree.' According to the Madras Gloss, all these, as well as the English forms, are ultimately derived from the Malay pumpulmas. Mr. Skeat writes: "In an obsolete Malay dict., by Howson (1801) I find 'pompelmoos, a fruit brought from India by Captain Shaddock, the seeds of which were planted at Barbadoes,' and afterwards obtained his name: the affix moos appears to be the Dutch moes, 'vegetable.'" If this be so, the Malay is not the original form.]

1661.—"The fruit called by the Netherlanders Pampelmoos, by the Portuguese Jamboa, grows in superfluity outside the city of Batavia. . . . This fruit is larger than any of the lemon-kind, for it grows as large as the head of a child of 10 years old. The core or inside is for the most part reddish, and has a kind of sourish sweetness, tasting like unripe grapes."—Walter Schulze, 236

PONDICHERRY, n.p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Pudu-ch-chiri, or Puthuggeri, 'New Town,' more correctly Pudu-rai, Puthurai, meaning 'New Place.' C. P. Brown, however, says it is Pudi-cherā, 'New Tank.' The natives sometimes write it Phulcheri. [Mr. Garstin (Man. S. Arcot, 422) says that Hindus call it Puthurai or Puthuggeri, while Musulmans call it Pulecheri, or as the Madras Gloss writes the word, Pulchari.]

1630.—"Mr. Edward Brogdon, arrived from Porto Novo, reports arrival at Puddicherry of two French ships from Sumat, and the receipt of advices of the death of Sevajie."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., May 23. In Notes and Exts. No. iii p. 20.

[1683—" . . . Interlopers intend to settle at Verampatnam, a place near Pullicherry. . . ."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 41. In iv. 113 (1685) we have Pondicherry.]

1711.—"The French and Danes likewise hire them (Portuguese) at Pont de Cherre and Trincombar."—Lockyer, 286.

1718.—"The Fifth Day we reached Buddischeri, a French Town, and the chief Seat of their Missionaries in India."—Prop. of the Gospel, p. 42.

1726.—"Poedechery," in Valentijn, Choro, 11.

1727.—"Punticherry is the next Place of Note on this Coast, a colony settled by the French."—J. Hamilton, i. 356; [ed. 1741].

1753.—"L'Établissement des François à Pondichéri remonte jusqu'en l'année 1674; mais par du si foible commencement, qu'on n'auroit eu de la peine à imaginer, que les suites en fussent aussi considérables."—D'Auvill, p. 121.

1780.—"An English officer of rank, General Coote, who was unequalled among his compeers in ability and experience in war, and who had frequently fought with the French of Phoolcheri in the Karnatic and . . . had as often gained the victory over them . . ."—H. of Hyder Nul, 413

PONGOL, s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tam. pōṅḡl, 'boiling'; i.e. of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 91), but the connection which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted. [See the meaning of the rite discussed by Dr. Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 305 seq.]

1651.—" . . . nous parlerons maintenant du Pongol, qui se celebre le 9 de Janvier en l'honneur du Soleil. . . . Ils cuisent du riz avec du lait. . . . Co riz se cuit hors la maison, afin que le Soleil puisse luire dessus . . . et quand ils voyent, qu'il semble le vouloir retirer, ils crient d'une voix intelligible, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol. . ."—Abt. Roger, Fr. Tr. 1670, pp. 237-8.

1871.—"Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The files of the Munsif's Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. . . . The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed 'till after Pongol!'"—Gover, as above, p. 96.

POOJA, s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pūjā; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus jhanda ki pūjā, or 'Pooja of the flag,' is the sepoy term for what in St. James's Park is called 'Trooping of the colours.' [Used in the plural, as in the quotation of 1900, it means the holidays of the Durgā Pūjā or Dussera.]

[1776.—" . . . the occupation of the Bramin should be . . . to cause the performance of the poojen, i.e. the worship to Deviddh. . . .—Balkat, Code, ed. 1781, Pref. xcix.

[1813.—“ . . . the Pundits in attendance commenced the pooja, or sacrifice, by pouring milk and curds upon the branches, and smearing over the leaves with wetted rice.”—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 214.]

1826.—“The person whose steps I had been watching now approached the sacred tree, and having performed puja to a stone deity at its foot, proceeded to unmanse himself from his shawl. . . .”—Pandurang Itari, 20; [ed. 1873, i. 31].

1866.—“Yes, Sahib, I Christian boy. Plenty poojah do. Sunday time never no work do.”—Travels in, The Dark Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 226.

1874.—“The mass of the ryots who form the population of the village are too poor to have a family deity. They are forced to be content with . . . the annual pujahs performed . . . on behalf of the village community.”—Cal. Rev. No. cxvii. 195.

1879.—“Among the curiosities of these lower galleries are little models of costumes and country scenes, among them a grand pooja under a tree.”—Cal. Rev. No. 1251, p. 177.

[1900.—“Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujahs since yesterday.”—Pioneer Mail, 5 Oct.]

POOJAREE, s. Hind. pujāri. An officiating priest in an idol temple.

1702.—“L'office de poujari ou de Pré-tre de la Reine m'ro étoit incompatible avec le titre de servante du Seigneur.”—Lett. Edif. xi. 111.

[1891.—“Then the Pujāri, or priest, takes the Bhuta sword and bell in his hands. . . .”—Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, 4th ed. 219.]

POOL, s. P.—II. pul, ‘a bridge.’ Used in two of the quotations under the next article for ‘embankment.’

[1812.—“The bridge is thrown over the river . . . it is called the Pool Khann. . . .”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 124.]

POOLBUNDY, s. P.—II. pulbandi, ‘Securing of bridges or embankments.’ A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

[1765.—“Deduct Poolbundy advanced for repairs of dykes, roads, &c.”—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 213.

[c. 1781.—“Pay your constant devoirs to Marian Allypore, or sell yourself soul and body to Poolbundy.”—Ext. from Hickey's Gazette, in Buxton, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. 178. This refers to Impey, who was called by this name in allusion to a lucrative contract given to his relative, a Mr. Fraser.]

1780.—“That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan . . . had delivered it as their opinion. . . .”—Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

1802.—“The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of poolbundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which call aloud for a remedy.”—Lyth Report, App. p. 558.

1810.—“ . . . the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the pool bandy, maintained at a very great and regular expense.”—Williamson, F. M., ii. 365.

POON, PEON, &c., s. (an. ponne, [Mal. punna, Skt. punndga]. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly used for masts, whence also called mast-wood. [Linschoten refers to this tree, but not by name (Hak. Soc. i. 67).]

[1727.—“ . . . good Poon-masts, stronger but heavier than Firr.”—J. Hamilton, ed. 1741, i. 267.

[1776.—“ . . . Pohon-masts, chiefly from the Malabar coast.”—Grove, 2nd ed. ii. 103.]

[1773.—“Poon tree . . . the wood light but tolerably strong; it is frequently used for masts, but unless great care be taken to keep the wet from the ends of it, it soon rots.”—Ives, 460.]

1835.—“Peon, or Puna . . . the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Corumel in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foremast for the Leander, 60-gun ship, in one piece, for 1300 Rupees.”—Edgc. in J. R. As. Soc. ii. 351.

POONAMALEE, n.p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chingleput Dist. of Madras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Panamallu (?), and Ponda malai, whilst Col. Branfill gives it as “Pantha malli for Pāvirunthamalli,” without further explanation. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Pundamalli, ‘town of the jasmine-creeper,’ which is largely grown there for the supply of the Madras markets.]

[1876.—“The dog, a small pinobald cur, with a short tail, not unlike the ‘Poon-mallee terrier,’ which the British soldier is wont to manufacture from Pariah dogs for ‘Griffins’ with sporting proclivities, was brought up for inspection."—McMahon, Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 236.]

POONGEE, PHOONGY, s. The name most commonly given to the Buddhist religious in British Burma. The word (p'hun-gyi) signifies 'great glory.'

1782.—" . . . leurs Prêtres . . . sont moins instruits que les Brame, et portent le nom de Poongala."—Sonnerat, ii. 301.

1795.—"From the many convents in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, the number of Bhabans and Phoongs must be very considerable; I was told it exceeded 1500."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 210.

1831.—"The Talapoins are called by the Burmese Phoongs, which term means great glory, or Bhabans, which means perfect."—Hip, Bigandet, in J. Ind. Archip. iv. 222-3.

[1886.—"Every Burman has for some time during his life to be a Phoongee, or monk."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 177.]

POORĀNA, s. Skt. pūrāṇa, 'old,' hence 'legendary,' and thus applied as a common name to 18 books which contain the legendary mythology of the Brahmans.

1612.—" . . . These books are divided into bodies, members, and joints (corpos, membros, e articulos) . . . six which they call Nastri (see SHASTER), which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Parana, which are the members; twenty-eight called Agamon, which are the joints."—Couto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 3.

1651.—"As their Poranas, i.e. old histories, relate."—Royerius, 153.

[1667.—"When they have acquired a knowledge of Sanscrit . . . they generally study the Parana, which is an abridgement and interpretation of the Boths" (see VEDAS).—Bernier, ed. Constable, p. 335.]

c. 1760.—"Le puran comprend dix-huit livres qui renferment l'histoire sacrée, qui contiennent les dogmes de la religion des Brames."—Encyclopédie, xxvii. 807.

1806.—"Ceux-ci, calculoient tout haut de mémoire tandis que d'autres, plus avancés, isoient, d'un ton chantant, leurs Pourans."—Haufrer, i. 130.

POORUB, and POORBEBA, ss. Hind. pūrab, pūrb, 'the East,' from Skt. pūrva or pūrba, 'in front of,' as pāścha (Hind. pachham) means 'behind' or 'westerly' and dakshina, 'right-hand' or 'southerly.' In Upper India the term means usually Oudh, the Benares division, and Behar. Hence Poorbeba (pārbiya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepoy, the majority being recruited in those provinces.

1553.—"Omaum (Hūmāyān) Patishah . . . resolved to follow Xerehan (Sher Khān) and try his fortunes against him . . . and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamuna, where on the West bank of the river there is a city called Canose (Canaux), one of the chief of the kingdom of Dely. Xerehan was beyond the river in the tract which the natives call Farba. . . ."—Barros, IV. ix. 9.

[1611.—"Pierb is 400 coss long."—Jourdain, quoted in Sir T. Ho, Hak. Soc. ii. 539.]

1616.—"Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large provinces within it, Furb and Patan, the one lying on the east, the other on the west side of the river."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 357.

1666.—"La Province de Malabas s'appelloit autrefois Puroop. . . ."—Theriot, v. 197.

[1773.—"Instead of marching with the great army he had raised into the Purbneean country . . . we were informed he had turned his arms against us. . . ."—Jess, 91.]

1881.—
" . . . My lands were taken away, And the Company gave me a pension of just eight annas a day;
And the Poorbebas swaggered about our streets as if they had done it all. . . ."
Attar Singh loquitur, by 'Sowar,' Sir M. Durand in an Indian paper, the name and date lost.

POOTLY NAUTCH, s. Properly Hind. kāth-pūli-nāch, 'wooden-puppet-dance.' A puppet show.

c. 1817.—"The day after tomorrow will be my lad James Dawson's birthday, and we are to have a puttally-nautch in the evening."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 291.

POPPER-CAKE, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same word and thing, though to the former is attributed a Hind. and Mahr. origin pīpar, Skt. paripata, and to the latter a Tamil one, pappadam, as an abbreviation of parippu-adam, 'lentil cake.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. appadam, Tam. appalam (see HOPPER), and Mal. pappalam, from parippu, 'dhal,' ata, 'cake.'] It is a kind of thin scone or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with asafoetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry. It is not bad, even to a novice.

1814.—"They are very fond of a thin cake, or wafer, called popper, made from the flour of oord or mash . . . highly seasoned with assa-footida; a salt called popper-chor; and a very hot massaula (see MUSSALLA), compounded of turmeric, black pepper, ginger, garlic, several kinds of warm seeds, and a quantity of the hottest Chili pepper."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50; [2nd ed. i. 347].

1820.—"Papadoms (fine cakes made of gram-flour and a fine species of alkali, which gives them an agreeable salt taste, and serves the purpose of yeast, making them rise, and become very crisp when fried. . . ."—As. Researches, xiii. 315.

"Paper, the flour of oored (see OORD), salt, assa-footida, and various spices, made into a paste, rolled as thin as a wafer, and dried in the sun, and when wanted for the table baked crisp. . . ."—T. Coates, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 194.

PORCA, n.p. In Imp. Gazetteer Porakâd, also called Piracada; properly Purakādā, [or according to the Madras Gloss. Purakkātu, Mal. pura, 'outside,' kātu, 'jungle']. A town on the coast of Travancore, formerly a separate State. The Portuguese had a fort here, and the Dutch, in the 17th century, a factory. Fra Paolina (1796) speaks of it as a very populous city full of merchants, Mahomedan, Christian, and Hindu. It is now insignificant. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 338.]

[1663-4.—"Your factories of Carwarr and Porquatt are continued but to very little purpose to you."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 18.]

PORCELAIN, s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypræidae, or Cowries (q.v.) were in medieval Italy called porcellana and porcelletta, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Malin (see in Littre sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. s.v. Cypræidae) that Pig is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell seems to have been used in the Middle Ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz. to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pig in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic pig, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skcat, s.v. piggin). We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelaine from "pour cent années," because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250.—Capmany has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1791, he has deranged the whole of the chapters, and thus, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether!

"In the XLIVth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelona, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 13th century, there are regulations for the return cargoes of the ships trading with Alexandria. . . . In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt . . . cotton in bales and spun wool de capella (for harts), porcellanas, alums, elephants' teeth. . . ."—Morras, Hist. de Barcelona, I. Pt. ii. p. 44.

1293.—"Il out monoie en tel mainere con jo voz dirai, car il espendent porcelaine blanche, celle qe se trovant en la mer et qe se metent au cuol des chions, et valent les quatre-vingt porcelaines un saio d'arjont qe sunt dous vencesins gros. . . ."—Marco Polo, oldest French text, p. 132.

"Et encore voz di qe on ce-to provence, en uno cite qe est apelle Tinugui, se font escuelle de porcellaine grant et pitet les plus belles qe l'en peust deviser."—Ibid. 180.

c. 1323.—"Audiri quodd ducentas civitates habet sub so imperator illo (Magnus Tartarus) majores quam Tholosa; et ego certè credo quodd plures habeant homines. . . . Alia non sunt quao ego sciam in isto imperio digna relatione, nisi una pulcherrima, et nobilissima, atque virtuosa porsoleta."—Jordan, Mss. Bibl., p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

c. 1313.—". . . ghomerabien, vernice, armoniaco, zaffiro, coloquinti, porcellane, mirra, mirabolani . . . si vendono a Vinegia a conto di peso sottile" (i.e. by the cutoha hundredweight).—Pygoletti, Pratica della Mercatura, p. 131.

c. 1440.—". . . this Cim and Macinn that I have before named arr ii verie great provinces, thinhabitants whereof arr idolaters, and thero make they vessels and dishes of Porcellana."—Giovanni Barba, Hak. Soc. 75.

In the next the shells are clearly intended :

1442.—"Gabriele di Firenze . . . Porcellette marine, la libra . . . soldi . . . denari . . ."
—Uzano, Prut. della Mercatura, p. 23.

1461.—"Porcellane pezzi 20, cioè 7 piattine, 5 scodelle, 4 grandi e una piccina, piattine 5 grandi, 3 scodelle, una bava, e due bianche."—List of Presents sent by the Sultan of Egypt to the Doge Pasquale Malipiero. In Murator, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, xxi. col. 1170.

1475.—"The exports of Cheen and Machin are also large. Porcelain is made there, and sold by the weight and at a low price."—Nikitin, in India in the XVth Cent., 21.

1497.—". . . lo mando lo inventario del presente del Soldano dato a Lorenzo . . . vasi grandi di Porcellana mai più veduti simili ne meglio lavorati. . ."
—Letter of P. da Bibbene to Clar. de Medici, in Roscoe's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371.

1602.—"In questo tempo abramiamo xxi nave sopra il porto di Calcehut ; et de epso hebbo tãto drogario e speciarie cho cariche le diete co nave. Praterica me ha mandato ei vasi di porzellana eccellitissimi et grãdi : quatro bochili de argento grandi cõ certi altri vasi al modo loro per credentia."—Letter of K. Emanuel, 13.

1616.—"They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts, very fine and good, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-snails (caracoli), and eggs-shells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to refine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave as a fortune to their children. . ."
—Barbosi, in Ramusio, i. 320.

1653.—(In China) "The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be, everything being of very fine porcelana (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little."—Barros, III. ii. 7.

1651.—(After a suggestion of the identity of the vera purpurina of the ancients) "Ce nom de Porcelaine est donné à plusieurs coquilles de mer. Et pource qu'un beau Vaisseau d'une coquille de mer ne se pourroit rendre mieux à propos suyuât le nom antique, que de l'appeller de Porcelaine j'ay pensé que les coquilles polies et lustrées, ressemblant à Nacre de perles, ont quelque affinité avec la matiere des vases de Porcelaine antiques : soinet aussi que le peuple l'arçois nomme les pates-nostres faictes de gros signols, pates-nostres de Porcelaine. Les susdits vases de Porcelaine sont transparents, et coustent bien cher au Caire, et aliënt mesmement qu'ilz les apportent des Indes. Mais cela ne me sembla vraysemblable : car on n'en vroit pas si grande quantité, ne de si grãdes pieces, s'il failloit apporter de si loing. Vne e-guiere, vn pot, ou vn autre vaisseau pour petite qu'elle soit, cousto vn ducat : si c'est quelque grãd vase, il coustera d'aunantage."—P. Belon, Observations, f. 131.

c. 1560.—"And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not bene in China, about where this Porcelaine is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of oysters shels, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enformed of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance. . ."
—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

[1605-6.—". . . China dishes or Fuselen."—Burdwood, First Letter Book, 77.

[1612.—"Balanced one part with sandal wood, Porcelain and pepper."—Danvers, Letters, i. 107.]

1615.—"If we had in England bods of porcelain such as they have in China, which porcelain is a kind of plaster buried in the earth, and by length of time congealed and glazed into that substance; this were an artificial mine, and part of that substance. . ."
—Bacon, Argument on Improvement of Waste; Works, by Spalding, &c., 1859, vii. 523.

c. 1630.—"The Bannians all along the sea-shore pitch their Booths . . . for there they sell Callicoco, China-satten, Porcellainware, scrutores or Cablinets. . ."
—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 46.

1650.—"We are not thoroughly resolved concerning Porcellane or China dishes, that according to common belief they are made of earth, which both in preparation about an hundred years underground; for the relations thereof are not only divers but contrary; and Authors agree not herein. . ."
—Sir Thomas Browne, Vulgar Errors, ii. 5.

[1652.—"Invited by Lady Gerrard I went to London, where we had a greates supper; all the vessels, which were innumerable, were of Porcelan, she having the most ample and richest collection of that curiositie in England."—Evelyn, Diary, March 19.]

1726.—In a list of the treasures left by Akbar, which is given by Valentijn, we find :

"In Porcelayn, &c, Ropias 2507747."—iv (Suratte), 217.

1850.—"Va-cella quidem delicatior et caerulea et venusta, quibus inhaeret nescimus quid elegantius, porcellana vocantur, quasi (sed nescimus quare) a porcella. In partibus autem Britanniae quas septentrionem spectant, vocabulo forsan analogo, vasa grossiora et fusca pigi appellant barbari, quasi (sed quare itorum nescimus) a porci. Narrischehen und Weigeholt, Etymol. Universale, s.v. 'Miao China.'"—Motto to An Ode in Brown Pig, St. James's Gazette, July 17.

PORGO, s. We know this word only from its occurrence in the passage quoted; and most probably the explanation suggested by the editor of the Notes is correct, viz. that it represents Port. pragua. This word is perhaps the same as piroga, used by the French for a canoe or 'dug-out'; a term said by Littré to be (piroga) Carib. [On the passage from T. B. quoted below Sir H. Yule has the following note: "J. (i.e. T.) B., the author, gives a rough drawing. It represents the Purgoe as a somewhat high-sterned lighter, not very large, with five oar-pins a side. I cannot identify it exactly with any kind of modern boat of which I have found a representation. It is perhaps most like the galadr. I think it must be an Orissa word, but I have not been able to trace it in any dictionary, Uriya or Bengali." On this Col. Temple says: "The modern Indian galadr (Malay galua) is a skiff, and would not answer the description." Anderson (loc. cit.) mentions that in 1695 several "well-laden Purgoes" and boats had put in for shelter at Rameswaram to the northward of Madapollam, i.e. on the Coromandel Coast. There seems to be no such word known there now. I think, however, that the term Purgoe is probably an obsolete Anglo-Indian corruption of an Indian corruption of the Port. term barca, barea, a term used for any kind of sailing boat by the early Portuguese visitors to the East (e.g. D'Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 230; Vasco da Gama, Hak. Soc. 77, 240).]

[1669-70.—"A Purgoe: These Vessels for the most part between Hugly and Pypla and Ballaore; with these boats they carry goods into ye Roads on board English and Dutch, &c. Ships, they will lino a longo time in ye Sea, being brought to anchor by ye Sterne, as theire Vnual way is."—MS. by T. B[ateman], quoted by Anderson, English Intercourse with Siam, p. 266.]

1680.—"Ft. St. Geo. Comm., Jany. 30, "records arrival from the Bay of the 'Success', the Captain of which reports that a Porgo [Pengua], a fast-sailing vessel, [clipped] drove ashore in the Bay about 14 ply. . . ."—Notes and Letts, No. iii. p. 2.

[1683.—"The Thomas arrived with ye 23 bales of Silk taken out of the Purga."—Hedley, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 95.

[1685.—"In Hoogly letter to Fort St. George, dated February 6 Porgo occurs coupled with 'horn' (Hind. bar, 'a lighter')."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 165.

PORTIA, s. In S. India the common name of the Theapsia populi.

nra, Lam. (N.O. Malvaceae), a favourite ornamental tree, thriving best near the sea. The word is a corruption of Tamil Puarasu, 'Flower-king; [pu-rasu, from pu, 'flower,' rasu, 'popul tree']. In Ceylon it is called Suria gansuri, and also the Tulip-tree.

1712.—"Le bois sur lequel on les met (les toiles), et celui qu'on employe pour les battre, sont ordinairement du tamariner, ou d'un autre arbo nommé porchi."—Letts, Idyl. xiv. 122.

1860.—"Another useful tree, very common in Ceylon, is the Suria, with flowers so like those of a tulip that Europeans know it as the tulip tree. It loves the sea air and saline soils. It is planted all along the avenues and streets in the towns near the coast, where it is equally valued for its shade and the beauty of its yellow flowers, whilst its tough wood is used for carriage-shafts and gun-stocks."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 117.

1861.—"It is usual to plant large branches of the portia and banyan trees in such a slovenly manner that there is little probability of the trees thriving or being ornamental."—Claghorn, Forests and Gardens of S. India, 197.

PORTO NOVO, n.p. A town on the east of South Arcot, 32 m. S. of Pondicherry. The first mention of it that we have found is in Bocarro, Decada, p. 42 (c. 1613). The name was perhaps intended to mean 'New Oporto,' rather than 'New Haven,' but we have not found any history of the name. [The Tamil name is Parangipattai, 'European town,' and it is called by Mahomedans Mahmud-bandar.]

1718.—"At Night we came to a Town called Porta Nova, and in Malabarish Puranti Pota (Parangipattai)."—Propagation of the Gospel, &c., Pt. ii. 41.

1726.—"The name of this city (Porto Novo) signifies in Portuguese New Haven, but the Moors call it Mohammed Bender . . . and the Gentos Perrangipente."—Valentijn, Chormandel, 8.

PORTO PIQUENO, PORTO GRANDE, m. pp. 'The Little Haven,' and 'the Great Haven'; names by which the Bengal ports of Satigam (q.v.) and Chatigam (see CHITTAGONG) respectively were commonly known to the Portuguese in the 16th century.

1551.—"Porto Pequeno de Bengala . . . Cowries are current in the country; 80 cowries make 1 pone (see PUN); of these pones 48 are equal to 1 larin more or less."—A. Nunes, 37.

1554.—“Porto Grande de Bengala. The maund (māo), by which they weigh all goods, contain 40 seers (seer), each seer 18½ ounces. . . .”—A. Nunes, 37.

1568.—“Io mi parti d’Orisa per Dongala al Porto Picheno . . . s’entra nel fiume Ganze, dalla bocca del qual fiume s’uno a Satagira (see SATIGANI) città, oue si fanno negotij, et oue i mercadanti si riducono, sono centi o venti miglia, che si fanno in dieotto hore a remi, cioè, in tre crescenti d’acqua, che sono di sei hore l’uno.”—C. s. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392.

1569.—“Partisemo di Sondiana, et giungesemo in Chitigan il gran porto di Bengala, in tempo che già i Portoghesi hauevano fatto pace o tregua con i Retton.”—Ibid. 396.

1595.—“Beside, you tell me that the traffic and commerce of the Porto Pequeno of Benguala being always of great moment, if this goes to ruin through the Mogors, they will be the masters of those tracts.”—Letter of the K. of Portugal, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Fascic. 3, p. 481.

1596.—“And so he wrote me that the Commerce of Porto Grande of Bengala is flourishing, and that the King of the Country had remitted to the Portuguese 3 per cent. of the duties that they used to pay.”—Ibid. p. 580.

1598.—“When you thinke you are at the point do Gualle, to be asured thereof, make towards the Iland, to know it . . . where commonlie all the shippes know the land, such I say as we sayle to Bengalen, or to any of the Hauens thereof, as Porto Pequeno or Porto Grande, that is the small, or the great Haven, where the Portingalles doe traffique. . . .”—Lincheuten, Book III. p. 324.

[c. 1617.—“Port Grande, Fort Pequina,” in Sir T. Ro’s Lett. Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

POSTEEN, s. An Afghan leathern pelisse, generally of sheep-skin with the fleece on. Pers. postin, from post, ‘a hide.’

1680.—“Khwāja Ahmad came on some Government business to Ghaznia, and it was reported to him that some merchants were going to Turkistan, who were returning to Ghaznia in the beginning of winter. The Khwāja remembered that he required a certain number of postins (great coats) every year for himself and sons. . . .”—Nizām-ul-Mulk, in Elliot, ii. 497.

1742.—“His Majesty the Fortunate Khān had sent for the Prince of Kākhūt, horse, pelisse (postin) and robes woven of gold. . . .”—Abdurazzāl, in Not. et Extr. xiv. Pt. i. 437.

[c. 1590.—“In the winter season there is no need of postins (fur-lined coats). . . .”—Atin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 337.]

1862.—“Otter skins from the Hills and Kashmir, worn as Postins by the Yarkandis.”—Punjab Trade Report, p. 65.

POTTAH, s. Hind. and other vernaculars, paṭṭā, &c. A document specifying the conditions on which lands are held; a lease or other document securing rights in land or house property.

1778.—“I am therefore hopeful you will be kindly pleased to excuse me the five lacs now demanded, and that nothing may be demanded of me beyond the amount expressed in the pottah.”—The Rajah of Benares to Hastings, in Articles of Charge against H., Burke, vi. 591.

[1860.—“By the Zameendar, then, or his under tenant, as the case may be, the land is farmed out to the Ryots by pottahs, or agreements. . . .”—Front, Rural Life in Bengal, 67.

PRA, PHRA, PRAW, s. This is a term constantly used in Burma, familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Skt. Śrī. In Burmese the word is written bhura, but pronounced (in Arakan) phra, and in modern Burma Proper, with the usual slurring of the r, P’hyā or Pyd. The use of the term is not confined to Burma; it is used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alahaster; the word is used in the same form Phra among the Shans; and in the form Praa, it would seem, in Camboja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambojan epithets as Praa En and Praa Noreni (Nārāyana); of the figure of Buddha entering nirvāna, as Praa Nippan; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as Praa Kot Melea, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as Praa Ang Reachea Vodey, of various sites of temples as Praecon, Praean, Praa Pithu, &c. (Voyage d’Exploration, i. 26, 40, 388, 77, 85, 72).

The word phra appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous Alomphra (1753-60), founder of the late dynasty, and of his son Dodoah-phra (1781-1810). In the former instance the name is, according to Sir A. Phayre, Alaung-phā, i.e. the embryo Buddha, or Bodhisatva. A familiar Siamese example of use is in the Phrā Bā, or sacred foot-mark of Buddha, a term which represents the Nri Pada of Ceylon.

The late Prof. H. H. Wilson, as will be seen, supposed the word to be a corruption of Skt. prabhu (see PARVOE). But Mr. Alabaster points, under the guidance of the Siamese spelling, rather to Skt. vara, 'pre-eminent, excellent.' This is in Pali vare, 'excellent, best, precious, noble' (Childers). A curious point is that, from the prevalence of the term phrā in all the Indo-Chinese kingdoms, we must conclude that it was, at the time of the introduction of Buddhism into those countries, in predominant use among the Indian or Ceylonese propagators of the new religion. Yet we do not find any evidence of such a use of either prabhu or vare. The former would in Pali be pabbho. In a short paper in the Bijlagen of the Royal Institute of the Hague (Dl. X. 4de Stuk, 1885), Prof. Kern indicates that this term was also in use in Java, in the forms Bra and pra, with the sense of 'splendid' and the like; and he cites as an example Bra-Wijaya (the style of several of the medieval kings of Java), where Bra is exactly the representative of Skt. Sri.

1648.—"I know that in the country of Laos the Dignities of Pa-ya and Meuang, and the honourable Epithets of Pra are in use; it may be also that the other terms of Dignity are common to both Nations, as well as the Laws."—De la Loubère, Siam, E.T. 79.

"The Pra-Clang, or by a corruption of the Portuguese, the Barcelon, is the officer, who has the appointment of the Commerce, as well within as without the Kingdom. . . . His name is composed of the Balu word Pra, which I have so often discoursed of, and of the word Clang, which signifies Mercantile."—Ibid. 91.

"Then Summano-Udom (see GAUTAMA) they call Pra-Boute-Telon, which verbatim signifies the great and Excellent Lord."—Ibid. 131.

1795.—"At noon we reached Meeaday, the personal estate of the Magawoon of Pegue, who is oftener called, from this place, Meeaday Praw, or Lord of Meeaday."—Smyth, Embassy to Am. 212.

1855.—"The epithet Phra, which occupies so prominent a place in the ceremonial and religious vocabulary of the Siamese and Burmese, has been the subject of a good deal of nonsense. It is unfortunate that our Burmese scholars have never (I believe) been Sanskrit scholars, nor vice versa, so that the Pāli terms used in Burma have had little elucidation. On the word in question, Professor H. H. Wilson has kindly favoured me with a note: 'Phrā is no doubt a corruption of the Sanskrit Prabhu, a Lord or Master; the h of the aspirate bh is often retained alone, leaving Prabu which becomes Prāh or Phra.'"—Sir H. Yule, Mission to Ava, 61.

1855.—"All these readings (of documents at the Court) were intoned in a high recitative, strongly resembling that used in the English cathedral service. And the long-drawn Phyā-ā-ā-ā! (My Lord), which terminated each reading, added to the resemblance, as it came in exactly like the Amen of the Liturgy."—Ibid. 88.

1859.—"The word Phra, which so frequently occurs in this work, here appears for the first time; I have to remark that it is probably derived from, or of common origin with, the Pharaoh of antiquity. It is given in the Siamese dictionaries as synonymous with God, ruler, priest, and teacher. It is in fact the word by which sovereignty and sanctity are associated in the popular mind."—Boering, Kingdom and People of Siam, [i. 35]

1863.—"The title of the First King (of Siam) is Phra-Chon-Khu-Yu-Hua and spoken as Phra-Phuth-Chao-Yu-Hua. . . . His Majesty's name is styled in the Pali form Phra-Naga. . . . The Siamese term the Catholic missionaries, the Preachers of the Phra-Chao Phu-Sung, i.e. of God the Creator, or the Divine Lord Builder, . . . The Catholic missionaries express 'God' by Phra-Phuth-Chao. . . . and they explain the Eucharist as Phra-Phuthi-Kaya (Kaya: 'Body')."—Bastian, Reise, iii. 109, and 111-115.

1870.—"The most excellent Parā, brilliant in his glory, free from all ignorance, beholding Nibbāna the end of the migration of the soul, lighted the lamp of the law of the Word."—Legros, Buddha-gosha's Parables, tr. from the Burmese, p. 1.

1871.—"Phra is a Siamese word applied to all that is worthy of the highest respect, that is, everything connected with religion and royalty. It may be translated as 'holy.' The Siamese letters p-h-r commonly represent the Sanskrit r-r. I therefore presume the word to be derived from the Sanskrit 'ri'—to choose, or to be chosen, and 'ra'—better, best, excellent, the root of āpavos."—Alabaster, The Wheel of the Law, 161.

PRAAG, sometimes PIAGG, n.p. Properly Prayāga, 'the place of sacrifice,' the old Hindu name of Allahabad, and especially of the river confluence, since remote ages a place of pilgrimage.

o. A.D. 638.—"Le royaume de Polo-ye-Lin (Prayāga) a environ 5000 li de tour. La capitolo, qui est situé au confluent de deux fleuves, à environ 20 li de tour. . . Dans la ville, il y a un temple des dieux qui est d'une richesse éblouissante, et où éclatent une multitude de miracles. . . Si quel qu'un est capable de pousser le mépris de la vie jusqu'à se donner la mort dans ce temple, il obtient le bonheur éternel et les joies infinies des dieux. . . Depuis l'antiquité jusqu'à nos jours, cette coutume incense n'a pas cessé un instant." —Houen-Thsang, in Pel. Bouddh. ii 276-79.

c. 1020 — " . . . thence to the tree of Barāgi, 12 (parasangs). This is at the confluence of the Jumna and Ganges." —Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i, 65

1520. — "The same day I swam across the river Ganges for my amusement. I counted my strokes, and found that I crossed over at 33 strokes. I then took breath and swam back to the other side. I had crossed by swimming every river that I had met with, except the Ganges. On reaching the place where the Ganges and Jumna unite, I rowed over in the boat to the Pāg side. . . ." —Haber, 106.

1585 — " . . . Frō Agra I came to Prage, where the river Jemena entreth into the mighty river Ganges, and Jemena looeth its name." —R. Fitch, in Hall, ii 336.

PRACRIT, s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness. The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadha, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title "Institutiones Linguae Pracriticae." Scripsit Christianus Lassen, Bonnæ ad Rhenum, 1837. The term itself is Skt. prākṛita, 'natural, unrefined, vulgar,' &c.

1801 — "Sanskrita is the speech of the Celestial, framed in grammatical institutes, Pracrita is similar to it, but manifold as a provincial dialect, and otherwise." —Sanskrit Treatise, quoted by Colebrooke, in As. Res. vii. 199.

PRAYA, s. This is in Hong-Kong the name given to what in most foreign settlements in China is called the Bund; i.e. the promenade or drive along the sea. It is Port. praya, 'the shore.'

[1593. — "Another towne towards the North, called Villa de Praya (for Praya is as much as to say, as strand)" —Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 278.]

PRESIDENCY (and PRESIDENT), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a principal Factory, was, in early popular use, though in the charters of the E.I.C. its first occurrence is in 1661 (see Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (l. 297-8); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr. Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 343).

1623. — "Speaking of the Dutch Commander, as well as of the English President, who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandees of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrow." —J. della Valle, ii. 517.

"Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, and is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastel . . . came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)." —Ibid. ii. 501-2; [Hak. Soc. i. 18].

1638. — "As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Bihaly, they went ashore. . . . The two dayes following were spent in feasting, at which the Commanders of the two Ships treated the President, who afterwards returned to Surat. . . . During my abode at Surat, I wanted for no diversion; for I . . . found company at the Dutch President's, who had his Farms there . . .

* Thomas Rastell or Rastell went out apparently in 1613, in 1619 is mentioned as a "chief merchant of the fleet at Swally Road," and often later as chief at Surat (see Sainsbury, i. 476, and ii. passim) inasmuch as I could converse with them in their own Language."—Mandelslo, E.T., ed. 1669, p. 19.

1638.—"Les Anglois ont bien encore un bureau à Bantam, dans l'Isle de Java, mais il a son President particulier, qui ne depend point de celuy de Suratta."—Mandelslo, French ed. 1669, p. 124.

"A mon retour à Suratta je trouvoy dans la loge des Anglois plus de cinquante marchands, que le President avoit fait venir de tous les autres Bureaux, pour rendre compte de leur administration, et pour estre presens à ce changement de Gouvernement."—Ibid. 188.

1661.—"And in case any Person or Persons, being convicted and sentenced by the President and Council of the said Governor and Company, in the said East Indies, their Factors or Agents there, for any Offence by them done, shall appeal from the same, that then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawfull to and for the said President and Council, Factor or Agent, to seize upon him or them, and to carry him or them home Prisoners to England."—Letters Patent to the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, dealing with the E. Indies, 3d April.

1670.—The Court, in a letter to Fort St. George, fix the amount of tonnage to be allowed to their officers (for their private investments) on their return to Europe:

"Presidents and Agents, at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . . . 5 tons.
Chiefs, at Persia, the Bay (q.v.), Mosulapattam, and Macassar: Deputy at Bombay, and Seconds at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . . . 3 tons."
In Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 3.

1702.—"Tuesday 7th April. . . . In the morning a Council . . . afterwards having some Discourse arising among us whether the charge of hiring Calashes, &c., upon Invitations given us from the Shabander or any others to go to their Countrey Houses or upon any other Occasion of diverting our Selves abroad for health, should be charged to our Honble Masters account or not, the President and Mr. Loyd were of opinion to charge the same. . . . But Mr. Rouse, Mr. Ridges, and Mr. Master were of opinion that Batavia being a place of extraordinary charge and Expense in all things, the said Calash hire, &c., ought not to be charged to the Honourable Company's Account."—MS. Records in India Office.

The book containing this is a collection of fragmentary MS. diaries. But this passage pertains apparently to the proceedings of President Allen Catchpole and his council, belonging to the Factory of Chusan, from which they were expelled by the Chinese in 1701-2; they stayed some time at Batavia on their way home. Mr. Catchpole (or Ketchpole) was soon afterwards chief of an English settlement made upon Pulo Condore, off the Cambojan coast. In 1704-5, we read that he reported favourably on the prospects of the settlement, requesting a supply of young writers, to learn the Chinese language, anticipating that the island would soon become an important station for Chinese trade. But Catchpole was himself, about the end of 1705, murdered by certain people of Macassar, who thought he had broken faith with them, and with him all the English but two (see Bruce's Annals, 483-4, 580, 606, and A. Hamilton, ii. 205 [ed. 1744]). The Pulo Condore enterprise thus came to an end.

1727.—"About the year 1674, President Aungier, a gentleman well qualified for governing, came to the Chair, and leaving Surat to the Management of Deputies, came to Bombay, and rectified many things."—A. Hamilton, i. 188.

PRICKLY-HEAT, s. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimples, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimples," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandal-wood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him described as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it. [See RED-DOG.]

1631.—"Quas Latinus Hippocrates Cornelius Celsus papulas, Plinius sudamina vocat . . . ita coëbra sunt, ut ego adhuc neminem noverim qui molestias has effugerit, non magis quam morsus culicium, quos Lusitani Mosquitas vocant. Sunt autem hæc papulae rubentes, et asperae aliquantum, per sudorem in cutem ejectæ; plerumque a capito ad calcem usque, cum summo pruritu, et assiduo scilicet desiderio erumpentes."—Jac. Bontii, Hist., Nat. &c., ii. 18, p. 33.

1665.—"The Sun is but just now rising, yet he is intolerable; there is not a Cloud in the Sky, not a breath of Wind; my horses are spent, they have not seen a green Herb since we came out of Lahor; my Indians, for all their black, dry, and hard skin, sink under it. My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, as so many needles."—Bernier, E.T. 125; [ed. Constable, 389].

[1673.—"This Season . . . though moderately warm, yet our Bodies broke out into small fiery Pimples (a sign of a prevailing Crasis) augmented by MUSKETEE-Bites, and Chineses raising Blisters on us."—Fryer, 35.]

1807.—"One thing I have forgotten to tell you of—the prickly heat. To give you some notion of its intensity, the placid Lord William (Bentinck) has been found sprawling on a table on his back, and Sir Henry Gwillim, one of the Madras Judges, who is a Welshman, and a fiery Briton in all senses, was discovered by a visitor rolling on his own floor, roaring like a baited bull."—Lord Minto in India, June 29

1813.—"Among the primary effects of a hot climate (for it can hardly be called a disease) we may notice prickly heat."—Johnson, Influence of Trop. Climates, 25.

PRICKLY-PEAR, s. The popular name, in both E. and W. Indies, of the Opuntia Dillenii, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country. Undoubtedly, however, it came from America, wide as has been its spread over Southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e.g. in Sicily) it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scouted, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncomplaining material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. [See 8th ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 254.] The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury's Useful Plants of India. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian Opuntia, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent. There is a good description of the plant and fruit in Ovidio, with a good cut (see Ramusio's Ital. version, bk. viii. ch. xav.). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1515.

Some of the names by which the Opuntia is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of Euphorbia. Thus the Euphorbia Boyleana, Bois, is called tsūi chū, &c.; and the Opuntia is called Kābuli tsūi, Gangī sho, Kanghī chū, &c. Gangī chū is also the name of an Euphorbia sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be the E. Verisolia, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 104-5). [The common name in Upper India for the prickly pear is nāgphani, 'snake-hood,' from its shape.] This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain Euphorbias, there is no Euphorbia resembling the Opuntia in form.

The Zakām mentioned in the Āin Glādurīn, 1600, ii. 68; [Jarrett, ii. 239; Sidi Ali, ed. Pumbery, p. 31] as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless Euphorbia also. The Opuntia is very common as a hedge plant in cantonments, &c., and it was much used by Tipoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the E. Royleana and the Opuntia are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. The latter is objectionable, from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

1825.—"The Prickly-Pear, Bush, or Shrub, of about 4 or 5 foot high . . . the fruit at first is green, like the leaf . . . It is very pleasant in taste, cooling and refreshing; but if a man eat 15 or 20 of them they will colour his water, making it look like blood."—Dumppar, i. 223 (in W. Indies).

1764.—

"On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear; They soon a formidable fence will shoot." Granger, Bk. i.

[1829.—"The castle of Bunaf . . . is covered with the cactus, or prickly pear, so abundant on the east side of the Araval."—Tol, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 826.]

1861.—"The use of the prickly pear" (for hedges) "I strongly deprecate; although impenetrable and inexpensive, it conveys an idea of sterility, and is rapidly becoming a nuisance in this country."—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens, 225.

PROME, n.p. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Talaing, properly Brun. The Burmese call it Pye or (in the Arakanese form in which the r is pronounced) Pré and Pré-myo ('city').

1515.—"When he (the K. of Brumau) was arrived at the young King's palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of Prom, and during the Ceremony . . . made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up. . . . This done he went into a Balcone, which looked on a great Market-place, whither he commanded all the dead children that lay up and down the streets, to be brought, and then causing them to be hacked very small, he gave them, mingled with Bran, Rice, and Herbs, to his Elephants to eat."—Pinto, E.T. 211-212 (orig. clv.).

c. 1609.—". . . this quarrel was hardly ended when a great rumour of arms was heard from a quarter where the Portuguese were still fighting. The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of Pren sent in pursuit of the King of Arracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of Pren were so disheartened at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Boanca, 142. This author has Prom (p. 132) and Porão (p. 149). [Also see under AVA.]

1755.—"Prone . . . has the ruins of an old brick wall round it, and immediately without that, another with Tak Timber."—Capt. G. Baker, in Dalrymple, i. 173.

1795.—"In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Prae-miao, or Prome, . . . renowned in Birman history."—Symes, pp. 238-9.

PROW, PARAO, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayäl. pärn, 'a boat,' and the Island word (common to Malay, Javnese, and most languages of the Archipelago) präh or prähü. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, "Malay Prow," but Crawford defines it as "a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft." It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499.—"The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parão, well manned, on board which he sent a Nairo of his with an errand to the Captains. . . ."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

1510.—(At Calicut) "Some other small ships are called Parao, and they are boats of ten paces each, and are all of a piece, and go with oars made of cane, and the mast also is made of cane."—Vartema, 154.

1510.—"The other Persian said: 'O Sir, what shall we do?' I replied: 'Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.'"—Ibid., 269.

1518.—"Item; that any one possessing a zambucuo (see SAMBOOK) or a parao of his own and desiring to go in it may do so with all that belongs to him, first giving notice two days before to the Captain of the City."—Livro dos Privilegios da Cidade de Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. v. p. 7.

1523.—"When Dom Sancho (Dom Sancho Anriquez; see Correa, ii. 770) went into Muar to fight with the fleet of the King of Bintam which was inside the River, there arose a squall which upset all our paraos and lancharas at the bar mouth. . . ."—Lembrança de Cousas de India, p. 6.

1582.—"Next daye after the Capitaine General with all his men being a land, working upon the ship called Barrio, there came in two little Paraos."—Custaneda (tr. by N. L.), f. 62r.

1586.—"The fifth and last festival, which is called Sapan Dman, is one in which the King (of Pegu) is embarked in the most beautiful parò, or boat. . . ."—G. Balbi, f. 122.

1606.—Gouvea (f. 27r) uses parò.

"An howe after this comming a board of the hollanders came a prawe or a canow from Bantam."—Middleton's Voyage, c. 3 (v).

[1611.—"The Portuguese call their own galliots Navires (navios) and those of the Malabars, Paicraus. Most of these vessels were Chettis (see CHETTY), that is to say merchantmen. Immediately on arrival the Malabars draw up their Pados or galliots on the beach."—Pyrard de Laval, Ind. Soc. i. 315.

[1623.—"In the Morning we discern'd four ships of Malabar Rovers near the shore (they called them Paraos and they goe with Oars like our Galeots or Foists."—P. della Valle, Ind. Soc. ii. 201.]

1666.—"Con secreto provino Lopo do Soarez veinte bateles, y gobernandolos y entrando por un rio, hallaron el poligro de cinco naves y ochenta paraos con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Faria y Sousa, Asia, i. 66.

1673.—"They are owners of several small Provoes, of the same make, and Canoes, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Pryer, 20. Elsewhere (e.g. 57, 59) he has Proes.

1727.—"The Andamaners had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Praws, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobareans as they could overcome."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65 [ed. 1744].

1816.—". . . Prahu, a term under which the Malays include every description of vessel."—Raffles, in As. Res. xii. 132.

1817.—"The Chinese also have many brigs . . . as well as native-built prahus."—Raffles, Java, i. 203.

1863.—“On December 13th I went on board a prau bound for the Aru Islands.”—Wallace, Malay Archip. 227.

PUCKA, adj. Hind. pukka, ‘ripe, mature, cooked’; and hence substantial, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutch (q.v.) One of the most common uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

[1756.—“... adjacent houses; all of them of the strongest Pecca work, and all most proof against our Metal on ye Bastions.” Capt. Grant, Report on Siege of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, Ind. Ant., 1890, p. 7.]

1781.—“The House, Cook-room, bottle-cannah, godown, &c., are all pukka-built.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1821.—“A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pukka sheds pointed out the Company’s warehouse.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 259-60.

1842.—“I observe that there are in the town (Dehli) many buildings pukka-built, as it is called in India.”—Wellington to Ld. Ellenborough, in Indian Adm. of Ld. E., p. 306.

1857.—“Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are, all of them, pukka trumps.”—Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869.—“... there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pukka houses that are being built.”—Report of a Sub-Committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pukka, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1721.—“Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Mortar, called Puckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, it is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744, ii. 7].

The word was also sometimes used substantively for “pukka piece” (see CUTCHA).

c. 1817.—“I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four puckers.”—Mrs. Sherwood’s Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale’s) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1788.—“Pucka—A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours.”

Another habitual application of pukka and cutcha distinguishes between two classes of weights and measures. The existence of twofold weight, the pukka ser and the cutcha, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (e.g. see Pegolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pound avoirdupois and pound troy.

1673.—“The Maund Pucka at Agræ is double as much (as the Surat Maund).”—Fryer, 205.

1760.—“Les pacca coques . . . repondent à une lieue de l’isle de Franco.”—Lett. Edif. xv. 189.

1803.—“If the rice should be sent to Corrygaum, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucca seers for each load.”—Wellington, Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of the appointments held.

1866.—“Susan. Well, Miss, I don’t wonder you’re so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is outcha. Thank goodness, my young man is pukka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee.”—Trevelyan, The Dakk Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853.—“Well, Jenkyns, any news?” “Nothing pukka, that I know of.”—Outfield, ii. 57.

1866.—“I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pukka.”—Trevelyan, The Dakk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 220.

The word has spread to China:

“Dis pukka sing-song makees show
How smart man make mistake, galow.”
Leland, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 54.

PUCKAULY, s; also PUCKAUL. Hind. pakhali, ‘a water-carrier.’ In N. India the pakhali [Skt. payas, ‘water,’ khalla, ‘skin’] is a large water-skin (an entire ox-hide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the pakhali is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. (See also Williamson’s V. M. (1810), i. 229.)

[1538.—Referring to the preparations for the siege of Diu, "which they brought from all the wells on the island by all the bullocks they could collect with their water-skins, which they call pacals (Pacnis)."—Couto, Dec. V, Bk. iii. ch. 2.]

1780.—"There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two buccalies to each company: these are two large leathern bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock. . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 183.

1803.—"It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leathern bags, called here puckally bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckally-boys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans."—Percival's Ceylon, 102.

1801.—"It would be a much better arrangement to give the adjutants of corps an allowance of 28 rupees per mensem, to supply two puckallo men, and two bullocks with bags, for each company."—Wellington, iii. 509.

1813.—"In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags called pacanlies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 140; [2nd ed. i. 415].

1812.—"I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckalls' and 'mussucks' by sea to Suex."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ellenborough's Ind. Admin. 219.

[1850.—"On the reverse flank of companies march the Pickalliers, or men driving bullocks, carrying large leather bags filled with water. . . ."—Nisrny, Ten Years in India, iii. 335.]

PUCKEROW, v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakrānā, 'to cause to be seized,' pakrāo, 'cause him to be seized'; or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb pakarāo, 'seize and come,' or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckerow belongs essentially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckerow,' i.e. to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native). The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumbcow, gubbrow, lugow, &c.

1866.—"Fanny, I am cutcha no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is pucker to pucker!"—Trevelyan, The Dark Jungles, 360.

PUDIPATAN, n.p. The name of a very old seaport of Malabar, which 'has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakaré of K. Johnston's Royal Atlas. [It appears in the map in Logan's Malabar as Putuppattanam or Pulappannani.] The name is Tamil, Pudupattana, 'New City.' Compare true form of Pondicherry.

c. 515.—"The most notable places of trade are there . . . and then five marts of Malé from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangaruth (see MANGALORE) Salopatana, Nalopatana, Pudopatana. . . ."—Comas Indoeplevres, Bk. xi. (see in Cuthay, &c. p. clxxviii.).

c. 1342.—"Buddfattan, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary. . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the hotel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China."—Jen Batula, iv. 87.

c. 1420.—"A quā rursus se diebus viginti terrestri viā contulit ad urbem portumque maritimum nomine Pudifetanem."—Conti, in Poggio, de Var. For.

1516.—". . . And passing those places you come to a river called Pudripatan, in which there is a good place having many Moorish merchants who possess a multitude of ships, and here begins the Kingdom of Calicut."—Barbosa, in Humson, i. f. 311r. See also in Stanley's Barbosa Pudopatani, and in Tohfat-ul-Muyakuden, by Rowlandson, pp. 71, 157, where the name (Budfattan) is misread Budfattan.

[PUG, s. Hind. puṭṭ, Skt. padala, 'a foot'; in Anglo-Indian use the footmarks of an animal, such as a tiger.

[1831.—". . . sanguine we were sometimes on the report of a hura pug from the shikaree."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, ii. 178.

[1882.—"Presently the large square 'pug' of the tiger we were in search of appeared."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 30.]

PUGGRY, PUGGERIE, s. Hind. pagrī, 'a turban.' The term being often used in colloquial for a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

c. 1200.—"Prithirāja . . . wore a pagari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid torn. In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace."—Chand Bardai E.T. by Beames, Ind. Ant. i. 282.

[1827.—". . . I find it is the common mode of the Eastern People to shave the head all save a long lock which superstitiously they leave at the very top, such especially as wear Turbans, Mandils, Dustars, and Puggarees"—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 110.]

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the consanguinity they claim with Mahomet, as a Siad is akin to that imposture, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Packery (or Turban). . . ."—Fraser, 93, [comp. 113]

1689.—" . . . with a Puggaree or Turbant upon their Heads"—Orington, 314

1871.—"They (the Negro Police in Demarara) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, with white puggies framing in their ebony faces"—Jenkins, The Courier.

PUGGY. Hind pugi (not in Shakespeare's Dut, nor in Platts), from pug (see PUG), 'the foot.' A professional tracker, the name of a caste, or rather an occupation, whose business is to track thieves by footmarks and the like. On the system, see Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 180 seqq.

[1821.—"There are in some of the districts of Central India (as in Guzerat) puggees, who have small fees on the village, and whose business it is to trace thieves by the print of their feet."—Macleod, Central India, 2nd ed. n. 18.]

1879.—"Good puggies or trackers should be employed to follow the dacoits during the daytime"—Times of India, Overland Suppl., May 12, p. 7.

PUHUR. PORE. PYRE, &c., s. Hind. pahar, pahr, from Skt. prahara. 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch' or space of 8 gharis (see GHURRY).

c. 1526.—"The natives of Hindostan divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a tihari, they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a Pahar or watch, which the Persians call a Pās."—Baber, 331.

[c. 1590.—"The Hindu philosophers divide the day and night into four parts, each of which they call a pahr."—Itin, ed. Jurrett, iii. 15.]

1633.—"Par." See under GHURRY.

1673.—"Pore." See under GONG.

1803.—"I have some Jasooses selected by Col. C's brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur in fear. . . ."—M. Lippinstone, in Life, i. 62.

PULĀ, s. In Tamil pillai, Malayāl. pillā, 'child'; the title of a superior class of (so-called) Śūdras, [especially curnums] In Cochin and Travancore it corresponds with Nāyār (see NAIR). It is granted by the sovereign, and carries exemption from customary manual labour.

1533.—" . . . pulas, who are the gentlemen" (fidalgos).—Coutancada, iv. 2

[1724.—"O Signato quo o Commendador tuha remetido como grã-novo nmin e as Pulamares temo ca reebid."—Ratification, in Legat. Malabar, iii. 13.]

PULICAT, n.p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of a Dutch factory. Bp. Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Sāstri gives the proper name as pala-Vēlkādu, 'old Velkādu or Verkādu,' the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sivāite Tiruvam (see also Valentijn below). [The Madras Gloss. gives Paḷavar-kādu, 'old nenia forest,' which is corroborated by Dr. Hultzsch (Lipigraphia Indica, i. 398).]

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the pe (alcarr) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Choromandel by the vessels of Peru and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Paleacate, which is on the coast of Choromandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Florentino (sic, frörentin) called Pero L-croce, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Choromandel. . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1533.—"The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Paleacate, which is in the Province of Choromandel and the Kingdom of Binnaga, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. Thomas was said to be, and when they arrived at the port of Paleacate the wind was against their going on. . . ."—Barros, III. vii. 11.

[1611.—"The Dutch had settled a factory at Pallacatta."—Danvers, Letters, i. 133; in Foster, ii. 63, Pollicat.]

1726.—"Then we come to Palleam N'dam Cuddor, called by us for shortness Palleacatta, which means in Malabars 'The old Fortress,' though most commonly we call it Castle Geldria."—Valentijn, Chorm, 13.

"The route I took was along the strip of country between Porto Novo and Paleacatta. This long journey I travelled on foot; and preached in more than a hundred places. . . ."—Letter of the Missionary Schultz, July 19, in Notices of Madras, &c., p. 20.

1727.—"Pollent is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St George.

... It is strengthened with two Ports, one contains a few Dutch soldiers for a Garrison, the other is commanded by an Officer belonging to the Mogul."—A. Hamilton, i. 372, [ed. 1744].

[1813. — "Pulecat handkerchiefs." See under PIECE-GOODS.]

PULTUN, s. Hind. pattan, a corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of platoon or peloton. The S. India form is patulam, patilum. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800. — "All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy some campoos and pultons which have been indirectly pushed across the Kistna."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Mem. of Munro, by Arbuthnot, lxi.

[1885. — "I know lots of Sahibs in a pultoon at Bareilly."—Mrs. Croker, Village Tales and Jungle Tragedies, 60.]

PULWAH, PULWAR, s. One of the native boats used on the rivers of Bengal, carrying some 12 to 15 tons. Hind. pulwār. [For a drawing see Grierson, Bihar Village Life, p. 42.]

1735. — "... We observed a boat which had come out of Samboe river, making for Pulwa: the commandant detached two light pulwars after her. . ."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 69.

[1767. — "... a Peon came twice to Noon-golah, to apply for pulwars. . ."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 197.]

1780. — "Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others; a pulwah for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a paunchway" (q.v.).—Hodge, p. 39.

1782. — "To be sold, Three New Dacca Pulwars, 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each."—India Gazette, Aug. 31.

1824. — "The ghât offered a scene of bustle and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many badgerows and pulwars, that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place."—Heber, ed. 1811, i. 131.

1860. — "The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of neater build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying one of the large kind of boats. . ."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 7, with an illustration.

PULWAUN, s. P.—H. pahlidun, [which properly means 'a native of ancient Persia' (see PAHLAVI). Mr.

3 A

Skeat notes that in Malay the word becomes pahlidan, probably from a confusion with Malay lawan, 'to fight'. A champion; a professed wrestler or man of strength.

[1753. — "... the fourth, and least numerous of these bodies, were choico men of the Pohlevans. . ."—Hanway, iii. 101.

[1813. — "When his body has by these means unlikened an additional portion of vigour, he is dignified by the appellation of Puhlwan."—Liroughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 165.]

1828. — "I added a pohlivan or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filed into saws, of a temper as ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jackass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout."—Haji Bala in England, i. 15.

PUN, s. A certain number of cowries, generally 80; Hind. pana. (See under COWEY). The Skt. pana is 'a stake played for a price, a sum,' and hence both a coin (whence fanam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1551. — "Pone." (See under PORTO PIQUENO.)

1683. — "I was this day advised that Mr. Charnock putt off Mr. Ellis's Cowries at 31 pund to yo Rupee in payment of all yo Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 38 punds are really bought by him for a Rupee. . ."—Hodge, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hink. Soc. i. 122].

1760. — "We now take into consideration the relief of the menial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appear in near a quadruple (proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

"No tailor to demand for making:

1 Jamma, more than 3 annas.

1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.

No washerman:

1 corgo of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.

No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas" (see COWEY).—William Collins, March 27, in Lung, 209.

PUNCH, s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. panj, or Hind. and Mahr. patuch, both meaning 'five'; because composed of five ingredients, viz. arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of its origin; but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as battis, because it is supposed to contain 32 ('batts') ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschlied, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: "Vier Elemente innig gesellt, Bilden das Leben, Bauen die Welt."

The Greeks also had a "Punch," πετραπλόα, as is shown in the quotation from Athenæus. Their mixture does not sound inviting. Littré gives the etymology correctly from the Pers. pani, but the 5 elements à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon-peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q. v.). Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-ponjis was adopted as the title of a Miscellany published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below

c. 210.—"On the feast of the Soirra at Athens he (Aristodemus on Pindar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called scelus, and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Scira. And the winner receives a cup such as is called 'Five-fold,' and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called πετραπλόα because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little oil."—Athenæus, XI. xxi.

1633.—"This voyage (Gombroon to Surat) . . . we accomplished in 19 days. . . . We drank English beer, Spanish sack, French wine, Indian spirit, and good English water, and made good Palepunzen."—Mandelslo, (Dutch ed. 1658), p. 24. The word Palepunzen seems to have puzzled the English translator (John Davis, 2nd ed. 1669), who has "excellent good sack, English beer, French wines, Arak, and other refreshments." (p. 10).

biscuit roty."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 634.

[1658.—"Arrived this place where found the Bezar almost Burnt and many of the People almost starved for want of Food which caused much Sadnes in Mr. Charnock and my Selfe, but not soe much as the absence of your Company, which wee have often remembered in a bowle of the cleerest Punch, haung noo better Liquor."—Hedge, Diary, Hak. Soc. iii. cxiv.]

1659.—"Furs Dritte, Pale bunze gettuhret, von halb Wasser, halb Brantwein, dreyssig, vierzig Limonien, deren Kornlein ausgespeyet worden, und ein wenig Zucker eingeworfen; wie dem Geschmack so angenehm nicht, also auch der Gesundheit nicht."—Saar, ed. 1672, 60.

[1662.—"Amongst other spirituous drinks, as Punch, &c., they gave us Canarie that had been carried to and fro from the Indies, which was indeed incomparably good."—Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 16.]

c. 1666.—"Neanmoins depuis qu'ils (les Anglois) ont donné ordre, aussi bien que les Hollandois, que leurs equipages ne boivent point tant de Bouleponges . . . il n'y a pas tant de maladies, et il ne leur meurt plus tant de monde. Bouleponge est un certain breuvage composé d'arac . . . avec du suc de limons, de l'eau, et un peu de muscade rapé dessus: il est assez agréable au goût, mais c'est la peste du corps et de la santé."—Dernier, ed. 1723, ii. 335 (Eng. Tr. p. 141); [ed. Constable, 411].

1670.—"Doch als men zekere andere drank, die zij Palepunts noemen, dar-tusschen drinkt, zo word het quat enigins gewoert."—Andrietz, 9. Also at p. 27, "Palepunts."

We find this blunder of the compound word transported again to England, and explained as a 'hard word.'

1672.—Padre Vincenzo Maria describes the thing, but without a name:

"There are many fruites to which the Hollanders and the English add a certain beverage that they compound of lemon-juice, aqua-vitæ, sugar, and nutmegs, to quench their thirst, and this, in my belief, augments not a little the evil influence."—Viaggio, p. 103.

1673.—"At Nerule is the best Arak or Nepa (see NIPA) of Goa, with which the English on this Coast make that enervating Liquor called Faunch (which is Indo-pan for Fire), from Five Ingredients; as the Physicians name their Composition Diapente; or from four things, Diatesaron."—Eggr, 157.

1674.—"Palapuntz, a kind of Indian drink, consisting of Aqua-vitæ, Rose-water, juce of Citrons and Sugar."—Glossographia, &c., by T. E.

[1676.—"Drank part of their boules of Punch (a liquor very strange to me)."—H. Tronche, Diary, June 1.]

1692.—"Some (of the Chinese in Batavia) also sell Sugar-beer, as well as cooked dishes and Sury (see SURA), arak or Indian brandy; wherefrom they make Musak and Follepons, as the Englishmen call it."—Nieuhoff, Zee en Land-Reize, ii. 217.

1693.—". . . Our own people and mariners who are now very numerous, and insolent among us, and (by reason of Punch) every day give disturbance."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 123].

1698.—". . . the soldiers as merry as Punch could make them."—In Wheeler, i. 187.

1699.—"Bengal (Arak) is much stronger spirit than that of Goa, tho' both are made use of by the Europeans in making Punch."—Ovington, 237-8.

1694.—"If any man comes into a victualling house to drink punch, he may demand one quart good Goa arak, half a pound of sugar, and half a pint of good lime water, and make his own punch."—Order Book of Bombay Govt., quoted by Anderson, p. 281.

1705.—"Un bon repas chez les Anglais ne se fait point sans bonne pousse qu'on sert dans un grand vase."—Sieur Luillier, Voy. aux Grandes Indes, 29.

1771.—"Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection."—Lockyer, 22.

1721.—"Next to Drams, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Ropasts of the Tender, Valetudinary, and Stodious, than Punch."—G. Chryne, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 53.

1791.—"Dès que l'Anglais eut cessé de manger, le Paria . . . fit un signe à sa femme, qui apporta . . . une grande calbasse pleine de punch, qu'elle avoit préparé, pendant le souper, avec de l'eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre. . . ."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne, 56.

PUNCH-HOUSE, s. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar, [which in Upper India is now transferred to the meeting-place of a Municipal Board]) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use. [In the Straits the Malay Panchau is, according to Mr. Skeat, still in use, though obsolescent.]

[1661.—". . . the Commandore visiting us, we delivering him another examination of a Parsee (Parsee), who kept a Punch house, where the murder was committed. . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 189.]

1671-2.—"It is likewise enordered and declared hereby that no Victuallar, Punch-house, or other house of Entertainment shall be permitted to make stoppage at the pay day of their wages. . . ."—Rules, in Wheeler, iii. 423.

1676.—Major Puckle's "Proposals to the Agent about the young men at Metchlepatam

"That some pecuniary mulct or fine be imposed . . . for misdemeanours.

"6. Going to Punch or Rack-houses without leave or warrantable occasion.

"Dribbing any of the Company's Peons or servants."

—In Notes and Exts., No. I. p. 40.

1688.—". . . at his return to Achen he constantly frequented an English Punch-house, spending his Gold very freely."—Dampier, ii. 134.

"Mrs. Francis, wife to the late Lieutenant Francis killed at Hoogly by the Moors, made it her petition that she might keep a Punch-house for her maintenance."—In Wheeler, i. 184.

1697.—"Monday, 1st April . . . Mr. Cheesely having in a Punch-house, upon a quarrel of words, drawn his Sword . . . and being taxed therewith, he both doth own and justify the drawing of the sword . . . it thereupon ordered not to wear a sword while here."—In Wheeler, i. 320.

1727.—". . . Of late no small Pains and Charge have been bestowed on its Buildings (of the Fort at Tollichery); but for what Reason I know not . . . unless it be for small Vessels . . . or to protect the Company's Ware-house, and a small Punch-house that stands on the Sea-shore. . . ."—J. Hamilton, i. 299 [ed. 1744].

1789.—"Many . . . are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1810.—"The best house of that description which admits boarders, and which are commonly called Punch-houses."—Williamson, V.M. i. 135.

PUNCHAYET, s. Hind. panchayat, from pañch, 'five.' A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or what-not, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1778.—"The Honourable WILLIAM HORNBY, Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty's Castle and Island of Bombay, &c.

"The humble Petition of the Managers of the Panchayet of Parsis at Bombay. . . ."—Dosambhai Framji, II. of the Parsis, 1884, ii. 219.

1810.—"The Parsees . . . are governed by their own panchait or village Council.

The word panchait literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guheras in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the set."—Maria Graham, 11.

1813.—"The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durtar, where the arbitrators assembled: there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a panchayet or jury of five persons."—Peter, Or. Mem., ii. 359. [in 2nd ed. (ii. 2) Panchaut.]

1819.—"The punchayet itself although in all but effigie copies it has the defects before ascribed to it, possesses many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and . . . the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on the principles that were not generally understood."—Aspinwall, in Life, ii. 82.

1821.—"I kept up punchayets because I found them . . . I still think that the punchayet should on no account be dropped, that it is an excellent institution for dispensing justice, and in keeping up the principles of justice, which are less likely to be observed among a people to whom the administration of it is not at all intrusted."—Ibid., 121.

1826.—" . . . when he returns assemble a punchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hyabty has justice."—Panchurang Hari, 31. [ed. 1873, t. 12]

1872.—Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a punchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the fatwa. See LAW-OFFICER

1853.—"From the death of Runjeet Singh to the battle of Solomon, the Sikh Army was governed by 'Punchayets' or 'Panches,'—committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by some one who paid higher."—See C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

1873.—"The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons . . . the panchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India."—Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

PUNDIT. s. Skt. paṇḍita, 'a learned man.' Properly a man learned in Sanskrit lore. The Pundit of the Supreme Court was a Hindu Law-Officer, whose duty it was to advise the English Judges when needful on questions of Hindu Law. The office became extinct on the constitution of the 'High Court,' superseding the Supreme Court and Sudder Court, under the Queen's Letters Patent of May 14, 1862.

In the Marhatta and Telugu countries, the word Pundit is usually pronounced Pant (in English colloquial Punt); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Marhatta history, e.g. the Nānā Dhundogant of evil fame.

Within the last 30 or 35 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Hindusthan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly employed there much as Docteur used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nām Singh, C.S.I. [See Markham, Memoir of Indian Survey, 2nd ed. 148 seqq.]

1571.—"I hereby give notice that . . . I hold it good, and it is my pleasure, and therefore I enjoin on all the paṇḍits (paṇḍits) and Gentile physicians (phizicagists) that they ride not through this City (of Goa) or the suburbs thereof on horseback, nor in andors and palanquins, on pain of paying, on the first offence 10 crucados, and on the second 20, pena o multa, with the forfeiture of such horse, andors, or palanquins, and on the third they shall become the galley-slaves of the King my Lord. . . ."—Proc. of the Governor Antonio Moriz Barreto, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascle 5, p. 899.

1601.—" . . . Ilamando tāhen en su com-pains los Pōditos, le presentaron al Navaho."
—Giverrero, Relación, 70.

1618.—" . . . Brachmanno una cum Paṇḍitis comparentes, simile quid iam inde ab orbis exordio in Indostana visum necant."
—Jarric, Thesaurus, iii. 81-82.

* From a report, &c. 'for the march.' We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1543 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodious of its shipping and the landing of goods, &c., makes a grant 'of the march inundated with sea-water (do canal along do dogra e sigula) which extends along the river-side from the houses of Antonio Correa to the houses of Afonso Pique, which grant is to be perpetual . . . to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankshalls (banqueros), and never to be turned away to any other purpose.' Possibly the lines went into a fund for the drainage of this rapid formation of landing places. See Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 2, pp. 124-131.

1663.—“A Pendet Brachman or Heathen Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah . . . would needs make his Panegyrick . . . and at last concluded seriously with this; When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Feet, the eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it.”—Bernier, E.T., 65; [ed. Constable, 261].

1688.—“Je feignis donc d'être malade, et d'avoir la fièvre on fit venir aussitôt un Pandite ou médecin Gentil.”—Dellon, Rel. de l'Inq. de Goa, 214.

1785.—“I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our pundits, who deal out Hindu law as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made.”—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Lt. Teignmouth, 1807, ii. 67.

1791.—“Il était au moment de s'embarquer pour l'Angleterre, plein de perplexité et d'ennui, lorsque les brames de Bénarès lui apprirent que le brame supérieur de la fameuse pagode de Jagrenat . . . était seul capable de résoudre toutes les questions de la Société royale de Londres. C'était en effet le plus fameux pandect, ou docteur, dont on eût jamais ouï parler.”—B. de St. Pierre, La Chauxière Indienne. The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth Macaulay's flaming wrath, in the quotation lower down, was not a new one.

1788.—“ . . . the most learned of the Pundits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal.”—Raynal, Hist. i. 42.

1786.—“Besides . . . being a Pundit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds.”—Life and Letters of Sydney Dollé, ii. 14.

1800.—“Mr. Vizetelly next makes me say that the principle of limitation is found amongst the Pandects of the Benares. . . . The Benares he probably supposes to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandects to be I shall not presume to guess. . . . If Mr. Vizetelly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pundits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pundit is.”—Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877.—“Colonel Y.—Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person, this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him, . . . I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pundit.”—Address by Sir R. Thorne, Pres. R. Geog. Soc., May 28.

“Colonel Y—in reply, said: . . . Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work. . . . He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employes with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford no great pleasure to take stops for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pundit.”—Reply to the President, same date.

PUNJAUB, n.p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo Indian province so-called, now extends on one side up beyond the Indus, including Peshawar, the Derajat, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Delhi. [In 1901 the Frontier Districts were placed under separate administration.] The name is Pers. Panjāb, ‘Five Rivers.’ These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelam (see JELUM) or Behat, the ancient Vistula which the Greeks made Táδων (Strabo) and Ἰνδῶν (Plol.), (3) Chenab, ancient Chandrabagha and Aiskni. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Σαρδάβαλ, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e. probably because Greece it would be Σαρδοπάριος, ‘the devourer of Alexander.’ The alternative Aiskni they rendered Ἀσκιόν. (4) Ravi, the ancient Aradrati, Táπων (Strabo), Táδων (Arrian), Ἰάπων or Πόδαρι (Plol.). (5) Bias, ancient Ἰπῆσι, Ἰπῆσις (Arrian), Βιάσιος (Plol.). This excluded the Sutlej, Σατράν, Ἡσπύριος of Pliny, Ῥαπῶδρος or Σαδῶδρος (Plol.), as Timor excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we can hardly exclude the Chenab as Wansel does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers. “Putandum est nomen Panchanadae Graecos aut omnino latuisse, aut casu quodam non ad nostra usque tempora pervenisse, quod in tanta monumentorum ruina facile accidere potuit” (Lassen, Pentapotamia, 3). Lassen however has termed the country Pentapotamia in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Panjāb is Persian, and dates from Mahomedan times, the corresponding Skt. Panchanada is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana. The name Panjāb in older Mahomedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjab. In that sense Panjab, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used. [In S. India the term is sometimes applied to the country watered by the Tumbradhra, Wardha, Malprabha, Gatprabha and Kistna (Hills, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 405).]

We remember in the newspaper, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of "the bloody Punjab of Lahore."

b. c. — "Having explored the land of the Pahlavi and the country adjoining, there had then to be searched Panchanada in every part, the monkey then explore the region of Kashmir with its woods of acacia." — Rāmāyaṇa, Bk. iv. ch. 12.

c. 940. — Mas'ūd details (with no correctness) the five rivers that form the Mīhrān or Indus. He proceeds: "When the Five Rivers which we have named have past the House of Gold which is Mīltān, they unite at a place three days' distant from that city, between it and Manjūm at a place called Doshāb." — i. 377-8.

c. 1020. — "They all (Sind, Jhālam, Irāwā, Bāh) combine with the Satlader (Satley) below Mīltān, at a place called Panjab, or 'the junction of the two rivers.' They form a very wide stream." — Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, i. 18.

c. 1300. — "After crossing the Panjab, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelam, the river of Lohāwar (i. e., of Lahore, viz. the Rāwī), Satlūt, and Bīyah. . . ." — Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1333. — "By the grace of God our caravan arrived safe and sound at Banjab, i. e., at the River of the Sind. Banjab (panj) signifies 'five,' and ab, 'water'; so that the name signifies 'the Five Waters.' They flow into this great river, and water the country." — Al-Batūta, iii. 91.

c. 1400. — "All these (united) rivers (Jelam, Chenāb, Rāwī, Bīyah, Sind) are called the Sind or Panjab, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta." — The Emp. Timur, in Elliot, iii. 476.

[c. 1630. — "He also takes a Survey of Pang-ab. . ." — Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 63. He gives a list of the rivers in p. 70.]

1648. — ". . . Pang-ab, the chief city of which is Lahor, is an excellent and fruitful province, for it is watered by the five rivers of which we have formerly spoken." — Van Tart, 3.

"The River of the ancient Indus, is by the Persians and Magols called Pang-ab, i. e. the Five Waters." — Ibid. i.

1710. — "He found this ancient and famous city (Lahore) in the Province Panschaap, by the side of the broad and fish-abounding river Rari (for Rari)." — Valentijn, iv. (Sinatte), 232.

1790. — "Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjab, would in many cases widely differ." — Forster, Preface to Journey.

1793. — "The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is oftener named Panjab than Lahore." — Kennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. 82.

1801. — "I rather think . . . that he (Holkar) will go off to the Panjab. And what gives me stronger reason to think so is, that on the seal of his letter to me he calls himself 'the Slave of Shah Mahmūd, the King of Kings.' Shah Mahmūd is the brother of Zemaun Shah. He seized the mu-nud and government of Caubul, after having defeated Zemaun Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes." — Wellington, Desp. under March 17.

1815. — "He (Subutigeen) . . . overran the fine province of the Panjab, in his first expedition." — Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 316.

PUNKAH, s. Hind. pankhat.

a. In its original sense a portable fan, generally made from the leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis, or 'fan-shaped'), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such pankhat in India are not however formed, as Chinese fans are, like those of our Indies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle.

b. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is to the large fixed and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormuz) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhrī, which show that the true Anglo-Indian punka was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

1710. — "Aloft in a Gallery the King sits in his chaire of State, accompanied with his Children and chief Vizier . . . no other without calling during to goe up to him, save only two Punkahs to rather wind."—W. Puck, in Purcell, i. 439. The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who piled the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to punkaw:

" . . . behind one punkawing, another lolling his sword."—Ibid., 433.

Terry does not use the word:

1616.—" . . . the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing about them, who continually beat the air upon them with Flabellæ, or Fans, of stuffed leather, which keeps off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lie."—Ibid., 1633, p. 305.

1661.—"On such occasions they do it nothing but . . . to lie down in some cool and shady place all alone, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Punkahs, or Fans."—Decker, E.T., p. 76, (ed. C. 1630, 241).

1727.—"Over her head we hold a punker."—Sir C. Moore, in Parl. Papers, 1821, 'The Old World'.

1809.—"He . . . presented me . . . two punkahs."—Lord Valentia, i. 42.

1881.—"The air of state, the flabellæ of the ancients, which the Pope is termed to be the ancient predecessor of the Roman nobles, &c., of course, of the Roman Princes . . . the fan, which go behind are the punkahs of the Eastern Empires, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Proc. Senate, Critica, Archæologia, 187.

c. 1150 G.—"Sous le nom de Khaich on entend des étoffes de mauvais toile de lin qui servent à différents usages. Dans ce pays de Riva (c. A.D. 1691) on s'en sert de ventilateurs faits de cet étoffe. C'est ce qui donne de cette manière : on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d'un tape, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le rend arrondé de tous côtés qui ont de la disposition et qui ne pâlissent pas facilement, par exemple avec du sparle. L'ayant ainsi en pendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lâcher tour à tour et continuellement par un homme placé dans le haut de l'appartement. De cette manière il fait beaucoup de vent et rafraîchit l'air. Quelquefois on le traîne dans le vent de l'eau de rose, et alors il parfume l'air en même temps qu'il le rafraîchit."—Manuscrit de la Bibliothèque de l'Université de Leyde, quoted in Proceedings of the Society of the Friends of the Old Dutch, vol. 1, p. 312. See also Dutch, Sept. 1607, Archæologia, 187.

1166.—"He (Hos Roudun the Kātil) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of a linen fan: (1)

"Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free. Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path be closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey."—Quoted by Reza Khallikan, E.T. iii. 91.

"(3) The linen fan (Musallat al Khaich) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irak. See de Sicie's Hariri, p. 471."—Note by Macfie, in de Sicie, vol. p. 32.

c. 1360.—"One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansur (A.D. 753-774) was the Khaich of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Syrian Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."—Al-Fahri, ed. Al-Hakim, p. 17.

1596.—"And (they use) instruments like fans with fans, to rock the people in, and to make wind for cooling, which they call flabellæ."—Lateran Translations from the Arabic, ch. 6.

1650.—"And they use certain instruments like Wagons, with bellows, to cool the people in, and to gather winds to cool the people within, which they call flabellæ."—1650, Flabellæ Translations, by W. P., p. 16, (Hist. Soc. v. 32).

The French version is really a brief description of the punkah.

1610.—"Estant sur un divan, on se sert de certains instruments, qu'on appelle flabellæ, pour le rafraîchir, de vent qu'on leur fait souffler."—Ibid., 1610, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punkah:

1672.—" . . . furnished also with great Cellars with great Fans to stir the Air, for exposure in the fresh Air from 12 till 1 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of the Cellars begins to be hot and stifling."—Ibid., p. 70; (ed. C. 1670, 247).

1607.—"As a small concern more is another, the punkah which gently cools my eyes."—Lord Minto, Notes, 27.

1610.—"Were it not for the punkah (a large frame of wood covered with cloth which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would be scarcely possible to sit out the sultry months of summer of an Indian dinner."—Maria Ford, 13.

Williamson mentions that punkahs "were suspended in most dining halls."—Lord Minto, i. 281.

1823.—"Punkah, large frames of light wood covered with white cotton, and looking not unlike enormous fire-balls, hung from the ceilings of the principal apartments."—Notes, ed. 1844, i. 24.

1852.—
"Holy stones with reeds and slaps
(Our Christmas waits) prelude the day;
For holy and festoons of lay Swing for the punkah,—or perhaps
A wind all dangles in collapse.
Christ on a cross and a P. and O., for the Equator.

1875.—“The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead.”—Chesney, The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

Mr. Busted observes: “It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through the old records in the last century (18th), is there any mention of the punka, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use. . . . The swinging punka, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period. . . . This dates from an early year in the present century.”—Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115. He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction. [“Hanging punkahs are said by one authority to have originated in Calcutta by accident towards the close of the last (18th) century. It is reported that a clerk in a Government office suspended the leaf of a table, which was accidentally waved to and fro by a visitor. A breath of cool air followed the movement, and suggested the idea which was worked out and resulted in the present machine” (Carey, Good Old Days of John Company, i. 81). Mr. Douglas says that punkahs were little used by Europeans in Bombay till 1810. They were not in use at Nuncomar’s trial in Calcutta (1775), Bombay and W. India, ii. 253.]

PUNSAREE, s. A native drug-seller; Hind. pansāri. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says ‘it is certainly a foreign word,’ and assigns it to a corruption of dispensarium; which is much to be doubted. [The word is really derived from Skt. panyāsāla, ‘a market, warehouse’]

[1830.—“Beside this, I purchased from a pansaree some application for relieving the pain of a bruise.”—Frazer, The Persian Adventurer, iii. 23.]

PURDAH, s. Hind. from Pers. parda, ‘a curtain’; a portière; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion is termed parda-nishin, ‘one who sits behind a curtain.’ (See GOSHA.)

1809.—“On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 100.

1810.—“If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture . . . in order to feel the patient’s pulse.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 130.

[1813.—“My travelling palankeen formed my bed, its purdoo or chintz covering my curtains.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 109.]

1876.—“Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it.”—Life in the Mofussil, i. 113.

[1900.—“Charitable aid is needed for the purdah women.”—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 21.]

PURDESEE, s. Hind. paradeśi usually written pardesi, ‘one from a foreign country.’ In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepoy from N. India. [In the N.W.P. the name is applied to a wandering tribe of swindlers and coiners.]

PURWANNA, PERWAUNA, s. Hind. from Pers. parwāna, ‘an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a license or pass.’

1682.—“ . . . we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Pherwanna for the Duan of Decca to excuse us from it.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 34]

1693.—“ . . . Egmore and Pursewaukum were lately granted us by the Nabob’s purwannas.”—Wheeler, i. 281.

1769.—“Perwanna, under the Coochneek (or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulma Maleek, Nizam ul Muluck Bahadour, to Mr. John Spensor.”—In Cambridge’s Act. of the War, 230. (See also quotation under HOSBOLHOOKUM.)

1774.—“As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your parwanna to this purpose before the departure of the caravan.”—Bogle’s Diary, in Markham’s Tibet, p. 50. But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

PUTCHOCK, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalaya in the vicinity of Kashmir, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient of the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jostick. This root was recognised by the famous Garcia de Orta as the Costus of the ancients. The latter took their word from the Skt. kustha, by a modification of which name—kut—it is still known and used as a medicine in Upper India. De Orta speaks of the plant as growing about Mandu and Chitore, whence it was brought for sale to Ahmadabad; but his informants misled him. The true source was traced in situ by two other illustrious men, Royle and Falconer, to a plant belonging to the N. O. Compositae, Saussurea Lappé, Clarke, for which Dr. Falconer, not recognising the genus, had proposed the name of Aucklandia Costus verus, in honour of the then Governor-General. The Costus is a gregarious plant, occupying open, sloping sides of the mountains, at an elevation of 8000 to 9000 feet. See article by Falconer in Trans. Linn. Soc. xix. 23-31.

The trade-name is, according to Wilson, the Telugu pitch'chaku, 'green leaf,' but one does not see how this applies. (Is there, perhaps, some confusion with Patch? see PATCHOULI). De Orta speaks as if the word, which he writes puchio, were Malay. Though neither Crawford nor Favre gives the word, in this sense, it is in Marsden's earlier Malay Dict.: "Pichok, a plant, the aromatic leaves of which are an article of trade; said by some to be Costus indicus, and by others the Melissa, or Laurus." [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "Puchok is the Malay word for a young sprout, or the growing shoot of a plant. Puchok in the special sense here used is also a Malay word, but it may be separate from the other. Klinkert gives puchok as a sprout or shoot and also as a radish-like root (indigenous in China (sic), used in medicine for fumigation, &c.). Apparently it is always the root and not the leaves of the plant that are used, in which case Marsden may have confused the two senses of the word." In the year 1837-38 about 250 tons of this article, valued at £10,000, were exported from Calcutta alone. The annual import into China at a later date, according to Wells Williams, was 2,000 peculs or 120 tons (Middle Kingdom, ed. 1867, ii. 308). In 1866-66, the last year for which the details of such minor exports are found in print, the quantity exported from Calcutta was only 492½ cwt., or 24½ tons. In 1875 the value of the imports at Hankow and Chefoo was £6,421. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. ii. p. 482, Bombay Gazetteer, xi. 470.]

1516.—See Barbosa under CATECHU.

1520.—"We have prohibited (the export of) pepper to China . . . and now we prohibit the export of puchio and incense from these parts of India to China."—Capítulo de hum Regimento del Rey a Diogo Ayres, Feitor da China, in Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. v. 49.

1525.—"Puchio of Cambaya worth 35 tangas a maund."—Leitbranças, 80.

[1527.—Mr. Whitway notes that in a letter of Diogo Calvo to the King, dated Jan. 17, puchio is mentioned as one of the imports to China.—India Office MS. Corps Chronologico, vol. i.]

1551.—"The buar (see BAHAR) of puchio contains 20 faracolas (see FRAZALA), and an additional 4 of pieota (q.v.), in all 24 faracolas. . . ."—A. Nunes, 11.

1563.—"I say that costus in Arabic is called rost or cust, in Guzarate it is called uplot (upalta); and in Malay, for in that region there is a great trade and consumption thereof, it is called puchio. I tell you the name in Arabic, because it is called by the same name by the Latins and Greeks, and I tell it you in Guzerati, because that is the land to which it is chiefly carried from its birth-place; and I tell you the Malay name because the greatest quantity is consumed there, or taken thence to China."—Garcia, f. 72.

c. 1603.—". . . Opium, Acaia Fotula, Puchio, with many other sortes of Drugges."—Carmur Fraterlicæ, in Hall, i. 313.

1617.—"5 hampers pochok. . . ."—Cocks, Diary, i. 291.

1631.—"Cacternum Costus vulgato vocabulo inter mercatores Indos Puchio, Chincensibus Potsiock, vocatur . . . vidi ego integrum Picol, quod pondus centum et viginti in auctione decem realibus distribui."—Jur. Bontai, Hist. Nat., &c., lib. iv. p. 46.

1711.—In Malacca Price Current, July 1701: "Putchuck or Costus dulcis."—Lorkyer, 77.

1726.—"Patsjaak (a leaf of Asplen (Acheon?) that is pounded to powder, and used in incense). . . ."—Valentin, Choro, 31.

1727.—"The Wood Ligna dulcis grows only in this country (Sind). It is rather a Wood than a Root, and nothing of it is useful but the Root, called Putchock, or Radix dulcis. . . . There are great quantities exported from Surat, and from thence to China, where it generally bears a good Price. . . ."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127].

1808.—"Elles emploient ordinairement . . . une racine aromatique appelée piesch-tok, qu'on coupe par petits morceaux, et fait bouillir dans de l'huile de noix de coco. C'est avec cette huile que les danseuses se graissent . . ."—Haagjer, ii. 117.

1862.—"Kool is sent down country in large quantities, and is exported to China, where it is used as incense. It is in Calcutta known under the name of 'Patchuk.'"—Punjab Trade Report, cvii.

PUTLAM, n.p. A town in Ceylon on the coast of the bay or estuary of Calpentin; properly Puttalama; a Tamil name, said by Mr. Ferguson to be puthu- (putu alam), 'New Salt-pans.' Ten miles inland are the ruins of Tammiana Newera, the original Tamhapanni (or Taprobane), where Vyaya, the first Hindu immigrant, established his kingdom. And Putlam is supposed to be the place where he landed.

1298.—"The pearl-fishers . . . go post to a place called Bettelar, and (then) go 60 miles into the gulf."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1315.—"The natives went to their King and told him my reply. He sent for me, and I proceeded to his presence in the town of Battala, which was his capital, a pretty little place, surrounded by a timber wall and towers."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 160.

1672.—"Putelaon. . ."—Baldarus (Germ.), 373.

1726.—"Portaloon or Putelan."—Valen-tyn, Ceylon, 21.

PUTNEE, PUTNEY, &c.

a. Hind. and Beng. putni, or putni, from v. put-ni, 'to be agreed or closed' (i.e. a bargain). Goods commissioned or manufactured to order.

1755.—"A letter from Coimbatour mentions they had directed Mr. Warren Hastings to proceed to the Putney aurang (q.v.) in order to purchase putney on our Honble. Masters' account, and to make all necessary enquiries."—Fort William Consols, Nov. 10. In Long, 61.

b. A kind of sub-tenure existing in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the putni-dār, or occupant of which "holds of a Zemindar a portion of the Zemindari in perpetuity, with the right of hereditary succession, and of selling or letting the whole or part, so long as a stipulated amount of rent is paid to the Zemindar, who retains the power of sale for arrears, and is entitled to a regulated fee or fine upon transfer" (Wilson, q.v.). Probably both a and b are etymologically the same, and connected with putni (see POTTAR).

[1860.—"A perpetual lease of land held under a Zumeendar is called a putnee,—and the holder is called a putneedar, who not only pays an advanced rent to the Zumeendar, but a hand-omo price for the same."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 61.]

PUTTÂN, PATHÂN, n.p. Hind. Pathân. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtân and Pukhtân, pl. Pukhtāna, the name the Afghans gave to their own race, with which Dr. Trumpp [and Dr. Bellow (Races of Afghanistan, 25) agree. This again has been connected with the Pactyca of Herodotus (iii. 102, iv. 44).] The Afghans have for the name one of the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below (see quotation, c. 1611). The Mahomedans in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz. Pathāns; Mughals (see MOGUL), i.e. those of Turki origin; Shiikhs, claiming Arab descent; and Saiyyids, claiming also to be descendants of Mahomed.

1553.—"This State belonged to a people called Patane, who were lords of that hill-country. And as those who dwell on the skirts of the Pyrenees, on this side and on that, are masters of the passes by which we cross from Spain to France, or vice versa, so these Patane people are the masters of the two entrances to India, by which those who go thither from the landward must pass. . . ."—Barroa, IV. vi. 1.

1563.—" . . . This first King was a Patane of certain mountains that march with Bengala."—Garcia, Coll. i. 31.

1572.—

"Mas agora de nomes, et de usança, Novos, et varios são os habitantes,
Os Delys, os Patānes que em possança
Do terra, e gente são mais abundantes."
Cândido, vii. 20.

[By Aubertin :

"But now inhabitants of other name And customs now and various there are found,

The Delhis and Patans, who in the fame
Of land and people do the most abound."]

1610.—"A Pattan, a man of good stature."—Hackins, in Purchas, i. 220.

c. 1611.—" . . . the mightiest of the Afghan people was Kais. . . The Prophet gave Kais the name of Abd Ulrasheed . . . and . . . predicted that God would make his issue so numerous that they, with respect to the establishment of the Faith, would outvie all other people; the angel Gabriel having revealed to him that their attachment to the Faith would, in strength, be like the wood upon which they lay the keel when constructing a ship, which wood the seamen call Pathan . . . on this account he conferred upon Abd Ulrasheed the title of Pathan* also."—Hist. of the Afghans, E.T., by Dorn, i. 39.

[1638.—" . . . Ozmanchan a Puttanian . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 76.]

1648.—"In general the Moors are a haughty and arrogant and proud people, and among them the Pattans stand out superior to the others in dress and manners."—The Tactist, 53.

1660.—"Martin Affonso and the other Portuguese delivered them from the war that the Patanes were making on them."—Faria y Souza, Asia Portuguesa, i. 313.

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the Consanguinity they claim with Mahomet; as a Sind is a kin to that Imposture. . . . A Shick is a Cousin too, at a distance, into which Relation they admit all new made Proselytes. Meer is somewhat allied also. . . . The rest are adopted under the Name of the Province . . . as Mogul, the Race of the Tartars . . . Patani, Duccan."—Fryer, 93.

1691.—"En estas regiones ay una cuyas gentes se dizen los Patanes."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 21.

1726.—" . . . The Patans (Patanders) are very different in garb, and surpass in valour and stout-heartedness in war."—Valentyn, Choro, 108.

1757.—"The Colonel (Clive) complained bitterly of so many insults put upon him, and reminded the Subahdar how different his own conduct was, when called upon to assist him against the Pytaus."—Ives, 149.

1763.—"The northern nations of India, although idolaters . . . were easily induced to embrace Mahomedanism, and are at this day the Afghans or Pitans."—Orme, i. 24, ed. 1803.

1789.—"Moormen are, for the most part, soldiers by profession, particularly in the cavalry, as are also . . . Pitans."—Munro, Narr. 49.

1798.—" . . . Afghans, or as they are called in India, Patans."—G. Torder, Travels, ii. 47.

[PUTTEE, PUTTY, s. Hind. putti.

a. A piece or strip of cloth, bandage; especially used in the sense of a ligature round the lower part of the leg used in lieu of a gaiter, originally introduced from the Himalaya, and now commonly used by sportsmen and soldiers. A special kind of cloth appears in the old trade-lists under the name of puteahs (see PIECE GOODS).

* We do not know what word is intended, unless it be a special use of Ar. batan, 'the interior or middle of a thing.' Dorn refers to a note, which does not exist in his book. Belfer gives the title conferred by the Prophet as 'Phlān or Pāhān, a term which in the Syrian language signifies a rider.' Somebody else interprets it as 'a mast.

1875.—"Any one who may be bound for a long march will put on leggings of a peculiar sort, a bandage about 6 inches wide and four yards long, wound round from the ankle up to just below the knee, and then fastened by an equally long string, attached to the upper end, which is lightly wound many times round the calf of the leg. This, which is called patawa, is a much cherished piece of dress."—Dress, Jummoo, 175.

1900.—"The Puttee leggings are excellent for peace and war, on foot or on horseback."—Times, Dec. 21.

b. In the N.W.P. "an original share in a joint or coparcenary village or estate comprising many villages: it is sometimes defined as the smaller subdivision of a mahal or estate" (Wilson). Hence Putteedaree, putti-dāri used for a tenure of this kind.

1852.—"Their names were forthwith scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forthwith, in village and catchery parlance, lumberdars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of puttee Sherru Singh and puttee Baz Singh."—Rail, Notes on the N.W.P. 94.

c. In S. India, soldiers' pay.

1810.—" . . . hence in ordinary acceptation, the pay itself was called puttee, a Canarese word which properly signifies a written statement of any kind."—Willk, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 415.]

PUTTYWALLA, s. Hind. putti-wālā, putti-wālā (see PUTTEE), 'one with a belt.' This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an office, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chuprassy or peon (qq.v.), in Madras usually by the latter name.

1878.—"Here and there a belted Government servant, called a Puttiwālā, or Pattawālā, because distinguished by a belt. . . ."—Monier Williams, Modern India, 31.

PUTWA, s. Hind. putwā. The Hibiscus sabdariffa, L., from the succulent acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households. [It is also known as the Rozelle or Red Sorrel (Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 243). Riddell (Domest. Econ. 337) calls it "Oseille or Roselle jam and jelly."]

PYE, s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Pariah-dog (q.v.); a contraction, no doubt, of the former word.

[1892.—“We English call him a pariah, but this word, belonging to a low, yet by no means degraded class of people in Madras, is never heard on native lips as applied to a dog, any more than our other word ‘pie.’”—L. Kipling, Beast and Man, 286.]

PYJAMMAS, a. Hind. pi-jāma (see JAMMA), lit. ‘leg-clothing.’ A pair of loose drawers or trousers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g. by women of various classes, by Sikh men, and by most Mahomedans of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahomedans by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with Long Drawers, Shulwāurs, and Mogul-breeches. [For some distinctions between these various articles of dress see Forbes-Watson, (Textile Manufactures, 57).] It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrard (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital. “Ils ont force culons sans quoy ne couchent nains les Portugais des Indes” (ii. p. 11. [Hak. Soc. ii. 9]). The word is now used in London shops. A friend furnishes the following reminiscence: “The late Mr. B—, tailor in Jermyu Street, some 40 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjammās had feet sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: ‘I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants.’”

[1823.—“His chief joy smoking a cigar in loose Paseo-jams and native slippers.” Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 61.]
1881.—“The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pyjama suit.”—Hakel, Ceylon, 329.

PYKE, PAIK, a. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: “Pāik or Pāyik, corruptly Pyke, Hind. &c. (from S. padatikā), Pāik or Pāyik, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, an inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a courier, a village watchman: in Cuttack the Pāiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Zamiudārs or Rājās by the tenure of military service.” &c., quoting Bengal Regulations. [Platts also treats the two words as identical.] But it seems clear to us that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paik, ‘a foot-runner or courier.’ We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hammer Purgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Ain, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paik (with the fatha point).

c. 1590.—“The Jilawdar (see under JULIEDAR) and the Paik (a runner). Their monthly pay varies from 1200 to 1204. (dāms), according to their speed and manner of service. Some of them will run from 50 to 100 iroh (Goss) per day.”—Ain, L.T. by Blochmann, i. 138 (see orig. i. 141).

1673.—At the Court of Constantinople: “Les Peiks venoient ensuite, avec leurs bonnets d’argent dont ornés d’un petit plumage de héron, un arc et un carquois chargé de flèches.”—Journal d’A. Galland, i. 95.

1687.—“... the under officers and servants called Agham-Oghans, who are designed to the meaner uses of the Surglio ... most commonly the sons of Christians taken from their Parents at the age of 10 or 12 years ... These are: 1. Porters, 2. Boatmen or Gardimors ... 5. Paicks and Sekals ...” —Sir Paul Rycaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, 19.

1761.—“Ahmad Sultan then commissioned Shih Parand Khān ... the harkāras (see HURGARRA) and the Paiks, to go and procure information as to the state and strength of the Mahratta army.”—Muhammad Jāfar Shāmī, in Elliot, viii. 151-2.

1810.—“The express-riders (Zilbothen) accomplished 50 furangs a-day, so that an express catao in 4 days from Khorasān to Tobris (Tabriz). ... The Foot-runners carrying letters (Paik), whose name at least is maintained to this day at both the Persian and Ottoman Courts, accomplished 30 furangs a-day.”—Hammer Purgstall, Gesch. der Golden Horde, 243.

[1863.—“The Payeko is entrusted with the tehlīm (see CHILLUM) (pipe), which at court (Khwa) is made of gold or silver, and must be replenished with fresh water every time it is filled with tobacco.”—Tainbery, Sketches, 89.]

b. Hind paik and pāyik (also Mahr.) from Skt. padatila, and padika, ‘a foot-soldier,’ with the other specific application given by Wilson, exclusive of ‘courier.’ In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.

In the first quotation, which is from the Am, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source.

c. 1590.—“It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Bengal) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (paik), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a confederacy with these guards, who one night killed the King, Puteh Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuok Shah.”—Gladius's Tr., ed. 1800, ii. 19 (orig. i. 415; Jarrett (ii. 149) gives the word as Páylks).

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for ‘a seaman.’ Compare uses of Lascar.

c. 1615.—“(His fleet) consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call paikas, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topazes who were excellent muskatoers; 50 hired jatus (see GALLEVAT) of like sort and his own (Sebastian Gonçalves's) galliot (see GALLEVAT), which was about the size of a patcho, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the fore-castle, and 60 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topazes and Caffres (see CAFFER).”—Borcaro, Dracda, 452.

1722.—Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindáry of Rájsháhi appears:

“P. Paikan, or the pikers, guard of villages, everywhere necessary . . . 2,161 rupees.”—Fifth Report, App. p. 345.

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of Ld. Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792.—“All Pykes, Chokoydars (see CHOKIDAR), Passians, Durands, Nigabans, Harces (see HARRY), and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah (see DAROGA) . . .”—Regs. for the Police . . . passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 7.

“The army of Assam was a militia organized as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called gotes, the individuals comprising the gotes being termed pykes.”—Sakuntala's Act. of Wleh's Expedition to Assam, 1792-93-94 (commd. by Gen. Kenting).

* P. pishán and nigabán, both meaning literally ‘watch-keeper,’ the one from pish, ‘a watch,’ in the sense of a division of the day, the other from nigab, ‘watch,’ in the sense of ‘heed’ or ‘observation.’ (Dissau = Dowdill, a low caste often employed as watchmen.)

1802.—After a detail of persons of rank in Midsnapore:

“None of these entertain armed followers except perhaps ten or a dozen Peons for state, but some of them have Pykes in considerable numbers, to keep the peace on their estates. These Pykes are under the magistrate's orders.”—Fifth Report, App. p. 535.

1812.—“The whole of this last-mentioned numerous class of Pykes are understood to have been disbanded, in compliance with the new Police regulations.”—Fifth Report, 71.

1872.—“... Dutais or officers of the peasant militia (Paiks). The Paiks were settled chiefly around the fort on easy tenures.”—Hunter's Orissa, ii. 239.

PYSE! interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotations. Notwithstanding the writer's remark (below) it is really Hindustani, viz. po's, ‘look out!’ or ‘make way!’ apparently from Skt. práya, ‘look! see!’ (see Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. p. 529, col. c; Fallon's Hind. Dict., p. 376, col. a; Platts, 282b).

[1815.—“... three men came running up behind them, as if they were clearing the road for some one, by calling out ‘pice! pice!’ (make way, make way) . . .”—Elphinstone's Report on Murders of Gungadhar Shastri, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, p. 14.]

1833.—“Does your correspondent Col. Prideaux know the origin of the warning called out by buggy drivers to pedestrians in Bombay, ‘Pyse!’ It is not Hindustani.”—Letter in N. & Q., Ser. VI. viii. p. 388.

[Other expressions of the same kind are Malayál. po, ‘Get out of the way!’ and Hind. Mahr. khis, khis, from khisná, ‘to drop off.’]

1598.—“As these hayres goe in the stroetes, they crie po, po, which is to say, take heed.”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 280.

1826.—“I was awoken from disturbed rest by cries of kis! kis! (clear the way).”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 46.]

Q

[QUAMOCUIT, s. The Ipomaea quamoclitis, the name given by Linnaeus to the Red Jasmine. The word is a corruption of Skt. Kāma-latā, ‘the creeper of Kāma, god of love.’

1834.—“This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalāta ‘Love's Creeper.’ Some have flowers of snowy hue, with a delicate fragrance. . . .—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 310-11.]

QUEDDA, n.p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to 'Crawford' is Malay Kedah, 'an elephant-trap' (see KEDDAH). [Mr Skeat writes: "I do not know what Crawford's authority may be, but Kedah does not appear in Klinkert's Dict. . . . In any case the form taken by the name of the country is Kilah. The coralling of elephants is probably a Siamese custom, the method adopted on the E coast, where the Malays are left to themselves, being to place a decoy female elephant near a powerful nose."] It has been supposed sometimes that Kadāh is the Kāra or Kāra of Ptolemy's sea-route to China, and likewise the Kalah of the early Arab voyagers, as in the Fourth Voyage of Sindbad the Seaman (see Procès. R. Geog. Soc. 1882, p. 655; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 396). It is possible that these old names however represent Kirala, 'a river mouth,' a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Qudda is called by the Malays Kirala Bétrang.

1516.—"Having left this town of Tanassary, further along the coast toward Malacca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Aniam, which is called Queda, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise."—Barboza, 188-189.

1553.—". . . The settlements from Tavay to Malacca are these: Tanassary, a notable city, Lungur, Torrio, Queda, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pedão, Perá, Solungor, and our City of Malacca. . . ."—Barros, l. ix. 1.

1572.—
"Olha Tavai cidade, onde começa
De São largo o império tão comprido:
Tanassarí, Quedá, que ho se cabeça Das quo pimenta ali tem produzido."
Camões, x. 123.

By Burton:

"Behold Tavai City, whence begin Siam's dominions, Reign of vast extent;
Tanassarí, Queda of towns the Queen
That bear the burthen of the hot piment."

1598.—". . . to the town and Kingdom of Queda . . . which lyeth under 6 degrees and a half; this is also a Kingdom like Tanassarí, it hath also some wine, as Tanassarí hath, and some small quantity of Pepper."—Linschoten, p. 31; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

1611.—"And so . . . Diogo de Mendonça . . . sending the gallies (see GALLEVAT) on before, embarked in the julá (see GALLEVAT) of João Rodriguez de Paiva, and coming to Queda, and making an attack at daybreak, and finding them unprepared, he burnt the town, and carried off a quantity of provisions and some tin" (obtain, see GALAY).—Novarra, Decada, 187.

1838.—"Leaving Penang in September, we first proceeded to the town of Quedah lying at the mouth of a river of the same name."—Quedah, &c., by Capt. Sherard Osburne, ed. 1835.

QUEMOY, n.p. An island at the east opening of the Harbour of Amoy. It is a corruption of Kin-mán, in 'hang-chau dialect Kin-mu', meaning 'Golden-door.'

QUI-HI, s. The popular distinctive nickname of the Bengal Anglo-Indian, from the usual manner of calling servants in that Presidency, viz. 'Koi hai?' 'Is any one there?' The Anglo-Indian of Madras was known as a Mull, and he of Bombay as a Duck (qq.v.)

1816.—"The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Hi in Hindostan, a Hindustani Poem; with illustrations by Rowlandson."

1825.—"Most of the household servants are Parcees, the greater part of whom speak English. . . . In stead of 'Kee hue,' Who's there! the way of calling a servant is 'boy,' a corruption, I believe, of 'Ha,' brother"—Hecar, ed. 1811, ii. 35. (But see under BOY.)

c. 1830.—"J'ai vu dans vos gazettes de Calcutta les elémens des quolhaes (sobriquet des Européens Bengalis de ce côté) sur la chaleur."—Jequeumont, Corresp. ii. 305.

QUILOA, n.p. i.e. Kilwa, in lat. 9° 0' S., next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the ne plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Capt. Boydell was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilwa does not occur in the Geographies of Edrisi or Abulfeda, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Roteiro, and in Barros's account of Da Gama's voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quiloa, and says it was founded about A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadoxo and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

1220.—"Kilwa, a place in the country of Zenj, a city."—Yâkût, (orig.), iv. 502.

c. 1330.—"I embarked at the town of Maklashan (Magadoxo), making for the country of the Sawāhīl, and the town of Kulwā, in the country of the Zanj. . . .”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. [See under SOBALA.]

1498.—“Here we learned that the island of which they told us in Mocombiquy as being peopled by Christians is an island at which dwells the King of Mocombiquy himself, and that the half is of Moors, and the half of Christians, and in this island is much seed-pearl, and the name of the island is Quyluea. . . .”—Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 48.

1501.—“Quilloa ò citadão in Arabia in rna insuletta giunta a terra firma, ben popolata de homini negri et mercadanti: edificata al modo nro: Quiui hanno abundancia di nuro: argento: anbra: muschio: et perle: ragionevolmente vestono panni de serm: et bambaxi fini — Letter of K. Emanuel, 2.

1506.—“Del 1502 . . . mandò al viaggio nave 21, Capitano Don Vasco da Gamba, cho fu quello che discoperto l'India . . . e nell' andar de li, del Cao de Bona Speranza, zone in uno loco chiamato Ochilia; in qual terra e dentro uno rio. . . .”—Leonardo Cu' Massey, 17.

1553.—“The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quilon, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To wreak this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gama, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quilloa, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thither.”—Barros, i. iv. 5.

“Esta ilha pequena, que habitamos,
Ho om toda esta terra corta escala
De todos os que as ondas navegamos De Quilloa, do Mombaça, e do Sofala.”
Cambes, i. 51.

By Burton:

“This little island, where we now abide, of all this seaboard is the one sure place for every merchantman that stems the tide from Quilloa, or Sofala, or Mombas. . . .”

QUILON, n.p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore; once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kaulam. The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as ‘Palace’ or ‘royal residence,’ from Kolu, ‘the royal Presence,’ or Hall of Audience. [Mr. Logan says: “Kollam is only an abbreviated form of Koyilagam or Kovilagam, ‘King’s house’” (Malabar, i. 231, note).] For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Malé of Cosmas in the 6th century (see MALABAR), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reynaud. The ‘Kollam era’ in general use in Malabar dates from A.D. 824; but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syriac extract (which is, however, modern) in Latinf’s Anecdota Syriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac, p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in A.D. 823, and got leave from King Shakirbirti to build a church and city at Kaulam. It would seem that there is some connection between the date assigned to this event, and the ‘Kollam era’; but what it is we cannot say. Shakirbirti is evidently a form of Chakraratti Raja (see under CHUCKER-BUTTY). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop. (in 1891) 23,380; there is little trade. It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the Middle Ages the name occurs in the form Columbum, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniya in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordanus of Severac, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or obtained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de’ Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Columbum is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Antiq. ii. 360) which shows that the city was called Kolambā, [other forms being Kelambapattana, or Kālamapattana (Bombay Gazetteer, vol. i. pt. i. 183)]. The form Palumbum also occurs in most of the MSS. of Friar Odoric’s Journey; this is the more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of columba and palumbes. A passage in a letter from the Nestorian Patriarch Yeshu'yah (c. 650-60) quoted in Assemani (iii. pl. 1. 131), appears at that date to mention Colom. But this is an arbitrary and erroneous rendering in Assemani's Latin. The Syriac has Kalah, and probably therefore refers to the port of the Malay regions noticed under CALAY and QUEDDA.

851.—"De ce lieu (Mascate) les navires mettent la voile pour l'Inde, et se dirigent vers Koulam-Malay, la distance entre Mascate et Koulam-Malay est d'un mois de marche, avec un vent modéré."—Relation, &c., tr by Renard, l. 15.

1166—"Seven days from thence is Chulam on the confines of the country of the sun-worshippers, who are descendants of Kush and are all black. This nation is very trustworthy in matters of trade. . . . Pepper grows in this country. . . . Cinnamon, ginger, and many other kinds of spices also grow in this country."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Palestine, 114-115.

c. 1280-90.—"Royaumes de Ma-pa-rh. Parmi tous les royaumes étrangers d'au-delà des mers, il n'y eut que Ma-pa-rh et Kiu-lan (Mabar and Quilon) sur lesquels on ait pu parvenir à établir une certaine sujétion; mais surtout Kiu-lan. . . . (Année 1252). Cette année. . . . Kiu-lan a envoyé un ambassadeur à la cour (mongole) pour présenter en tribut des marchandises précieuses et un singe noir."—Chinese Annals, quoted by Panther, Murc Pol, ii. 603, 643.

1298.—"When you quit Maabar and go 500 miles towards the S.W. you come to the Kingdom of Coilum. The people are idolaters, but there are also some Christians and some Jews," &c.—Marco Polo, Bk. in. ch. 22.

c. 1300—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan and Tina; beyond them the country of Malabar, which from the boundary of Karoha to Kulam, is 300 parasangs in length. . . . The people are all Samāns, and worship idols. . . ."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1310—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulam to Nilluar (Nellore) nearly 300 parasangs along the sea-coast. . . ."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1322—" . . . as I went by the sea . . . towards a certain city called Polumbum (where groweth the pepper in great store). . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, p. 71.

c. 1322—"Poi venni a Colombio, ch' è la migliore terra d'India per mercatanti. Quivi è il gengiovo in grande copia e del buono del mondo. Quivi vanno tutti ignudi salvo che portano un panno innanzi alla vergogna. . . . e legalosi di dietro."—Palatine M.S. of Odoric, in Cathay, App., p. xlvii.

c. 1323—"In India, whilst I was at Columbum, were found two cats having wings like the wings of bats. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, p. 29.

1330.—"Joannes, &c., nobili viro domino Nascarenorum et universis sub eo Christianis Nascarenis de Columbo gratiam in praesenti, quae ducat ad gloriam in futuro . . . quatenus venerabilem Fratrem nostrum Jordanum Catalani episcopum Columbensem . . . quem nuper ad episcopalis dignitatis apicem auctoritate apostolica duximus promovendum. . . ."—Letter of Pope John X. XII to the Christians of Coilon, in Odorici Raynaldi Ann. Eccles. v. 495.

c. 1343—"The 10th day (from Calicut) we arrived at the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malabar. Its markets are splendid, and its merchants are known under the name of Silti (see CHOOLIA). They are rich; one of them will buy a ship with all its fittings and load it with goods from his own store."—Jon Batuta, iv. 10.

c. 1318.—"And sailing on the feast of St. Stephen, we navigated the Indian Sea until Palm Sunday, and then arrived at a very noble city of India called Columbum, where the whole world's pepper is produced. . . . There is a church of St. George there, of the Latin communion, at which I dwelt. And I adorned it with fine paintings, and taught there the holy Law."—John Mari gnolli, in Cathay, &c., pp. 342-344.

c. 1430.—" . . . Coloem, civitatem nobilem venit, cujus ambitus duodecim millia passuum amplectitur. Gingibor qui colobi (colombi) dicitur, piper, verzinum, cannellae quae crassae appellantur, haec in provincia, quam vocant Melibarum, leguntur."—Conti, in Poggini de Var. Fortune.

c. 1468-9.—"In the year Bhavalī (844) of the Kolamba era, King Adityavarman the ruler of Vānci . . . who has attained the sovereignty of Chorabaya Maudalam, hung up the bell. . . ."—Inscr. in Tinnervilly, see Ind. Antiq. ii. 360.

1510.—" . . . we departed . . . and went to another city called Colom. . . . The King of this city is a Pagan, and extremely powerful, and he has 20,000 horsemen, and many archers. This country has a good port near to the sea-coast. No grain grows here, but fruits as at Calicut, and pepper in great quantities."—Varthema, 182-3.

1516.—"Further on along the same coast towards the south is a great city and good sea-port which is named Coilum, in which dwell many Moors and Gentiles and Christians. They are great merchants and very rich, and own many ships with which they trade to Cholmendo, the Island of Ceylon, Bengal, Malaca, Samatara, and Pegu. . . . There is also in this city much pepper."—Barboza, 157-8.

1572.—"A hum Cochim, e a outro Cananor. A qual Chalé, a qual a ilha da Pimenta. A qual Coulao, a qual da Cranganor, E os mais, a quem o mais serve, e contenta. . . ."—Cunha, vii. 35.

By Burton :

"To this Cochim, to that falls Cannanor, one hath Chalc, another th' Isle Piment, a third Coulan, a fourth takes Cranganor, the rest is theirs with whom he rests content."

1726.—"... Coylang."—Valrutijn, Choru, 115.

1727.—"Coiloon is another small principality. It has the Benefit of a River, which is the southmost Outlet of the Couchin Islands; and the Dutch have a small Fort, within a Mile of it on the Sea-shore. . . . It keeps a Garrison of 30 Men, and its trade is inconsiderable."—A. Hamilton, i. 333 [ed.
1714].

QUIRPELE, s. This Tamil name of the mungoose (q.v.) occurs in the quotation which follows: properly Ktrippillai, ['little squeaker'].

1601.—"... bestiola quaedam Quil sive Quirpele vocata, quae aspectu primo vi-verme. . . ."—De Bry, iv. 83.

R

RADAREE, s. P.—H. rāh-dārī, from rāh-dār, 'road-keeper.' A transit duty; sometimes 'black-mail.' [Rāh- dārī is very commonly employed in the sense of sending prisoners, &c., by escort from one police post to another, as along the Grand Trunk road].

1620.—"Fra Nicolo Ruigiola Francescano genovese, il quale, passeggero, che d'India andava in Italia, partito alcuni giorni prima da Ispahan . . . poco di qua lontano era stato trattenuto dai rahdari, o custodi delle strade. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 99.

1622.—"At the garden Pelengon we found a rahdar or guardian of the road, who was also the chief over certain other rahdari, who are usually posted in another place 2 leagues further on."—Ibid. ii. 285.

1623.—"For Rahdars, the Khan has given them a firman to free them, also firmans for a house. . . ."—Sainsbury, iii.
p. 163.

[1667.—"... that the goods . . . may not be stopped . . . on pretence of taking Rhadaryes, or other duties. . . ."—Phir- man of Shar Orung Zeb, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 213.]

1673.—"This great officer, or Farmer of the Emperor's Custom (the Shawbunder [see SEABUNDER]), is obliged on the Roads to provide for the safe travelling for Merchants by a constant Watch . . . for which Rhadorage, or high Imposts, are allowed by the Merchants, both at Landing and in their passage inland."—Fryer, 222.

1685.—"Here we were forced to compound with the Rattaree men, for ye Dutys on our goods."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 15; [Ilak. Soc. i. 213. In i. 100, Rawdarrie].

c. 1731.—"Nizamu-l Mulk . . . thus got rid of . . . the rāhdārī from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen upon travellers and traders."—Khāfi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 531.

[1744.—"Passing the river Kizilazan we ascended the mountains by the Rahdar (a Persian toll) of Noglabar. . . ."—Hanway,
i. 226.]

RAGGY, s. Rāgi (the word seems to be Dec. Hindustani, [and is derived from Skt. rāga, 'red,' on account of the colour of the grain]. A kind of grain, Eleusine Coracana, Gaertn.; Cynosurus Coracanus, Linn.; largely cultivated, as a staple of food, in Southern India.

1792.—"The season for sowing raggy, rice, and bajora from the end of June to the end of August."—Life of T. Munro, iii. 92.

1793.—"The Mahratta supplies consisting chiefly of Raggy, a coarse grain, which grows in more abundance than any other in the Mysore Country, it became necessary to serve it out to the troops, giving rice only to the sick."—Dumont, 10.

[1800.—"The Doconny Mussulmans call it Ragy. In the Tamil language it is called Keur (lēzhvaragu)."—Buchanan, Mysore, i.
100.]

RAINS, THE, s. The common Anglo-Indian colloquial for the Indian rainy season. The same idiom, as churas, had been already in use by the Portuguese. (See WINTER).

c. 1666.—"Lastly, I have imagined that if in Delhi, for example, the Rains come from the East, it may yet be that the Seas which are Southerly to it are the origin of them, but that they are forced by reason of some Mountains . . . to turn aside and discharge themselves another way. . . ."—Bernier, E.T., 138; [ed. Constable, 139].

1707.—"We are heartily sorry that the Rains have been so very unhealthy with you."—Letter in Orme's Fragments.

1750.—"The Rains . . . setting in with great violence, overflowed the whole country."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, i. 153.

1868.—"The place is pretty, and although it is 'the Rains,' there is scarcely any day when we cannot get out."—Dr. Milman, in Memoir, p. 67.

[RAIS, s. Ar. ra'is, from ra's, 'the head,' in Ar. meaning 'the captain, or master, not the owner of a ship;'] in India it generally means 'a native gentleman of respectable position.'

1610.—" . . . Reyeses of all our Nauyes." —Birdwood, First Letter Book, 435.

1785.—" . . . their chief (more worthless in truth than a horsekeeper)." In note—"In the original the word syse is introduced for the sake of a jingle with the word Ryae (a chief or leader)." —Tippoo's Letters, 18.

1870.—"Raees." See under RYOT.

1900.—"The petition was signed by representative landlords, raises." —Pioneer Mail, April 13]

RAJA, RAJAH, s. Skt. rajā, 'king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemundars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahommedan predecessors, on Hindus, as Nawāb is upon Moslem. Rāj, Rāo, Rānā, Rāval, Rāya (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindu civilisation to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Rājā cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Rachias be an exception. In early Mahommedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Rād and Rāi, are those which we find. (Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right.) Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

e. 1338.—" . . . Bahā-uddīn fled to one of the heathen Kings called the Rāi Kan-bīlah. The word Rāi among those people, just as among the people of Rūm, signifies 'King.'" —Ibn Batuta, iii. 318. The traveller here refers, as appears by another passage, to the Spanish Rey.

[1609.—"Raiaw." See under GOONT.]

1612.—"In all this part of the East there are 4 castes. . . . The first caste is that of the Rayas, and this is a most noble race from which spring all the Kings of Canara. . . ." —Couto, V. vi. 4.

[1615.—"According to your direction I have sent per Orineay (see ORANKAY) Beego Roger's junk six peccolles (see PEGUL) of lead." —Foster, Letters, iv. 107.

[1623.—"A Ragin, that is an Indian Prince." —P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 84.]

1633.—"I went a hunting with yo Rages, who was attended with 2 or 300 men, armed with bows and arrows, swords and targets." —Hedges, Diary, March 1; [Hak. Soc. i. 66].

1786.—Tippoo with gross impropriety addresses Louis XVI. as "the Rajah of the French." —Select Letters, 369.

RAJAMUNDREY, n.p. A town, formerly head-place of a district, on the lower Godavery R. The name is in Telegu Rājamahendravaramu, 'King-chief(s)-Town,' [and takes its name from Mahendradeva of the Orissa dynasty; see Morris, Godavery Man. 23].

RAJPOOT, s. Hind. Rājput, from Skt. Rājaputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a honorific assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great mediæval bard of the Rājputs, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihār, Pramār, Solankhī, and Chauhān) who sprang into existence from the sacred Agni-kunda or Firepit on the summit of Mount Abū. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 99 clans. The Rājputs thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmans do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is factitious. "The Rajpoots," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both unclean in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate-castes" (Rās-mālā, reprint 1876, p. 537). An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repast of the flesh of the wild boar killed in the chase (see Terry's representation of this below), is a Rājput characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers. In Lord Canning's time the young Rājput Rāja of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, inasmuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open darbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profligate Mahomedans, who had so influenced his conduct that among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, 'Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!' It seemed the ne plus ultra of Rājput degradation! The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashboot, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi 'Alī shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them Reys Butos, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516.—"There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Razbutes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentle, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country."—Barboza, 40.

1533.—"Inasmuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladin placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fight; and Saladin ordered them to be set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whereupon all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Razbutes fought in such a way that they drove the Gaznat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished."—Correa, iii. 527.

"And with the stipulation that the 200 pardaos, which are paid as allowance to the lucarcins of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Baçaim and the Reys buutos, shall be paid out of the revenues of Baçaim as they have been paid hitherto."—Treaty of Nuno da Cunha with the K. of Cambay, in Subsidior, 137.

c. 1551.—"But if the caravan is attacked, and the Bats (see BHAT) kill themselves, the Rashbuts, according to the law of the Bats, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death."—Sidi 'Alī Kapudan, in J. As., Ser. I., tom. ix. 95.

[1602.—"Rachebidas."—Conto, Dec. viii. ch. 15.]

c. 1611.—"The next day they embarked, leaving in the city, what of those killed in fight and those killed by fire, more than 500 persons, the most of them being Regibutos, Moors of great valour; and of ours fell eighteen. . . ."—Novarro, Decada, 210.

[1614.—". . . in great danger of thieves called Rashbouts. . . ."—Forster, Letters, ii. 260.]

1616.—". . . it were fitter he were in the Company of his brother . . . and his estate more regarded, then in the hands of a Rashboote Gentle. . . ."—Sir T. Roe, i. 553-4; [Hist. Soc. ii. 232].

"The Rashbootes unto Swines—flesh most hateful to the Mahometans."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1633.—"These Rashbootes are a sort of Highway men, or Tories."—Mandelslo, Eng. by Davies, 1669, p. 19.

1618.—"The Rezbouts (Rezbouten) are held for the best soldiers of Guzaratta."—Van Nieut, 35.

[c. 1660.—"The word Ragipous signifies Sons of Rajas."—Bernier, ed. Comte, 39.]

1673.—"Next in esteem were the Rashwars, Rashpoots, or Souldiers."—Fryer, 27.

1699.—"The place where they went ashore was at a Town of the Moors, which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the Great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolaters Gentous or Rashbouts."—Dampier, i. 507.

1791.—". . . Quatre cheyaves ou reis-poutes montés sur des chevaux persans, pour l'escorter."—B. de St. Pierre, Chauvière Indienne.

RAMASAMMY, s. This corruption of Ramaswami ('Lord Rāma'), a common Hindū proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a). As a generic name for Hindūs, like 'Tommy Atkins' for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, &c.

1890.—“... if you want a clerk to do your work or a servant to attend on you, ... you would take on a saponaceous Bengali Baboo, or a servile abject Madras Ramasammy. ... A Madras, even if wrongly abused, would simply call you his father, and his mother, and his aunt, defender of the poor, and epitome of wisdom, and would take his change out of you in the bazaar account.”—Cornhill Mag., Nov., pp. 582-3.

RAMBOTANG, s. Malay, rambūtān (Filet, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin luscious pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambūt, ‘hair.’

1613.—“And other native fruits, such as lathoes (perhaps bichang, the Mangifera foetida) rambotans, viribos, bombacous, and pomegranates, and innumerable others. ...”—Gleanings of Europe, 16.

1725.—“... the rambootan-trees (the fruit of which the Portuguese call fruta dos caffares or Caffer's fruit).”—Valentyn (v.) Sumatra, 3

1727.—“The Rambostan is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tough Skin, beset with Capillaments, within the Skin is a very savoury Pulp.”—J. Harriott, ii. 81; [ed. 1711, u. 60].

1783.—“Mangustines, rambustines, &c.”—Forrest, Mysore, 10.

[1812.—“... mangutan, rambudan, and doran. ...”—Horne, Travels, 111.]

RAMDAM, s. Hind. from Ar. ramadān (ramadhān). The ninth Mohammedan lunar month, viz. the month of the Fast.

1615.—“... at this time, being the preparation to the Ramdam or Lent.”—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. i. 21; also 63, 72, ii. 274].

1623.—“The 29th June: I think that (to-day) the Moors have commenced their ramadhan, according to the rule by which I calculate.”—P. della Valle, ii. 607; [Hak. Soc. i. 179]

1696.—“They are not ... very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, except it be Ramdam time as we call it. ... In this time they fast all Day. ...”—Dampier, i. 313.

* L'arbre gives (Diet Malin-François): “Duku” (bura is fruit). “Nom d'un fruit de la grosseur d'un œuf de poule; il parait être une grosse espèce de Laurus.” (It is L. danielliana.) The Rambet is figured by Mar-deu in Atlas to Hist. of Sumatra, 3rd ed. pl. vi. and pl. ix. It seems to be Dacarcara dulcis, MILL (Picardilla dulcis, Jack).

RAMOOSY, n.p. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr. Rdmash, [said to be from Mahr. ramud-i, ‘jungle-dweller’]; originally one of the thieving castes. Hence they came to be employed as hereditary watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokidars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapur. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telegu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang. [See an early account of the tribe in: “An Account of the Origin and Present condition of the tribe of Ramoosies, including the Life of the Chief Oomlah Naik, by Capt. Alexander Mackintosh of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, Madras Army,” Bombay 1833.]

[1817.—“His Highness must long have been aware of Ramoosies near the Mahadeo pagoda.”—Elphinstone's Letter to Patta, in Papers relating to E. I. Affairs, 23.]

1833.—“There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendancy over the village Patells (Patel) and Koolturnies (Coolurnees), but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly ... and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities.”—Mackintosh, Acc. of the Tribes of Ramoosies, p. 10.

1853.—“Till a late hour in the morning he (the chameleon) sleeps sounder than a ramoosy or a chonkeydar; nothing will wake him.”—Tribes on My Frontier.

RAM-RAM! The commonest salutation between two Hindus meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.

[1652.—“... then they approach the idol waving them (their hands) and repeating many times (the words) Ram, Ram, i.e. God, God.”—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 253.]

1673.—“Those whose Zeal transports them no further than to die at home, are immediately Washed by the next of Kin, and bound up in a Sheet; and as many as go with him carry them by turns on a Colst-staff; and the rest run almost naked and shaved, crying after him Ram, Ram.”—Fryer, 101.

1726.—"The wives of Braminey (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps a pinang, (q.v.), which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends who stand by, and after taking leave of them, go and lie over the corpse, calling out only Ram, Ram."—Valentijn, v. 51.

[1828.—See under SUTTEE.]

c. 1885.—Sir G. Birdwood writes: "In 1869-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very doleful, dull, and miserable to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxed it in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I bestowed me of its being a Mahatta popul, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Mahatti to it; when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against the bars, and laid its head against my knuckles. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager hurry to salute me as I drew near to it."

RANEE, s. A Hindu queen; rānī, fem. of rājā, from Skt. rājñī (= regina).

1673.—"Bednūr (Bednūr) . . . is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranna, the Relict of Sham Shuker Nāg."—Fryer, 162.

1809.—"The young Rannie may marry whomsoever she pleases."—Lord Valentia, i. 361.

1870.—"There were once a Raja and a Rānē who had an only daughter."—Miss Stiles, Indian Fairy Tales, 1.

RANGOON, n.p. Burm. Ran-gun, said to mean 'War-end'; the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alompra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional resonance to Da-gun, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies." Occupied by the British forces in May 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176 (1881); [in 1891, 180,324].

RANJOW, s. A Malay term, ran-jau. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 276. [The same thing on the Assam frontier is called a poze (Levin, Wild Races, 308), or panji (Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 233).]

RASEED, s. Hind. rasīd. A native corruption of the English 'receipt,' shaped, probably, by the Pers. rasīda, 'arrived'; viz. an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand.'

1877.—"There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasid' (receipt), and 'Apil' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 282.

EAT-BIRD, s. The striated bu-bblier (Chattachoen caudata, Dumeril); see Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 3.

RATTAN, s. The long stem of various species of Asiatic climbing palms, belonging to the genus Calamus and its allies, of which canes are made (not 'bamboo-canes,' improperly so called), and which, when split, are used to form the seats of cane-bottomed chairs and the like. From Malay rotan, [which Crawford derives from rauat, 'to pare or trim'], applied to various species of Calamus and Dacmonorops (see Filet, No. 696 et seq.). Some of these attain a height of several hundred feet, and are used in the Himalaya and the Kasia Hills for making suspension bridges, &c., rivaling rope in strength.

1511.—"The Governor set out from Malacca in the beginning of December, of this year, and sailed along the coast of Pedir. . . . He met with such a contrary gale that he was obliged to anchor, which he did with a great anchor, and a cable of rotas, which are slender but tough canes, which they twist and make into strong cables."—Corra, London, ii. 269.

1563.—"They took thick ropes of rotas (which are made of certain twigs which are very flexible) and cut them round the feet, and others round the trucks."—Garcia, f. 90.

1598.—"There is another sorte of the same reedes which they call Rota: these are thinn like twigges of Willow for baskets. . . ."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 97].

c. 1610.—"Il y a une autre sorte de canno qui ne vient jamais plus grosse que lo petit doigt . . . et il ploye comme osier. Ils l'appellent Rotan. Ils en font des cables de navire, et quantité de sortes de pauciers gentiment entre lances."—Pyard de Laet, i. 237; [Hak. Soc. i. 331, and see i. 207].

1673.—“... The Materials Wood and Plaster, beautified without with folding windows, made of Wood and latticed with Battans. . . .”—Fryer, 27.

1844.—“In the deep valleys of the south the vegetation is most abundant and various. Amongst the most conspicuous species are . . . the rattan winding from trunk to trunk and shooting his pointed head above all his neighbours.”—Notes on the Kasia Hills and People, in J.A.S.B. vol. xiii. pt. ii. 61b.

RAVINE-DEER. The sportsman's name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella Bennettii, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 526 seq.]).

RAZZIA, s. Thus is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Ar. ghaziya, ‘an attack upon infidels,’ from ghazi, ‘a hero.’

REAPER, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind. Dictionary; but in the Mahratti Dict. we find rip in this sense.

[1731-5.—See under BANKSHALL.]

REAS, REES, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay, the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Port. real, pl. reis. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and reas, down at least to November 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673.—(In Goa) “The Intern . . . 15 Baerooks (see BUDGROOK), whereof 75 make a Tungo (see TANGA), and 60 Rees make a Tungo.”—Fryer, 207.

1727.—“Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Rayes and Rupes. 1 Rupe is . . . 400 Rayes.”—A. Hamilton, ii. App. 6; [ed. 1744, ii. 316].

RED CLIFFS, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mt. Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the Ῥυφφὸς ὄρος of the Periplus.

c. 80-90.—“Another village, Bakarū, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nel-kynda. . . . From Bakarū extends the Red-Hill (Ῥυφφὸς ὄρος) and then a long stretch of country called Paralia.”—Periplus, §§ 65-68.

1727.—“I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the Northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking.”—A. Hamilton, i. 332; [ed. 1741, i. 334].

1813.—“Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped.”—Milburn, Or. Comm. i. 335. See also Dunn's New Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 161.

1814.—“From thence (Quilone) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Boccoli (qu. Bakaph as above); where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring.”—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 331; [2nd ed. i. 213].

1841.—“There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships' boats to land.”—Horsburgh's Direc. ed. 1811, i. 516.

RED-DOG, s. An old name for Prickly-heat (q.v.).

c. 1752.—“The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest.”—Oberlin's Voyage, i. 190.

REGULATION, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G.-G. and Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company's settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of “Regulations of the Govt. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853,” begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XL. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1793, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1858.—“The new Commissioner . . . could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations! How was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with!”—Id. Col. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 376.

1880.—“The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, or to modify the ‘Laws and customs’ by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed.”—Saty. Rev., March 13, p. 323.

REGULATION PROVINCES.

See this explained under NON-REGULATION.

REGUR, s. Dakh. Hind. regar, also legur. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India ‘black cotton soil.’ The word may possibly be connected with H.—P. reg, ‘sand’; but regada and regadi is given by Wilson as Telugu. [Platt. connects it with Skt. rikha, ‘a furrow.’] This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Rajmahal Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madras, Salem, Tanjore, Ramnad, and Tinnevely. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Saugor, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and composes the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat. It is also found in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: “Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but . . . the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and . . . some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation.”—Op. cit. i. 431.

REH, s. [Hind. reh, Skt. roj, ‘to shine, shake, quiver.’] A saline efflorescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst reh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet. [Plains infested with these salts are very commonly known in N. India as Uour Plains (Hind. ūsar, Skt. ūshara, ‘impregnated with salt.’)] The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the trackless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the sub-soil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of the detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, as are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren. The canal-irrigation of the Upper Provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the sub-soil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out. [See a full account in Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. i. 400 seqq.]

REINOL, s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to ‘Johnny New-comes' or Griffins (q.v.). It is from reino, 'the Kingdom' (viz. of Portugal). The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598.—". . . they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newly come from Portingall, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portingales use there in India."—Leuchoten, ch. xxxi. : [Hak. Soc. i. 205].

c. 1610.—". . . quand ces soldats Portugais arrivent de nouveau aux Indes portant avec leurs habits du pays, ceux qui sont là de long t^{em}s quand les voyent par les rues les appellent Renol, chargés de poux, et mille autres injures et moqueries."—Moquey, 301.

"When they are newly arrived in the Indies, they are called Raignolles, that is to say 'men of the Kingdom,' and the older hands mock them until they have made one or two voyages with them, and have learned the manners and customs of the Indies; this name sticks to them until the fleet arrives the year following."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 123.

[1727.—"The Reynolds or European Adalgaos."—J. Hamilton, ed. 1711, l. 251.]

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E.I. Co. Thus.

c. 1760.—"With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynolds."—Glean, i. 38.

RESHIRE, n.p. Rishīr. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century. I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Reyzel in the quotation from A. Nunes under Dubber. The spelling Raxet in Barros below is no doubt a clerical error for Raxel.

c. 1340.—"Rishīr. . . This city built by Lohrasp, was rebuilt by Shapur son of Ardeshīr Babegān; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy. . . . The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependance on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloth called Ritchīrī are the chief productions."—Hauddalla Mastāfi, quoted in Bushier de Meynard, Diet. de la Perse.

1511.—"And thereupon Pero Dilloquerio sailed away . . . and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it . . . and when he was as far advanced as Rāfom, the winds being now westerly—he tacked about, and stood along in the tack for a two day's voyage, and reached Raxel, where he found Miruzaca, Captain of the Reque Ismail, (Shāh Ismā'īl Sāfi, of Persia), who had captured 20 turraids from a Captain of the King of Ormuz."—Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

"On the Persian side of the Gulf is the Province of Raxel, which contains many villages and fortresses along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Ibid. 156-7.

1531.—"And at this time insurrection was made by the King of Raxel, (which is a city on the coast of Persia); who was a vassal of the King of Ormuz, so the latter King sought help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silveira. And he sent down Jorge do Crasto with a galliot and two foists and 100 men, all well equipt, and good musketeers; and made him tell the King of Raxel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormuz."—Corr. iii. 557.

1553.—". . . And Francisco de Gouvea arrived at the port of the city of Raxel, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that . . . he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormuz."—Ibid. iv. 26.

1551.—"Reyzel." See under DUBBER, as above.

1600.—"Reformados y proveydos en Har-muz de lo necesario, nos tornamos a partir . . . fuymos esta vez por fuera de la isla Queixioina (see KISHM) corriendo la mi-mar costa, como de la primera, pasamos . . . mas adelante la fortaleza de Raxel, celebre por el mucho y perfecto pan y frutos, que su territorio produce."—Travesura, Vag. 70.

1856.—"48 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ship of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidable position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshire) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Despatch in Lord's H. of the Indian Navy, ii. 346.

RESIDENT, s. This term has been used in two ways which require distinction. Thus (a) up to the organization of the Civil Service in Warren Hastings's time, the chiefs of the Company's commercial establishments in the provinces, and for a short time the European chiefs of districts, were termed Residents. But later the word was applied (b) also to the representative of the Governor-General at an important native Court, e.g. at Lucknow, Delhi, Hyderabad, and Baroda. And this is the only meaning that the term now has in British India. In Dutch India the term is applied to the chief European officer of a province (corresponding to an Indian Zillah) as well as to the Dutch representative at a native Court, as at Solo and Djokjocarta.

1748.—“We received a letter from Mr. Henry Kelsall, Resident at Ballasore.”—Fr. William Conn., in Long, 3.

1760.—“Agreed, Mr. Howitt the present Resident in Rajah Tillack Chund's country (i.e. Burdwan) for the collection of the tuncaks (see TUNCA), he wrote to. . .”—Ibid. March 29, ibid. 244.

c. 1778.—“My pay as Resident (at Sylhet) did not exceed £600. per annum, so that fortune could only be acquired by my own industry.”—Hon. R. Landsey, in Lives of the L., iii. 174.

1798.—“Having received overtures of a very friendly nature from the Rajah of Benar, who has requested the presence of a British Resident at his Court, I have despatched an ambassador to Nagpore with full powers to ascertain the precise nature of the Rajah's views.”—Maryia Wellesley, Despatches, i. 99.

RESPONDENTIA, s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: “Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract” (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed., 1876; [and see N.E.D. under Bottomry]). What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hoogly, was known down to the first quarter of the last century, as Respondentia Walk. We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent jawaubs, (q.v.); but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of ‘Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

[1685.—“ . . . Provided he gives his Bill to repay itt in Syam, . . . with 20 p. Ct. Respondentia on the Ship. . .”—Pingle, Diary Fr. St. Geo, 1st ser. iv. 123.]

1776.—“I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on Ships in India. . . I have also subscribed £500 towards a China Voyage.”—MS. Letter of James Rennell, Feb. 20.

1794.—“I assure you, Sir, Europe articles, especially good wine, are not to be had for love, money, or respondentia.”—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, &c., p. 206.

[1840.—“A Grecian ghat has been built at the north end of the old Respondentia walk. . .”—Davidson, Diary of Truets, ii. 209.]

RESSAIDAR, s. P.—H. Rasaidār. A native subaltern of irregular cavalry, under the Ressaldar (q.v.). It is not clear what sense rasāī has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is ‘quickness of apprehension; fitness, perfection.’

RESSALA, s. Hind. from Ar. risala. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a rasāl, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dozy), [and in the passage from the Āin, quoted under RESSALDAR, the original text has Risalah]. The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758.—“Presently after Shokum Sing and Harroon Cawn (formerly of Roy Dullub's Rissalla) came in and discovered to him the whole affair."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Gleg, i. 70.

[1781.—"The enemy's troops before the place are five Rossallars of infantry . . ."—Sir Eyre Coote, letter of July 6, in Progs. of Council, September 7, Forrest, Letters, vol. iii.]

RESSALDAR, Ar.—P.—H. Rissal-laddr (Ressala). Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse, though the second quotation shows it, in the south, applied to officers of infantry. Now applied to the native officer who commands a ressala in one of our regiments of "Irregular Horse." This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables. (See Panjab Notes et Queries, ii. 84.)

[e. 1500. — "Besides, there are several copyists who write a good hand and a lucid style. They receive the yaddāsh (memorandum) when completed, keep it with themselves, and make a proper abridgement of it. REST-HOUSE, s. Much the same as Dawk Bungalow (q.v.). Used in Ceylon only. [But the word is in common use in Northern India for the chokies along roads and canals.]

[1894. — "'Rest-Houses' or 'staging bungalows' are erected at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles along the road."—G. W. MacGeorge, Ways and Works in India, p. 78.]

RESUM, s. Lascar's Hind. for ration (Hoeluck).

RHINOCEROS, s. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 16th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himalaya, but in the forests near Peshāwar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshāwar. See also GANDA, [and for references to the animal in Greek accounts of India, McGrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander, 186.]

c. 1387. — "In the month of Zi-Ka'da of the same year he (Prince Muhammed Khan) went to the mountains of Sirmor (W. of the Jumna) and spent two months in hunting the rhinoceros and the elk."—Tārīkh-i-Mulūk-i-Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 16.

1519. — "After sending on the army towards the river (Indus), I myself set off for Sawāth, which they likewise call Karak-Khaneh (Karl-Khāna, 'the rhinoceros-haunt'), to hunt the rhinoceros. We started many rhinoceroses, but as the country abounds in brushwood, we could not get at them. A rhinoceros, that had whelp, came out, and fled along the plain; many arrows were shot at her, but . . . she gained cover. We set fire to the brushwood, but the rhinoceros was not to be found. We got sight of another, that, having been scorched in the fire, was lamed and unable to run. We killed it, and every one cut off a bit as a trophy of the chase."—Baber, 253.

Sur le Koutel nous aperçûmes des rhinoceros, dont la grosseur approchoit celle d'un elephant. . . ."—Sidi Ali, in J. As., 1^{er} ser. tom. ix. 201-202.

RHOTASS, n.p. This (Rohids) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Shāhūdā district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Sōn river to a height of 1490 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shāh, the successful rival of the Mogul Humāyūn: b. A fort at the north end of the Salt-range in the Jhelum District, Panjāb, which was built by the same king, named by him after the ancient Rohtās. The ruins are very picturesque.

c. 1560.—“Shor Shāh was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle. . . . He kept money (khazāna) and revenue (khazā) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessity required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasury was in Rohtās under the care of Ikhtiyār Khān.”—Wak'at-i-Mushtaki, in Elliot, iv. 551.

[c. 1590.—“Rohtas is a stronghold on the summit of a lofty mountain, difficult of access. It has a circumference of 14 kos and the land is cultivated. It contains many springs, and whenever the soil is excavated to the depth of 3 or 4 yards, water is visible. In the rainy season many lakes are formed, and more than 200 waterfalls gladden the eye and ear.”—Fin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 132 seq.]

1665.—“. . . You must leave the great road to Patna, and bend to the South through Exterbourgh (?) [Akbarpur] and the famous Fortress of Rhodes.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 53; [ed. Dall, i. 121].

[1761.—“From Shaw Mull, Kalladar of Rotus to Major Munro.”—In Long, 359.]

c. 1540.—“Sher Shāh . . . marched with all his forces and retinue through all the hills of Padmān and Garjhāk, in order that he might choose a fitting site, and build a fort there to keep down the Ghakkars. . . . Having selected Rohtās, he built there the fort which now exists.”—Tārīkh-i-Sher Shāhi, in Elliot, iv. 390.

1809.—“Before we reached the Hydaspees we had a view of the famous fortress of Rotas; but it was at a great distance. . . . Rotas we understood to be an extensive but strong fort on a low hill.”—Elphinstone, Cambul, ed. 1839, i. 108.

RICE, s. The well-known cereal, Oryza sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek ὀρυζα, which is the source of our word through It. riso, Fr. riz, etc., from the Tamil ariśi, ‘rice deprived of husk’, ascribed to a root ari, ‘to separate’. It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (Flora Indica, ii. 200) says that a wild rice, known as Newaree [Skt. nivāra, Tel. nirvāri] by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant.

It is possible that the Arabic al-rumz (arrumz) from which the Spaniards directly take their word arroz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that ὀρυζα can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of ὀρυζα by Theophrastus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristobulus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below), was a companion of Alexander's expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophrastus. The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer ὀρυζα than erīhi, the very common exchange of aspirant and sibilant might easily give a form like erisi or brisi (comp. hindū, sindū, &c.) in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing. ‘a grain of rice’ wrijāh, pl. ‘rice’ wrijey, the former close to oryza. The same writer gives in Bairakai (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a ‘Tajik’ tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanigoram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as w'ri-za, a very close approximation again to oryza. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former, as ri-za. The modern Persian word for husked rice is birinj, and the Armenian brinz. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical brisi or erisi, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindū Kūsh tribes, e.g. Burishki (Khajuna of Leitner) brōy, Shina (of Gilgit) brīñ; Khovar of the Chitral Valley (Arniyah of Leitner) grinj (Biddulph, Tribes of Hindoo Koosh, App., pp. xxxiv., lix., cxxxix.).

c. 4.

11 c. 20. — "The rice (ῥυζα), according to Aristotle, stands in water, in an enclosure. It is sown in beds. The plant is 1 cubit in height, with many ears, and yields a large produce. The harvest is about the time of the setting of the Pleiades, and the grain is beaten out like barley.

"It grows in Bactriana, Babylonia, Susia, and in the Lower Syria." Strabo, xv. i. s.
18, in Bohm & E. T. iii. 83.

11 c. 20. — "Megasthenes writes, in the second Book, of his India. The Indians, says he, at their banquets have a table placed before each person. This table is made like a buffet, and they set upon it a golden bowl, into which they first help-leaved rice (ῥυζα), as it might be boiled grouts, and then a variety of cakes dressed in Indian fashions." — Athenæus, iv. § 39.

A.D. c. 70. — "Hordeum Indis sativum et butter" (see GHEE) and cotton, and the abounding Indian piece-goods made from it." — Ptolemy, § 11.

ROC. — The Rokh or fabulous colossal bird of Arabian legend. This has been treated of at length by one of the present writers in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 33, notes); and here we shall only mention one or two supplementary facts.

M. Maure states that rak-rak is applied by the Malays to a bird of prey of the vulture family, a circumstance which possibly may indicate the source of the Arabic name, as we know it to be of some at least of the legends. [See Skeat, Malay Magic, 124.]

In one of the notes just referred to it is suggested that the roc's quills, spoken of by Marco Polo in the passage quoted below (a passage which evidently refers to some real object brought to China), might possibly have been some vegetable production such as the great frond of the Ravenala

* Müller and (very positively) Fabricius discard Bourrépau for Bourrépau, which "no fellow understands." A. Hamilton (l. 136) mentions "Whit, Pulse, and Butter" as exports from Mangarou on this coast. He does not mention Bourrépau!

of Madagascar (Urvinia speciosa), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Silke, in his excellent book on Madagascar
(The Great African Island, 1850), noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rofia palm (Synsperma Raphia). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England.
These must have been originally from 36 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all stript, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Boodingnagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1881. Sir John Kirk wrote:

"I send to-day per S.S. Arcot . . .
four fronds of the Raphia palm, called here Male. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state — i.e. stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making staves and ladders, and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths, and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Mgamoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and these declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated this statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Udoe (?) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself says that 'what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale' (see letter of the present writer in Athenæum, March 22nd, 1884).

(c. 1000). — "El Haçan fils d'Amr et d'autres, d'après ce qu'ils tenaient de maintpersonnages de l'Inde, m'ont rapporté des choses bien extraordinaires, au sujet des oiseaux du pays de Zabedj, du Khmér (Kumér) du Sout et autres régions des parages de l'Inde. Ce que j'ai vu de plus grand, en fait de plumes d'oiseaux, c'est un tuyau que me montra Abou' l-Abbas de Siraf. Il était long de deux aunes environs capable, semblait-il, de contenir une outre d'œuf.

"J'ai vu dans l'Inde, me dit le capitaine Ismaïlweïh, chez un des principaux marchands, un tuyau de plume qui était près de sa maison, et dans lequel on versait de l'eau comme dans une grande tonne. . . . Ne sois pas étonné, me dit-il, car un capitaine du pays des Zindja m'a conté qu'il avait vu chez le roi de Siraf un tuyau de plume qui contenait vingt-cinq outres d'eau."—Livre des Mercuriales d'Inde. (Par Van der Lith et Marcel Devic, pp. 62-63.)

ROCK-PIGEON. The bird so called by sportsmen in India is the Pterocles exustus of Temminck, belonging to the family of sand-grouse (Pteroclididae). It occurs throughout India, except in the more wooded parts. In their swift high flight these birds look something like pigeons on the wing, whence perhaps the misnomer.

ROGUE (Elephant), s. An elephant (generally, if not always a male) living in apparent isolation from any herd, usually a bold marauder, and a danger to travellers. Such an elephant is called in Bengal, according to Williamson, raun, i.e. rañ [Hind. rañ, Skt. shanda]; sometimes it would seem gunda [Hind. gundā, 'a rascal']; and by the Sinhalese hora. The term rogue is used by Europeans in Ceylon, and its origin is somewhat obscure. Sir Emerson Tennent finds such an elephant called, in a curious book of the 18th century, ronkedor or runkedor, of which he supposes that rogue may perhaps have been a modification. That word looks like Port. roncador, 'a snorer, a noisy fellow, a bully,' which gives a plausible sense. But Littré gives rogue as a colloquial French word conveying the idea of arrogance and rudeness. In the following passage which we have copied, unfortunately without recording the source, the word comes still nearer the sense in which it is applied to the elephant: "On commence à s'apercevoir dès Bayonne, que l'humour de ces peuples tient un peu de celle de ses voisins, et qu'ils sont rogues et peu communicatifs avec l'étranger." After all however it is most likely that the word is derived from an English use of the word. For Skeat shows that rogue, from the French sense of 'malapert, saucy, rude, surly,' came to be applied as a cant term to beggars, and is used, in some old English passages which he quotes, exactly in the sense of our modern 'tramp.' The transfer to a vagabond elephant would be easy. Mr. Skeat refers to Shakspeare.—

"And wast thou fain, poor father, To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn?"
K. Lear, iv. 7.

1878.—"Much misconception exists on the subject of rogue or solitary elephants. The usually accepted belief that these elephants are turned out of the herds by their companions or rivals is not correct. Most of the so-called solitary elephants are the lords of some herds near. They leave their companions at times to roam by themselves, usually to visit cultivation or open country . . . sometimes again they make the expedition merely for the sake of solitude. They, however, keep more or less to the jungle where their herd is, and follow its movements."—Sunderman, p. 52.

ROGUE'S RIVER, n.p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunderbund channels joining the Lower Hoogly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakur Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hoogly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedges' Diary for the Hakluyt Society, identifies Rogue's River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Sangor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just opposite Buffalo Point, "R. Theeves," then, as we descend, the R. Rangafula, and, close below that, "Rogues" (without the word River), and still further below, Chanell Creek or R. Jessore. Rangafula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.

After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chingri Khāl, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kalpi Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chingri Khāl. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Threves of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Saugor (the Gunga Saugor of those days, which forms the extreme S. of what is styled Saugor Island now) with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the "first safe anchoring place in the River," viz. Diamond Harbour. The Rogue's River was apparently a little 'above the head of the Grand Middle Ground' or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some $7\frac{1}{2}$ m. below Chingri Khāl. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the "R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom." Now there is a town on the Chingri Khāl, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell's Map Ottagunge, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttoogum. Farther, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India Office, I find in a position corresponding with Chingri Khāl, De Roovers Spruit, which I take to be 'Robber's (or Rogue's) River.'

1683.—"And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by y^r Council that if I should not prevail to go this way to Decca, I should attempt to do it with y^e Sloops by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Decca."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 36.

1711.—"Directions to go up along the Western Shore. . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers.* You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Buffaloe Point bears from you $\frac{1}{4}$ N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E."—The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 54.

"Mr. Herring, the Pilot's Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hughley. . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard, until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom. . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard!) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard all along down to Channel Trees, for in the offing lies the Grand Middle Ground."—Ibid. p. 57.

1727.—"The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Sagor," commonly known by the Name of Rogues River, which had that Appellation from some Banditti Portuguese, who were 'followers of Shah Sujah . . . for those Portuguese . . . after their Master's Flight to the Kingdom of Arakan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with all the Channels from Xaliyam (see CHITTAGONG) to the Westward, from this River they used to sally out."—A. Hamilton, i. 3 [ed. 1744].

1752.—". . . 'On the receipt of your Honors' orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master Attendant, and directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honors' Ships higher than Rogues River.'"—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 32.

ROHILLA, n.p. A name by which Afghāns, or more particularly Afghāns settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province Rohilkand, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rōhēlah or rōhēlai, adj., formed from rōhu, 'mountain,' thus signifying 'mountaineer of Afghānistān.' But a large part of E. Afghānistān specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Fall of the Moghul Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when 'Ali Mahommed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta. A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: "The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of ai used in that language, 'Sādik Rohilai yam pa Hindubār gad,' meaning, 'I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan'; i.e. 'an honest man among knaves.'"

* This is shown by a 17th century Dutch chart in I.O. to be a creek on the west side, very little below Diamond Point. It is also shown in Tassin's Maps of the R. Hoogly, 1835; not later.

* This also points to the locality of Diamond Harbour, and the Chingri Khāl.

c. 1452.—“The King . . . issued farmāns to the chiefs of the various Afghān Tribes. On receipt of the farmāns, the Afghāns of Roh came as is their wont, like ants and locusts, to enter the King's service. . . . The King (Bahlol Lodi) commanded his nobles, saying,—‘Every Afghān who comes to Hind from the country of Roh to enter my service, bring him to me. I will give him a jāgir more than proportional to his deserts.’”—Tārīkh-i-Shir-Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 307.

c. 1542.—“Actuated by the pride of power, he took no account of clanship, which is much considered among the Afghans, and especially among the Rohilla men.”—Ibid. 428.

c. 1612.—“Roh is the name of a particular mountain [-country], which extends in length from Swād and Bajaur to the town of Siwī belonging to Bhakar. In breadth it stretches from Hasan Abdāl to Kābul. Kandahār is situated in this territory.”—Firishta's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 563.

1720.—“ . . . 1000 other horsemen called Ruhelāhs.”—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 277.

1745.—“This year the Emperor, at the request of Saffier Jung, marched to reduce All Mahumud Khan, a Rohilla adventurer, who had, from the negligence of the Government, possessed himself of the district of Kuttūr (Kathkar), and assumed independence of the royal authority.”—In Vol. II. of Scott's E.T. of Hind. of the Dekkan, &c., p. 218.

1763.—“After all the Rohilas are but the best of a race of men, in whose blood it would be difficult to find one or two single individuals endowed with good nature and with sentiments of equity; in a word they are Afghans.”—Sir Munglheria, iii. 210.

1786.—“That the said Warren Hastings . . . did in September, 1773, enter into a private engagement with the said Nabob of Oude . . . to furnish them, for a stipulated sum of money to be paid to the E. I. Company, with a body of troops for the declared purpose of ‘thoroughly extirpating the nation of the Rohillas’; a nation from whom the Company had never received, or pretended to receive, or apprehend, any injury whatever.”—Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vi. 568.

ROLONG, s. Used in S. India, and formerly in W. India, for fine flour; semolina, or what is called in Bengal soojee (q.v.). The word is a corruption of Port. rolão or ralão. But this is explained by Bluteau as farina secunda. It is, he says (in Portuguese), that substance which is extracted between the best flour and the bran.

1813.—“Some of the greatest delicacies in India are now made from the rolong-flour, which is called the heart or kidney of the wheat.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32].

“ . . . proposing to give 200 Pagodas Madaras Brahminy to obtain a Rocca from the Nabob that our business might go on Salabad (see SALLABAD).”—Ibid. Sept. 27, p. 35.

[1727.—“Swan . . . holding his Petition or Rocca above his head . . .”—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 199.]

[1875.—“The old native coins seem to have consisted of Varaghans, rookas and Doodoos. The Varaghan is what is now generally called a pagoda. . . . The rookas have now entirely disappeared, and have probably been melted into rupees. They varied in value from 1 to 2 Rupees. Though the coins have disappeared, the name still survives, and the ordinary name for silver money generally is rookaloo.”—Gribble, Man. of Cuddapah, 296 seq.]

ROOK, s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukh, which is properly the name of the famous gryphon, the roc of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. According to Marcel Devic it meant ‘warrior.’ It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rath (see RUT) or ‘chariot,’ the name of the piece in India.

ROOM, n.p. ‘Turkey’ (Rām); ROOMEE, n.p. (Rāmi); ‘an Ottoman Turk.’ Properly ‘a Roman.’ In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as ‘a Latin’—represented in later times by firin-ghee (e.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under RAJA). But Rām, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. Garcia de Orta and Jarric deny the name of Rūmī, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rūmī; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes call Toorkes), as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

c. 1508.—“Ad hæc, trans euripum, seu fretum, quod insulam fecit, in orientali continentis plaga oppidum condidit, receptaculum advenæ militibus, maximo Turcis; ut ab Diensibus fretis divisi, rixandi cum iis . . . causas procul haberent. Id oppidum primo Gogola (see GOGOLLA), dein Rumepolis vocatum ab ijsa ro. . .” —Maffei, p. 77.

1510.—“When we had sailed about 12 days we arrived at a city which is called Diokolanderrumi, that is ‘Diū, the port of the Turks.’ . . . This city is subject to the Sultan of Combea . . . 400 Turkish merchants reside here constantly.” —L'art-thema, 91-92.

Bandar-Rūmī is, as the traveller explains, the ‘Port of the Turks.’ Gogola, a suburb of Diū on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as Villa dos Rumes (see GOGOLLA, and quotation from Maffei above). The quotation below from Daniana a Goes alludes apparently to Gogola.

1513.—“ . . . Vnde Rumina Turchorū quoque milibz nostris continuo infestabit.” —Linauctus Regis Epistola, p. 21.

1514.—“They were ships belonging to Moors, or to Romī (there they give the name of Romī to a white people who are, some of them, from Armenia the Greater and the Less, others from Circassia and Tartary and Russia, Turks and Persians of Shacmal called the Sygh, and other ronegades from all countries.” —Goe. du Bayoli, 38.

1525.—In the expenditure of Malik Aliaz we find 30 Rumes at the pay (monthly) of 100 fedees each. The Arabiz are in the same statement paid 40 and 50 fedees, the Corapones (Rhorisians) the same; Guzerates and Cyndes (Sindis) 25 and 30 fedees; Purtuguis, 60 fedees. —Lembranga, 37.

1549.—“ . . . in nova civitate quæ Rhomaum appellatur. Nomen inditum est Rhomaes, quasi Rhomania, vocantur enim in totā India Rhomaes et, quos nos communis nomine Geniceros (i.e. Janisaries) vocamus. . . .” —Daniana a Goes, Diensis Oppugnatione —in De Rebus Hispaniis Lusitanis, Aragoniis, Indiis et Aethiopiis. . . . Opera, Colon. Agr., 1602, p. 281.

1553.—“The Moors of India not understanding the distinctions of those Provinces of Europe, call the whole of Thence, Greece, Slavonia, and the adjacent islands of the Mediterranean Rūmī, and the men thereof Rūmī, a name which properly belongs to that part of Thrace in which lies Constantinople; from the name of New Rome belonging to the latter, Thrace taking that of Romania.” —Barro, IV. iv. 16.

1554.—“Also the said ambassador promised in the name of Idalshaa (see IDALCAN) his lord, that if a fleet of Rumes should invade these parts, Idalshaa should be bound to help and succour us with provisions and mariners at our expense. . . .” —S. Didallo, Tombo, 12.

c. 1555.—“One day (the Emp. Humāyūn) asked me: ‘Which of the two countries is greatest, that of Rūm or of Hindustan?’ I replied: . . . ‘If by Rūm you mean all the countries subject to the Emperor of Constantinople, then India would not form even a sixth part thereof.’ . . .” —Sidi Ali, in J. As., ser. I. tom. ix. 143.

1563.—“The Turks are those of the province of Natolia, or (as we now say) Asia Minor; the Rumes are those of Constantinople, and of its empire.” —Garcia De Orta, f. 7.

ROOMAUL, s. Hind. from Pers. rūmal (lit. 'face-rubber') a towel, a handkerchief. ["In modern native use it may be carried in the hand by a high-born parda lady attached to her batwa or tiny silk handbag, and ornamented with all sorts of gold and silver trinkets; then it is a handkerchief in the true sense of the word. It may be carried by men, hanging on the left shoulder, and used to wipe the hands or face; then, too, it is a handkerchief. It may be as big as a towel, and thrown over both shoulders by men, the ends either hanging loose or tied in a knot in front; it then serves the purpose of a gulliband or muffler. In the case of children it is tied round the neck as a neckkerchief, or round the waist for mere show. It may be used by women much as the 18th century tucker was used in England in Addison's time" (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 79; for its use to mark a kind of shawl, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 123).] In ordinary Anglo-Indian Hind. it is the word for a 'pocket handkerchief.' In modern trade it is applied to thin silk piece-goods with handkerchief-patterns. We are not certain of its meaning in the old trade of piece-goods, e.g.:

ROSALGAT, CAPE, n.p. The most easterly point of the coast of Arabia; a corruption (originally Portuguese) of the Arabic name Ras-al-hadd, as explained by P. della Valle, with his usual acuteness and precision, below.

1553. — "From Guria Muria to Cape Rosalgate, which is in 22½°, an extent of coast of 120 leagues, all the land is barren and desert. At this Cape commences the Kingdom of Ormus."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

ROSE-APPLE. See JAMBOO.

ROSELLE, s. The Indian Hibiscus or Hib. sabdariffa, L. The fleshy calyx makes an excellent sub-acid jelly, and is used also for tarts; also called 'Red Sorrel.' The French call it 'Guinea Sorrel,' Oseille de Guinée, and Roselle is probably a corruption of Oseille. [See PUTWA.]

[ROSE-MALLOWS, s. A semi-fluid resin, the product of the Liquidambar altingia, which grows in Tenasserim; also known as Liquid Storax, and used for various medicinal purposes. (See Hanbury and Pluckiger, Pharmacog. 271, Wat, Econ. Dict. V. 78 seqq.). The Burmese name of the tree is nan-ta-yoke (Mason, Burmah, 778). The word is a corruption of the Malay-Javanese rasamalla, Skt. rasa-māla, 'Perfume garland,' the gum being used as incense (Encycl. Britann. 9th ed. xii. 718.)

1598.—"Rosamallia."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 150.]

ROTTLE, RATTLE, s. Arab. rafil or ritl, the Arabian pound, becoming in S. Ital. rotolo; in Port. arratel; in Span. arrelde; supposed to be originally a transposition of the Greek λίτρον, which went all over the Semitic East. It is in Syriac as litra; and is also found as litrim (pl.) in a Phœnician inscription of Sardinia, dating c. a.c. 180 (see Corpus Inscriptt. Semitt. i. 188-189.)

c. 1340 — "The ritl of India which is called str (see SEER) weighs 70 mithkāl. . . 40 str form a mann (see MAUND)." — Shihā-buddīn Dimshkī, in Notes and Exts. xiii. 189.

1803 — "At Judda the weights are :

15 Vakees = 1 Rattle.

2 Rattles = 1 maund."

Milburn, i. 88.

ROUND, s. This is used as a Hind. word, raund, or corruptly raun gasht, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.' [And we find in the Madras Records the grade of 'Rounder,' or 'Gentlemen of the Round,' officers whose duty it was to visit the sentries.

[1683. — " . . . it is order'd that 18 Souldiers, 1 Corporall & 1 Rounder goe upon the Sloop Conifer for Hugly. . . ." — Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 33.]

ROUNDEL, s. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. [In 1676 the use of the Roundell was prohibited, except in the case of "the Councell and Chaplaine" (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxii.)] In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-guard on a lance, as we learn from Bluteau's great Port. Dictionary: "Arundela, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England." Cobarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing. Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is, even in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel. [The N.E.D. gives arrondell, arundell as forms of hirondelle, 'a swallow.'] 1673. — "Lusty Fellows running by their Sides with Arundels (which are broad Umbrelloes held over their Heads)." — Fryer, 30.

1676. — "Proposals to the Agent, &c., about the young men in Metchlipatam.

1677-78.—". . . That except by the Members of this Council, those that have formerly been in that quality, Cheefes of Factorys, Commanders of Shippes out of England, and the Chaplains, Rundells shall not be worne by any Men in this Towne, and by no Woman below the Degree of Factors' Wives and Ensigns' Wives, except by such as the Governour shall permit."—Madras Standing Orders, in Wheeler, iii. 433.

1680.—"To Verona (the Company's Chief Merchant's adopted son was given the name of Muddoo Verona, and a Rundell to be carried over him, in respect to the memory of Verona, eleven cannon being fired, that the Towne and Country might take notice of the honour done them."—Fl. St. Geo. Concn. In Notes and Exts. No. II. p. 15.

1716.—"All such as serve under the Honourable Company and the English Inhabitants, deserted their Employ; such as Cooks, Water bearers, Coolies, Palankeen-boys, Roundel men. . . ."—In Wheeler, ii. 230.

1726.—"Whoever the magnates go on a journey they go not without a considerable train, being attended by their pipers, horn-blowers, and Rondel bearers, who keep them from the Sun with a Rondel (which is a kind of little round sunshade)."—Valentin, Chor. 54.

"Their Priests go like the rest clothed in yellow, but with the right arm and breast remaining uncovered. They also carry a rondel, or parasol, of a Tallipot (see TALLIPOT) lent. . . ."—Ibid. v. (Ceylon), 403.

1754.—"Some years before our arrival in the country, they (the E. I. Co.) found such sumptuary laws so absolutely necessary, that they gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to hire a Roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his Roundel or Umbrella from the heat of the sun. A young fellow of humour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squardel instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbade him the use of it."—Ives, 21.

1785.—"He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his roundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun."—Carraccioli, i. 233. This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

ROWANNAH, s. Hind. from Pers. rawdnah, from rawd, 'going.' A pass or permit.

[1764.—". . . that the English shall carry on their trade . . . free from all duties . . . excepting the article of salt, . . . on which a duty is to be levied on the Rowana or Houghly market-price. . . ."—Letter from Court, in Verelst, Vieo of Bengal, App. 127.]

ROWOE, s. Hind. raus, rois, rauns. A Himalayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking-sticks, Cotoneaster bacillaris, Wall., also C. acuminata (N.O. Rosa-ceae). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 581.]

1838.—"We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the brawling mountain stream, aided by my long pahārī pole of rous wood."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 241; [also i. 112]

a. A fausse-braye, i.e. a subsidiary enceinte surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. raonī. The word is not in Shakespear, Wilson, Platts or Fallon. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations. The origin of the word is obscure. [Mr. Irvine suggests Hind. rāndhnd, 'to enclose as with a hedge,' and says: "Fallon evidently knew nothing of the word raunī, for in his E. H. Dict. he translates fausse-braye by dhus, matti kī pushtah; which also shows that he had no definite idea of what a fausse-braye was, dhus meaning simply an earthen or mud fort." Dr. Grierson suggests Hind. ramand, 'a park,' of which the fem., i.e. diminutive, would be ramanī or rāonī; or possibly the word may come from Hind. rev, Skt. reyn, 'sand,' meaning "an entrenchment of sand."]

1799.—"On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the glacis) because the guns could not bear on the rounnee."—Jas. Skinner's Mil. Memoirs, i. 172. J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets rounee here as 'counterscarp'; but that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

[1803.—Writing of Hathras, "Renny wall, with a deep, broad, dry ditch behind it surrounds the fort."—II. Thorne, Mem. of the War in India, p. 400.]

1805.—In a work by Major L. F. Smith (Sketch of the Rise, &c., of the Regular Corps in the Service of the Native Princes of India) we find a plan of the attack of Aligarh, in which is marked "Lower Fort or Renny, well supplied with grape," and again, "Lower Fort, Renny or Faussebraye."

[1819.—“... they saw the necessity of covering the foot of the wall from an enemy's fire, and formed a defence, similar to our fausse-braye, which they call Rainees.”—Fitzclarence, Journal of a Route to England, p. 245; also see 110.]

b. This word also occurs as representative of the Burmese yo-wet-ni, or (in Arakan pron.) ro-wet-ni, ‘red-leaf,’ the technical name of the standard silver of the Burmese ingot currency, commonly rendered Flowered-silver.

1796.—“Rouni or fine silver, Ummernapoora currency.”—Notification in Seton-Karr, ii. 179.

1800.—“The quantity of alloy varies in the silver current in different parts of the empire; at Rangoon it is adulterated 25 per cent.; at Ummernapoora, pure, or what is called flowered silver, is most common, in the latter all duties are paid. The modifications are as follows:

“Rouni, or pure silver.

Rounika, 5 per cent. of alloy.”

Symes, 327.

ROWTEE, s. A kind of small tent with pyramidal roof, and no projection of fly, or eaves. Hind. rdoti.

[1813.—“... the military men, and others attached to the camp, generally possess a dwelling of somewhat more comfortable description, regularly made of two or three folds of cloth in thickness, closed at one end, and having a flap to keep out the wind and rain at the opposite one: these are dignified with the name of ruotees, and come nearer (than the pawl) to our ideas of a tent.”—Broughton, Letters, ed. Constable, p. 20.

[1875.—“For the servants I had a good rauti of thick lined cloth.”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 90.]

ROY, s. A common mode of writing the title raji (see RAJA); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hindu Theist Rammohun Roy.

ROZA, s. Ar. rauḍa, Hind. rauza. Properly a garden; among the Arabs especially the rauḍa of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by the natives the Taj-rauza); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzib near Aurungābād.

1813.—“... the roza, a name for the mausoleum, but implying something saintly or sanctified.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 41; [2nd ed. ii. 413].

KOZYE, s. Hind. razāi and rajāi; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind. with the Ar. letter zaid; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning ‘a cover for the head in winter.’ The kindred meaning of mirzāi is apt to suggest a connection between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word factitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespear's suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. ranjika, ‘cloth.’ [Platts gives the same explanation, adding “probably through Pers. razāi,” from razādan, ‘to dye.’] The most probable suggestion perhaps is that razāi was a word taken from the name of some person called Razā, who may have invented some variety of the article; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c. A somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Dict. called Bahār-i-Ajam, extracted by Vullers (s.v.), seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the word.

1784.—“I have this morning... received a letter from the Prince addressed to you, with a present of a rozy and a shawl handkerchief.”—Warren Hastings to his Wife, in Busteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 195.

1834.—“I arrived in a small open pavilion at the top of the building, in which there was a small Brahminy cow, clothed in a wadded resai, and lying upon a carpet.”—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 135.

1857.—(Imports into Kandahar, from Mashad and Khorasan) “Razais from Yeazd, . . .”—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. lxviii.

1867.—“I had brought with me a soft quilted rezai to sleep on, and with a rug wrapped round me, and sword and pistol under my head, I lay and thought long and deeply upon my line of action on the morrow.”—Lieut.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 301.

RUBBEE, s. Ar. rabi, ‘the Spring.’ In India applied to the crops, or harvest of the crops, which are sown after the rains and reaped in the following spring or early summer. Such crops are wheat, barley, gram, linseed, tobacco, onions, carrots and turnips, &c. (See KHURREEF.)

[1765.—“... we have granted them the Dewanee (see DEWAUNY) of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, from the beginning of the Fussul Rubby of the Bengal year 1172. . . .”—Firmann of Shah Aadam, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 167.

[1866.—“It was in the month of November, when, if the rains closed early, irrigation is resorted to for producing the young rubber trees.”—Confessions of an Ordurely, 178.]

RUBLE, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 1½d.; [in 1901 about 2s. 1½d.]. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1552.—“Vix centum annos vtuntur moneta argentea, præsertim apud illos cusa. Initio cum argentum in provinciam inferebatur, fundebantur portianæulæ oblongæ argenteæ, sine imagine et scriptura, ætimatione vnius rubli, quarum nulla nunc apparet.”—Herbertus, in Rerum Moscorit. Auctores, Francof. 1600, p. 42.

1591.—“This penaltie or mulet is 20 dingos (see TANGA) or pence upon every rubble or mark, and so ten in the hundred. . . . Heo (the Emperor) hath besides for every name conteyned in the writs that passe out of their courts, five altens, an altcen 5 pence sterling or thereabouts.”—Treatise of the Russian Commonwealth, by Dr. Giles Fisher, Hak. Soc. 51.

c. 1651-6.—“Dog dollars they (the Russians) are not acquainted with, these being attended with loss . . . their own ducats they call Roubles.”—Mucarius, L.T. by Buljour, i. 280.

[RUFFUGUR, s. P.—H. rafûgar, Pers. rafâ, ‘darning.’ The modern rafûgar in Indian cities is a workman who repairs rents and holes in Kashmir shawls and other woollen fabrics. Such workmen were regularly employed in the cloth factories of the E.I. Co., to examine the manufactured cloths and remove petty defects in the weaving.

1750.—“On inspecting the Dacca goods, we found the Serbetties (see PIECE-GOODS) very much frayed and very badly rafâ-gurâ or joined.”—Bengal Letter to L.I. Co., Feb. 25, India Office MSS.

* These ingots were called saum. Ibn Batuta says: “At one day’s journey from Ukak are the hills of the Rûs, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mines, and they bring from their country saum, i.e. ingots of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each ingot is five munces.”—II. 411. Pegolotti (c. 1340), speaking of the land route to Cathay, says that on arriving at Cawak (i.e. Kinnou of Marco Polo or Hang-chau-fu) “you can dispose of the summt of silver that you have with you . . . and you may reckon the saum to be worth 5 golden florins” (see in Cathay, &c., II. 25-6, 253). It would appear from Wessl. quotes by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, 23), that gold ingots also were called saum or saum. The ruble is still called slim in Turkistan.

1851.—“Rafu-gara are darners, who repair the cloths that have been damaged during bleaching. They join broken threads, remove knots from threads, &c.”—Taylor, Cotton Manufacture of Dacca, 97.]

RUM, s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, rome for ‘good’; rome-booze, ‘good drink’; and so, rum. The English word has always with us a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Corresio in his Italian version of the Rāmāyana, whilst describing the Palace of Rāvana, is bold enough to speak of its being pervaded by “an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop” (iii. 292). “Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1645. A MS. ‘Description of Barbados’ in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1651, says: ‘The chief fuddling they make in the Island is Rumbullion, alias Kill-Devil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor.’ G. Warren’s Description of Surinam, 1681, shows the word in its present short term: ‘Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes . . . called Kill-Devil in New England!’ ‘Rumbullion’ is a Devonshire word, meaning ‘a great tumult,’ and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumboiling, which sailors give to their grog.”—Academy, Sept. 5, 1885.

RUM-JOHNNY, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both, we believe, obsolete.

a. It was applied, according to Williamson, (V.M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Rumaz-dû, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahomedan names. [The Meery-johny Gully, of Calcutta (Curey, Good Old Days, .

139) perhaps in the same way derived its name from one Mir Jan.]

1810.—“Generally speaking, the present banians, who attach themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversion, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-johnnies of a larger growth.”—Williamson, V.M., i. 191.

b. Among soldiers and sailors, ‘a prostitute’; from Hind. rāmjanī, Skt. rāma-janī, ‘a pleasing woman,’ ‘a dancing-girl.’

[1799.—“... and the Rāmjanīs (Hindu dancing women) have been all day dancing and singing before the idol.”—Colebrooke, in Life, 163.]

1814.—“I lived near four years within a few fules of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the ramjannies or dancing-girls attached to the temples, in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctified indolence unknown in colder climates.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 127].

[1816.—“But we must except that class of females called ravjannas, or dancing-girls, who are attached to the temples.”—Asiatic Journal, n. 375, quoting Wathen, Tour to Madras and China.]

RUMNA, s. Hind. ramnā, Skt. rumāṇa, ‘causing pleasure,’ a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1760.—“Abdal Chah Cawn murdered at the Rumna in the month of March, 1760, by some of the Hercambes. . . .”—Van Sittart, i. 63.

1792.—“The Peshwa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his rumna (read rumna), or park, about four miles from Poonah. . . .”—Sir C. Malet, in Forbes, Or. Mem. [2nd ed. ii. 82]. (See also verses quoted under PAWNEE.)

RUNN (OF CUTOH), n.p. Hind. raṇ. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-waste, often covered by high tides, or by land-floods, which extends between the Peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. irina or irina, ‘a salt-swamp, a desert,’ [or of aranya, ‘a wilderness’]. The Runn is first mentioned in the Periplus, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

c. A.D. 80-90.—“But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irion, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift continual eddies extending far from the land.”—Periplus, § 40.

c. 1370.—“The guides had maliciously misled them into a place called the Kunchi-ran. In this place all the land is impregnated with salt, to a degree impossible to describe.”—Shams-i-Sirdj-Afsr, in Elliot, in. 321.

1533.—“Muzaffar fled, and crossed the Ran, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jervalmir. In some places the breadth of the water of the Ran is 10 loas and 20 loas. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of the water.”—Tabakat-i-Akbari, Ibid. v. 440.

c. 1590.—“Between Chalwanch, Sircar Ahmedabad, Puttan, and Surat, is a low tract of country, 90 coss in length, and in breadth from 7 to 30 coss, which is called Ran. Before the commencement of the periodical rains, the sea swells and inundates this spot, and leaves by degrees after the rainy season.”—Ayern, ed. Gladrin, 1800, ii. 71; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 219].

1819.—“On the morning of the 21th I embarked and landed about 6 p.m. in the Runn of Sindh.

“... a boggy syrtis, neither sea
Nor good dry land. . . .”

Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 11.

RUPEE, s. Hind. rāpiya, from Skt. rāpiya, ‘wrought silver.’ The standard coin of the Anglo-Indian monetary system, as it was of the Mahomedan Empire that preceded ours. It is commonly stated (as by Wil-on, in his article on this word, which contains much valuable and condensed information) that the rupee was introduced by Sher Shāh (in 1542). And this is, no doubt, formally true; but it is certain that a coin substantially identical with the rupee, i.e. approximating to a standard of 100 ratīs (or 175 grains troy) of silver, an ancient Hindu standard, had been struck by the Mahomedan sovereigns of Delhi in the 13th and 14th centuries, and had formed an important part of their currency. In fact, the capital coins of Delhi, from the time of Iyaltimish (A.D. 1211-1236) to the accession of Mahommed Tughlak (1325) were gold and silver pieces, respectively of the weight just mentioned. We gather from the statements of Ibn Batuta and his contemporaries that the gold coin, which the former generally calls tanga and sometimes gold dinār, was worth 10 of the silver coin, which he calls dinār, thus indicating that the relation of gold to silver value was, or had recently been, as 10:1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great “depreciation of gold” (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1330) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 176 grs. was readopted for gold, and was maintained till the time of Sher Shāh. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed’s successor Feroz Shāh, Mr. E. Thomas’s examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodi dynasty (i.e. 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into a state of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrafis (see ASHRAFEE) and dirhams, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humāyūn, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shāh, as above mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of rūpiya, which has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coin so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are four specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears obv. ‘THE RUPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. BY AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND; rev. KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE AND IRELAND.’ Wt. 167.8 gr. The fourth bears obv. ‘HON. SOC. ANG. IND. ORI.’ with a shield; rev. ‘A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM.—MON. BOMBAY. ANGLO-REGIUM.’ A* 7½. Weight 177.8 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz. the Sikka (see SICCA) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs., and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Farrukhabad, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165.215 of pure silver; the Demara Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174.76 grs., and contained 168.885 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chalāni or ‘current’ rupee of account, in which the Company’s accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikhas. [“The bhāri or Company’s Arcot rupee was coined at Calcutta, and was in value 3½ per cent. less than the Sikka rupee” (Derividge, Bakaryanj, 99).] The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178.32 grs.; its pure silver 161.94. The Rupee at Madras (where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see PAGODA) was originally that of the Nawab of the Carnatic (or ‘Nabob of Arcot’) and was usually known as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 169.20 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other, perhaps from commerce between those places and the ‘Coast,’ the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) “formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and

* The term Sonaut rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and unification of the Indian coinage in 1823, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly a noun, pl. of Ar. sonat(s), a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, coins deteriorated in value, in comparison with the rupee of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed Sonaut or Sonaut. But in 1778, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 16th Jan or year of Shāh ‘Alam (the Mogul then reigning). And in all later uses of the term Sonaut it appears to be equivalent in value to the Farrukhabad rupee, or the modern “Company’s Rupee” (which was of the same standard).

Dacca Mints.' (1) (Prinsep, Useful Tables, ed. by E. Thomas, 24.)

These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (without any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional Sicca in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The Sicca was abolished as a coin by Act XIII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight and 165 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Farrukhabad Rupee.

Letter of James Rennell*, March 31.

RUSSUD, s. Pers. rasad. The provisions of grain, forage, and other necessities got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège. The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian month.

[c. 1640-50.—Rasad. (See under TANA.)

RUT, s. Hind. rath, 'a chariot.' Now applied to a native carriage drawn by a pony, or oxen, and used by women on a journey. Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days. [See ROOK.]

1829.—"This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 183.

RUTTEE, RETTEE, s. Hind. ratti, rati, Skt. raktika, from rakta, 'red.' The seed of a leguminous creeper

(Abrus precatorius, L.) sometimes called country liquorice—a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith's weight, and known in England as 'Crab's eyes.' Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient ratti may be taken as equal to 1.75 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., Pt. I. pp. 12-14). This work of Mr. Thomas contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of basing standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Maun (viii. 132): "The very small mote which may be discerned in a sunbeam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a trasarepu. 133. Eight of these trasarepus are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (likhyā), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (ruja-sarshapa), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaura-sarshapa). 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (yava), three such barley-corns to one krishnala (or raktika), five krishnalas of gold are one māsha, and sixteen such māshas one surarna," &c. (ibid. p. 13). In the Ain, Abul Fazl calls the ratti surkh, which is a translation (Pers. for 'red'). In Persia the seed is called chashm-i-khurā, 'Cock's eye' (see Blodmann's E.T., i. 16 n., and Jarrett, ii. 354). Further notices of the rattī used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot's Coins of Madras (p. 49). Sir Walter's experience is that the rattī of the gem-dealers is a double rattī, and an approximation to the manjādi (see MANGELIN). This accounts for Tavernier's valuation at 3½ grs. [Mr. Ball gives the weight at 2.66 Troy grs. (Tavernier, ii. 448).]

c. 1676.—"At the mine of Soumelpour in Bengala, they weigh by Rattī's, and the Rattī is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 140 [ed. Ball, ii. 89].

RYOT, s. Ar. ra'iyat, from ra'ā, 'to pasture,' meaning originally, according to its etymology, 'a herd at pasture'; but then 'subjects' (collectively). It is by natives used for 'a subject' in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to 'a tenant of the soil'; an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator. In Turkey the word, in the form raya, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Kharāj, or Jizya (see JEZYA).

[1609.—"Blats or clownes." (See under DOAL.)]

1776.—"For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment . . . and the Ryots were nourished with piety and morality."—Halket, Gentoo Cod., 41.

1789.—

"To him in a body the Ryots complain'd That their houses were burnt, and their cattle distrain'd."

The Letters of Simplin the Second, &c. 11.

1790.—"A rayot is rather a farmer than a husbandman."—Colebrooke, in Life, 42.

1809.—"The ryots were all at work in their fields."—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1813.—

"And oft around the cavern fire
On visionary schemes debate,
To snatch the Rayahs from their fate."

Byron, Bride of Abydos.

1820.—"An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayots, the various tenures . . . the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and soverans (see SOWCAR) respecting loans and advances . . . is essential to a judge."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, ii. 17.

1870.—"Ryot is a word which is much . . . misused. It is Arabic, but no doubt comes through the Persian. It means 'protected one,' 'subject,' 'a commoner,' as distinguished from 'Races' or 'noble.' In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in that of tenant."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 166.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said; it is Races and Raiyat.

1877.—"The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam . . . and the rayahs or infidel subjects of the Sultan, was the payment of haratch or capitation tax."—Finlay, H. of Greece, v. 22 (ed. 1877).

1884.—"Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere, except in the Cyclades, . . . seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece; whilst the Rayahs, as the Turks style their non-Muslim subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the metayer system."—Murray's Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 64.

RYOTWARRY, adj. A technicality of modern coinage. Hind. from Pers. ra'yatwār, formed from the preceding. The ryotwarry system is that under which the settlement for land revenue is made directly by the Government agency with each individual cultivator holding land, not with the village community, nor with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual. It is the system which chiefly prevails in the Madras Presidency, and was elaborated there in its present form mainly by Sir T. Munro 1824—"It has been objected to the ryotwārī system that it produces unequal assessment and destroys ancient rights and privileges but these opinions seem to originate in some misapprehension of its nature."—Minutes, &c., of Sir T. Munro, i. 265. We may observe that the spelling here is not Munro's. The Editor, Sir A. Arbuthnot, has followed a system (see Preface, p. x.), and we see in Gleg's Life (iii. 355) that Munro wrote 'Rayetwar.'

S

SABAIO, ÇABAIO, &c., n.p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahommedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bāhmanī kingdom of the Decan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 15th century, became the founder of the 'Adil Shāhī family which reigned in Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see IMALCAN). His real name was Abdul Muzaffar Yūsuf, with the surname Sabāī or Sarāī. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2) that he had this name from being a native of Sāra in Persia [see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 404] Garcia de Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sāhib (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Albuquerque, ii. 82), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that "the word may possibly be connected with sipāhī, Arabic, a soldier," is quite inadmissible (nor is sipāhī Arabic). [On this word Mr. Whiteway writes: "In his explanation of this word Sir H. Yule has been misled by Barros Couto (Dec. iv. Bk. 10 ch. 4) is conclusive, where he says: 'This Çufo extended the limits of his rule as far as he could till he went in person to conquer the island of Goa, which was a valuable possession for its income, and was in possession of a lord of Canara, called Saray, a vassal of the King of Canara, who then had his headquarters at what we call Old Goa. . . . As there was much jungle here, Saray, the lord of Goa, had certain houses where he stayed for hunting. . . . These houses still preserve the memory of the Hindu Saray, as they are called the Savayo's house, where for many years the Governors of India lived. As our João de Barros could not get true information of these things, he confounded the name of the Hindu Saray with that of Çufo (? Yūsuf) Adil Shāh, saying in the 5th Book of his 2nd Decade that when we went to India a Moor called Soay was lord of Goa, that we ordinarily called him Sabayo, and that he was a vassal of the King of the Decan, a Persian, and native of the city of Sāra. At this his sons laughed heartily when we read it to them, saying that their father was anything but a Turk, and his name anything but Çufo.' This passage makes it clear that the origin of the word is the Hindu title Sīrūr, Hind. Saudī, 'having the excess of a fourth,' 'a quarter better than other people,' which is one of the titles of the Mahārājā of Jaypur. To show that it was more or less well known, I may point to the little State of Sunda, which lay close to Goa on the S.E., of which the Rāja was of the Vijayanagar family. This little State became independent after the destruction of Vijayanagar, and remained in existence till absorbed by Tippoo Sultan. In this State Sīrūr was a common honorific of the ruling family. At the same time Barros was not alone in calling Adil Shāh the Sabaio (see Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 24), where the name occurs. The mistake having been made, everyone accepted it."]

There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishita, that the Sabalo was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Agi Murad (or 'Amurath') II., who was saved from murder at his father's death, and placed in the hands of 'Imad-ud-din, a Persian merchant of Savā, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Decan (Briggs, Firishita, iii. 7-8).

1510.—"But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Sabalo had taken it from the Hindoos."—Dalboquerque, ii. 96.

"In this island (Goa called Goga) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Savalu, who has 400 Mamelukes, he himself being also a Mameluke. . . ."—Parthema, 116.

1516.—"Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Dagum (Decan), and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining in the interior; and in it there was a great Lord, as vassal of the said King (of Decan) called Sabayo, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Cabaym Hydalcan. . . ."—Jarrois, Lisbon ed. 287.

1563.—"O. . . . And returning to our subject, as Adel in Persian means 'justice,' they called the prince of these territories Adelhām, as it were 'Lord of Justice.'

"I. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabalo?

"O. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name; but I afterwards came to know that in fact sabalo in Arabic means 'lord.' . . ."—Garcia, i. 36.

SADERAS, SADRASPATAM, n.p. This name of a place 42 m. south of Madras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Madraspatam. The correct name is Sadurā, but it is sometimes made into Sadrang- and Shatranj-patam. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Shaluvrangappatanam, Skt.

chatur-anga, 'the four military arms, infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars.'] Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sandraslapatam, which is probably a misprint, for Sandraslapatam.

1672.—"From Tirepoplier you come . . . to Sadraspatam, where our people have a Factory."—Baldarus, 152.

1726.—"The name of the place is properly Sadrangapatam; but for short it is also called Sadrampatam, and most commonly Sadraspatam. In the Tellinga it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means 'thousand troubles' or the Shah-board which we call chess."—Valentin, Choromandel, 11. The curious explanation of Shatranj or 'chess,' as 'a thousand troubles,' is no doubt some popular etymology; such as P. and-anj, 'a hundred gruels.' The word is really of Sanskrit origin, from Chaturangam, literally, 'quadripartite'; the four constituent parts of an army, viz. horse, foot, chariots and elephants.

[1727.—"Saderass, or Saderass Patam." (See under LONG-CLOTH.)]

c. 1780.—"J'avois pensé que Sadras auroit été le lieu où devoient finir mes contrariétés et mes courses."—Laufner, i. 141.

"Non, je ne suis point Anglois," m'écriai-je avec indignation et transport; "je suis un Hollandois de Sadrangapatnam."—Ibid. 151.

1781.—"The chief officer of the French now despatched a summons to the English commandant of the Fort to surrender, and the commandant, not being of opinion he could resist . . . evacuated the fort, and proceeded by sea in boats to Sudrung Pattun."—H. of Hydur Naik, 447.

SAFFLOWER, s. The flowers of the annual Carthamus tinctorius, L. (N.O. Compositae), a considerable article of export from India for use of a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed 'bastard saffron.' The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the 'striving after meaning.' For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half, to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, usfur. This word we find in medieval trade-lists (e.g. in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as usfiore, asfirole, ustifiore, zaffrole, saffiore; from the last of which the transition to safflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna it seems to be called Crocus hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given hasfor. Another Arabic name for this article is kurkum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist's carthamus. In Hind. it is called Lusumbha or Lusum. Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

c. 1200. — "Usfur . . . At Havsu. This plant yields a coloring matter, used in dyeing. There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurkum." — Ibn Battar, ii. 196.

c. 1317. — "Affiore vuol esser fresco, e asciutto, e colorito rosso in colore di lion saffrono, e non giallo, e chiaro a uolo di femonella di saffrono, e che non sia trandato, che quando è vecchio e trandato si spolverizza, e fae vermint." — Pagolo, 372.

1612. — "The two Indian ships above-mentioned did discharge these goods following . . . osfar, which is a red dye, great quantity" — Capt. Sars, in Peregrin, i. 317.

[1657-8. — " . . . molder, safflower, arg. dl, cartharum. . . . — List of Goods Imported, in Hutchins. Report on Old Records, 76.]

1810. — "Le safran tiré de carthame, nommé dans le commerce safran, est appelé par les Arabes . . . osfour ou . . . karkum. Suivant M. Bonaldi, le premier nom désigne la plante, et le second, ses graines." — Silv. de Sars, Note on Metallurg., p. 123.

1813. — "Safflower (Crocus, Hind., As four Arab) is the flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus tinctorius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste." — Milne, ii. 238.

SAFFRON, s. Arab. safranin. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called acafuão da terra ('country saffron.') The Hind. name is haldi, or in the Deccan halad, [Skt. haridra, hari, 'green, yellow']. Garcin de Orta calls it croc Induice, 'Indian saffron.' Indeed, Dory shows that the Arab. kurkum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. curcuma) is probably taken from the Greek κρόκος or olil, κρόκος.

Moodeen Sherif says that kurkum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1299. — "The Persians call this root al-Hand, and the inhabitants of Bera call it al-Kurkum, and al-Kurkum is Saffron. They call these plants Saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does." — Ibn Battar, ii. 370.

1561. — "R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call 'country saffron.'

"O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arab's and Persia. In this city (Gua) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e. in Canara and Calcutta. The Canarins call the root al-Hand, and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it safran, and the Malays carot; the Persians, dizwan, which is as much as to say 'yellow-wood.' The Arabs call it al-Hand; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India." — Garcin, i. 78. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1729. — "Curcuma, or Indian Saffron." — Valestin, 47. c. 42.

SAGAR-PESHA, s. Camp-safflower, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hind. as written above, is Pers. shagird-peshā (lit. shagird, 'a disciple, a servant,' and peshā, 'business').

[1767. — "Sagur Depersah say. . ." — In Lang, 513.]

SAGO, s. From Malay sagih. The farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metrostylon laeve, Mart., and M. Rumphii, Willd., found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and S. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1293. — "They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330.—"But as for the trees which produce flour, tis after this fashion. . . . And the result is the best pasta in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cakes of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Prior Odoric, have eaten."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 32.

1522.—"Their bread (in Tidoro) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there: then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages."—Pignatta, Hak. Soc. p. 136. This is a bad description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree.

1552.—"There are also other trees which are called sagus, from the pith of which bread is made."—Catanheda, vi. 21.

1553.—"Generally, although they have some millet and rice, all the people of the Isles of Maluco eat a certain food which they call Sagan, which is the pith of a tree like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark."—Barro, III. v. 5.

1579.—". . . and a Kind of meale which they call Sago, made of the toppes of certaine trees, tasting in the Mouth like some curle, but molts away like sugar."—Dral's Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

"Also in a list of 'Certaine Wordes of the Naturall Language of Iauu': 'Sagu, bread of the Country.'"—Hakl. iv. 246.

c. 1690.—"Primo Sagu genuina, Malaico Sagu, sive Lapia tani, h.o. vern Sagu."—Rumphius, i. 76. (We cannot make out the language of lapia tani.)

1727.—"And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagow, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun."—A. Hamilton, ii. 93; [ed. 1744].

SAGWIRE, s. A name applied often in books, and formerly at least, in the colloquial use of European settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance in its rural economy. The name is Port. saguira (analogous to palmeira), in Span. of the Indies sagiran, and no doubt is taken from sagu, as the tree, though not the Sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus Gomutus, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blow-pipe, or Sumpitan (see SARBATANE). "The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of 'hell-water' (Cræfurd, Desc. Dict. p. 146). The term sagwire is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515.—"They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur, and of this they make bread."—Gior. da Lupoli, 66.

1615.—"Oryza tamen magna hic copia, ingens etiam modus arborum quas Saguras vocant, quæque varia suggerunt comoda."—Jarric, i. 201.

1631.—". . . tertia frequens est in Banda ac reliquis insulis Moluccis, quæ distillat ex arbore non dissimili Palmas Indicæ, e quo potus indigenis Sagur vocatur. . . ."—Jac. Donth, Dial. iv. p. 9.

1781.—"The natives drink much of a liquor called sagwire, drawn from the palm-tree."—Forrest, Meyeri, 73.

1820.—"The Portuguese, I know not for what reason, and other European nations who have followed them, call the tree and the liquor sagwire."—Cræfurd, Hist. i. 401.

SAHIB, s. The title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sahib, Collector Sahib, Lord Sahib, and even Sergeant Sahib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sahib! 'Sir!' In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to 'Master'; and it is occasionally used as a specific title both among Hindus and Musulmans, e.g. Appa Sahib, Tipa Sahib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khān Sāhib, Nawab Sāhib, Raja Sāhib. The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion'; (sometimes a companion of Mahommed). [In the Arabian Nights it is the title of a Wazir (Burton, i. 218).]

1673.—" . . . To which the subtle Hethen replied, Sahab (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fryer, 417.

1699.—"Thus the distracted Husband in his Indian English contest, English fashion, Sab, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Orington, 323.

1853.—"He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Gulfield, ii. 252.

1878.—" . . . forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mogul, i. 191.

[ST. DEAVES, n.p. A corruption of the name of the island of Sandrip in the Bay of Bengal, situated off the coast of Chittagong and Noakhali, which is best known in connection with the awful loss of life and property in the cyclone of 1876.

a. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sindān of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. [Doshai Framji, Hist. of the Parsees, i. 30.] The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20° 12' and lies 83 m north of Bombay, is apparently Sayām (see Hist. of Cambay, in Bo. Got. Solutions, No. xxvi., N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanjān. E. B. Esauwick in J. Bo. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "Kishāh-i-Sanjān, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India." Sanjān is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Umhargām. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanjān is found, for miles around, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302, [and for medieval references to the place, ibid. I. Pt. i. 262, 520 seq.].

c. 1150.—"Sindān is 1½ mile from the sea. . . . The town is large and has an extensive commerce both in exports and imports."—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. 85.

c. 1599.—

"When the Dastur saw the soil was good, He selected the place for their residence: The Dastur named the spot Sanjan, And it became populous as the Land of Iran."—Kishāh, &c., as above, p. 179.

c. 1616.—"The alder Nargul . . . in the lands of Damun was infected by Mahitar Moors in their paris, who commonly landed there for water and provisions, and plundered the boats that entered or quitted the river, and the passengers who crossed it, with heavy loss to the aldeas adjoining the river, and to the revenue from them, as well as to that from the custom-house of Sangens."—Boeraro, Decada, 670.

1623.—"La mattina seguente, fatto giorno, scoprimmo terra di lontano . . . In un luogo poco discosto da Buxalin, che gl' Inglesi chiamano Terra di San Giovanni; ma nella carta da navigare vidi esser notato, in lingua Portoghese, col nome d'ilhas das ruínas, o 'sola delle ruache' al modo nostro."—J. della Valle, ii. 500; [Hak. Soc. i. 16].

1630.—"It happened that in a sly they made to the land of St. Johns on the shores of India."—Levi, The Religion of the Persians, 3.

1641.—"Besides these four ports there are in the said district four *Tamudar*s (see TANADAR), or different Captainships, called Sangēs (St. John's), Dand, Mann, and Trapor."—Boeraro (Port. MS.).

1673.—"In a Week's Time we turned it up, sailing by Bagein, Tamapore, Valentine's Peak, St. John's, and Daman, the last City northward on the Continent, belonging to the Portuguese."—Fryer, 82.

1803.—"They (the Parsee emigrants) landed at Diun, and lived there 19 years; but, disliking the place . . . the greater part of them left it and came to the Guerat coast, in vessels which anchored off Sorjan, the name of a town."—R. Drummond.

1813.—"The Parsees or Guehres . . . continued in this place (Diun) for some time, and then crossing the Gulph, landed at Suzan, near Nunareo, which is a little to the southward of Surat."—Forbes, Or. Men. i. 102; [2nd ed. i. 78].

1811.—"The high land of St. John, about 3 leagues inland, has a regular appearance. . . ."—Horsburgh's Directory, ed. 1811, i. 470.

1872.—"In connexion with the landing of the Parsees at Sanjān, in the early part of the 8th century, there still exist copies of the 16 Sanskrit Nalas, in which their Nobeds explained their religion to Jadē Rānā, the Rājā of the place, and the reply he gave them."—Ind. Antiq. i. 214. The Slokas are given. See them also in Doshai Framji's Hist. of the Parsees, i. 31.

b. ST. JOHN'S ISLAND, n.p. This again is a corruption of San-

Shan, or more correctly Shung-chuang, the Chinese name of an island about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1552.—“Inde nos ad Sancianum, Sinarum insulam a Cantone millia pas. circiter exx Deus porduxit incolumes.”—Seti. Franc. Xaverii Epist., Prague 1667, IV. xiv.

1637.—“We came to Anchor the same Day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 32 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quantung or Canton in China.”—Dampier, i. 306.

1727.—“A Portuguese Ship . . . being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa.”—A. Hamilton, i. 252; [ed. 1744, ii. 255].

1780.—“St. John's,” in Dunn's New Directory, 472.

c. ST. JOHN'S ISLANDS. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name, of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sikajang, [or as Dennys (Desc. Dict. 321) writes the word, Pulo Skijang].

SAIVA, s. A worshipper of Siva; Skt. Saitra, adj., ‘belonging to Siva.’

1651.—“The second sect of the Bramins, ‘Selviá’ . . . by name, say that a certain Entum is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him.”—Rogers, 17.

1807.—“This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest shrine in India, at least among the Shaivites.”—By. Milman, in Memoirs, p. 48.

SALA, s. Hind. sālā, ‘brother-in-law,’ i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

[1856.—“Another reason (for infanticide) is the blind pride which makes them hate that any man should call them sala, or Sussoor—brother-in-law, or father-in-law.”—Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, 610.]

1861.—“Another of these popular Paris sayings is ‘et tu sœur!’ which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark sālā, ‘brother-in-law,’ is to a Hindoo.”—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, 326.

SALAAM, s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Mahomedans to each other. Arab. sālm, ‘peace.’ Used for any act of salutation; or for ‘compliments.’

[c. 60 A.C.—

“ΑΛΛ' εἰ μὲν Σέρος ἐστί “Σαλᾶμ,” εἰ δ' οὐν σὺ γε φολιγέ “Ναῖδες,” εἰ δ' Ἑλλην “Χαῖρε.” τὸ δ' αὐτὸ φράσον.”

—Melagros, in Anthologia Palatina, vii. 149.

The point is that he has been a bird of passage, and says good-bye now to his various resting-places in their own tongue.]

1513.—“The ambassador (of Binnagar) entering the door of the chamber, the Governor rose from the chair on which he was seated, and stood up while the ambassador made him great calema.”—Correa, Lemtas, II. i. 377. See also p. 431.

1552.—“The present having been seen he took the letter of the Governor, and read it to him, and having read it told him how the Governor sent him his calema, and was at his command with all his fleet, and with all the Portuguese. . . .”—Castanheda, iii. 445.

1611.—“Calema. The salutation of an inferior.”—Cobarrurias, Sp. Dict. s.v.

1626.—“Ileo (Solim i.e. Jahāngir) turneth over his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himself to the people to receive their salames or good morrow. . . .” —Purchas, Pilgrimage, 623.

1638.—“En entrant ils se salient de leur Salom qu'ils accompagnent d'une profonde inclination.”—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 223.

1648.—“ . . . this salutation they call salam; and it is made with bending of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head.”—Van Tienst, 55.

1689.—“The Salem of the Religious Bramins, is to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out.”—Orington, 183.

1691.—“The Town Conicopolles, and chief inhabitants of Egnore, came to make their Salaam to the President.”—H'keeler, i. 281.

1717.—“I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schalam.”—Philipp's Act. 62.

1800.—“The old priest was at the door, and with his head uncovered, to make his salamas.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 273.

1813.—

“‘Ho! who art thou!’—‘This low salam Replies, of Moslem faith I am.’”

Byron, The Giaour.

1832.—“Il me rendit tous les salamas que je fis autrefois au ‘Grand Mogol.’”—Jacquemont, Corresp. II. 137.

1844.—“All chiefs who have made their salam are entitled to carry arms personally.”—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

SALAK, s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation.

It is the fruit of a species of ratan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotan-salak.

1763-71. — "The salac (Calamus rotang salacca) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry." — Saururus, L.T. i. 211.

SALEB, SALEP, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times, have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures', but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Baithar with the Satyrium of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Ar. (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khu-i-al-hu'lab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis'; but it is commonly known in India as gū'lab migri, i.e. Salep of Egypt, or popularly salep-misree. In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Eulophia, found in Kashmir and the Lower Himalaya. Saloop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London, is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared. [In 1889 a correspondent to Notes & Queries (7 ser. vii. 35) stated that "within the last twenty years saloop vendors might have been seen plying their trade in the streets of London. The term saloop was also applied to an infusion of the sassafras bark or wood. In Pereira's Materia Medica, published in 1850, it is stated that 'sassafras tea, flavoured with milk and sugar, is sold at daybreak in the streets of London under the name of saloop.' Saloop in balls is still sold in London, and comes mostly from Smyrna."]

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salif; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognised the tha'lab, ra'lab in its Indian pronunciation.

c. 1310. — "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian ri'ls of flour . . . 1000 of meat, a large number of ri'ls (how many I don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of salif, of areca, and 1000 leaves of betel." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 332.

1727. — "They have a fruit called Saleb, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard . . . and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are. . . . They are of opinion that it is a great restorative." — 1. Hamilton, i. 123; [ed. 1711, i. 123].

[1751. — In his list of Indian drugs Ives (p. 41) gives "Rad. Salop, Persia Rs. 35 per maund."]

1833. — "Saleb Misree, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritive for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each. . . . It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce." — Doc. of articles found in Bazaars of Calcutta. In Punjab Trade Report, 1862, App. vi.

1882 (1). — "Here we knock against an ambulant salep-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against roaming oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, pedlars with cakes, fellows offering dainty little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser." — Lectonia, The Capital of Cyprus, ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

SALEM, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Sheram, which is perhaps a corruption of Chera, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced. ["According to one theory the town of Salem is said to be identical with Seran or Sheran, and occasionally to have been named Sheralan; when S. India was divided between the three dynasties of Chola, Sera and Pandia, according to the generally accepted belief, Karur was the place where the three territorial divisions met; the boundary was no doubt subject to vicissitudes, and at one time possibly Salem or Serar was a part of Sera." — Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 18.]

SALEMPPOORY, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under PALEMPPORE. [The Madras Gloss., deriving the word from Tel. sāle, 'weaver,' pura, Skt. 'town,' describes it as "a kind of cotton cloth formerly manufactured at Nellore; half the length of ordinary Punjuns" (see PIECE-GOODS). The third quotation indicates that it was sometimes white.]

[1598. — "Sarampuras." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 95.

[1611. — "I . . . was only doubtful about the white Bettelas and Salempurya." — Danvers, Letters, i. 155.

[1614. — "Salampora, being a broad white cloth." — Foster, ibid. ii. 32.]

1680. — "Certain goods for Bantam priced as follows:—

"Salampores, Blew, at 14 Pagodas per corge. . . ." — Fl. St. Geo. Consn., April 22. In Notes and Exts. iii. 16; also ibid. p. 24.

1747. — "The Warehousekeeper reported that on the 1st inst. when the French entered our Bounds and attacked us . . . it appeared that 5 Pieces of Long Cloth and 10 Pieces of Salampores were stolen, That Two Pieces of Salampores were found upon a Peon . . . and the Person detected is ordered to be severely whipped in the Face of the Publick. . . ." — Fl. St. David Consn., March 30 (MS. Records in India Office).

c. 1780. — "I . . . en l'on y fabriquoit différentes espèces de toiles de coton, telles que salempouris." — Hagfner, ii. 461.

SALIGRAM, s. Skt. Śālagrāma (this word seems to be properly the name of a place, 'Village of the Śāla-tree'—a real or imaginary tīrtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahābhārata). [Other and less probable explanations are given by Oppert, Anc. Inhabitants, 337.] A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Son, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil ammonite. The śālagrāma is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the Brahmans; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine. In May 1883 a śālagrāma was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindus of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question arose regarding the identity of a śālagrāma, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindus, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into Court, because of the coir-matting, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Ilbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengallee newspaper, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted Civil Service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

c. 1590. — "Salgram is a black stone which the Hindoos hold sacred. . . . They are found in the river Sown, at the distance of 40 coss from the mouth." — Ayeen, Gladiwin's E.T. 1800, ii. 25; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 150].

1782. — "Avant de finir l'histoire de Vichenou, je ne puis me dispenser de parler de la pierre de Salagraman. Elle n'est autre chose qu'une coquille pétrifiée du genre des cornes d'Ammon: les Indiens prétendent qu'elle représente Vichenou, parcequ'ils en ont découvert de neuf nuances différentes, ce qu'ils rapportent aux neuf incarnations de ce Dieu. . . . Cette pierre est aux sectateurs de Vichenou ce que le Lingam est à ceux de Chiven." — Sonnerat, i. 307.

[1822. — "In the Nerbuddah are found those types of Shiva, called Salgrammas, which are sacred pebbles held in great estimation all over India." — Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 296.]

1824. — "The shalgramū is black, hollow, and nearly round; it is found in the Gunduk River, and is considered a representation of Vishnoo. . . . The Shalgramū is the only stone that is naturally divine; all the other stones are rendered sacred by incantations." — Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 43.

1885. — "My father had one (a Salagram). It was a round, rather flat, jet black, small, shining stone. He paid it the greatest reverence possible, and allowed no one to touch it, but worshipped it with his own hands. When he became ill, and as he would not allow a woman to touch it, he made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present."—Sundarābāi, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 109. The sālagrāma is in fact a Hindu fetish.

* Like the Batrōnion which the Greeks got through the Semitic nations. In Ptolemy there are extracts from Damascius (Life of Isidore the Philosopher), which speak of the stones called Battulos and Battulon, which were objects of worship, gave oracles, and were apparently used in healing. These appear, from what is stated, to have been meteoric stones. There were many in Lebanon (see Phot. Biblioth., ed. 1653, pp. 1047, 1062-3).

SALLABAD, s. This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exactions of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, sālābād, 'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a factitious word from Pers. sāl, 'year,' and Ar. abād, 'ages.'

[1630.—"Salabad." See under ROOCKA.]

1703.—"... although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Sallabad (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not recited here as grievances."—In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716.—"The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions:—That for anything which has yet appeared the Comatoes (Gomats) may cry out their Ponnagundoo Nagarum . . . at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c., according to Salabad but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillary. . . ."—Ibid. 231.

1783.—"Sallabaud. (Usual Custom). A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

SALOOTREE, SALUSTREE, s. Hind. Salotar, Salotri. A native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahomedan. But the word is taken from the Skt. name Sālīhotra, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists in a form more or less modified and imperfect. "A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th century), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyāsu-d dīn Muhammad Shāh Khiljī. This rare book, called Kur-tu-l-Mulk, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Salotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brahman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says the translation was made 'from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels.'"* (Elliot, v. 573-4.)

a. A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive caves of Kānhēri (see KENNEEY). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Queen Catherine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Mahrattas took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the islands (Salinas). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shāshī, from Shāshashī, meaning 'Sixty-six' (Skt. Shat-shashī), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages. This name occurs in the form Shat-sashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Bo. J. R. As. Soc. xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Naura, "one of the 66 of Sri Shānaka (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J. R. As. Soc. ii. 383). I have to thank Mr. J. M. Campbell, C.S.I., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

b. Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Velhas Conquistas or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1)

* "It is curious that without any allusion to this work, another on the Veterinary Art, styled Salotari, and said to comprise in the Sanskrit original 16,000 ślokas, was translated in the reign of Shāh Jahan . . . by Saiyad 'Abdulla Khan Bahadur Firoz Jang, who had found it among some other Sanskrit books which . . . had been plundered from Amr Singh, Rānā of Citor."

the Ilhas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsette on the southern mainland. The port of Marmagaon, which is the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsette. The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsette; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Tiçoari, meaning (Mahr.) Tis-wādi, "30 hamlets." [See BARGANY.]

A.D. 1186.—"I, Aparāditya ("the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Kōṭkann, the most illustrious King") have given with a libation of water 24 drachms, after exempting other taxes, from the fixed revenue of the cart in the village of Mahauli, connected with Shat-shashti." — Inscription edited by Pandit Bhagavāntāl Indrajī, in J. Do. Br. R. A. S. xii. 332. [And see Bombay Gazetteer, I. Pt. ii. 514, 567.]

S. Botelho, Tombo, 142.

1538.—"Beyond the Isle of Elephanta (do Alifante) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues long by 5 in breadth. On the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephanta, on the east the mainland, and on the west the I. of Bombai or of Boa Vida. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts, and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city called Thana; and a league and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete; both one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (destrôito) and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen."—João de Castro, Primo Roteiro da Índia, 69-70.

"And to the Tanadar (tenadar) of Salsete 30,000 reis.

"He has under him 12 peons (pidés) of whom the said governor takes 7; leaving him 5, which at the aforesaid rate amount to 10,800 reis.

"And to a Parvu (see PARVOE) that he has, who is the country writer . . . and having the same pay as the Tenadar Mor, which is 3 pardaos a month, amounting in a year at the said rate to 10,800 reis."—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 211-212.

1610.—"Frey Manuel do S. Mathias, guardian of the convent of St. Francis in Goa, writes to me that . . . in Goa alone there are 90 resident friars; and besides in Baçaim and its adjuncts, viz., in the Island of Salsete and other districts of the north they have 13 parishes (Freguezias) of native Christians with vicars; and five of the convents have colleges, or seminaries where they bring up little orphans; and that the said Ward of Goa extends 300 leagues from north to south."—Livros das Monções, 298.

[1674.—"From whence these Pieces of Land receive their general Name of Salset . . . either because it signifies in Canorein a Granary. . . ."—Fryer, 62.]

c. 1760.—"It was a melancholy sight on the loss of Salsett, to see the many families forced to seek refuge on Bombay, and among them some Portuguese Haidagos or noblemen, reduced of a sudden from very flourishing circumstances to utter beggary."—Grose, i. 72.

[1768.—"Those lands are comprised in 66 villages, and from this number it is called Salsette."—Foral of Salsete, India Office MS.]

1777.—"The acquisition of the Island of Salset, which in a manner surrounds the Island of Bombay, is sufficient to secure the latter from the danger of a famine."—Perris's Tracts, i. 101.

1808.—"The island of Sashty (corrupted by the Portuguese into Salsette) was conquered by that Nation in the year of Christ 1534, from the Mohammodan Prince who was then its Sovereign; and thereupon parcelled out, among the European subjects of Her Most Faithful Majesty, into village allotments, at a very small Foro or quit-rent."—Bombay, Regn. I. of 1808, sec. ii.

1510.—"And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and Antraz, scouring the districts and the tanadars, and placing in them by his own hand tanadars and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, inasmuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money."—Correa, ii. 161.

1546.—"We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Idalkaa (Idalkaan) promise and swear on our Koran (no novo moçaffo), and by the head of my eldest son, that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Bardeas, which I have made contract and donation of to His Highness,

I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the Subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idalrao, who was formerly called Idalgio (Adil Khan).—Notelho, Tombo, 40.

1693.—"On the South side of the Island of Goa, where the river runneth againe into the Sea, there cometh euen out with the coast a land called Salsotte, which is also vnder the subiection of the Portugales, and is . . . planted both with people and fruito."—Lincolsten, 51, [Hak. Soc. i. 177].

1692.—"Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1516) Idalxa (Adil Shah) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Salsote and Barid's, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of the Moor Kings of Visapor."—Cochin, IV. x. 1.

SALWEN, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lu-liang. The Burmese form is Than-tsen, but the original form is probably Shān. ["The Salween River, which empties itself into the sea at Maulmain, rivals the Irrawaddy in length but not in importance" (Forbes, British Burma, 8).]

SAMBOOK, s. Ar. sanbul, and sanbul (there is a Skt. word śambhala, 'a bivalve shell, but we are unable to throw any light on any possible transfer); a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. Pt. ii. 470.] It is smaller than the bagalt (see BUGGALOW), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go inside the reefs. Burton renders the word 'a foyst,' which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in the last but one quotation below.

c. 330.—"It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Makdashau) that the Sultan's sanbul board her to ask whence the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 183; also see pp. 17, 181, &c.

1493.—"The Zambuco came loaded with doves-dong, which they have in those islands, and which they were carrying, it being merchandize for Cambay, where it is used in dyeing cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

"In the curious Vocabulary of the language of Calicut, at the end of the Noteto of Vasco da Gama, we find: "Barcas; Cambuco."

1506.—"Questo Capitano si prese uno zambuco molto ricco, veniva dalla Mecha per Colocut."—Leonardo da' Mussi, 17.

1510.—"As to the names of their ships, some are called Sambuchl, and these are flat-bottomed."—Varthema, 151.

1516.—"Item—our Captain Major, or Captain of Cochim shall give passes to secure the navigation of the ships and zambucos of their ports . . . provided they do not carry spices or drugs that we require for our cargoes, but if such be found, for the first occasion they shall lose all the spice and drugs so laden, and on the second they shall lose both ship and cargo, and all may be taken as prize of war."—Treaty of Lopo Sarm with Coulão (Quillon), in Notelho, Tombo, Sulidino, p. 32.

[1516.—"Zambucos." See under ARECA.]

1518.—"Zambuquo." See under PROW.

1543.—"Item—that the Zambuquos which shall trade in his port in rice or solo (paddy) and cottons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Martin Affonso de Sousa with Corlan, in Notelho, Tombo, 37.

[1514.—"Sambouk." See under DHOW.]

1553.—"Our pilgrim ship . . . was a Sambuk of about 400 ardils (50 tons), with narrow wedge-like bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undecked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular lateen. . . ."—Burton, Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Meccah, i. 276; [Memorial ed. i. 189].

1553.—"The vessels of the Arabs called Sombuk are small Baggelows of 80 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward into a sharp prow, the after part of the vessel is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a sprit that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. von Arnim, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., xli. 420.

1890.—"The small sailing boat with one sail, which is called by the Arabs 'Jambuk' with which I went from Hodeida to Aden."—Letter in Athenaeum, March 13, p. 340.

[1900.—"We scrambled into a sambouka crammed and stuffed with the baggage."—Bent, Southern Arabia, 220.]

SAMBRE, SAMBUR, s. Hind. sabar, sambar; Skt. sambara. A kind of stag (Rusa Aristotelis, Jerdon: [Blanford, Mammalia, 543 seqq.]) the elk of S. Indian sportsmen; ghaus of Bengal; jerrow (garáo) of the Himalaya; the largest of Indian stags, and found in all the large forests of India. The word is often applied to the soft leather, somewhat resembling chamois leather, prepared from the hide.

1673. — " . . . Our usual diet was of spotted deer, Sabre, wild Hogs and sometimes wild Cows." — Fryer, 175.

[1813. — "Here he saw a number of deer, and four large sabirs or samboos, one considerably bigger than an ox. . . ." — Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 400.]

[1900. — "The Sambu stags which Lord Powerscourt turned out in his glens. . . ." — Spectator, December 15, p. 833.]

SAMPAN, s. A kind of small boat or skiff. The word appears to be Javanese and Malay. It must have been adopted on the Indian shores, for it was picked up there at an early date by the Portuguese; and it is now current all through the further East. [The French have adopted the Annamite form tamban.] The word is often said to be originally Chinese, 'sanpan,' = 'three boards,' and this is possible. It is certainly one of the most ordinary words for a boat in China. Moreover, we learn, on the authority of Mr. E. C. Baber, that there is another kind of boat on the Yangtse which is called wu-pan, 'five boards.' Giles however says: "From the Malay sampan = three boards"; but in this there is some confusion. The word has no such meaning in Malay.

1510. — "My companion said, 'What means then might there be for going to this island?' They answered, 'That it was necessary to purchase a chiampanna,' that is a small vessel, of which many are found there." — Varthema, 242.

1516. — "They (the Moors of Quilaicore) perform their voyages in small vessels which they call champana." — Barboza, 172.

c. 1510. — "In the other, whereof the captain was slain, there was not one escaped, for Quiaiy Panian pursued them in a Champana, which was the Boat of his Junk." — Pinto (Cogan), p. 79, orig. ch. lix.

1552. — " . . . Champanas, which are a kind of small vessels." — Casanheda, ii. 76; [rather, Bk. ii. ch. xxii. p. 76].

1613. — "And on the beach called the Bazar of the Jaos . . . they sell every sort of provision in rice and grain for the Jaos merchants of Java Major, who daily from the dawn are landing provisions from their junks and ships in their boats or Champanas (which are little skiffs). . . ." — Godinho de Eralia, 6.

[1622. — "Yt was thought fytt . . . to tryen up a China Sampan to goe with the fleet. . . ." — Cocks's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 122.]

1648. — In Van Spilbergen's Voyage we have Champanes, and the still more odd Champaigns. [See under TOPAZ.]

1702. — "Sampans being not to be got we were forced to send for the Sarah and Eaton's Long-boats." — JMS. Correspondence in 1. Office from China Factory (at Chusan), Jan. 8.

c. 1788. — "Some made their escape in prows, and some in sampans." — Mem. of a Malay Family, 3.

1863. — "The harbour is crowded with men-of-war and trading vessels . . . from vessels of several hundred tons burthen down to little fishing-boats and passenger sampans." — Wallace, Malay Archip. 21.

SAMSHOO, s. A kind of ardent spirit made in China from rice. Mr. Baber doubts this being Chinese; but according to Wells Williams the name is san-shao, 'thrice fired' (Guide, 220). 'Distilled liquor' is shao-sin, 'fired liquor.' Compare Germ. Brantwein, and XXX beer. Strabo says: 'Wine the Indians drink not except when sacrificing, and that is made of rice in lieu of barley' (xv. c. i. § 53).

1684. — " . . . sampsoe, or Chinese Beer." — Valentijn, iv. (China) 129.

[1697. — "Samshu." See under ARRACK.]

1727. — " . . . Samshew or Rico Arrack." — A. Hamilton, ii. 222; [ed. 1741, ii. 224].

c. 1752. — " . . . the people who make the Chinese brandy called Samsu, live likewise in the suburbs." — Osbeck's Voyage, i. 235.

[1852. — " . . . samashoe, a Chinese invention, and which is distilled from rice, after the rice has been permitted to ferment (?) in . . . vinegar and water." — Neale, Residence in Siam, 75.

SANDAL, SANDLE, SANDERS, SANDAL-WOOD, s. From Low

Latin santalum, in Greek σάνταλον, and in later Greek σάνδαρον; coming from the Arab. sandal, and that from Skt. chandana. The name properly belongs to the fragrant wood of the Santalum album, L. Three woods bearing the name santalum, white, yellow, and red, were in official use in the Middle Ages. But the name Red Sandalwood, or Red Sanders, has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of Pterocarpus santalina, L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dye-wood. According to Hanbury and Fluckiger this last was the sanders so much used in the cookery of the Middle Ages for colouring sauces, &c. In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real odorous sandal-wood, or was the wood of Pteroc. santal. It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, even in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

It has been a question how the Pterocarpus santalina came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East.

c. 545.—"And from the remoter regions, I speak of Tzinista and other places of export, the imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, Sandalwood (ṣāṇḍāraṇ), and so forth. . . ."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxxvii.

c. 1390.—"Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk . . . and colour it with Saunders."—Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 350.

1554.—"Le Santal donc croist es Indes Orientales et Occidentales: en grandes Forests, et fort espesses. Il s'en treuve trois especes: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur: le blanc apres: le rouge est mis au dernier ranc, pource qu'il n'a aucune odeur: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon."—Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. ch. xix.

1563.—"The Sandal grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called chundana; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malacca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it sandal. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus . . ."—Garcia, f. 185r. He proceeds to speak of the sandalo ermello as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1584.—". . . Sandales wilde from Cochin. Sandales domestick from Malacca. . . ."—Wm. Barrett, in Hall, ii. 412.

1613.—". . . certain renegade Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollanders, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the said fort, at a time when most of the people . . . were gone to Solor for the Sandal trade, by which they had their living."—Bocarro, Decada, 723.

1615.—"Committee to procure the commodities recommended by Capt. Saris for Japan. viz. . . pictures of wars, steel, skins, sanders-wood."—Sainsbury, i. 380.

1813.—"When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the sandal; it is then taken up and . . . sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide sandal into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour."—Milburn, i. 291.

1825.—"REDWOOD, properly RED Saunders, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It . . . comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no smell or taste."—Ibid. ed. 1825, p. 249.

SANDOWAY, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is Thandwe (Sand-wé), for which an etymology ('iron-tied'), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual [see Burmah Gazetteer, ii. 606] It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the Sada of Ptolemy.

1553.—"In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Affonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island called Negamale, opposite the town of Sedoe, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef . . ."—Barro, IV. ii. 1.

In I. ix. 1, it is called Sedoe.

1696.—"Other places along this Coast subjected to this King (of Arracan) are Coromaria, Sedoa, Zara, and Port Magaoni."—Appendix to Ovington, p. 563.

meeting with the Zamorin, and secure peace with him; and how he brought destruction on the Naïque of Sangulcer."

1727.—"There is an excellent Harbour for Shipping 8 Leagues to the Southward of Dabul, called Sanguseer, but the Country about being inhabited by Raparees, it is not frequented."—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744] i. 244.

SANSKRIT, s. The name of the classical language of the Brahmins, Sanskṛita, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahmins Sanskrit was the bhāṣa, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the proto-grammarians Pāṇini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a denomination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit' and 'Prakrit' (Pracrit) are used in the Bṛhat Saṁhitā of Varāhamihira, c. A.D. 504, in a chapter on omens (lxxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Alirich'hakatika, translated by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart'; in the works of Kumāra Bhaṭṭa, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāṇiniyā Sīkṣā, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curiously early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahomedan poet Amīr Khurū of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davanzati in Florence, and dating from 1586. The few words on the subject, of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Grandonic, or the like, from grantha, 'a book' (see GRUNTH, GRUNTHUM) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century. [See Macdonell, Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. ch. i.]

A.D. x f.—"Maitreya. Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song: the woman snuffles like a young cow when the rope is first passed through her nostrils; and the man wheezes like an old Pandit repeating his bead-roll."—The Toy-Cart, E.T. in Wilson's Works, xi. 60.

A.D. y f.—"Three-and-sixty or four-and-sixty sounds are there originally in Prakrit (PRACRIT) even as in Sanskrit, as taught by the Śrāyambhū."—Pāṇiniyā Sīkṣā, quoted in Weber's Ind. Studien (1853), iv. 345. But see also Weber's Aladem. Vorlesungen (1876), p. 194.

1818.—"But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brahmins use. Its name from of old is Sahasakrit, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amīr Khurū, in Elliot, iii. 563.

1586.—"Sono scritte le loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Samskruta, che vuol dire 'bene articolata': della quale non si ha memoria quando fusse parlata, con avere (com' io dico) memorie antichissime. c. 1590.—"Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahasakrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tāra, which is the bark of a tree,* which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed out."—Ain (orig.), i. p. 563; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 351].

1623.—"The Jesuites conceive that the Bramones are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Bookes (called Samescretan) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 559.

1651.—"... Sauri signifies the Sun in Samscortam, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Bramines just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Rogierius, 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for:

c. 1666.—"Their first study is in the Hanscrit, which is a language entirely

SAPECA, SAPEQUE, s. This word is used at Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: "From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochim-China, and equal to about half a pfennig (s½ Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreuzer" (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin. Milburn says, under 'Cochim China'. "The only currency of the country is a sort of cash, called sappica, composed chiefly of tutenague (see TOOTNAGUE), 600 making a guan: this is divided into 10 mace of 60 cash each, the whole strung together, and divided by a knot at each mace" (ed. 1825, pp. 444-445). There is nothing here inconsistent with our proposed derivation, given later on. Mace and Sappica are equally Malay words. We can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baber: "Very probably from Malay sa, 'one,' and paku, 'a string or file of the small coin called pichis.' Pichis is explained by Crawford as 'Small coin . . . money of copper, brass, or tin. . . . It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portuguese.' Paku is written by Favre pakā (Dict. Malais-Français) and is derived by him from Chinese pak, 'cent.' In the dialect of Canton pak is the word for 'a hundred,' and one pak is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash." Sapeku would then be properly a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of paku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin. There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha's Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Numismatics, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerque at Goa in 1510 was called copayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malacca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Albuquerque, and it is quite possible that the dinheiros, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name copayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Da Cunha, pp. 11-12, and 22). [But also see the quotation of 1610 from Correa under PARDAO. This word has been discussed by Col. Temple (Ind. Antiq., August 1897, pp. 222 seq.), who gives quotations establishing the derivation from the Malay sapak.

[1639.—“It (cara, cash) hath a four-square hole through it, at which they string them on a Straw; a String of two hundred Caras, called Sata, is worth about three farthings sterling, and five Satas tied together make a Sapocon. The Javians, when this money first came amongst them, were so cheated with the Novelty, that they would give six bags of Pepper for ten Sapocons, thirteen whereof amount to but a Crown.”—Andelot's Voyages, E.T. p. 117.

[1703.—“This is the reason why the Cazus are valued so little they are punched in the middle, and string'd with little twists of Straw, two hundred in one Twist, which is called Santa, and is worth nine Deniers. Five Santas tied together make a thousand Cuzas, or a Sapocon (? Sapocon).”—Collection of Dutch Voyages, 199.

[1830.—“The money current in Bali consists solely of Chinese pice with a hole in the centre. . . . They however put them up in hundreds and thousands, two hundred are called satah, and are equal to one rupee copper, and a thousand called Sapaku, are valued at five rupees.”—Singapore Chronicle, June 1830, in Moor, Indian Archip. p. 94.

[1892.—“This is a brief history of the Sapee (more commonly known to us as the cash), the only native coin of China, and which is found everywhere from Malaysia to Japan.”—Ridgeway, Origin of Currency, 157.]

SAPPAN-WOOD, s. The wood of Caesalpinia sappan; the bakkam of the Arabs, and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tannil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan. Rumphius says that Siam and Champa are the original countries of the Sappan, and quotes from Rheede that in Malabar it was called Tsapampangan, suggestive apparently of a possible derivation from Champa. The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this derivation any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (gran turca) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayāḷ. shappannam, and the Tamil shappu, both signifying ‘red (wood),’ are apparently derivatives from shauca, ‘to be red,’ and suggest another origin as most probable. [The Mad. Gloss. gives Mal. chappannam, from chappu, ‘leaf,’ Skt. anga, ‘body’; Tam. shappangam.] The Malay word is also sapang, which Crawford supposes to have originated the trade-name. If, however, the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see BRAZIL; [and Bunnell's note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 121].

c. 1570.—
“O rico Sião ja dado ao Bremem,
O Cochim de Colamba que deu mana
Do sapão, chumbo, salitre e vitualhas Lhe apercebem celheiros e murlhas.”
A de Albrú, Desc. de Malaca.

1598.—“There are likewise some Diamonds and also . . . the wood Sapon, whereof also much is brought from Siam, it is like Brazil to die withall.”—Linschoten, 36; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

c. 1616.—“There are in this city of Orá (read Odia, Judea), capital of the kingdom of Siam, two factories; one of the Hollanders with great capital, and another of the English with less. The trade which both drive is in deer-skins, shagreen sappan (sapão) and much silk which comes thither from Chincheo and Cochinchina. . . .”—Ilocarro, Decadé, 630.

[1615.—“Hindoring the cutting of bacam or brazill wood.”—Foster, Letters, iii. 168.]

1616.—“I went to Sapán Dono to know whether he would lend me any money upon interest, as he promised me; but . . . he drove me off with wordes, ofring to deliver me money for all our sappan which was com in this junk, at 22 mas per pice.”—Cock's Diary, i. 208-9.

1617.—Johnson and Pitts at Judea in Siam “are glad they can send a junk well laden with sapon, because of its scarcity.”—Sainsbury, ii. 32.

1625.—“ . . . a wood to die withall called Sapan wood, the same we here call Brasil.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1004.

1685.—“Moreover in the whole Island there is a great plenty of Brazil wood, which in India is called sapão.”—Ribeiro, Fat. Hist. t. 8.

1727.—“It (the Siam Coast) produces good store of Sapan and Agala-woods, with Gumlaek and Sticklaek, and many Drugs that I know little about.”—Hamilton, ii. 194; [ed. 1744].

1860.—"The other productions which constituted the exports of the island were Sapan wood to Persia. . . ."—Trennent, Ceylon, ii. 54.

SARBATANE, SARBACANE, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian Islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Span. erbatana, erbatana, sarbatana, also Port. sarabatana, &c., Ital. erbatana, Mod. Greek εραβοδάρνα, from the Ar. zarbatāna, 'a tube for blowing pellets' (a pen-shooter in fact!). Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcalá translates erbatana by Ar. zarbatāna. The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpit (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is, as it appears, old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word. The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the mouth by a forcible expiration' (Crawford, Mal. Diet.).

[1516.—" . . . the force which had accompanied the King, very well armed, many of them with bows, others carrying blowing tubes with poisoned arrows (Zarbatanas com setas erradas. . . .)—Corpus of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 101.]

SARBOJI, s. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Collieries (q.v.). See Hp. Caldwell's II. of Tinnevely, p. 103 and passim; [Stuart, Man. of Tinnevely, 60. This explanation is probably incorrect. Welsh (Military Rem. i. 101) defines sarabogies as "a species of park guns, for firing salutes at feasts, &c.; but not used in war." It has been suggested that the word is simply Hind. sirbojha, 'a head-load,' and Dr. Grierson writes: "Laden with a head' may refer to a head carried home on a spear." Dr. Poye writes: "Sarboji is not found in any Dravidian dialect, as far as I know. It is a synonym for Sivaji. Sarna (sarbo)-ji is honorific. In the Tanjore Inscription it is Serfogi. In mythology Siva's name is 'arrow,' 'spear,' and 'head-burthen,' of course by metonymy." Mr. Brandt suggests Tam. serū, "war," biyri, "a tube." No weapon of the name appears in Mr. Egerton's Hand-book of Indian Arms.]

1801.—"The Rt. Hon. the Governor in Council . . . orders and directs all persons, whether Polygars (see POLIGAR), Collieries, or other inhabitants possessed of arms in the Provinces of Dindigul, Tinnevely, Ramnadpuram, Sivagangai, and Madurai, to deliver the said arms, consisting of Muskets, Matchlocks, Pikes, Gingalls (see GINGALL), and Sarabogoi to Lieut.-Col. Agnew. . . ."—Procl. by Madras Govt., 1d. 1st Decr., in Hp. Caldwell's Hist. p. 227.

c. 1814.—"Those who carry spear and sword have land given them producing 5 lathas of rice; those bearing muskets, 7 lathas; those bearing the sarboji, 8 lathas; those bearing the sergali (see GINGALL), or gun for two men, 11 lathas. . . ."—Account of the Marakas, from MacKenzie MSS. in Madras Journal, iv. 360.

SAREE, s. Hind. sirī, sirhi. The cloth which constitutes the main part of a woman's dress in N. India, wrapt round the body and then thrown over the head.

1598.—" . . . likewise they make whole pieces or webbes of this hearbe, sometimes mixed and woven with silke. . . . Those webes are named sarijn. . . ."—Lauschoer, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 96].

1785.—" . . . Her clothes were taken off, and a red silk covering (a saurry) put upon her."—Acct. of a Sultan, in Asiatick Res. i. 90.

SARNAU, SORNAU, n.p. A name often given to Sum in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahr-i-nua, Pers. 'New-city'; the name by which Yuthia or Ayodhya (see JUDEA), the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Braddell (J. Ind. Arch. v. 317) has suggested that the name (Sheher-al-nua, as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Loubère between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamese. But this is less probable.

We have still a city of Siam called Lophaburi, anciently a capital, and the name of which appears to be a Sanskrit or Pali form, Nava-pura, meaning the same as Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name. The Cornore of Nkolo Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhnauti or Gaur, an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

1442.—“The inhabitants of the sea-coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the countries of China, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zerbid, Tenzitri, Sokotora, Shahr-i-nao. . . .”—Abharrazak, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 422.

1510.—“ . . . They said they were from a city called Sarnau, and had brought for sale silken stuffs, and aloewood, and benzoin, and musk.”—Vardema, 212.

1514.—“ . . . Tannazzari, Sarnau, where is produced all the finest white benzoin, storax, and lac finer than that of Martaman.”—Letter of Gio. d'Ercole, in Arch. Storica Italiana, App. 80.

1540.—“ . . . all along the coast of Malaya, and within the Land, a great King commands, who for a more famous and recommendable title above all other Kings, causeth himself to be called Pretar Salan, Emperor of all Sornau, which is a Country wherein there are thirteen kingdoms, by us commonly called Siam” (Sio).—Pinto (orig. cap. xxxvi.), in Ceylon, p. 43.

c. 1612.—“It is related of Siam, formerly called Sheher al-Nawl, to which Country all lands under the wind here were tributary, that there was a King called Bahanna, who when he heard of the greatness of Malacca sent to demand submission and homage of that kingdom.”—Syaru Malayan, in J. Ind. i. 114. v. 451.

1726.—“About 1340 reigned in the kingdom of Siam (then called Sjahnarouw or Sornau), a very powerful Prince.”—Valentijn, v. 319.

SARONG, s. Malay. sarung; the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javanese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran) are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplah) of that coast, and the Labbais (Lubbo) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Buntos of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labbais the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawford seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first ‘a case or sheath,’ and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay Islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. stranga, meaning ‘variegated’ and also ‘a garment.’

[1850.—“ . . . the cloth or sarong, which has been described by Mr. Madden to be ‘not unlike a Scots highlander’s plaid in appearance, being a piece of party-coloured cloth, about 6 or 8 feet long, and 3 or 4 feet wide, sewed together at the ends, forming, as some writers have described it, a wide sack without a bottom.’ With the Malays, the sarong is either worn slung over the shoulders as a wrap, or tucked round the waist and descending to the ankles, so as to enclose the legs like a petticoat.”—Engelst, Java, i. 166.]

1868.—“He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket.”—Walker, Mal. Arch. 171.

SATIGAM, n.p. Sattigon, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 m. above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the site of a few huts, with a ruined mo-que as the only relique of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the silting up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Pequeno (q.v.).

c. 1310.—“About this time the rebellion of Fakhri broke out in Bengal, Fakhri and his Bengali forces killed Kadar Khan (Governor of Lakhnauti). . . . He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Satganw and Sungrganw.”—Zut-ud-din Ibrati, in Elliot, iii. 243.

1535.—“In this year Diogo Dalvello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Choromandel fishery, with license from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his . . . and he went well armed along with two foists which equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more. . . . So this Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satigraon, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandize, selling and buying: and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatigaon, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Gozil that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King if he chose to liberate the (Portuguese) prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace. . . .—Correa, lii, 649.

[c. 1590.—"In the Sarkār of Sātgrāon, there are two ports at a distance of half a kos from each other; the one is Sātgrāon, the other Mughl: the latter the chief; both are in the possession of the Europeans. Fine pomegranates grow here."—Atn, ed. Farrell, ii, 125.]

SATIN, s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation [accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. 2nd ed. s.v.) is with Low Lat. seta, 'silk,' Lat. seta, setula, 'a bristle, a hair,' through the Port. setim. Dr. Wells Williams (Middle King, ii, 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese sz-tiin, though intermediately through other languages. It is true that sz-tiin or sz-tuan is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 486; viz. from Zaitun or Zaylon, the name by which Chwan-chau (Chinchew), the great medieval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zaitānia; the Span. acetyuni (for 'satin'), the medieval French zatony, and the medieval Ital. zetani, afford intermediate steps.

c. 1350.—"The first city that I reached after crossing the sea was Zaitān. . . . It is a great city, superb indeed; and in it they make damasks of velvet as well as those of satin (linchā—see KINCOB, ATLAS), which are called from the name of the city zaitānia."—Ibn Batuta, iv, 269.

1352.—In an inventory of this year in Douet d'Aray we have: "Zatony at 4 écus the ell" (p. 342).

1405.—"And besides, this city (Samar-kand) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from Cathay silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern."—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham's at p. 171). The word setuni occurs repeatedly in Clavijo's original.

1440.—In the Libro de Gubelli, &c., of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk stuffs, several times, of "zetani cellutati, and other kinds of zetani."—Della Decima, iv, 68, 107, &c.

1441.—"Before the throne (at Bijanagar) was placed a cushion of zaitūn satin, round which three rows of the most exquisite pearls were sewn."—Abdurrazzāk, in Elliot, iv, 120. (The original is "darpeh-i-talhi bālishi az atlas-i-zaitūn"; see Not. et Extr. xiv, 376. Quatremère (ibid. 462) translated "un carreau de satin olive," taking zaitūn in its usual Arabic sense of 'an olive tree.') Also see Elliot, iv, 113.

SATRAP, s. Anc. Pers. kshatrapa, which becomes satrap, as kshāyathiya becomes shāh. The word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in the ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surāshtra or Peninsular Guzerat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Gīrnār:

c. A.D. 160.—". . . he, the Mahā-Kshatrapa Rudradāman . . . for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger."—In Indian Antiquary, vii, 262. The identity of this with satrap was pointed out by James Prinsep, 1838 (J. As. Soc. Ben. vii, 315). [There were two Indian satrap dynasties, viz. the Western Satraps of Surāshtra and Gujārāt, from about A.D. 150 to A.D. 335; for which see Rapson and Indrji, The Western Kshatrapas (J. R. A. S., N. S., 1890, p. 639); and the Northern Kshatrapas of Mathura and the neighbouring territories in the 1st cent. A.D. See articles by Rapson and Indrji in J. R. A. S., N. S., 1894, pp. 525, 511.]

1883.—"An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. 'Because,' he used to say, 'σάτραπς is the Greek for satrap, it does not follow that παρδάπς is the Greek for rat-trap.'"—Sat. Rev. July 14, p. 53.

SATSUMA, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar cream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615.—"I said I had recoued suffition at his highnes hands in havinge the good hap to see the face of one mightie a King as the King of Siamhama; whereat he smiled."—Cock's Diary, i. 1-5.

1617.—"Speeches are given out that the satsumas or Japan players (or whores) going from hence for Turhima to meete the Corean Ambassadors, were set on by the way by a boate of Kaxma theeves, and kild all both men and women, for the money they had gotten at Firando."—Ibid. 256.

SAUGOR, SAUGOR ISLAND, n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great fair and pilgrimage—properly Ganga Sāgara ('Ocean Ganges'). It is said once to have been populous, but in 1638 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave. It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683.—"We went in our Budgeras to see yo Pagodas at Sagar, and returned to yo Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Hedges, March 12; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

1681.—"James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when yo Island called Ganga Sagur was inhabited, yo Raja of yo Island gathered yearly Rent out of it, to yo amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Ibid. Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1705.—"Sagore est une I-le où il y a une Pagode très-respectée parmi les Gentils, où ils vont en pèlerinage, et où il y a deux Faquers qui y font leur residence. Ces Faquers savent charmer les bêtes ferocees, qu'on y trouve en quantité, sans quoi ils seroient tous les jours exposés à estre devorés."—Lullier, p. 123.

1727.—"... among the Pagans, the Island Sagor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Joungs go yearly thither in the Months of November and December, to worship and wash in Salt-Water, tho' many of them fall Sacrifices to the hungry Tigers."—i. Hamilton, ii. 3; [ed. 1741].

SAUL-WOOD, s. Hind. śāl, from Skt. śāla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N.O. Dipterocarpaceae, which is the most valuable building timber of Northern India. Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himālaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Bīās; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Godavery. [The botanical name is taken from Sir John Shore. For the peculiar habitat of the Sal as compared with the Teak, see Forsyth, Highlands of O.I. 25 seqq.] It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and other accounts, inferior to teak. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Ain. The sal has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period, on account of its connection with Buddha's history, and it is known there by the Indian name, so-lo (Drutschneider on Chinese Botan. Works, p. 6).

c. 650.—"L'Honorable du siècle, animé d'une grande pitié, et obéissant à l'ordre des temps, jugea utile de paroître dans le monde. Quand il eut fini de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvāna. Se plaçant entre deux arbres Sālas, il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s'endormit."—Hiouen Tsiang, Mémoires (Voyages de) Pyl. Bouddh. ii. 340].

1765.—"The produce of the country consists of shaal timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 200.

1774.—"This continued five loos; towards the end there are shāl and large forest trees."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 19.

1810.—"The saal is a very solid wood . . . it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our former woods, sink in fresh water."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 69.

SAYER, SYRE, &c., s. Hind. from Arab. ṣā'ir, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted to the kind help of Sir H. Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the word sayer in this sense was especially great.

Wilson, s.v. says: "In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said: 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was 'the rest of it.'

Sir C. Trevelyan again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word has "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pace tantorum virorum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the 18th century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zemindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazar, haut, gunge) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in sa'ir two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) sair, producing sa'ir, 'walking, current,' and sa'r, producing sa'ir, 'remainder,' the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the Biblical Shear-jashub, 'the remnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges'; an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own Customs, as well as the dustoory which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of Feb. 10, 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that some confusion arose with the other sense of sa'ir, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the word.

I find, however, that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.), defines: "Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licenses, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses, shops, bazars, &c." This of course throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name as suggested above.

In a despatch of April 10, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants"; enjoining that no Buzars or Gunges should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that "all duties coming under the description of sayer Chelluntah (H. chalamā, 'in transit'), and Rah-darry (radaree) . . . and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country" should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zemindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders. And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zemindar in whose zemindarry such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on till 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On June 11, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all duties indicated into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (July 28) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated July 18 "When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collection (the unauthorised article excepted) for the current year, in order that by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year. . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration, . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry (Abcarree) . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gunges, Bazars and Hauts," compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

The Order of July 28 abolished "all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims at Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the Abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of the Government . . . the collections made in the Gunges, Bazars and Hauts situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of Gunges &c. by the published Resolutions of June 11, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries sometimes included in the Sayer under the denomination of phulur (Hind. phullar, from phal, 'fruit'), bunkur (from Hind. bin, 'forest or pasture-ground'), and julkur (Hind. jalkar, from jul, 'water') . . ." These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from 'Land Revenue'; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Accts. presented to Parliament in 1796. In the "Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government" for 1793-94, the "Collections under head of Syer and Abkarry" amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the "Land and Sayer Revenues" are given, but Abkari is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears "Syer Collections, including Abkarree, 7,51,025."

These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9, to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Syer and Abkarree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 showed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta, Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto,

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,
Abkarree,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1602; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance :—

Under Bengal, Behar and Orissa :

• Sale of Trees and Sunken Boats Rs. 555 0 0

Under Pegu and Martaban Provinces :

Fisheries Rs. 1,22,874 0 2

Tax on Birds' nests (q.v.) 7,449 0 0

„ on Salt 43,061 3 10

Fees for fruits and gardens 7,237 9 1

Tax on Bees' wax 1,179 8 0

Do. Collections 8,050 0 0

Sale of Government Timbers, &c. 4,19,141 12 8

6,09,043 1 9

Under the same :

Sale proceeds of unclaimed and confiscated

Timbers, Rs. 146 11 10

c. 1580.—“Sair az Gangapat o' a'raf-i-Hindori waghaira . . .” i.e. “Sayer from the Ganges . . . and the Hindu districts, &c. . . 170,800 dans.”—Ain-i-Albari, orig. i. 395, in detailed Revenues of Sirkar Jannat-abad or Gaur; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 131].

1751.—“I have heard that Ramkison Sent who lives in Calcutta has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxidavad Syre chowkey (chowky) duties.”—Letter from Nicoll to Pres. Ft. William, in Long, 25.

1788.—“Sairjat—All kinds of taxation besides the land-rent. Sairs.—Any place or office appointed for the collection of duties or customs.”—The Indian Vocabulary, 112.

1790.—“Without entering into a discussion of privileges founded on Custom, and of which it is easier to ascertain the abuse than the origin, I shall briefly remark on the Collections of Sayer, that while they remain in the hands of the Zemindars, every effort to free the internal Commerce from the baneful effects of their vexatious impositions must necessarily prove abortive.”—Minute by the Hon. C. Stuart, dd. Feb. 10, quoted by Lord Cornwallis in his Minute of July 18.

“The Board last day very humanely and politically recommended unanimously the abolition of the Sayer.

“The statement of Mr. Mercer from Burdwan makes all the Sayer (consisting of a strange medley of articles taxable, not omitting even Hermaphrodites) amount only to 53,000 Rupees. . . .”—Minute by Mr. Law of the Bd. of Revenue, forwarded by the Board, July 12.

1792.—“The Jumma on which a settlement for 10 years has been made is about (current Rupees) 3,01,00,000 . . . which is 9,35,691 Rupees less than the Average Collections of the three preceding Years. On this Jumma, the Estimate for 1791-2 is formed, and the Sayer Duties, and some other extra Collections, formerly included in the Land Revenue, being abolished, accounts for the Difference. . . .”—Head of Mr. Dundas's Speech on the Finances of the E.I. Company, June 4, 1792.

3 E

1793.—“A Regulation for re-enacting with alterations and modifications, the Rules passed by the Governor General in Council on 11th June and 25th July, 1790, and subsequent dates, for the resumption and abolition of Sayer, or internal Duties and Taxes throughout Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa,” &c. “Passed by the Governor General in Council on the 1st May, 1793. . . .”—Title of Regulation, XXVII. of 1793.

1802.—“The Government having reserved to itself the entire exercise of its discretion in continuing or abolishing, temporarily or permanently, the articles of revenue included according to the custom and practice of the country, under the several heads of salt and saltpetre—of the sayer or duties by sea or land—of the abkarry . . .—of the excise . . .—of all taxes personal and professional, as well as those derived from markets, fairs and bazaars—of lakiraj (see LACKERAGE) lands. . . . The permanent land-tax shall be made exclusively of the said articles now recited.”—Madras Regulation, XXV. § iv.

1817.—“Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer.”—Mill, II. of Br. India, v. 417.

1863.—“The next head was ‘Sayer,’ an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as ‘miscellaneous.’ It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined . . . to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head of the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under ‘Sayer,’ have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and what remains has been denominated ‘Forest Revenue.’”—Sir C. Trevelyan, Financial Statement, dd. April 30.

SCAVENGER, s. We have been rather startled to find among the M.S. records of the India Office, in certain “Lists of Persons in the Service of the Right. Honble. the East India Company, in Fort St. George, and the other Places on the Coast of Choromandell,” begin-ming with Feb'y. 1704, and in the entries for that year, the following :

"Fort St David.

"5. Tecor Gueza, Land Customer and Scavenger of Cuddalore, 5th Councl. . . .

"6. Ethand Baugja, Translator of Country Letters, Sen. Merett.

"7. Jehn Null, Scavenger and Corn-meter, Tuccumbatam, Merett."

Under 1711 we find again, at Fort St. George

"Jeph Smart, Rentall General and Scavenger, "Whet the oil," and so on, in the entries of most years, down to 1761, when we have, for the first time

"Sam'l Ardley, 7th of Council, Military, Stockholder, Rentall General, and Scavenger

Some light is thrown upon this surprising occurrence of such a term by a reference to Cox's Law Dictionary, or The Interpreter (published originally in 1607) new ed. of 1727, where we read

"Scavage, Scavium. It is otherwise called Scheyr, Scheyr, and Scheyring, maybe deduced from the Saxon Scheyr (Saxony) the dore and is a kind of Toll or Custom exacted by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c. of Merchant Strangers, for Wares shew'd or offered to sale within their Precincts, which is prohibited by the Statute 19 H. 7. c. 5. In a Charter of Henry the Second to the City of Canterbury it is written Scheyr, and (in Mon. Ang. 2. per fol. 50 b) Scheyr, and elsewhere I find it in Latin Tributa Onosorum. The City of London still retains the Customs of which in an old printed Book of the Customs of London, we read thus, Of ichi Custos halfe del appertyneth to the Sheriff, and the other halfe del to the Hevys in whose Houses the Merchants sell togeher. And it is to wit that Scheyr is the Show by cause that Merchantes (viz) shew into the Sheriffs Merchandises, of the which Customs ought to be taken ere that any thing thereof be sold, &c.

"Scabenger, from the Belgick Scaen, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned in 11 Car. 2. cap. 2. The Germans call him a Ureclamson, from one Simon, a noted Scavenger of Marburg.

"Schabildus, The officer who collected the Scavage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. 1. p. 75; "Anno 1311. Schwaldi im argentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter composuit. Aliqua pendebantur, alij extra Episcopatum fugabantur.")

In Sylvaum also (Glossarium Archaeologicum, 1685) we find :—

"Saxonia.] Tributum quod a mercatoribus exigere solent nundinarum domini, ob licentiam proponendi ibidem venditionem mercium. A Saxon (Saxonia) id est, O tenders, may ore, Angl. schewage and shewage. Spectum hic us Scavenger or Scavenger."

The charge then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being, as Shew it points out, a Low French (or Low Latin) formation from Shew, ["From O.F. examine, to examine, inspect. O. Sax. laurem, to behold; cognate with A.S. cearian, to look at." (Cox's Dict. v.v.)] And the scavenger or scavenger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods, and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Lib. Albus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 31) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Senay, i.e. inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word 'scavenger,' whose office corresponds with the rikyer (riker) of former times." [The meaning and derivation of this word have been discussed in Notes de Quérrie, 2 ser. ix. 325; 5 ser. v. 49, 152.]

We can hardly doubt then that the office of the Comandant scavenger of the 18th century, united as we find it with that of "Rentall General," or of Land-customer, and held by a senior member of the Company's Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods, subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.), than customs on imports from seaward.

It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavengers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become a predominant part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavenger's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albus. In Skinner's Etymologicon, 1671, the definition is Collector sordium abrasarum (erroneously connecting the word with shaving and scraping), whilst he adds: "Nostri Scabengers vilissimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis auferendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scabinger. Boueur. Gadourard" — agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Lye's Juratus, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connection with the city of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavage was still alive within the City in 1829.

1265. — "Walterus Herry et Willelmus de Dunolmo, Ballivi, ut Custodes . . . de Lxxv. l. v. s. & x. de consuetudinibus omnimodorum mercandiarum venientium de partibus transmarinis ad Civitatem predictam, de quibus consuetudo debetur quae vocatur Scavagium. . . ." — Mag. Rot. 59. Hon. III., extracted in T. Madoc, II. and Ant. of the Exchequer, 1779, i. 779.

Prior to 1419. — "Et debent ad dictum Wardemotum per Aldermannum et probos Wardes, neonon per juratores, oligi Constabularii, Scavageours, Aleconners, Bedello, et alii Officiarii." — Liber Albus, p. 38.

"SEREMENT DE Scavageours. Vous jurrez qe vous surverrez diligentement qe les paviments danz vostre Garde soient bien et droitement reparaillez et nyont enhaussez a nosance dez roysyns; et qe les chemyns, ruwes, et venelles soient nettoz dez hies et de toutz maners dez ordures, pur honestee de la citee; et qe toutz les chymyns, fournes, terrailles soient de pierre, et suffisament defensables encontre peril de feu; et si vous trovez rien a contraire vous monstrez al Alderman, issint qe l'Alderman ordeigne pur amendement de celle. Et ces ne lorrez—si Dieu vous eyde et loz Saintz." — Ibid. p. 319.

1591. — Letter from the Lords of the Council to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, requesting them to admit John de Cardenas to the office of Collector of Scavage, the reversion of which had . . . been granted to him. — Index to the Remembrancia of the C. of London (1878), p. 284.

1607. — Letter from the Lord Mayor to the Lord Treasurer . . . enclosing a Petition from the Ward of Aldergate, complaining that William Court, an inhabitant of that Ward for 8 or 10 years past, refused to undergo the office of Scavenger in the Parish, claiming exemption . . . being privileged as Clerk to Sir William Spencer, Knight, one of the Auditors of the Court of Exchequer, and praying that Mr. Court, although privileged, should be directed to find a substitute or deputy and pay him — Ibid. 283.

1623. — Letter . . . reciting that the City by ancient Charters held . . . "the office of Package and Scavage of Strangers' goods, and merchandise carried by them by land or water, out of the City and Liberties to foreign parts, whereby the Customs and Duties due to H.M. had been more duly paid, and a stricter oversight taken of such commodities so exported." — Remembrancia, p. 321.

1632. — Order in Council, reciting that a Petition had been presented to the Board from divers Merchants born in London, the sons of Strangers, complaining that the "Packer of London required of them as much fees for Package, Ballage, Shewage, &c., as of Strangers not English-born. . . ." — Ibid. 322.

1760. — "Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of. Agreed we allow him Rs 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post." — Fl. William Comm., in Long, 215. It does not appear from this what the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case were.

1829. — "The oversight of customable goods. This office, termed in Latin super-risus, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles I. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day. . . . The real nature of this duty is not a toll for showing, but a toll paid for the overnight of showing; and under that name (super-risus apertionis) it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. . . . The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandize on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no concealment, or fraudulent practices . . . should deprive the King of his just dues. . . . (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III., and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty." — G. Norton, Commentaries on the Hist., &c., of the City of London, 3rd ed. (1859), pp. 330-331.

SCRIVAN, s. An old word for a clerk or writer, from Port. escrivão.

1616.—"He desired that some English might early on the Morow come to his house, wher should meete a Scrivano and finish that busines."—Sir T. Har. Hak. Soc. i. 173. On the same page "The Scrivano of Zulphkearcaron."

1673.—"In some Places they write on Cocoo-Leafes dried, and then use an Iron Style, or else on Paper, when they use a Pen made with a Reed, for which they have a Brass Case, which holds them and the Ink too, always stuck at the Girdles of their Scrivans."—Fryer, 181.

1683.—"Mr. Watson in the Taffny warehouse without any provocation called me Pityful Prodigall Scrivan, and told me my Hatt stood too high upon my head. . . ."—Letter of S. Langley, in Helgelbury, Sept. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

SOYMITAR, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word is taliedr (see TULWAUR). We get it through the French cimitère, Ital. scimitarra, and according to Marcel Devic originally from Pers. shamshir (chimchir as he writes it). This would be still very obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between c and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. carquois from Pers. tirkash. Scimecirra representing shimshir might easily thus become scimitirri. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. This word (shamshir) was known to Greek writers. Thus:

A.D. 93.—" . . . Καὶ καθ' ἑκατέρου τὸν πρὸς βύρατον παῖδα Μορδὸβατον βασιλεῖα περιβέβητα τὸ δίδδῃμα καὶ δοῦσα τὸν σφμαρτῆρα τὸν παρὰ δακτύλιον, τῆρε σαρμψῆραν ὁμομαζούρην παρ' αὐτοῖς."—Joseph. Antiqq. xx. ii. 3.

C. A.D. 114.—"Δῶρα ἔχει Τραυανῶ ἱπτάματα σφικὰ καὶ σαμψῆρας αἱ δὲ εἰσι σαρδάα βαρβαρικά."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, s.v.

1595.—

SEACUNNY, s. This is, in the phraseology of the Anglo-Indian marine, a steersman or quartermaster. The word is the Pers. sukliti, from Ar. sukkatn, 'a helm.'

c. 1550.—"Aos Mocaddas, Socdes, o Vagas."—Primor e Honra, &c. i. 63r. ("To the Mocuddams, Seacunnies, and carmen.")

SEBUNDY, s. Hind. from Pers. sihbandi (sih, ‘three’). The rationale of the word is obscure to us. [Platts says it means ‘three-monthly or quarterly payment.’ The Madras Gloss. less probably suggests Pers. sipahbandi (see SEPOY), ‘recruitment.’] It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to “The Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners” employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E.I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the late Field-Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840. An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:—

“Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement of Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour.

“He commenced the work, obtained some (Native) officers and N.C. officers from the old Bengal Sappers, and enlisted about half of each company.

“The first season found the little colony quite unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Coolies, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick; and in 1838 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Nyncoleea—to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of *pitara*s as my sole possession.

“Just then, our relations with Nepal became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills unconnected with Nepal—Garrowas and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me.

“When they arrived I found, instead of the ‘fair recruits,’ announced, a number of most unfit men; some of them more or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in India as siddi, buddi (see BUDLEE), the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them; but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitied my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!

“In the expressive language of my sergeant, there was not a ‘visage’ of the men left.

“The Sebundies were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was brs. a month, instead of a Sepoy’s 7½. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those they enlisted for.

“I eventually completed the corps with Nepaul-c, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

“I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N.C. officers from India with a good pen-jacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

“When I visited Darjeeling again in 1872, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome.

“My month’s acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels and temporary huts thrown up by my Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical teaching to the Hill-men, the Hills and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work.”

c. 1778.—“At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowo. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a Lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company’s military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundies, or native militia.”—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindsay, iii. 161.

1785.—“The Board were pleased to direct that in order to supply the place of the Sebundy corps, four regiments of Sepoys be employed in securing the collection of the revenues.”—Jn Stron-Karr, i. 92

“One considerable charge upon the Nabob’s country was for extraordinary sibbundes, sopos and horsomen, who appear to us to be a very unnecessary incumbrance upon the revenues.”—Append. to

SEEDY, s. Hind. sidi; Arab. saiyid, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), saiyidi, 'my lord'; and Mahr. siddhi. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahomedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan. Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz. the Nawāb of Jangira (see JUNGEEERA), near Bombay. The young heir to this principality, Siddhi Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the Government in Oct., 1883. But the proper application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general. [It "is a title still applied to holy men in Morocco and the Maghrib; on the East African coast it is assumed by negro and negroid Moslems, e.g. Sidi Mubarak Bombay; and 'Seedy boy' is the Anglo-Indian term for a Zanzibarian" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 231).]

c. 1563.—"And among these was an Abyssinian (Aberim) called Cide Meriam, a man reckoned a great cavalier, and who entertained 500 horse at his own charges, and who greatly coveted the city of Daman to quarter himself in, or at the least the whole of its pergunnas (pergunas—see PERGUNNAE) to devour."—Couto, VII. x. 8.

[c. 1610.—"The greatest insult that can be passed upon a man is to call him Cisy—that is to say 'cook.'"—Purana de Laval, Ind. Soc. i. 173.]

1679.—"The protection which the Siddlees had given to Gingerah against the repeated attacks of Savagi, as well as their frequent annoyance of their country, had been so much facilitated by their resort to Bombay, that Savagi at length determined to compel the English Government to a stricter neutrality, by reprisals on their own port."—Orme, Fragments, 78.

1690.—"As he whose Title is most Christian, encouraged him who is its principal Adversary to invade the Rights of Christendom, so did Senor Padre de Pandara, the Principal Jesuite and in an adjacent Island to Bombay, invite the Siddy to exterminate all the Protestants there."—Orington, 157.

1750-60.—"These (islands) were formerly in the hands of Angria and the Siddlees or Moors."—Grose, i. 56.

1759.—"The Indian seas having been infested to an intolerable degree by pirates, the Mogul appointed the Siddlee, who was chief of a colony of Coffrees (Caffer), to be his Admiral. It was a colony which, having been settled at Dundee-Rajapore, carried on a considerable trade there, and had likewise many vessels of force."—Cumbridge's Account of the War, &c., p. 216.

1800.—"I asked him what he meant by a Siddlee. He said a hubshee. This is the name by which the Abyssinians are distinguished in India."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 287.

SEEMUL, SIMMUL, &c. (sometimes we have seen Symbol, and Gymbal), s. Hind. seemal and sembhal; [Skt. śālmali]. The (so-called) cotton-tree Bombax Malabaricum, D.C. (N.O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. "About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-buds are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine" (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishnagarh, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

[c. 1807.—"... the Salmoli, or Simul ... is one of the most gaudy ornaments of the forest or village."—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 789.]

SEER, s. Hind. ser; Skt. setak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and set we often find in the same locality a pakkā (pucka) and a lachehā (cutchā) ser; a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only (see under PUCKA). The ser is generally (at least in upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas's ed. of Prinsep) is that called "Cholpahar," equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz. 6½ dr. avoird.; the lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Malabar country, which is little more than 8 oz. [The Macleod ser of Malabar, introduced in 1802, is of 130 tolas; 10 of these weigh 33 lb. (Madras Man. ii. 516).]

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled "A Reg. for altering the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee (see RUPEE) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company's sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India." This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: "It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India." And Section IV. contains the following:

"The Tola or Sicca weight to be equal to 160 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Ratties = 1 Masha = 16 troy grains.
12 Mashas = 1 Tola 160 ditto.
80 Tolas (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer = 23 lbs. troy.
10 Seers = 1 Mun or Dacan Mauud = 100 lbs. troy."

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:

"The system of weights and measures (1) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Sangoor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for government or public purposes sent thither for examination."

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India: though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for Government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The ser of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy = 2½ lbs. troy, 2.037 lbs. avoirdupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called "The Indian Weights and Measures Act" (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expedient to provide for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these.

Section II. runs:

"Standards.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives."

Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called "The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act," repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fall to the ground. The ser of these Acts would be = 2.2 lbs. avoirdupois, or 0.143 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

1748.—"Enfin on verse le tout un serre do l'hulle."—Lett. Edif. xiv. 220.

SEER-FISH, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cybum. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-Fish. The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of Pers. siah (qu. Pers. 'black?') but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. serra. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Pristis)—see Blueau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of finlets, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day's Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates lv., lvi.).

1551.—"E aos Marinheiros hum peixe cerra por mes, a cada hum."—A. Nunez, Livro dos Pesos, 43.

"To Lopo Vaz, Mestre of the firearms (espingarda), his pay and provisions. . . . And for his three workmen, at the rate of 2 measures of rice each daily, and half a seer fish (peixe serra) each monthly, and a maund of firewood each monthly."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 235.

1598.—"There is a fish called Pieze Serra, which is cut in round pieces, as we cut Salmon and salt it. It is very good."—Lincolnton, 88; [Hak. Soc. ii. 11].

1720.—"PEYSE SERRA is ordinarily produced in the Western Ocean, and is so called" etc. (describing the Saw-fish) . . .

"But in the Sea of the Islands of Quirimba (i.e. off Mozambique) there is a different peysa serra resembling a large corrina,* but much better, and which it is the custom to pickle. When cured it seems just like ham."—Blueau, Vocab. vii. 608-607.

1727.—"They have great Plenty of Seer-fish, which is as savoury as any Salmon or Trout in Europe."—A. Hamilton, i. 379; [ed. 1744, i. 382].

[1813.—". . . the rohal, the seir-fish, the grey mullet . . . are very good."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 36.]

1860.—"Of those in ordinary use for the table the finest by far is the Seir-fish,† a species of Scomber, which is called Toramalu by the natives. It is in size and form very similar to the salmon, to which the flesh of the female fish, notwithstanding its white colour, bears a very close resemblance, both in firmness and in flavour."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 205.

SEERPAW, s. Pers. through Hind. ser-a-pā — 'cap-a-pie.' A complete suit, presented as a Khilat (Killut) or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative.

c. 1666.—"He . . . commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroidered Vest, a Turbant, and a Girdle of Silk Embroidery, which is that which they call Ser-apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot."—Bernier, E.T. 37; [ed. Constable, 147].

1673.—"Sir George Oxendine . . . had a Collat (Killut) or Serpaw, a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1680.—"Answer is returned that it hath not been accustomed for the Governours to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund (Firmaun), except there come therewith a Serpow or a Tasherriffe (Tashreef)."—Fl. St. Geo. Consn. Dec. 2, in N. & E. No. iii. 40.

1715.—"We were met by Padre Stephanus, bringing two Seerpaws."—In Wheeler, ii. 245.

1727.—"As soon as he came, the King embraced him, and ordered a seerpaw or a royal Suit to be put upon him."—A. Hamilton, i. 171 [ed. 1744].

1785.—"The last Nabob (Sadatulla) would very seldom suffer any but himself to send a Seerpaw; whereas in February last Santa Sahib, Subder Ali Sahib, Jehare Khan and Imaum Sahib, had all of them taken upon them to send distinct Seerpaws to the President."—In Wheeler, iii. 140.

1769.—"Another deputation carried six costly Seerpaws; these are garments which are presented sometimes by superiors in token of protection, and sometimes by inferiors in token of homage."—Orme, i. 159.

* Coriina is applied by Ouvier, Cantor and others to fish of the genus Sciæna of more recent ichthyologists.

† Cybum (Scomber, Linn.) guttatur.—Tennent.

SEETULPUTTY, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used to sleep on in the cold weather. [They are made from the split stems of the mukta pata, Phrynium dichotomum, Roxb. (see Patt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 216 seq.)] Hind. śitalputī, 'cold-slip.' Williamson's spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see SICLEEGUR) are quite erroneous.

1810.—"A very beautiful species of mat is made . . . especially in the south-eastern districts . . . from a kind of reedy grass. . . These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated 'seekul-putty' (i.e. polished sheets). . . The principal uses of the 'seekul-putty' are to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, thereby to keep the body cool."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 41.

[1818.—"Another kind (of mat) the shēstūlūpatāśa, laid on beds and couches on account of their coolness, are sold from one rupee to five each."—Ward, Hindoo, i. 106.]

1879.—In Fallon's Dirty, we find the following Hindi riddle:—

"Chinī kā piyālā fūṭā, kōī jarā nahīn ;
Malī jī lā lāy lagā, kōī tarā nahīn ;
Śital-putī bichāī, kōī sāt nahīn ;
Rāj-banī māī, kōī rotā nahīn."

Which might be rendered :

"A china bowl that, broken, none can join ;

A flowery field, whose blossoms none purloin ;

A royal scion slain, and none shall weep ;

A śitalputī spread where none shall sleep."

The answer is an Egg ; the Starry Sky ; a Snake (Rāj-banī, 'royal scion,' is a placatory name for a snake) ; and the Sea.

SEMBALI, s. Malay-Javan. sīmbal, sīmbal. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. p. 327) describes many varieties.]

1817.—"The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the lombok (i.e. red-pepper) ; triturated with salt it is called sambel."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 93.

SEPOY, SEAPOY, s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. siyāhī, from siyāh, 'soldier, an army' ; which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spāda, 'a soldier' (Le peuple et la Langue des Mèdes, 1879, p. 24). But Shah is a horseman in Armenian ; and sound etymologists connect siyāh with asp, 'a horse' ; [others with Skt. padāti, 'a foot-soldier']. The original word siyāhī occurs frequently in the poems of Amir Khusrū (c. A.D. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a 'horse-soldier,' for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See siyāhī below.

The word *sepo*y occurs in Southern India before we had troops in Bengal ; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David's is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS. [But see below.]

c. 1300.—"Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few siyāhīs from Hindustan, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 536.

[1665.—"Soldier—Suppya and Haddee."—Persian Gloss, in Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 99.]

1682.—"As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundollah's to have y^e Seapy, or Nabob's horseman, consigned to me, with order to see y^e Perranna put in execution ; but having thought better of it, y^e Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to y^e Seapy and Bulchunds I deed would be more powerful and advantageous to me than his own."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 55, seq. Here we see the word still retaining the sense of 'horseman' in India.

[1717.—"A Company of Sepoys with the colours."—J'ns, in ditto, II. ccclix. On this Sir H. Yule notes : "This is an occurrence of the word *sepo*y, in its modern signification, 30 years earlier than any I had been able to find when publishing the A.-I. Gloss. I have one a year earlier, and expect now to find it earlier still."

[1733.—"You are next . . . to make a complete survey . . . of the number of fighting Sepoys. . . ."—Forrest, Frontier Letters, ii. 55.]

1747.—"At a Council of War held at Fort St. David the 25th December, 1747.

Present:—

Charles Floyer, Esq., Governor.
George Gibson John Holland
John Crompton John Rodolph de Gingen
William Brown John Usgate
Robert Sanderson.

"It is further ordered that Capt. Crompton keep the Detachment under his Command at Cuddalore, in a readiness to march to the Choultry over against the Fort as soon as the Signal shall be made from the Place, and then upon his firing two Muskets, Boats shall be sent to bring them here, and to leave a sergeant at Cuddalore Who shall conduct his Seapoys to the Garden Guard, and the Sergeant shall have a Word by which He shall be received at the Garden."—Original MS. Proceedings (in the India Office).

"The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay, March 16th, "if they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Consn. May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Warwick, and Ilchester, Princess Augusta, "on the 28th inst., from Bombay, (bringing) us a General from that Presidency,* as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses (Topaz), and 100 well-trained Seapoys, all of which under the command of Capt. Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer. . . ."

And under July 13th. " . . . The Reinforcement of Seapoys having arrived from Tellicherry, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected; and as there is far greater Dependence to be placed on those People than on our own Peons . . . many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, AGREED, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Choicest of them continued in the Service."—MS. Records in India Office.

1752.—" . . . they quitted their outrenchments on the first day of March, 1752, and advanced in order of battle, taking possession of a rising ground on the right, on which they placed 50 Europeans; the front consisted of 1500 Sipoyas, and one hundred and twenty or thirty French."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, pp. 9-10.

1758.—A Tabular Statement (Mappa) of the Indian troops, 20th Jan. of this year, shows "Corpo de Sipaes" with 1162 "Sipaes prompts."—Bosquejo, as above.

1763.—"The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Sepoya."—Orme, i. 80.

1763.—"Major Carnac . . . observes that your establishment is loaded with the expense of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Sepoy Battalions, whereas such is the nature of Sepoys that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Court's Letter, of March 9. In Long, 290

1770.—"England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 9800 European troops, and 54,000 sipahis well armed and disciplined."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 459.

1774.—"Sipai sono li soldati Indiani"—Della Tomba, 297.

1778.—"La porta del Ponente della città si custodiva dalli sipaisi soldati Indiani radunati da tutte le tribù, e religioni."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, 4.

1780.—"Next morning the sepoy came to see me. . . . I told him that I owed him my life. . . . He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Imprisonment, Lives of Lindsays, iii. 274.

1782.—"As to Europeans who run from their natural colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard one of the best officers the Company ever had . . . say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Seapoys; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 95-96.

1789.—

"There was not a captain, nor scarce a seapoy,
But a Prince would depose, or a Bramin destroy."

The French write cipaye or cipai :

1759.—"De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cens sur la route de Pondichery, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Coulis, ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry, in Cambridge's Account, p. 150.

c. 1835-38.—

"Il ne criant ni Kriss ni zagaies, Il regarde l'homme sans fuir,
Et rit des balles des cipayes
Qui rebondissent sur son cuir."

Th. Gautier, L'Hippopotame.

Since the conquest of Algeria the same word is common in France under another form, viz., spâhi. But the Spâhi is totally different from the sepo, and is in fact an irregular horseman. With the Turks, from whom the word is taken, the spâhi was always a horseman.

1554.—"Aderant magnis muneribus praepositi multi, aderant praetoriam equites omnes Spahi, Garipigi, Ulufagi, Gianzarorum magnus numerus, sed nullus in tanto conventu nobilis nisi ex suis virtutibus et fortibus factis."—Busbey, Epistolae, i. 99.

1786.—"Bajazet had two years to collect his forces . . . we may discriminate the janizaries . . . a national cavalry, the Spahis of modern times."—Gibbon, ch. lv.

1877.—"The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. . . . The sipahis acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry which the janissaries held among the infantry, and their seditious conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Greece, ed. 1877, v. 37.

SERAI, SERYE, s. This word is used to represent two Oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sarā, sarāī. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Tartars when they began to build palaces. Hence Sarāī, the name of more than one royal residence of the Mongol Khāns upon the Volga, the Sarra of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language sarai has been degraded to mean 'a shed.' The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, serail and serraglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the "striving after meaning" connected the word with Ital. serrato, 'shut up'; and with a word serraglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connection. [Serraglio, according to Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) is "formed with suffix -aglio (L. -aculum) from Late Lat. serare, 'to bar, shut in'—Lat. sera, a 'bar, bolt'; Lat. serere, 'to join together.'] It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's apartments' to the word. Sarai has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Serraglio di Belve. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of 'a Serragle of blackguards.' In the Diary in England of Annibale Litolfi of Mantua the writer says: "On entering the tower there is a Serraglio in which, from grandeur, they keep lions and tigers and cat-lions." (See Randou Brown's Calendar of Papers in Archives of Venice, vol. vi. pt. iii. 1557-8. App.) [The Stanf. Dict. quotes Evelyn as using the word of a place where persons are confined: 1644. "I passed by the Piazza Judea, where their seraglio begins" (Diary, ed. 1872, i. 142).]

c. 1584.—"At Saralum Turcis palatium principis est, vel aliud amplum ædificium, non a Czar voce Tatarica, quæ regem significat, dictum; vnde Remecius Saragham Turcis vocari putat, ut regiam. Nam alio quoquo domus, extra Sultani regiam, nomen hoc ferunt . . . vt ampla Turcorum hospitia, sive diuersoria publica, quæ vulgo Caravansarais (Garavanseray) nostri vocant."—Leunclavius, ed. 1650, p. 403.

1609.—". . . by it the great Suray, besides which are diuers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein diuers neate lodgings are to be let, with doores, lockes, and keys to each."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614.—"This term serraglio, so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk's dwelling . . . has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly 'a palace.' . . . But since this word serai resembles serrato, as a Venetian would call it, or seraglio as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (serrato or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the women and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barred up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into serraglio."—P. della Valle, i. 36.

1615.—"Onely from one dayes Journey to another the Sophie hath caused to be erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodgings (like hamlets) called caravansaras, or surayes, for the benefite of Caravanes. . . ."—Dr Montfort, 8.

1616.—"In this kingdome there are no Innes to entertaine strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their recout, which they call Sarray, not inhabited, where any Passenger may haue room free, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessaries."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1475.

1638.—"Which being done we departed from our Serray (or Inne)."—W. Bruton, in Hall, v. 49.

* On another B.M. copy of an earlier edition than that quoted, and which belonged to Jos. Scaliger, there is here a note in his autograph: "Id est Cæsar, non est vox Tatarica, sed Vindica seu Illyrica, ex Latino delecta."

1618.—"A great sary or place for housing travelling folk."—Van Twick, 17.

1782.—"The stationary tenants of the Seraues, many of them women, and some of them very pretty, approach the traveller on his entrance, and in alluring language describe to him the varied excellencies of their several lodgings."—Forster, Journey, ed. 1803, i. 86.

1825.—"The whole number of lodgers in and about the serai, probably did not fall short of 500 persons. What an admirable scene for an Eastern romance would such an inn as this afford!"—Heber, ed. 1814, ii. 122.

1850.—"He will find that, if we omit only three names in the long line of the Delhi Emperors, the comfort and happiness of the people were never contemplated by them; and with the exception of a few sarais and bridges,—and these only on roads traversed by the imperial camps—he will see nothing in which purely selfish considerations did not prevail."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Original Preface to Historians of India, Elliot, I. xxi.

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goglet (q.v.). This is Ar.—P. surahi. [This is the dorai or kulleh of Egypt, of which Lane (Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 186 seq.) gives an account with illustrations.]

c. 1666.—". . . my Narah having vouchsafed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new loaf of his house, and a Souray of the water of Ganges. . . . Souray is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the Serrant that marcheth on foot before the Gentleman on horseback, carrieth in his hand, wrapt up in a sleeve of red cloath."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 356].

1808.—"We had some bread and butter, two surahes of water, and a bottle of brandy."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1830.—"The best known is the gilt silver work of Cashmere, which is almost confined to the production of the water-vessels or sarais, copied from the clay goblets in use throughout the northern parts of the Panjab."—Birdwood, Indust. Arts of India, 149.]

SERANG, s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. sarhang, 'a commander or overseer.' In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wills, 80).

1599.—". . . there set sail two Portuguese vessels which were come to Amcao (Macao) from the City of Goa, as occurs every year. They are commanded by Captains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of these nations, whom they understand, and recognise and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi."—Carletti, Viaggi, ii. 206.

SERAPHIN. See XERAFIN.

SERENDĪB, n.p. The Arabic form of the name of Ceylon in the earlier Middle Ages. (See under CEYLON.)

SERINGAPATAM, n.p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tippoo. Written Sri-ranga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnu's Town.' But as both this and the other Srirangam (Seringam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Cauvery, it is possible that ranga stands for Lanka, and that the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

[SERPEYCH, s. Pers. sarpech, sarpech; an ornament of gold, silver or jewels, worn in front of the turban; it sometimes consists of gold plates strung together, each plate being set with precious stones. Also a band of silk and embroidery worn round the turban.

[1753.—". . . a fillet. This they call a sirpach, which is wore round the turban; persons of great distinction generally have them set with precious stones."—Hamway, iv. 101.

[1786.—"Surpalshee." See under CULGEE.

[1813.—"Serpeych." See under KIL-LUT.]

SETT, s. Properly Hind. seth, which according to Wilson is the same word with the Chetti (see CHETTY) or Shetti of the Malabar Coast, the different forms being all from Skt. śreṣṭha, 'best, or chief,' śreṣṭhi, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti with the Skt. word (see CHETTY).

1740.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Filick Chund (&c.), they being of a different caste; and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757.—"To the Seats Mootabray and Roopchund the Government of Chandunnagore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 138 of reprint (Bk. viii.).

1770.—"As soon as an European arrived the Gontoos, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character . . . and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at this is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks.

"These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. . . ."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 427. Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setts.

[1883.—". . . from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin a security endorsed by the Mathura Seth is as readily convertible into cash as a Bank of England Note in London or Paris."—F. S. Growse, Mathura, 14.]

SETTLEMENT, s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and enquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province, [and a few districts in the Benares division of the N.W.P., and in Madras.]

[SEVEN PAGODAS, n.p. The Tam. Mavallipuram, Skt. Mahabali-pura, 'the City of the Great Bali,' a place midway between Sadras and Covelong. But in one of the inscriptions (about 620 A.D.) a King, whose name is said to have been Amara, is described as having conquered the chief of the Mahamalla race. Malla was probably the name of a powerful highland chieftain subdued by the Chalukyans (See Crole, Man. of Chingleput, 92 seq.). Dr. Oppert (Orig. Inhabit., 98) takes the name to be derived from the Malla or Palli race.

SEVEN SISTERS, or BROTHERS.

The popular name (Hind. sāt-bhāī) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terrior, Hodgson, 'Bengal babbler' of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon's Birds (Godwin-Austen's ed., ii. 59). In China certain birds of starling kind are called by the Chinese pa-ko, or "Eight Brothers," for a like reason. See Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, 1868, p. 319. (See MYNA.)

1878. — "The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas . . . sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly talking whilst they hop" — Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883. — " . . . the Satbhāī or 'Seven Brothers' . . . are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of. . . . Among themselves they will quarrel by the hour, and bandy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once. . . . Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth's opinionative child, they are seven." — Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

SEVEENDROOG, n.p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz.:

a. Suvarna-druga, or Suvandrug, on the west coast, about 78 m. below

Bombay (Lat. 17° 48' N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Tulaji Angria, of the famous piratical family. [For the commander of the expedition, Commodore James, and his monument on Shooter's Hill, see Douglas, Bombay and IV. India, i. 117 seq.]

b. Savandrug; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis's army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 55'). [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 228, ii. 232) calls it Saventy Droog, and Saren-droog.]

SEYCHELLE ISLANDS, n.p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40' & 4° 50' S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise "in the centre of a vast plateau of coral" of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Irmanos or Hermanos), sometimes Seven Sisters (Seis Irmanas), whilst in Delisle's Map of Asia (1700) we have both "les Sept Frères" and "les Sept Sœurs." Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Almirantes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained uninhabited, and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of the 18th century. In 1742 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the islands of this little archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazare Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1774, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé, and to the group the name of Iles de Bourdonnais, for which Res Mahé (which is the name given in the Neptune Orientale of D'Apres de Manneville, 1775, pp. 29-38, and the charts), seems to have been substituted. Whatever may have been La Bourdonnais' plans with respect to these islands, they were interrupted by his engagement in the Indian campaigns of 1745-46, and his government of Mauritius was never resumed. In 1756 the Sieur Morphey (Murphy?), commander of the frigate Le Cerf, was sent by M. Magon, Governor of Mauritius and Bourbon, to take possession of the Island of Mahé. But it seems doubtful if any actual settlement of the islands by the French occurred till after 1769. [See the account of the islands in Ocean's Narrative, ii. 158 seqq.]

A question naturally has suggested itself to us as to how the group came by the name of the Seychelles Islands; and it is one to which no trustworthy answer will be easily found in English, if at all. Even French works of pretension (e.g. the Dictionnaire de la Rousse) are found to state that the islands were named after the "Minister of Marine, Herauld de Séchelles, who was eminent for his services and his able administration. He was the first to establish a French settlement there." This is quoted from La Rousse; but the fact is that the only man of the name known to fame is the Jacobin and friend of Danton, along with whom he perished by the guillotine. There never was a Minister of Marine so called! The name Séchelles first (so far as we can learn) appears in the Hydrographie Française of Belin, 1767, where in a map entitled Carte réduite du Canal de Mozambique the islands are given as Les Îles Sécheyles, with two enlarged plans en cartouche of the Port de Sécheyles. In 1767 also Chev. de Grenier, commanding the Heure du Berger, visited the Islands, and in his narrative states that he had with him the chart of Picault, "envoyé par La Bourdonnais pour reconnoître les îles des Sept Frères, lesquelles ont été depuis nommées îles Mahé et ensuite îles Séchelles." We have not been able to learn by whom the latter name was given, but it was probably by Morphey of the Cerf; for among Dalrymple's Charts (pub. 1771), there is a "Plan of the Harbour adjacent to Bat River on the Island Seychelles, from a French plan made in 1756, published by Bellin." And there can be no doubt that the name was bestowed in honour of Moreau de Séchelles, who was Contrôleur-Général des Finances in France in 1754-56, i.e. at the very time when Governor Magon sent Capt. Morphey to take possession. One of the islands again is called Silhouette, the name of an official who had been Commissaire du roi près la Compagnie des Indes, and succeeded Moreau de Séchelles as Controller of Finance; and another is called Praslin, apparently after the Duc de Choiseul Praslin who was Minister of Marine from 1766 to 1770.

The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Capt. Neale shows that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahé as "the island Seychelles, or Sécheyles," as in Belin's chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which La Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connection with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1704, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L'Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526).

The following passage of Pyrand probably refers to the Seychelles:

c. 1810.—"Le Roy (des Maldives) enuoya par deux foyz un très expert pilote pour aller decouvrir une certaine île nommée pollouoy, qui leur est presque inconnue. . . . Ils disent aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l'île illo est fertile en toutes sortes de fruits, et même ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocos médicinaux qui sont si chers-là en viennent. . . . 1769.—“The principal places, the situation of which I determined, are the Secheyles islands, the flat of Cargados, the Salha da Maha, the island of Diego Garcia, and the Adu isles. The island Secheyles has an exceedingly good harbour. . . . This island is covered with wood to the very summit of the mountains. . . . In 1769 when I spent a month here in order to determine its position with the utmost exactness, Secheyles and the adjacent isles were inhabited only by monstrous crocodiles, but a small establishment has since been formed on it for the cultivation of cloves and nutmegs.”—Voyage to Madagascar and the E. Indies by the Abbé Rochon, E.T. London, 1792, p. lvi.

1772.—“The island named Seychelles is inhabited by the French, and has a good harbour. . . . I shall here deliver my opinion that these islands, where we now are, are the Three Brothers and the adjacent islands . . . as there are no islands to the eastward of them in these latitudes, and many to the westward.”—Capt Neale's Passage from Bencoolen to the Seychelles Islands in the Swift Grah. In Dunn's Directory, ed. 1780, pp 225, 232.

[1901.—“For a man of energy, perseverance, and temperate habits, Seychelles affords as good an opening as any tropical colony.”—Report of Administrator, in Times, Oct. 2.]

SHA, SAH, s. A merchant or banker; often now attached as a surname. It is Hind. śāh and śāhu from Skt. śādhū, 'perfect, virtuous, respectable' ('pradhomme'). See SOW-CAR.

[c. 1809.—“ . . . the people here called Mahajans (Mahajun), Sahu, and Bahariyas, live by lending money.”—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 573.]

SHABUNDER, s. Pers. Shāh-bandar, lit. 'King of the Haven,' Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship-masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabander; ours Shabunder or Sabunder. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo, [and the Persians still call their Consuls Shāh-bandar (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 156)] In the marine Malay States the Shabandar was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports. At Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, 'Scheik Bandar' (Voyages, iii. 121). [This is the office which King Mīhrjān conferred upon Sindbad the Seaman, when he made him "his agent for the port and registrar of all ships that entered the harbour" (Burton, iv. 351)].

c. 1350.—“The chief of all the Musulmans in this city (Kaulam—see QUILON) is Mahomed Shāhbandar.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 100.

c. 1539.—“This King (of the Bataes) understanding that I had brought him a Letter and a Present from the Captain of Malacca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabandar, who is he that with absolute Power governs all the affairs of the Army.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xv.), in Cogan's Transl. p. 18.

1552.—“And he who most insisted on this was a Moor, Xabandar of the Guzarates” (at Malacca).—Castanheda, ii. 359.

1553.—“A Moorish lord called Sabayo (Sabato) . . . as soon as he knew that our ships belonged to the people of these parts of Christendom, desiring to have confirmation on the matter, sent for a certain Polish Jew who was in his service as Shabandar (Xabandar), and asked him if he knew of what nation were the people who came in these ships. . . .”—Barros, i. iv. 11.

1561.—“ . . . a boatman, who, however, called himself Xabandar.”—Correa, Lendas, ii. 80.

1569.—“The Sabandar took off my Hat, and put a Roll of white linen about my head. . . .”—J. Davis, in Purchas, i. 12.

[1604.—“Sabindar.” See under KLING.]

1606.—"Then came the Sabendor with light, and brought the General to his house."

1610.—"The Sabander and the Governor of Mancoek (a place scituated by the River). . . ."
—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 322.

[1615.—"The opinion of the Sabindour shall be taken."—Foster, Letters, iv. 79.]

c. 1650.—"Coming to Golconda, I found that the person whom I had left in trust with my chamber was dead: but that which I observ'd most remarkable, was that I found the door seal'd with two Seals, one being the Cadi's or chief Justice's, the other the Sha-Bander's or Provost of the Merchants."—Tavernier, E.T. Pt. ii. 136; [ed. Ball, ii. 70].

1673.—"The Shawbunder has his Grandeur too, as well as receipt of Custom, for which he pays the King yearly 22,000 Thomands."—Fryer, 222.

1688.—"When we arrived at Achin, I was carried before the Shabander, the chief Magistrate of the City. . . ."
—Dampier, i. 502.

1711.—"The Duties the Honourable Company require to be paid here on Goods are not above one fifth Part of what is paid to the Shabander or Custom-Master."—Lockyer, 223.

1726.—Valentyn, v. 313, gives a list of the Sjahbandars of Malakka from 1641 to 1725. They are names of Dutchmen.

[1727.—"Shawbandaar." See under TENASSERIM.]

1759.—"I have received a long letter from the Shabzada, in which he complains that you have begun to carry on a large trade in salt, and betel nut, and refuse to pay the duties on those articles . . . which practice, if continued, will oblige him to throw up his post of Shahbunder Droga (Daroga)."—IV. Hastings to the Chief at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 5.

1768.—". . . two or three days after my arrival (at Batavia), the landlord of the hotel where I lodged told me he had been ordered by the shebandar to let me know that my carriage, as well as others, must stop, if I should meet the Governor, or any of the council; but I desired him to acquaint the shebandar that I could not consent to perform any such ceremony."
—Capt. Carteret, quoted by transl. of Suvarinus, i. 281.

1795.—"The descendant of a Portuguese family, named Jaunsee, whose origin was very low . . . was invested with the important office of Shawbunder, or intendant of the port, and receiver of the port customs."—Symes, p. 160.

1837.—"The Seyd Mohammad El Mah-roockee, the Shahbendar (chief of the Merchants of Cairo) hearing of this event, suborned a common fellow. . . ."
—Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1837, i. 157.

SHADDOCK, s. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the pommelo (q.v.). And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India. [Nothing definite seems to be known of this Capt. Shaddock. Mr. R. C. A. Prior (7 ser. N. & Q., vii. 375) writes: "Lunan, in 'Hortus Jamaicensis,' vol. ii. p. 171, says, 'This fruit is not near so large as the shaddock, which received its name from a Capt. Shaddock, who first brought the plant from the East Indies.' The name of the captain is believed to have been Shattock, one not uncommon in the west of Somersetshire. Sloane, in his 'Voyage to Jamaica,' 1707, vol. i. p. 41 says, 'The seed of this was first brought to Barbados by one Capt. Shaddock, commander of an East Indian ship, who touch'd at that island in his passage to England, and left its seed there.' Watt (Econ. Dict. ii. 349) remarks that the Indian vernacular name Batāvi nibā, 'Batavian lime,' suggests its having been originally brought from Batavia.]

[1754.—". . . pimple-noses (pommelo), called in the West Indies, Chadocks, a very fine large fruit of the citron-kind, but of four or five times its size. . . ."

1878.—". . . the splendid Shaddock that, weary of ripening, lays itself upon the ground and swells at ease. . . ."
—In My Indian Garden, 50.

[1893.—

"He has stripped my rails of the shaddock frails and the green unripened pine."

R. Kipling, Barrack Room Ballads, p. 130.]

SHADE (TABLE-SHADE, WALL-SHADE), s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of the last century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within it. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade. In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of last century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret. The second quotation below gives a notable description of a captain's outfit when taking the field in the 18th century.

1780.—"Borrowed last Month by a Person or Persons unknown, out of a private Gentleman's House near the Esplanade, a very elegant Pair of Candle Shades. Whoever will return the same will receive a reward of 40 Sera Rupers.—N.B. The Shades have private marks."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8.

1789.—"His tent is furnished with a good large bed, mattress, pillow, &c., a few camp-stools or chairs, a folding table, a pair of shades for his candles, six or seven trunks with table equipage, his stock of linen (at least 24 shirts); some dozens of wine, brandy, and gin; tea, sugar, and biscuit; and a hamper of live poultry and his milch-goat."—Munro's Narrative, 186.

1817.—"I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Munro, in Litt., i. 511.

[1838.—"We brought carpets, and chandeliers, and wall shades (the great staple commodity of Indian furniture), from Calcutta. . . ."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, 2nd ed. i. 182.]

SHAGREEN, s. This English word, —French chagrin; Ital. zigrino; Mid. High Ger. Zager, —comes from the Pers. ṣāghrī, Turk. ṣāghrī, meaning properly the croupe or quarter of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called ṣāghrī in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chagrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Ital. lima also is (Etym. Worterbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; but Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict.) denies its correctness.]

1663.—" . . . à Alep . . . on y travaille aussi bien qu'à Damas le sagri, qui est ce qu'on appelle chagrin en France, mais l'on en fait une bien plus grande quantité en Perse. . . . Le sagri se fait de croupe d'âne," &c.—Theriot, Voyages, iii. 116-116.

1862.—"Saghres, or Keemook, Horse or Ass-hide."—Punjab Trade Report, App. cexx.; [For an account of the manufacture of limukht, see Hocoy, Mon. on Trades and Manufactures of N. India, 91.]

SHAITAN, Ar. 'The Evil One; Satan.' Shaitān ka bhai, 'Brother of the Arch-Enemy,' was a title given to Sir C. Napier by the Amirs of Sind and their followers. He was not the first great English soldier to whom this title had been applied in the East. In the romance of Cœur de Lion, when Richard entertains a deputation of Saracens by serving at table the head of one of their brethren, we are told:

"Every man sat styll and pokyd othir; They saide: 'This is the Darlys brother, That sles our men, and thus hom cetes. . ."

[c. 1630.—"But a Mountebank or Impostor is nick-named Shitan. Tabib, i.e. the Devil's Chirurgeon."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1753.—"God preserve me from the Scheithan Almagim."—Hanray, iii. 90.]

1863.—"Not many years ago, an eccentric gentleman wrote from Sikkim to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta, stating that, on the snows of the mountains there were found certain mysterious foot-steps, more than 30 or 40 paces asunder, which the natives alleged to be Shaitan's. The writer at the same time offered, if Government would give him leave of absence for a certain period, etc., to go and trace the author of these mysterious vestiges, and thus this strange creature would be discovered without any expense to Government. The notion of catching Shaitan without any expense to Government was a sublime piece of Anglo-Indian tact, but the offer was not accepted."—Sir H. Yule, Notes to Friar Jordanus, 37.

SHALEE, SHALOO, SHELLA, SALLO, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the two latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the first two (Shakespear and Fallon give salū) are names in familiar use for a soft twilled cotton stuff, of a Turkey-red colour, somewhat resembling what we call, by what we had judged to be a modification of the word, shaloon. But we find that Skeat and other authorities ascribe the latter word to a corruption of Chalons, which gave its name to certain stuffs, apparently bed-coverlets of some sort. Thus in Chancer :

"With shotes and with chalons faira yspreddo."—The Reece's Tale.

On which Tyrwhitt quotes from the Monasticon, "... aut pannos pictos qui vocantur chalons loco lectisternii." See also in Liber Albus :

"La charge de chalouns et draps de Reynes. . . ."—p. 225, also at p. 231.

c. 1343.—"I went then to Shaliyāt (near Calicut—see CHALIA) a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs (qn. shālī?) that bear its name."—For Baituta, iv. 103.

[It is exceedingly difficult to disentangle the meanings and derivations of this series of words. In the first place we have saloo, Hind. salū, the Turkey-red cloth above described ; a word which is derived by Platts from Skt. salū, 'a kind of astringent substance,' and is perhaps the same word as the Tel. salū, 'cloth.' This was originally an Indian fabric, but has now been replaced in the bazars by an English cloth, the art of dyeing which was introduced by French refugees who came over after the Revolution (see 7 ser. N. & Q. viii. 485 seq.). See PIECE-GOODS, SALOO-PAUTS.

[c. 1590.—"Sālu, per piece, 3 R. to 2 M."—Am, i. 91.

[1610.—"Sallallo, blue and black."—Danvers, Letters, i. 72.

[1672.—"Salloos, made at Gulcundah, and brought from thence to Surat, and go to England."—In Dirdwood, Report on Old Records, 62.

[1896.—"Salu is another fabric of a red colour prepared by dyeing English cloth named mārkin ('American') in the dl dye, and was formerly extensively used for turbans, curtains, borders of female coats and female dress."—Muhammad Hadi, Mon. on Dyes, 34.

Next we have shelah, which may be identical with Hind. selā, which Platts connects with Skt. chela, chaila, "a piece of cloth," and defines as "a kind of scarf or mantle (of silk, or lawn, or muslin ; usually composed of four breadths depending from the shoulders loosely over the body ; it is much worn and given as a present, in the Dakkhan) ; silk turban." In the Deccan it seems to be worn by men (Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, Madras reprint, 18). The Madras Gloss. gives sheelay, Mal. shila, said to be from Skt. chira, 'a strip of cloth,' in the sense of clothes ; and sullah, Hind. sela, 'gauze for turbans.'

[c. 1590.—"Shelah, from the Dok'han, per piece, $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 M."—Am, i. 95.

[1693.—"Cheyla," in Linschoten, i. 81.

[1800.—"Shillas, or thin white muslins. . . . They are very coarse, and are sometimes striped, and then called Dupattas (see DOOPUTTY)."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 240.]

1809.—"The shalie, a long piece of coloured silk or cotton, is wrapped round the waist in the form of a petticoat, which leaves part of one leg bare, whilst the other is covered to the ankle with long and graceful folds, gathered up in front, so as to leave one end of the shalie to cross the breast, and form a drapery, which is sometimes thrown over the head as a veil"—Maria Graham, 3. [But, as Sir H. Yule suggested, in this form the word may represent Saroo.]

1813.—"Red Shellas or Salloes. . . ."—Milburn, i. 121.

[" " "His shela, of fine cloth, with a silk or gold thread border. . . ."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 219 seq.

The following may represent the same word, or be perhaps connected with P.—H. chilla, 'a selvage, gold threads in the border of a turban, &c.'

[1610.—"Tayle, the corg, Rs. 70."—Danvers, Letters, i. 72.]

1615.—"320 pieces red zelas."—Foster, Letters, iv. 129. The same word is used by Cocks, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 4.]

SHAMA, s. Hind. shāmā [Skt. syāma, 'black, dark-coloured.'] A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, Kitta cincla macrura, Gmel. "In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy" (Jerdon). The long tail seems to indicate the identity of this bird rather than the mainā (see MYNA) with that described by Aelian. [Mr. McCrindle (Invasion of India, 186) favours the identification of the bird with the Mainā.]

c. A.D. 250.—“There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a starling. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more loquacious and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for intercourse with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts . . . call the bird keplaw ('Taily'), and the name arose from the fact that the bird twitches his tail just like a wagtail.”—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 3.

SHAMAN, SHAMANISM, s

These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself with exorcism and “devil-dancing” as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes, but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddahs of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. “Hinduism has assimilated these ‘prior superstitions of the sons of Tur,’ as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Mussulman orthodoxy” (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. II. ch. 50). The characteristics of Shamanism is the existence of certain sooth-sayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dances.

The innuendite origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjuror in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming shaman, pl. samusa. But then in Chinese Sha-mán or Shi-mán is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. śramana, Pali samana. Whether the Tunguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately (Über den Doppelsinn des Wortes Schamane und über den tungusischen Schamanen-Cultus am Hofe der Mandju Kaisern, Berlin Akad. 1842), finds it difficult to suppose any connection. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

c. B.C. 320.—“Τὸς δὲ Σαρμάνας, τοὺς μὲν ἐντιμωτάτους Ἰνδοῖσι φασὶν ὀνομάζεσθαι, ζῶντας ἐν ταῖς οἰαῖς ἀπὸ φύλλων καὶ καρπῶν ἀγρίων, ἐσθῆτας δ' ἔχειν ἀπὸ φύλλων δένδρεων, ἀφροδισίων χωρὶς καὶ οἴνου.”—From Megasthenes, in Strabo, xv.

c. 712.—“All the Samanis assembled and sent a message to Bajhrā, saying, “We are śāsik devotees. Our religion is one of peace and quiet, and fighting and slaying is prohibited, as well as all kinds of shedding of blood.”—Chach Nāma, in Elliot, i. 168.

1829.—“Kami is the Mongol name of the spirit-conjuror or sorcerer, who before the introduction of Buddhism exercised among the Mongols the office of Sacrificer and Priest, as he still does among the Tunguzes, Manjus, and other Asiatic tribes. . . . In Europe they are known by the Tunguz name shaman; among the Manjus as saman, and among the Tibetans as llaba. The Mongols now call them with contempt and abhorrence Bok or Bügke, i.e. ‘Sorcerer,’ ‘Wizard,’ and the women who give themselves to the like fooleries Udugun.”—J. Schmidt, Notes to Sanang Setzen, p. 416.

1871.—“Among Siberian tribes, the shamans select children liable to convulsions as suitable to be brought up to the profession, which is apt to become hereditary with the epileptic tendencies it belongs to.”—Taylor, Primitive Culture, ii. 121.

SHAMBOGUE, s. Canar. shāna-or śāna-bhoga; shānāya, ‘allowance of grain paid to the village accountant,’ Skt. bhoga, ‘enjoyment.’ A village clerk or accountant.

[c. 1766.—“ . . . this order to be enforced in the accounts by the shanbogue.”—Logan, Malabar, iii. 120.

[1800.—“Shanaboga, called Shanbogue, by corruption, and Gurnum by the Mussulmans, is the village accountant.”—Buchanan’s Mysore, i. 263.]

1801.—“When the whole kist is collected, the shanbogue and potail (see FATEL) carry it to the teshildar’s cutcherry.”—T. Munro, in Life, i. 316.

SHAMEEANA, SEMIANNA, s. Pers. shamiyāna or shāmiyāna [very doubtfully derived from Pers. shah, 'king', miyāna, 'centre'], an awning or flat tent-roof, sometimes without sides, but often in the present day with canavats; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populo, and in a manner generally accessible. [In the early records the word is used for a kind of striped calico.]

c. 1500.—"The Shāmiyāna-awning is made of various sizes, but never more than of 12 yards square."—Ain, i. 51.

[1609.—"A sort of Calico here called semi-janes are also in abundance, it is broader than the Calico."—Danvers, Letters, i. 29.]

[1613.—"The Pector having certain chueckeros (chucker) of fine Semian chowters."—Ibid. i. 217. In Foster, iv. 239, somanes.]

1616.—". . . there is erected a throne four foot from the ground in the Durbar Court from the backe whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 43 broad was rayled in, and covered with fair Seminanes or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet joyned together, and sustained with Canes so covered."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i.; Hak. Soc. i. 142.

[1676.—"We desire you to furnish him with all things necessary for his voyage, . . . with bridle and saddle, Semennoes, canavats (Canaut). . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 89.]

1614.—"I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summiniana or Shamyana, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 455; 2nd ed. ii. 64. In ii. 291 he writes Shameeana.]

1657.—"At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives 'Shamennahs.'"—M. Thornhill, Personal Adventures, 14.

SHAMPOO, v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigue, &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is chāmpnā, from the imperative of which, chāmpō, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of Bunow, Puckerow, &c. The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly gripe and smite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the bloud. It is a pleasing wantonnesse, and much valued in these hot climes." (In Purchas, ii. 1476). The process was familiar to the Romans under the Empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractator and tractatrix. [Perhaps the earliest reference to the practice is in Strabo (McCrindle, Ancient India, 72).] But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748.—"Shampooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampooed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments. . . ." (The account is good, but too long for extract.)—A Voyage to the L. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1762, p. 226.

1750-60.—"The practice of champing, which by the best intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularizing, as it is little known to the modern Europeans. . . ."—Grove, i. 113. This writer quotes Martial, iii. Ep. 82, and Seneca, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1800.—"The Sultan generally rose at break of day: after being champeed, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Beatson, War with Tippoo, p. 169.

[1810.—"Shampooing may be compared to a gentle kneading of the whole person, and is the same operation described by the voyagers to the Southern and Pacific ocean."—Wells, Hist. Sketches, Madras [reprint, i. 276.]

"Then whilst they fanned the children, or champeed them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1001 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 410.

"That considerable relief is obtained from shampooing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue. . . ."—Williamson, i. M. ii. 108.

1813.—"There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, champeed, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensualists."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 35; [2nd ed. i. 25.]

SHAN, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great Tai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. Missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Loubère, who is very accurate) Tai-Noe or 'Little Tai,' whilst they applied the term Tai-Yai, or 'Great Tai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these;* sometimes also calling the latter Tai-gut, or the 'Tai left behind.' The Tai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan States exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Cambodia; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the case of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilisation, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable States.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Aham, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirant and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan State, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Man, and in Burma by the Buddhistic name of Kau-sambi (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-pyi and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan States.' Further south were those Tai States which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller States of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north of Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Manu or Kausambi), the Shan (Proper), or Burmese Shan, Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shān, is written sham. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Symes in 1795. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not until the Burmese war of 1824-1826, and the active investigation of our Eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shans that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. Ney Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Intro. Sketch of the Hist. of the Shans, &c.). [The ethnology of the race is discussed by J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 187 seqq. Also see Prince Henri d'Orléans, Du Tonkin aux Indes, 1898; H. S. Hallett, Among the Shans, 1885, and A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 1890.]

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Kakhyens; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Siām (written Sieyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Sieyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Sien, which the Chinese used in the compound Sien-lo (for Siam,—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shans as Yudia (see JUDEA) Shans, a term perhaps sometimes including Siam itself. Symes gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as 'Yoodra-Shaan,' and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people 'Cassay Shaan' (see CASSAY).

* On the probable indication of Great and Little used in this fashion, see remarks in notes on Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

1795.—"These events did not deter Shan-luan from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Muanipoora and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition."—Symes, p. 77.

"Zemee (see JANGOMAY), Sanda-poora, and many districts of the Yoodra Shaan to the eastward, were tributary, and governed by Chobwas, who annually paid homage to the Birman king."—Ibid. 102.

"Shaan, or Shan, is a very comprehensive term given to different nations, some independent, others the subjects of the greater states."—Ibid. 274.

c. 1818.—". . . They were assisted by many of the Zaloi (see CHOBWA) or petty princes of the Scliam, subject to the Burmese, who, wearied by the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. . . . The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous. . . . Instead of overcoming the Scliam (they) only lost day by day the territories. . . . and saw their princes range themselves. . . . under the protection of the King of Siam."—Sangermano, p. 57.

1861.—

"Fie, Fie! Captain Spry!

You are surely in joke

With your wives and your trams,

Going past all the Shams

With branches to Bam-you (see BANO), and end in A-smoke."

Ode on the proposed Yunnan Railway.

Bhamo and Lamok were names constantly recurring in the late Capt. Spry's railway projects.

SHANBAFF, SINABAFF, &c., s. Pers. shānbāst. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps indeed these names indicate two different stuffs, as we do not know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinbaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabaff is not in Vuller's Lexicon. Shānbāst is, and is explained as genus panni grossioris, sic descripta (E. T.): "A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of labas (see CABAYA) for sale."—Bahār-i-Ajam. But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China. [Badger (quoted by Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 163) identifies the word with sinā-bāsta, 'Chinn-woven' cloths.]

1313.—"When the aforesaid present came to the Sultan of India (from the Emp. of China) . . . In return for this present he sent another of greater value . . . 100 pieces of shirinbāst, and 500 pieces of shānbāst."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 3.

1498.—"The overcree of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call byramas (beiramee), and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos. . . ."—Correa, E.T. b. Let. Stantry, 137.

[1508.—See under ALJOFAR.]

1510.—"One of the Persians said: 'Let us go to our house, that is, to Calicut.' I answered, 'Do not go, for you will lose these fine sinabaph (which were pieces of cloth we carried)'.—Vearthema, 269.

1516.—"The quintal of this sugar was worth two ducats and a half in Malabar, and a good Sinabaffo was worth two ducats."—Barbosa, 179.

[. . . "Also they make other stuffs which they call Mamonas (Mahmūdā), others duguanas (doguāts), others chautares (see chowtars, under PIECE-GOODS), others sinabafas, which last are the best, and which the Moors hold in most esteem to make shirts of."—Ibid., Lisbon ed. 362.]

SHASTER, s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. śāstra, 'a rule,' a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612.—". . . They have many books in their Latin. . . . Six of these they call Xastra, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purāna (Poorana), which are the limbs."—Conto, V. vi. 3.

1630.—". . . The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shaster, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

1651.—In Rogers, the word is everywhere misprinted Isastra.

1717.—"The six Sastrangol contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship. . . ."—Phillips's Account, 40.

1765.—". . . at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1756, I lost many curious Gento manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Gento Shastah."—J. Z. Holwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2d ed., 1766, i. 3.

1770.—"The Shastah is looked upon by some as a commentary on the vedam, and by others as an original work."—Raynal 'tr 1777', i. 50.

1776.—“The occupation of the Bramin should be to read the Beds, and other Shasters.”—Bathed, Gentoo Code, 39.

[SHASTREE, s. Hind. śāstri (see SHASTER). A man of learning, one who teaches any branch of Hindu learning, such as law.

[1824.—“Gungadhar Shastree, the minister of the Baroda state, . . . was murdered by Trimbuckjee under circumstances which left no doubt that the deed was perpetrated with the knowledge of Bajerow.”—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 307.]

SHAWL, s. Pers. and Hind. shāl, also doshāla, ‘a pair of shawls.’ The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. śavala, ‘variegated.’ Sir George Birdwood tells us that he has found among the old India records “Carmania shells” and “Carmania shawwools” meaning apparently Kerman shawls. He gives no dates unfortunately. [In a book of 1685 he finds “Shawles Carmania” and “Carmania Wool”; in one of 1704, “Chawwools” (Report on Old Records, 27, 40). Carmania goats are mentioned in a letter in Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.] In Meninski (published in 1680) shāl is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally:

“Panni viliores qui partim albi, partim cineritii, partim nigri esse solent ex lana et pillis caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telam injeunt humeri Dervisi . . . instar stolae aut pallii.” To this he adds, “Datur etiam sericem ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostri multiti, sive simplici sive duplicati.” For thus the 2nd edition a century later substitutes: “Shāl-i-Hind” (Indian shawl). “Tela sericea subtilissima ex India adferri solita.”

c. 1590.—“In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmīr. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time. . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (shāl-hāfi) manufacture of shawls in Kashmīr. In Lahōr also there are more than 1000 workshops.”—Asi. i. 92. [Also see ed. Jarrett, ii. 349, 355.]

c. 1665.—“Ils mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu’ils sortent, une Chal, qui est une maniere de toilette d’une laine très-fine qui se fait a Cachmir. Ces Chals ont environ deux aunes (the old French aune, nearly 47 inches English) de long sur une de large. On les achete vingt-cinq ou trente écus si elles sont fines. Il y en a même qui coûtent cinquante écus, mais ce sont les très-fines.”—Theriot, v. 110.

c. 1666.—“Ces chales sont certaines pièces d’étoffe d’une aune et demie de long, et d’une de large ou environ, qui sont brodées aux deux bouts d’une espèce de broderie, faite au métier, d’un pied ou environ de large. . . . J’en ai vu de ceux que les Omrahs font faire exprès, qui coutoient jusqu’à cent cinquante Roupies; des autres qui sont de cette laine du pays, je n’en ai pas vu qui passoient 50 Roupies.”—Dernier, ii. 280-281; [ed. Constable, 402].

1717.—“ . . . Con tutto ciò preziosissime nobilissime e senza comparazione magnifiche sono le tele che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustani, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali Scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra scendere le due metà, con queste si cinge. . . .”—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

[1662.—“Another rich Skarf, which they call schal, made of a very fine stuff.”—J. Davies, Ambassador’s Trav., Bk. vi. 235, Stanf. Dict.]

1727.—“When they go abroad they wear a Shawl folded up, or a piece of White Cotton Cloth lying loose on the Top of their Heads.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 50; [Shawl in ed. 1744, ii. 49].

c. 1760.—“Some Shawls are manufactured there. . . . Those coming from the province of Cachemire on the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautifully bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so pliant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger.”—Grose, i. 118.

1781.—Sonnerat writes challes. He says: “Ces étoffes (faites avec la laine des montons de Tibet) surpassent nos plus belles soieries en finesse.”—Voyage, i. 52

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that breadth; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

SHEEAH, SHIA, s. Arab. shī’a, i.e. ‘sect.’ A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahommedan ‘sect,’ or sects rather, which specially venerate ‘Alī, and regard the Imāms (see IMĀUM), his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the 'Sophy' dynasty, (q.v.)) are Shi'as, and a good many of the Moslems in India. The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Ismaelites of Musulman history, and the modern Bohras (see BORA) and "Mulāhis," may generally be regarded as Shi'a. [See the elaborate article on the sect in Hughes, Dict. of Islām, 672 seqq.]

c. 1309.—". . . dont encore il est ainsi, que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali dient que cil qui croient en la loy Mahommet sont mescreant; et aussi tuit cil qui croient en la loy Mahommet dient que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali sont mescreant."—Joinville, 252.

1553.—"Among the Moors have always been controversies . . . which of the four first Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Babac, Homar, and Otthoman, the Persians (Parsees) favoured Ali, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahomed . . . to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xiā, as much as to say 'Union of one Body,' and the Arabs called them in reproach Raffady [Rafidi, a heretic (lit. 'deserter')], as much as to say 'People astray from the Path,' whilst they call themselves Guny (see SUNNEE), which is the contrary."—Barros, II. x. 6.

1620.—"The Sonnite adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who actually possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Shi'as (Sciā), i.e. 'Sectarics,' and are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali only."—P. della Valle, ii. 75; [conf. Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1626.—"He is by Religion a Mahumotan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turkes, are distinguished in their Sectes by tearmes of Seaw and Sunnee."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 995.

1673.—"His Substitute here is a Chias Moor."—Fryer, 29.

1798.—"In contradistinction to the Sonnis, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Schāhs drop their arms in straight lines."—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805.—"The word Sh'eeah, or Sheent, properly signifies a troop or sect . . . but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Ali, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khulefah, or successor to Moomhammad."—Baillie, Digest of Mah. Law, II. xii.

1869.—"La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l'Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sunnites et Schrites n'ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Turcs et les Persans . . . ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l'Inde; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n'existent généralement entre eux aucune animosité."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

SHEERMAUL, s. Pers.—Hind. shirmāl, a cake made with flour, milk and leaven; a sort of brioche. [The word comes from Pers. shir, 'milk,' māl, 'crushing.' Riddell (Domest. Econ. 461) gives a receipt for what he calls "Nauna Sheer Mhal," nān being Pers., 'bread.']

[1832.—"The dishes of meotah (mīhā, 'sweet') are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostan, without leaven, as Sheah-maul, bacherkaunie (bakir-khani), chapaatie (chupatty), &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 101.

[SHEIKH, s. Ar. shāikh; an old man, elder, chief, head of an Arab tribe. The word should properly mean one of the descendants of tribes of genuine Arab descent, but at the present day, in India, it is often applied to converts to Islam from the lower Hindu tribes. For the use of the word in the sense of a saint, see under PEER.

[1698.—"Lieftenant (which the Arabians called zeqen)."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 24.

[1625.—"They will not have them judged by any Custome, and they are content that their Xaque doo determine them as he list."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 1146.

1727.—". . . but if it was so, that he (Abraham) was thoir Sheek, as they alledge, they neither follow him in Morals or Religion."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 37.

[1835.—"Some parents employ a sheykh or shee to teach their boys at home."—Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 77.]

SHERBET, s. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat,*

* In both written alike, but the final t in Arabic is generally silent, giving sharba, in Persian sharbat. So we get manāra from Pers. and Turk. mudrāt, in Ar. (and in India) manāra [manār, manāra].

'draught,' it is not a word now specially in Anglo-Indian use. The Arabic seems to have entered Europe by several different doors. Thus in Italian and French we have sorbello and sorbet, which probably came direct from the Levantine or Turkish form shurbat or shorbat; in Sp. and Port. we have xarabe, azarabe (ash-sharāb, the standard Ar. sharāb, 'wine or any beverage'), and xarope, and from these forms probably Ital. sciropo, siropo, with old French ysierop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and more directly from the Spanish, shrub. Mod. Span. again gets, by reflection from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Duzy, 17, and Marcel Devic, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imported direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shraub, Sherry-shraub, Lall-shraub, Brandy-shraub, Beer-shraub.

c. 1331.—". . . They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar-candy-water; i.e. syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet" (ash-shurbat).—In Butula, iii. 121.

1678 — "The physicians of the same country use this xarave (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers."—Acosta, 67.

c. 1680.—"Et saccharo potum jucundissimum parant quem Sarbet vocant."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 70.

1611.—"In Persia there is much good wine of grapes which is called Xarab in the language of the country."—Tenzeyra, i. 16.

c. 1630. — "Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; 'tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and juyc of Lemons mixt, call'd Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 241.

1682.—"The Moores . . . dranke a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also dranke a little sorbet, and jacolat (see JOCOLE)."—Evlyn's Diary, Jan 24.

1827.—"On one occasion, before Barak-el-Hadgi left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

1837. — "The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. . . The most common kind (called simply shurbat or shurbat sookhar . . .) is merely sugar and water . . . lemonade (ley'molndeth, or sharāb el- ley'molnd) is another."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 206.

1863.—"The Estate overseer usually gave a dance to the people, when the most dissolute of both sexes were sure to be present, and to indulge too freely in the shrub made for the occasion."—Waddell, 29 Years in the W. Indies, 17.

SHERBEEF, s. Ar. sharif, 'noble.' A dignitary descended from Mahomed.

1493. — "The ambassador was a white man who was Xarife, as much as to say a clerigo" (i.e. clerigo).—Roteiro, 2nd ed. 30.

[1672.—"Schlerifi." See under CASIS.

1701.—" . . . 5th Shreiff of Judda. . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 232.]

SHERISTADAR, s. The head ministerial officer of a Court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form and duly stamped, and generally to attend to routine business. Properly H.—P. from sar-rishti-dār or sarishta-dār, 'register-keeper.' Sar-rishta, an office of registry, literally means 'head of the string.' C. P. Brown interprets Sarrishtadār as "he who holds the end of the string (on which puppets dance)"—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps 'keeper of the clue,' or 'of the file' would approximately express the idea.

1786.—(With the object of establishing) "the officers of the Canongoe's Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars . . . and to prevent confusion in the time to come. . . . For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Sarrishtadār, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department."—Letter from G. G. in C. to Board of Revenue, July 19 (Bengal Rev. Regulation xix.).

1878. — "Nowadays, however, the Sarrishtadār's signature is allowed to authenticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 117.

[SHEVAROY HILLS, n.p. The name applied to a range of hills in the Salem district of Madras. The origin of the name has given rise to much difference of opinion. Mr. Lefanu (Man. of Salem, ii. 19 seq.) thinks that the original name was possibly Sivarayan, whence the German name Shivarat and the English Shevarays; or that Sivarayan may by confusion have become Sherarayan, named after the Raja of Sera; lastly, he suggests that it comes from sharpu or sharu, 'the slope or declivity of a hill,' and ray, 'a mouth, passage, way.' This he is inclined to accept, regarding Sherarayan or Sharrarayan, as 'the cliff which dominates (rayan) the way (ray) which leads through or under the declivity (sharu).' The Madras Gloss. gives the Tam. form of the name as Sherrarayanmalai, from Sherran, 'the Chera race,' rayan, 'king,' and malai, 'mountain.'

[1823.—"Mr. Cockburn . . . had the kindness to offer me the use of a bungalow on the Sherraraya hills. . . ."—Hoot, Missions in Madras, 282.

[SHIBAR, SHIBBAR, s. A kind of coasting vessel, sometimes described as a great pattamar. Molesworth (Mahr. Diet. s.v.) gives shibār which, in the usual dictionary way, he defines as 'a ship or large vessel of a particular description.' The Bombay Gazetteer (x. 171) speaks of the 'shibādī, a large vessel, from 100 to 300 tons, generally found in the Ratnagiri sub-division ports'; and in another place (xiii. Pt. ii. 720) says that it is a large vessel chiefly used in the Malabar trade, deriving the name from Pers. shūhī-bār, 'royal-carrier.'

[1694.—"The Mucaddam (MOCUDDUM) of this shibar bound for Goa."—Yul, in Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. II. clxv.; also see clxxxiv.

[1727.—". . . the other four were Grabs or Gallies, and Sheybars, or half Gallies."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 131.

[1753.—". . . then we cast off a boat called a large shebar, bound to Muscat. . . ."—Jess, 196.]

SHIGRAM, s. A Bombay and Madras name for a kind of hack palaukin carriage. The camel-shigram is often seen on roads in N. India. The name is from Mahr. shighr, Skt. shighra, 'quick or quickly.' A similar carriage is the Jutkah, which takes its name from Hind. jhātka, 'swift.'

[1830.—At Bombay, "In heavy coaches, lighter landaulets, or singular-looking shigrampoes, might be seen hories of British fair . . ."—Mrs. Elwood, Narr. ii. 376.

[1875.—"As it is, we have to go . . . 121 miles in a dak gharry, bullock shigram, or mail-cart. . . ."—Wilson, Abode of Snow 18.]

SHIKAR, s. Hind. from Pers. shikār, 'in chase'; sport (in the sense of shooting and hunting); game.

c. 1590.—"Āin, 27. Of Hunting (orig. Āin-i-Shikār). Superficial worldly observers see in killing an animal a sort of pleasure, and in their ignorance stride about, as if senseless, on the field of their passions. But deep enquirers see in hunting a means of acquisition of knowledge. . . . This is the case with His Majesty."—Āin, i. 282.

1609-10.—"Sykary, which signifieth, seeking, or hunting."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 428.

1800.—"250 or 300 horsemen . . . divided into two or three small parties, supported by our infantry, would give a proper shikar; and I strongly advise not to let the Mahratta boundary stop you in the pursuit of your game."—Sir A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Life of Munro, iii. 117.

1847.—"Yet there is a charm in this place for the lovers of Shikar."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 3.

[1859.—"Although the jungles literally swarm with tigers, a shikar, in the Indian sense of the term, is unknown."—Elephant, Narr. of Mission, i. 25.]

1866.—"May I ask what has brought you out to India, Mr. Cholmondeley? Did you come out for shikar, eh?"—Trenchard, The Duck Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 222.

In the following the word is wrongly used in the sense of Shikaree.

[1900.—"That so experienced a shikar should have met his death emphasises the necessity of caution."—Field, Sept. 1.]

SHIKAREE, SHEKARRY, s. Hind. shikārī, a sportsman. The word is used in three ways:

a. As applied to a native expert, who either brings in game on his own account, or accompanies European sportsmen as guide and aid.

[1822.—"Shecarries are generally Hindoos of low cast, who gain their livelihood entirely by catching birds, hares, and all sorts of animals."—Johnson, Sketches of Field Sports, 25.]

1879.—"Although the province (Pegu) abounds in large game, it is very difficult to discover, because there are no regular shikarees in the Indian acceptation of the word. Every village has its local shikaree, who lives by trapping and killing game. Taking life as he does, contrary to the principles of his religion, he is looked upon as damned by his neighbours, but that does not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Pollak, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

b. As applied to the European sportsman himself; e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikaree." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-75 by Mr. H. A. Leveson under the name of 'The Old Shekarry.'

[c. A shooting-boat used in the Cashmere lakes.

[1875.—"A shikārī is a sort of boat, that is in daily use with the English visitors; a light boat manned, as it commonly is, by six men, it goes at a fast pace, and, if well fitted with cushions, makes a comfortable conveyance. A bandūqī (see BUNDOOK) shikārī is the smallest boat of all, a shooting punt, used in going after wild fowl on the lakes."—Drao, Jumnao, &c., 181.]

SHIKAR-GĀH, s. Pers. A hunting ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in shawl-work in Kashmir and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 17, and notes) [The great areas of jungle maintained by the Amīrs of Sind and called Shikārgāhs are well known.

[1831.—"Once or twice a month when they (the Amēers) are all in good health, they pay visits to their different shikargāhs or preserves for game."—J. Burnes, Visit to the Court of Sind, 103.]

SHIKHÓ, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship. Some correspondence took place in 1883, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burma, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by British envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no analogy whatever to that of shikho, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude. (See KOWTOW.)

1855.—"Our conductors took off their shoes at the gate, and the Woodouk made an ineffectual attempt to induce the Envoy to do likewise. They also at four different places, as we advanced to the inner gate, dropt on their knees and shikhoed towards the palace."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 82.

1882.—"Another ceremony is that of shikhoing to the spire, the external emblem of the throne. All Burmans must do this at each of the gates, at the foot of the steps, and at intervals in between. . . ."—The Burman, His Life and Notions, ii. 206.

SHINBIN, SHINBEAM, &c., s. A term in the Burmese teak-trade; apparently a corruption from Burm. shin-byin. The first monosyllable (shin) means 'to put together side by side,' and byin, 'plank,' the compound word being used in Burmese for 'a thick plank used in constructing the side of a ship.' The shinbin is a thick plank, about 15" wide by 4" thick, and running up to 25 feet in length (see Milburn, i. 47). It is not sawn, but split from green trees.

1791.—"Teak Timber for sale, consisting of Duggis (see DUGGIE). Maguire planks (?)

Shinbeens. Joists and Sheathing Coma planks (?). ing Boards."

Madras Courier, Nov. 10.

SHINKALI, SHIGALA, n.p. A name by which the City and Port of Cranganore (q.v.) seems to have been known in the early Middle Ages. The name was probably formed from Tiruvanjiculam, mentioned by Dr. Gundert below. It is perhaps the Gingaleh of Rabbi Benjamin in our first quotation; but the data are too vague to determine this, though the position of that place seems to be in the vicinity of Malabar.

c. 1167.—"Gingaleh is but three days distant by land, whereas it requires a journey of fifteen days to reach it by the sea; this place contains about 1,000 Israelites."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Wright's Early Travels, p. 117.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore (of Malabar) the first is Sindabur (Gon), then Faknir (see BACANORE), then the country of Manjardr (see MANGALORE) . . . then Chinkali (or Jinkali), then Kulam (see QUILON)."—Rashiduddin, see J. R. As. Soc., N.S., iv. pp. 342, 345.

c. 1320.—"Le pays de Manibár, appelé pays du Poivre, comprend les villes suivantes.

* * * * *
"La ville de Shinkli, dont la majeure partie de la population est composée de Juifs.

"KAULAM est la dernière ville de la côte du Poivre." — Shemmeddin Dimishqui, by Meherr (Co-mographie du Moyen Age), p. 231.

c. 1323. — ". . . there is one very powerful King in the country where the pepper grows, and his kingdom is called Molohar. There is also the King of Singuyli. . . ." — Fr. Jordanus, p. 40.

1330. — "And the forest in which the pepper groweth extendeth for a good 15 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrinn (see PANDARANI), and the other Cynyllin. . . ." — Fr. Oloric, in Cathay, &c., 75-76.

c. 1330. — "Etiam Shallyat (see CHALIA) et Shinkala urbes Malabaricas sunt, quarum alteram Judaei incolunt. . . ." — Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1349. — "And in the second India, which is called Mynibar, there is Cynkall, which signifieth Little India" (Little China) "for Kall is 'little.'" — John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

1510. — "Sciglaalias et Chrongalor vocatur, et quam Cranganorium dicimus Malabarico urbem, ut testatur idem Jacobus Indiarum episcopus ad calcem Testamenti Novi ab ipso exarati anno Græcorum 1821, Christi 1510, et in fine Epistolarum Pauli, Cod. Syr. Vat. B et 12." — In Armani, Dis. de Syr. Ant., pp. 410, 732.

1841. — "The place (Codangalur) is identified with Tiruvanjiculam river-harbour, which Cheraman Perumal is said to have declared the best of the existing 18 harbours of Kerala. . . ." — Dr. Gundert, in Madras Journal, xliii. 120.

"One Kerala Ulpatti (i.e. legendary history of Malabar) of the Nasrani, says that their forefathers . . . built Codangalur, as may be learned from the granite inscription at the northern entrance of the Tiruvanjiculam temple. . . ." — Ibid. 122.

SHINTOO, SINTOO, s. Japanese Shintau, 'the Way of the Gods.' The primitive relation of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be in the Sento of Couto. According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Siuto. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Sento seems more likely to be a mistake for Sento. [See Lowell's articles on Ko-triric Shintoo, in Proc. As. Soc. Japan, 1893.]

1612. — "But above all these idols they adore one Sento, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that it abode in the Heavens." — Couto, V. viii. 12.

1727. — "Le Sinto qu'on appelle aussi Sinsju et Kamimiti, est le Culto des Idoles, établi anciennement dans le pays. Sin et Kami sont les noms des Idoles qui sont l'objet de ce Culto. Siu (su) signifie la Foi, ou la Religion. Sinsju et au pluriel Sinsju, ce sont les personnes qui professent cette Religion." — Kaempfer, Hist. de Japon, i. 176; [L.T. 201].

1770. — "Far from encouraging that gloomy fanaticism and fear of the gods, which is inspired by almost all other religions, the Xinto sect had applied itself to prevent, or at least to moderate that disorder of the imagination." — Raynal (E.T. 1777), i. 187.

1878. — "The indigenous religion of the Japanese people, called in later times by the name of Shintau or Way of the Gods, in order to distinguish it from the way of the Chinese moral philosophers, and the way of Buddha, had, at the time when Confucianism and Buddhism were introduced, passed through the earliest stages of development." — W-stanley Rev., N.S., No. cvii. 25.

[SHIRAZ, n.p.] The wine of Shiraz was much imported and used by Europeans in India in the 17th century, and even later.

[1627. — "Sheraz then probably derive its self either from shera which in the Persian Tongue signifies a Grape here abounding. . . or else from sheer which in the Persian signifies Milk." — Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 127.

[1685. — ". . . three Chests of Shiraz wine. . . ." — Pringle, Dury Pl. St. Geo., 1st ser. iv. 109, and see ii. 118.

[1690. — "Each Day there is prepar'd (at Surrat) a Publick Table for the Use of the President and the rest of the Factory. . . The Table is spread with the choicest Meat Surrat affords. . . and equal plenty of generous Sherash and Arak Punch. . . ." — Orington, 391.

[1727. — "Shyrash is a large City on the Road, about 550 Miles from Amboon." — A. Hamilton, ed. 1711, i. 89.

[1813. — "I have never tasted this (pomegranate wine), nor any other Persian wine, except that of Schiraz, which, although much extolled by poets, I think inferior to many wines in Europe." — Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 463.]

SHIREENBAF, s. Pers. Shirimbaf, 'sweet-wool.' A kind of fine cotton stuff, but we cannot say more precisely what.

c. 1313. — ". . . one hundred pieces o shirimbaf. . . ." — Ibn Battuta, iv. 3.

[1609. — "Serribaff, a fine light stuff or cotton whereof the Moors make their cauvas or clothing." — Danvers, Letters, i. 29.]

1673. — ". . . string-chintz, Broad Baffa. . . ." — Fryer, 88.

SHISHAM. See under SISBOO.

SHISHMUHULL, s. Pers. shisha-mahāl, lit. 'glass apartment' or palace. This is or was a common appendage of native palaces, viz. a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gim-crack aspect. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Villa Palagonia at Bagheria near Palermo.

1835.—"The Shisha-mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded talo and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colour, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 365

SHOE OF GOLD (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: "The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz, and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity" (Gloss. of Reference, 128). [In Hissar the Chinese silver is called silti from the slabs (silt) in which it is sold (MacLagan, Mon. on Gold and Silver Work in Punjab, p. 5).] The same form of ingot was probably the balish (or yastok) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, &c. Both of these latter words mean also 'a cushion,' which is perhaps as good a comparison as either 'shoe' or 'boat.' The word now used in C. Asia is yambū. There are cuts of the gold and silver ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz. a corruption of the Dutch Goldschuyt.

1566.—"... valuable goods exported from this country (China) ... are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India, in leaves in the shape of boats. ..."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391b.

1611.—"Then, I tell you, from China I could load ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 250 pardaos,"—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, p. 155.

1676.—"The Pieces of Gold mark'd Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollanders called Goltschut, that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Leaves of Gold. . . . The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 8.

1702.—"Sent the Moolah to be delivered the Nabob, Dewan, and Duxie 48 China Oranges . . . but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court; which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of gold, or so many thousand pagodas or rupees."—In Wheeler, i. 397.

1704.—"Price Current, July, 1704, (at Malacca) . . . Gold, China, in Shoes 94 Touch."—Lockyer, 70.

1862.—"A silver ingot 'Fambu' weighs about 2 (Indian) seers . . . = 4 lbs., and is worth 165 Co.'s rupees. Koomooch, also called 'Fambucha,' or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs. . . . 5 yambuchas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of 'yambucha'; one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other . . . in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Fambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it."—Punjab Trade Report, App. ccxxvi.-xxviii. 1.

1875.—"The yambū or kira is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is lightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashghar) ser = 30,000 grains English."—Report of Forsyth's Mission to Kashghar, 491.

[1876.—" . . . he received his pay in Chinese yambū (gold coins), at the rate of 128 rubles each, while the real commercial value was only 115 rubles."—Schuyler, Turkistan, ii. 322.

[1901.—A piece of Chinese shoe money, value 10 taels, was exhibited before the Numismatic Society.—Athenaeum, Jan. 26, p. 118. Perhaps the largest specimen known of Chinese "boat-money" was exhibited. It weighed 89½ ounces troy, and represented 50 taels, or £8, 8s. 0d. English.—Ibid. Jan. 25, 1902, p. 120].

SHOE-FLOWER, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tam. shappattuvu, Singli. sappattumala, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kempang sapatu means the same. Voigt gives shoe-flower as the English name, and adds: "Petals astringent, used by the Chinese to blacken their shoes (!) and eyebrows" (Hortus Suburbanus Calcuttensis, 116-7); see also Drury, s.v. The notion of the Chinese blackening their shoes is surely an error, but perhaps they use it to blacken leather for European use.

[1773.—"The flower (Trepaltu, or Mor-roock) (which commonly by us is called Shoe-flower, because used to black our shoes) is very large, of a deep but beautiful crimson colour."—Ires, 475.]

1781.—"La nuit suivante . . . je joignis aux pivots . . . une fleur de foule sapatte, qui sert aux cordonniers à teindre leurs cuir en noir."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaudière Indienne. This foule-sapatte is apparently some quasi Hindustani form of the name (phul-sabdt?) used by the Portuguese.

SHOE-GOOSE, s. This ludicrous corruption of the Pers. sydh-gash, lit. 'black-ear,' i.e. lynx (Felis Caracal) occurs in the passage below from A. Hamilton. [The corruption of the same word by the Times, below, is equally amusing.]

[c. 1330.—". . . ounces, and another kind something like a greyhound, having only the ears black, and the whole body perfectly white, which among these people is called Siagois."—Friar Jordanus, 18.]

1727.—"Antelopes, Hares and Foxes, are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them a Shoe-goose."—A. Hamilton, i. 121; [ed. 1744, i. 125].

1802.—". . . between the cat and the lion, are the . . . syagush, the lynx, the tiger-cat. . . ."—Rilson, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813.—"The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Syah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 277; [2nd ed. i. 175 and 169].

[1886.—"In 1760 a Moor named Abdallah arrived in India with a 'Shah Goest' (so spelt, evidently a Shawl Goat) as a present for Mr. Secretary Pitt."—Account of I. O. Records, in Times, Aug. 3.]

SHOKE, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar.—shauk.

1796.—"This increased my shoug . . . for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindoostanee modes of warfare."—Mily. Mem. of Lt.-Col. J. Skinner, i. 109.

[1866.—"One Itakim has a shoukh for turning everything ooltapoolta."—Confessions of an Orderly, 94.]

SHOLA, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tam. sholdi.

1862.—"At daylight . . . we left the Sispura bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholas of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Peru and India, 356.

1870.—"Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholas, as they are called."—Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 202.

SHOOOKA, s. Ar.—II. shulka (properly 'an oblong strip'), a letter from a king to a subject.

1787.—"I have received several melancholy Shookas from the King (of Dehli) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

SHOOLDARRY, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platts. This author spells the word rhouldari, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhal in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is crammed into a bag when carried. [The word is in Fallon, with the rather doubtful suggestion that it is a corruption of the English 'soldier's' tent. See PAWL.]

1808.—"I have now a shooldarree for myself, and a long paul (see PAWL) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1869.—". . . the men in their sularis, or small single-roofed tents, had a bad time of it. . . ."—Hall, Jungle Life, 156.]

SIRAUB, SHROBB, s. Ar. shardb; Hind. shardb, shrdb, 'wine.' See under SHERBET.

SHIROFF, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. sarrafi, sairafi, sairaf. The word is used by Europeans in China as well as in India, and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next word). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission. From the same root comes the Heb. shref, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi, iii. 3: "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi." Only in Hebrew the goldsmith tests metal, while the piraf tests coin. "The Arab poet says of his mare: 'Her forefeet scatter the gravel every midday, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the curaf.'" (W. R. S.)

1651. "Salaries of the officers of the Custom House, and other charges for those which the Treasurers have to pay. . . . Also to the Xarraf, whose charge it is to see to the money, two pounds a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred reis." Relatio, London, in S. L. vol. 6, 238.

1670.—"There are in the city many and very wealthy carafas who change money."—Jerusalem, ch. 1.

1681. "5 tangas make a serafim (see XERAPHINE) of gold, but if one would change them into berachas (see BUD GHOOK) he may have 5 tangas and 16 berachas, which exceeds they call cerafagio."—Barro, in Holl. ii. 410.

1685.—"This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the raffa) have sold at 12 per cent of Xarafaggio (sh. raffa), as this communion is called, from the word Xaraffo, which is the title of the raffa or."—De Goa, in De Goa, etc., etc., p. 281.

1698. "There is in every place of the street a serafim of money, by that called Xaraffo, which are all elevation serafim."—De Goa, in De Goa, etc., etc., p. 281.

1610.—"Dins en March" . . . and cont les charreurs qui ont lement Cherases, dont il y en a en plusiers autres endroits; hors boutiques cont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toits courtoises de monnoye, dont ils payent tribut au Roy."—Piquet de Lant, ii. 39; (Hak. Soc. n. 67).

1611.—" . . . having been borne in hand by our Sarafes to pay money there."—Fisher, Letters, iii. 282. The "Sheriff of Bantam" (ibid. iv. 7) may perhaps be a shroff, but compare Sherreef.)

1679.—"It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers."—Prye, 413.

1697-8.—"In addition to the cash and property which they had got by plunder, the enemy fixed two lacs of rupees as the price of the ransom of the prisoners. . . . To make up the balance, the Sarrafs and merchants of Nanduldar were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent."—Khadf, Khadf, in Ellist, vii. 362.

1750.—" . . . the Irruption of the Morattas into Canara, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; inasmuch, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empero but had a House in it; in a word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Country People, and the Envy of all our European Noblemen."—Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co. 1551.

1800.—"I had the satisfaction of bearing the Court order them (i.e. Gen. Martin's executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow."—Ed. Vol. 10, i. 243.

[1801.—"The banker in Persia is looked on as simply as a small tradesman—in fact the honour of the Shroff is despised."—Holl., in De Goa, etc., etc., p. 281.]

SHROFF, TO, v. This verb is applied properly to the sorting of different species or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or agio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively 'to sift,' choosing the good (men, horses, fets, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

SHRUB, s. See under SHERDET.

SHULWAURS, s. Trowsers, or drawers rather, of the Oriental kind, the same as pyjamas, long-drawers, or mogul-breeches (qq.v.). The Persian is shabaz, which according to Prof. Max Muller is more correctly shadur, from shul, 'the thigh' related to Latin crus, cruris, and to Skt. shrum or shura, 'hoof' (see Pur on Daniel, 370). Be this as it may, the Ar. form is shadur (vulg. shadur), pl. shadur, [which Burton (Arab. Nights, i. 205) translates 'long-trowsers' and 'petticoat-trousers' "the latter being the divided skirt of the future."] This appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, as capdapa, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: "Et capillus capitis eorum non esset adustus, et garabala eorum non fuissent immutata, et odor ignis non nasset per eos" (iii. 27). The original word is sarbalin, pl. of sarbāla. Luther, however, renders this Mantel; as the A.V. also does by coats; [the R.V. roben]. On this Prof. Robertson-Smith writes:

"It is not certain but that Luther and the A.V. are right. The word sarbalin means 'cloak' in the Gemara; and in Arabic sarbāl is 'a garment, a coat of mail.' Perhaps quite an equal weight of scholarship would now lean (though with hesitation) towards the cloak or coat, and against the breeches theory.

"The Arabic word occurs in the Traditions of the Prophet (Hadith, vii. 36).

"Of course it is certain that sarabara comes from the Persian, but not through Arabic. The Bedouins did not wear trousers in the time of Ammianus, and don't do so now.

"The ordinary so-called LXX. editions of Daniel contain what is really the post-Christian version of Theodotion. The true LXX. text has irodēmata.

"It may be added that Jerome says that both Aquila and Symmachus wrote saraballa." [The Encycl. Biblicus also prefers the rendering of the A.V. (i. 607), and see iii. 2931.]

The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as jālbār, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as salbār, among the Kalmaks as shālbār, whilst it reached Russia as sharavari, Spain as zaraguelles, and Portugal as zarcos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, serabula, serabulla, sarabella, sarabola, sarabura, and more! [And Crawford (Desc. Dict. 124) writes of Malay dress: "Trowsers are occasionally used under the sarung by the richer classes, and this portion of dress, like the imitation of the turban, seems to have been borrowed from the Arabs, as is implied by its Arabic name, sarwal, corrupted saluncar."]

In the second quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some cases been interpreted as 'turbans.'

SIAM, n.p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Siyām. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sião as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camões also writes Syão for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use as Siamas for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o reyno Siame. But he also constantly says rey de Sião. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siam, identical with Shan (q.v.). "The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name Sien-lo. . . The supplement to Matwanlin's Encyclopædia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chien-chung (or Cochin China). 'It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hoh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A.D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hoh and united with the latter into one nation.'" See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Laotian Shans, Thaïnyat, or Great T'ai, whilst the Sien or Siamese Proper were the T'ai Noi, or Little T'ai. (See also SARNAU.) ["The name Siam. . . whether it is 'a barbarous Anglicism derived from the Portuguese or Italian word Sciam,' or is derived from the Malay Sayam, which means 'brown'"]—*J. It is difficult to interpret this Anseam, which we find also in C. Federici below in the form Asion. But the An is probably a Malay prefix of some kind. [Also see anyame in quotation from the same writer under MALACCA.]

c. 1522.—"The king (of Zzuba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 85.

1688.—"The Name of Siam is unknown to the Siamese. 'Tis one of those words which the Portugues of the Indies do use, and of which it is very difficult to discover the Original. They use it as the Name of the Nation and not of the Kingdom: And the Names of Pegu, Lao, Mogul, and most of the Names which we give to the Indian Kingdoms, are likewise National Names."—De la Loubère, E.T. p. 6.

SICCA, s. As will be seen by reference to the article RUPEE, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined in the Company's territories. The term sicca (sikka, from Ar. sikka, 'a coining die,'—and 'coined money,'—whence Pers. sikka zadan, 'to coin') had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta or premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1793 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, as far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impress of the 19th year of Shāh 'Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 San Sikkah," 'struck in the 19th year,' was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176·13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1835, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Farrukhshāh rupee) the proportion of 16 : 15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued, however, a ghostly existence for many years longer in the form of certain Government Book-debts in that currency. (See also CHICK.)

Francis, in 12thos of Old Calcutta*, 213. [To this Mr. Hutted add: "Nor does there seem to be any foundation for the other time-honoured story (also repeated by Kaye) in connection with this judgment, viz., the alleged interruption of the Chief Justice, while he was delivering judgment, by Mr. Justice Hyde, with the eager suggestion or reminder of 'Siccas, Siccas, Brother Impoy,' with the view of making the damages as high as the awarded figure as possible. Mr. Merivale says that he could find no confirmation of the old joke. . . . 1782—"In the year 1724 of the Hedjra" (1736) "a bloody action happened in the plains of the Panjab, between the Sikhs and the Imperialists, in which the latter, commanded by Abdul-rezzak-Khan, a famous warrior of that province, gave these infidels a great defeat, in which three Generals, Buddha, fell into the victors' hands. . . . He was a Sikh by profession, that is one of those men attached to the tenets of Guru Govind, and who from their birth or from the moment of their admission never cut or shave either their beard or whiskers or any hair whatever of their body. They form a particular Society as well as a sect, which distinguishes itself by wearing almost always blue clothes, and going armed at all times. . . . &c."—See Memoirs, i. 87.

1817—"Respect possesses great personal energy, a quality in which the Sikhs (sic) are supposed to be generally deficient."—Edinb. Courant for 22d Dec. 1817, p. 52.

We occasionally about 1845 saw the word written by people in Calcutta, who ought to have known better, Sheikhs.

SILBOOT, SILPET, SLIPPET, &c. Domestic Hind. corruptions of 'slipper.' The first is an instance of "striving after meaning" by connecting it in some way with 'boot.' [The Railway 'sleeper' is in the same way corrupted into slippet.]

SILLADAR, adj. and s. Hind. from Pers. silah-dar, 'bearing or having arms,' from Ar. silah, 'arms.' [In the Arabian Nights (Hurton, ii. 114) it has the primary sense of an 'armour-bearer.'] Its Anglo-Indian application is to a soldier, in a regiment of irregular cavalry, who provides his own arms and horse; and sometimes to regiments composed of such men—"a corps of Silladar Horse." [See Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 549).]

1766—"When this intelligence reached the Nawab, he leaving the whole of his troops and baggage in the same place, with only 6000 stable horse, 9000 Silladars, 4000 regular infantry, and 6 guns. . . . fell heavily on the Mahrattas. . . ."—Mir Husein Ali, H. of Hydr. Nul., 173.

SIND, SCINDE, &c., n.p. The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. [In the early inscriptions the two words Sindhu-Saurina are often found conjoined, the latter probably, part of Upper Sind (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 36).] The earlier Mahomedans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally there were in fact but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and sibilant tending in several parts of India (including the extreme east—compare ASSAM, THOM—and the extreme west), as in some other regions, to exchange places.

But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sindi are not Indian, but a Scythic people mentioned by Ammianus (xvii. 8), Valerius Flaccus (vi. 86), and other writers.

SINDĀBŪR, SANDĀBŪR, n.p. This is the name by which Goa was known to the old Arab writers. The identity was clearly established in Cathay and the Way Thither, pp. 444 and celi. We will give the quotations first, and then point out the grounds of identification.

A.D. 913.—"Crocodiles abound, it is true, in the ajwa or bays formed by the Sea of India, such as that of Sindābūra in the Indian Kingdom of Bighim, or in the bay of Zibaj (see JAVA) in the dominion of the Maharaj."—Ma'adî, i. 207.

1013.—"I have it from Abū Yūsuf bin Muḥim, who had it from Abū Bakr of Faḥḥ at Salmūr, that the latter heard told by Mūsā the Sindābūrī: 'I was one day conversing with the Sahib of Sindābūr, when suddenly he burst out laughing. . . . It was, said he, because there is a lizard on the wall, and it said, 'There is a guest coming to-day. . . . Don't you go till you see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said 'There is a ship of Oman come in.' Shortly after, people arrived, carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a long lizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one. It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Sindābūr, so that now they hurt nobody."—Letre des Merveilles de l'Inde. V. der Lath et Devic, 157-158.

c. 1150.—"From the city of Barūh (Baruch, i.e. Broach) following the coast, to Sindābūr 4 days.

"Sindābūr is on a great inlet where ships anchor. It is a place of trade, where one sees fine buildings and rich bazars."—Edrisi, i. 179. And see Elliot, i. 89.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tāna; beyond them the country of Mahār. . . The people are all Samānis (Buddhists), and worship idols. Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindābūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjarūr, then the country of Hāl. . ."—Rashid-addin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1330.—"A traveller states that the country from Sindāpūr to Hanāwar towards its eastern extremity joins with Malabar. . ."—Abulfida, Fr. tr., II. ii. 115. Further on in his Tables he jumbles up (as Edrisi has done) Sindāpūr with Sindān (see ST. JOHN).

"The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tāna, Kaulam, Calicut, Fandarāna, Shāhyūt, Manjarūr, Fakanūr, Hannur, Sandābūr, et cetera."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 177.

c. 1343-4.—"Three days after setting sail we arrived at the Island of Sandābūr, within which there are 36 villages. It is surrounded by an inlet, and at the time of ebb the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at flow it is salt and bitter. There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Muslims when they conquered the island the first time. . . We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . ."—Ibid. iv. 61-62.

1350, 1375.—In the Medicean and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Chintabor and Chintabor respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1551.—"24th Voyage. from Guvah-Sindābūr to Aden. If you start from Guvah-Sindābūr at the end of the season, take care not to fall on Cape Fāl," &c.—Mokit, in J.A.S.B. v. 564.

The last quotation shows that Goa was known even in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindābūr, whatever Indian name the last part represented; probably, from the use of the gadd by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabor of the European maps, Chandapur rather than Sindāpur. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connection, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is that of a delta-island, and Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the natives as Tirādī, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See SAI-SETTE.) Its vicinity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we have shown to be Anchediva (q.v.), is another proof. Turning to Rashiduddin, the order in which he places Sindābūr, Faknūr (Baccanore), Manjarūr (Mangalore), Hāl (M. D'Ely), is perfectly correct, if for Sindābūr we substitute Goa. The passage from Edrisi and one indicated from Abulfida only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

SINGALESE, CINGHALESE, n.p.

Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon. The word is formed from Sinhala, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the origin of most of the names given to it (see CEYLON). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it leads them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552.—"That the Chinese (Chijis) were masters of the Chorumandel Coast, of part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it. . . and because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingalla, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. 1.

1583.—(The Cauchin Chinese) "are of the race of the Chingalays, which they say are the best kind of all the Malabars."—Pitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1593.—". . . inhabited with people called Cingalas. . ."—Lincolsten, 24; [Hakl. Soc. i. 77; in i. 81, Chingalas].

c. 1610.—"Ils tiennent donc que . . . les premiers qui y allerent, et qui les peuplerent (les Maldives) furent . . . les Cingalles de l'Isle de Ceylan."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 185; [Hakl. Soc. i. 105, and see i. 286].

1612.—Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: "And as they spring from the Chins, who are the falsest heathen of the East. . . so are they of this island the weakest, falsest, and most tricky people in all India, inasmuch that, to this day, you never find faith or truth in a Chingalla."—V. i. 5.

1681.—"The Chingulays are naturally a people given to sloth and laziness: if they can but anyways live, they abhor to work." . . . —Knox, 32.

SINGAPORE, SINGAPORE, n.p. This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, February 23, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the Middle Ages. This it derived from Singapura, Skt. 'Lion-city,' the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Barros ascribes great commercial importance. The Indian origin of the name, as of many other names and phrases which survive from the old Indian civilisation of the Archipelago, had been forgotten, and the origin which Barros was taught to ascribe to it is on a par with his etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology is founded are no doubt Malay: singah, 'to tarry, halt, or lodge,' and pora-pora, 'to pretend'; and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Sinhapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca. [It may be noted that Dennys (Desc. Dict. s.v.) derives the word from singha, 'a place of call,' and pura, 'a city.' In Dalboquerque's Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. 73, we are told: "Singapura, whence the city takes its name, is a channel through which all the shipping of those parts passes, and signifies in his Malay language, 'treacherous delay'" See quotation from Barros below.]

The settlement of Hinduized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century, A.D., for inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these, on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 40 or 50 years ago for the accommodation of some wretched bungalow.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapore by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas. Its great adaptation for a mercantile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier. It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512.—"And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incontinently, and started for the Strait of Cincapura, where they were to wait for the junks."—Correa, ii. 284-5.

1551.—"Sed haecenus Deus nobis adsit omnibus. Amen. Anno post Christum natum, MDLI. Ex Fretto Synacapurano."—Scti. Franc. Xavieri Epist. Prague, 1667, Lib. III. viii.

1553.—"Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malacca was one called Cincapura, a name which in their tongue means 'protended halt' (falsa dimora); and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude . . . before the foundation of Malacca, at this same Cincapura . . . flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East. . . ."—Barros, II. vi. 1. [The same derivation is given in the Comm. of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 73.]

1572.—
"Mas na ponta da terra Cincapura Verás, onde o caminho as naos se estreita;
Daqui, tornando a costa á Cynosura, Se incurva, o para a Aurora se endireita."
Câmara, x. 125.

By Burton:

"But on her Lands-end throned see Cincapúr, where the wide sea-road shrinks to narrow way:
Thence curves the coast to face the Cynosure, and lastly tronds Aurora-wards its lay."

1598.—". . . by water the coast stretcheth to the Cape of Singapore, and from thence it runneth upwards (inward) againe. . . .—Linschden, 30; [Ind. Soc. i. 101].

1599.—“In this voyage nothing occurred worth relating, except that, after passing the Strait of Singapura, situated in one degree and a half, between the main land and a variety of islands . . . with so narrow a channel that from the ship you could jump ashore, or touch the branches of the trees on either side, our vessel struck on a shoal.”—Fuggi di Carletti, ii. 208-9.

1603.—“The 5th May came there 2 Prangs from the King of Johore, with the Shahbandor (Shahbunder) of Singapoera, called Sir Raja Nagara. . . .”—Valentijn, v. 331.

1610.—“Found a Dutch man-of-war, one of a fleet appointed for the siege of Malacca, with the aid of the King of Acheen, at the entrance of the Straits of Singapoera.”—Nauwary, i. 159.

1727.—“In anno 1703 I called at Johore on my way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Singapure, but I told him it could be of no use to a private Person, tho' a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 33; [ed. 1711, ii. 97].

1818.—“We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something, but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground. . . . My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapura.”—Raffles, Letter to Maraden, dated Sandak, Dec. 12.

SINGARA, s. Hind. singhārd, Skt. springattaka, springa, ‘a horn.’ The caltrop or water-chestnut; Trapa bispinosa, Roxb. (N.O. Haloragaceae).

[c. 1590.—The Itin (ed. Surrell, ii. 65) mentions it as one of the crops on which revenue was levied in cash.

[1798.—In Kashmir “many of them . . . were obliged to live on the Kernel of the singarah, or water-nut. . . .”—Forster, Travels, ii. 29.

[1809.—Buchanan-Hamilton writes singhara.—Eastern India, i. 211.]

1835.—“Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhara (Trapa bispinosa), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains. . . . The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine cartilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullocks' backs two or three hundred miles to market.”—Seymour, Hobbies, &c. (1811), i. 101; [ed. Smith, i. 91.]

1839.—“The nuts of the Trapa bispinosa, called Singhara, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster [loc. cit.] that it yields the Government 12,000*l.* of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Runjeet Sing's share, from 93,000 to 123,000 asc-sculs of this nut, yielded by the Lake of Oulter.”—Royle, Hiss. Plants, i. 211.

SIPAHSELAR, a. A General-in-chief; Pers. sipāh-salār, ‘army-leader,’ the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sākir Jang, i.e. ‘the leader in war.’

c. 1000-1100.—“Voici quello étoit alors la gloire et la puissance des Orghians dans le royaume. Ils possédoient la charge de shasalar, ou de généralissime de toute la Georgie. Tous les officiers du palais étoient de leur dépendance.”—Hist. of the Orghians, in St. Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, ii. 77.

c. 1353.—“At 10 my father took me by the hand, and brought me to his own Monastery. He there addressed me: ‘My boy, our ancestors from generation to generation have been commanders of the armies of the Jagatay and the Berlas family. The dignity of (Sopah Salār) Commander-in-Chief has now descended to me, but as I am tired of this world . . . I mean therefore to resign my public office. . . .’—Autob. Mém. of Timur, E.T. p. 22.

1712.—“Omnibus illis superior est . . . Sipah Salār, sive Imperator Georgiæ Regni, Præsidium dignitate excipiens. . . .”—Kaempfer, Amœn. Exot. 73.

1723.—A letter from the Heer Van Maatzunker “to His Highness Chan Chanaan, Sapperselaar, Grand Duke, and General in Chief of the Great Mogul in Assam, Bengal, &c.”—Valentijn, v. 173.

1755.—“After the Sipahsalār Hydur, by his prudence and courage, had defeated the Mahrattas, and recovered the country taken by them, he placed the government of Seringapattun on a sure and established basis. . . .”—Meer Husain Ali Khan, H. of Hydur Nizā, O. T. F. p. 61.

[c. 1803.—In a collection of native letters, the titles of Lord Lake are given as follows: “Ishtā-ul-Mulk Khān Dauda, General Gerald Lake Bahādur, Sipahsalār-i-kishwar-i-Hind,” “Valiant of the Kingdom, Lord of the Cycle, Commander-in-chief of the Territories of Hindustan.”—North Indian Notes and Queries, iv. 17.]

SIROAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sir-kār, ‘head (of) affairs.’ This word has very divers applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.

a. The State, the Government, the Supreme authority; also 'the Master' or head of the domestic government. Thus a servant, if asked 'Whose are those horses?' in replying 'They are the sarkār's,' may mean according to circumstances, that they are Government horses, or that they belong to his own master.

b. In Bengal the word is applied to a domestic servant who is a kind of house-steward, and keeps the accounts of household expenditure, and makes miscellaneous purchases for the family; also, in merchants' offices, to any native accountant or native employed in making purchases, &c.

c. Under the Mahomedan Governments, as in the time of the Mogul Empire, and more recently in the Deccan, the word was applied to certain extensive administrative divisions of territory. In its application in the Deccan it has been in English generally spelt Circar (q.v.).

a.—

{1759.—" . . . there is no reparation between your Honour . . . and this Circar. . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 129.]

1800.—"Would it not be possible and proper to make people pay the circar according to the exchange fixed at Seringapatam?"—Wellington, i. 60.

{1866.—" . . . the Sirkar Bahadur gives me four rupees a month. . . ."—Confessions of an Orderly, 43.]

b.—

1777.—"There is not in any country in the world, of which I have any knowledge, a more pernicious race of vermin in human shape than are the numerous cast of people known in Bengal by the appellation of Sircars; they are educated and trained to deceive."—Price's Tracts, i. 21.

1810.—"The Sircar is a genius whose whole study is to handle money, whether receivable or payable, and who contrives either to confuse accounts, when they are adverse to his view, or to render them most expressively intelligible, when such should suit his purpose."—Williamson, i. 200.

1822.—"One morning our Sircar, in answer to my having observed that the articles purchased were highly priced, said, 'You are my father and my mother, and I am your poor little child. I have only taken 2 annas in the rupee dustooris'" (dustoor).—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 21-22.

1831.—" 'And how the deuce,' asked his companion, 'do you manage to pay for them?' 'Nothing so easy,—I say to my Sirkar: 'Baboo, go pay for that horse 2000

rupees, and it is done, Sir, as quickly as you could dock him.'"—The Baboo and Other Tales, i. 13.

c. 1590.—"In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 165 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 kushabs (cuaba), "the revenue of which he settled for ten years at 3 Arabs, 62 Crores, 97 Lacks, 55,216 Dams" (q.v. 3,62,97,55,216 dams = about 9 millions sterling).—Ayres, E.T. by Gladwin, 1800, ii. 1; [ed. Jurnal, ii. 115.]

SIRDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sardār, and less correctly sirdār, 'leader, a commander, an officer'; a chief, or lord; the head of a set of palankin-bearers, and hence the 'sirdār-bearer,' or elliptically 'the Sirdār,' is in Bengal the style of the valet or body-servant, even when he may have no others under him (see BEARER). [Sirdār is now the official title of the Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian army; Sirdār Bahadur is an Indian military distinction.]

[c. 1810.—" . . . a captain of a company, or, as they call it, a Sardar."—L'opard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 251.]

{1876.—"Sardar." See under SEPOY.]

1808.—"I, with great difficulty, knocked up some of the villagers, who were nearly as much afraid as Christ's Will, at the visit of a Sirdār" (here an officer).—Life of Lytton.

[c. 1817.—" . . . the bearers, with their Sirdaur, have a large room with a verandah before it."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Booby, 63.]

1826.—"Gopoo's father had been a Sirdar of some consequence."—Pandurang Hari, 171; [ed. 1873, i. 252].

SIRDARĀS, s. This is the name which native valets (bearer) give to common drawers (underclothing). A friend (Gen. R. MacLagan, R.E.) has suggested the origin, which is doubtless "short drawers" in contradistinction to Long-drawers, or Py-jamas (q.v.). A common bearer's pronunciation is sirdarj; as a chest of drawers is also called 'Drāj ka almainā' (see ALMYRA).

SIRKY, s. Hind. sirkī. A kind of unplatted matting formed by laying the fine cylindrical culms from the upper part of the Saccharum sara, Roxb. (see SURKUNDA) side by side, and binding them in single or double layers. This is used to lay under the thatch of a house, to cover carts and palankins, to make Chicks (q.v.) and table-mats, and for many other purposes of rural and domestic economy.

1810.—"It is perhaps singular that I should have seen serry in use among a group of gypsies in Essex. In India these itinerants, whose habits and characters correspond with this intolerable species of banditti, invariably shelter themselves under serry."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 80.

[1832.—" . . . neat little huts of sirrakoe, a reed or grass, resembling bright straw."—Mrs. Merriam Allen, Observations, i. 23.]

SIRRIS, s. Hind. siris, Skt. shirisha, siri, 'to break,' from the brittleness of its branches; the tree Acacia Libek, Benth, indigenous in S. India, the Sātpura range, Bengal, and the sub-Himalayan tract; cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere. A closely kindred sp., A. Julibrissin, Boiss., affords a specimen of scientific 'Robson-Johnson'; the specific name is a corruption of tulab-reshm, 'silk-flower.'

1603.—"Quelques années après la mort de Darius, des charpentiers ayant abattu un arbre de Seris, qui croissoit auprès de son tombeau, le coupèrent en plusieurs pièces pour l'employer à des constructions. Tout-à-coup une voix terrible se fit entendre, la terre se mit à trembler et le tronc de cet arbre se releva de lui-même. Les ouvriers épouvantés s'enfuirent, et l'arbre ne tarda pas à renaître."—Ulysse, Antiquités, Mythol., quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. 88.

[c. 1850.—

"An't fell when siris shaws were wero,
And the nights were long and wark."

R. Kipling, Departmental Duties, The Fall of Jack Giltspine.]

SISSOO, SHISHAM, s. Hind. sisil, sisin, shisham, Skt. śināpad; Ar. si. am, si. am; the tree Dalbergia Sissoo, Roxb. (N.O. Leguminosae) and its wood. This is excellent, and valuable for construction, joinery, boat- and carriage-building, and furniture. It was the favourite wood for gun-carriages as long as the supply of large timber lasted. It is now much cultivated in the Punjab plantations. The tree is indigenous in the sub-Himalayan tracts; and believed to be so likewise in Beluchistan, Guzerat, and Central India. Another sp. of Dalbergia (D. latifolia) affords the Black Wood (q.v.) of S. and W. India. There can be little doubt that one or more of these species of Dalbergia afforded the scamini wood spoken of in the Periplus, and in some old Arabic writers. A quotation under Black Wood shows that this wood was exported from India to Chaldea in remote ages. Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt, (see Forskal, quoted by Boyle, Hindu Medicine, 128). Royle notices the resemblance of the Biblical shittim wood to shisham.

c. s.n. 80.—" . . . Thither they are wont to dispatch from Karygaza (Brosch) to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with masts and timbers, and beams of oak (ξύλων σαγάρων καὶ δοκῶν) . . . and logs of shisham (σαδάγγων σακαμίων) . . ."
—Periplus, Maria Ergythra, cap. 38.

c. 615.—"These again are passed on frons Shisham to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown, and Kalliana, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (σαγάρων ξύλων), and other wares."—Cosmas, lib. xi.

[before 1260.—

"There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove, And the plant of Zinj, and al-salam, and pepper. . . ."

Verses on India by Abu'l-khalaf, the Sindi, quoted by Kazani, in Golden Age, p. 218.

1610.—"Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with saul. . . . This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, of a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 71.

1839.—"As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, ed. 1851, p. 102.

SITTING-UP. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns more than a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated by the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1777.—"Lady Impey sits up with Mrs. Hastings; culpo load-eating."—Ph. Francis's Diary, quoted in British, Records of Old Calcutta, 121; [3rd ed. 125].

1780.—"When a young lady arrives at Madras, she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex, and gentlemen of the settlement."—Munro's Narr., 50.

1795.—"You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. . . . I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors. . . . I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for caps or petticoats for any lady. . . .—T. Munro to his Sister, in Life, i. 169.

1810. — "Among the several justly exploded ceremonies we may reckon that . . . of 'Sitting up.' . . . This 'Sitting up,' as it was termed, generally took place at the house of some lady of rank or fortune, who, for three successive nights, threw open her mansion for the purpose of receiving all . . . who chose to pay their respects to such ladies as might have recently arrived in the country."—Williamson, P.M. i. 118.

SITTRINGY, s. Hind. from Ar. shitrangi, shatranji, and that from Pers. shatrang, 'chess,' which is again of Skt. origin, chaturanga, 'quadripartite' (see SADRAS). A carpet of coloured cotton, now usually made in stripes, but no doubt originally, as the name implies, in chequers.

1618. — ". . . Een andere soorte van slechte Tapijten die nu noemt Chitrenga."—Van Tien, 63.

1673. — "They pull off their Slippers, and after the usual Salams, seat themselves in Choultries, open to some Tank of purling Water; commonly spread with Carpets or Siturreeges."—Fryer, 93.

[1688. — "2 citterengees."—In Fut, Hodge's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxv.]

1785. — "To be sold by public auction . . . the valuable effects of Warren Hastings, Esquire . . . carpets and sittringees."—In Seven-Karr, i. 111.

SIWALIK, n.p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himālaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as dāns (see DHOON). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahomedan historians the term Siwālikh is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Nājaur) and Mandāwar the predecessor of modern Jodhpūr, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwālikh) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Mālvā. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himālaya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Chereffudin (Sharifuddin 'Alī of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwālik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence, in a list of Indian national names, in the Vishnu Purāna, of the Saivālas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with whom the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purāna, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwālik as given in several of the quotations below, is from sawādikh, 'One lākh and a quarter'; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot's extracts by the interpolated phrase 'Siwālik Hills,' where it is evident from Raverty's version of the Tabakāt-i-Nisari that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himālayan range is quite modern. It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquemont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cautley, at Sahāranpūr, very shortly before Falconer's arrival there. Jacquemont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: "la première chaîne de montagnes que j'appellerai les montagnes de Dehra." The first occurrence that we can find is in a paper by Falconer on the 'Aptitude of the Himālayan Range for the Culture of the Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below. A year later, in the account of the Sivatherium fossil, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Sivālik, and its alleged etymology.

It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connection of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Siva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Bernier's Travels, we find Siba given as the name of a province about Hurdwār; and the same name occurs in the same connection in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahāngir (Elliot, vi. 382). [On the connection of Siva worship with the lower Himālaya, see Atkinson, Himālayan Gazetteer, ii. 743.]

1118.—“Again he rebelled, and founded the fortress of Nāghawr, in the territory of Siwālikh, in the neighbourhood of Birah(h).”—Tabaṭṭar-i-Nāyiri, E.T. by Rawerty, 110.

1192.—“The seat of government, Ajmir, with the whole of the Siwālikh [territory], such as (h) Hānsi, Sursuti, and other tracts, were subjugated.”—Ibid. 163-169.

1227.—“A year subsequent to this, in 621 H., he (Sultan Iyaltimish) marched against the fort of Mandawar within the limits of the Siwālikh [territory], and its capture, likewise the Almighty God facilitated for him.”—Ibid. 811.

c. 1247.—“... When the Sultan of Islam, Nūr-ud Dunyā-wa-ud-Dīn, ascended the throne of sovereignty . . . after Malik Balban had come [to Court] he, on several occasions made a request for Uchchah together with Multan. This was acquiesced in, under the understanding that the Siwālikh [territory] and Nāg-awr should be relinquished by him to other Maliks. . . .”—Ibid. 781.

1253.—“When the new year came round, on Tuesday, the 1st of the month of Muharram, 651 H., command was given to Ulugh Khān-i-A'zam . . . to proceed to his fiefs, the territory of Siwālikh and Hānsi.”—Ibid. 693.

1257.—“Malik Balban . . . withdrew (from Delhi), and by way of the Siwālikh [country], and with a slight retinue, less than 200 or 300 in number, returned to Uchchah again.”—Ibid. 786.

1255.—“When the royal tent was pitched at Talh-pat, the [contingent] forces of the Siwālikh [districts], which were the fiefs of Ulugh Khān-i-A'zam, had been delayed . . . (he) set out for Hānsi . . . (and there) issued his mandate, so that, in the space of 14 days, the troops of the Siwālikh, Hānsi, Sursuti, Jind [Jhind], and Barwālah . . . assembled. . . .”—Ibid. 837.

1260.—“Ulugh Khān-i-A'zam resolved upon making a raid upon the Koh-piyah [hill tracts of Nowit] round about the capital, because in this . . . there was a community of obdurate rebels, who, unceasingly, committed highway robbery, and plundered the property of Muslims . . . and destruction of the villages in the districts of Harīnah, the Siwālikh, and Bhīlānah, necessarily followed their outbreaks.”—Ibid. 850.

1300-10.—“The Mughals having wasted the Siwālikh, had moved some distance off. When they and their horses returned weary and thirsty to the river, the army of Ildāz, which had been waiting for them some days, caught them as they expected. . . .”—Kā-uddīn Baraī, in Elliot, iii. 199.

c. 1300.—“Of the cities on the shore the first is Sandabūr, then Fakūr, then the country of Manjārī, then the country of (Fandarainā), then Jangli (Jinkali), then Kulām. . . . After these comes the country of Sawālāk, which comprises 125,000 cities and villages. After that comes Mālwa (but in some MSS. Māhā).—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 63. Rashiduddin has got apparently much astray here, for he brings in the Siwālikh territory at the far end of Malabar. But the mention of Mālwa as adjoining is a probable indication of the true position. (Elliot imagines here some allusion to the Maldives and Laccadives. All in that way that seems possible is that Rashiduddin may have heard of the Maldives and made some jumble between them and Mālwa). And this is in a manner confirmed by the next quotation from a Portuguese writer who places the region inland from Guzerat.

1641.—“It confines . . . on the east with certain kingdoms of heathen, which are called Sanalacca pulatta (Skt. parvata), as much as to say 120,000 mountains.”—Barro, MS.

1399.—“Le Détroit de Coupéol est situé au pied d'une montagne par où passe le Gange, et à quinze milles plus haut que ce Détroit il y a une pierre on forme de Vache, de laquelle sort la source de ce grand Fleuve; c'est la cause pour laquelle les Indous adorent cette pierre, et dans tous les pays circonvoisins jusques à une année de chemin, ils se tournent pour prier du côté de ce Détroit et de cette Vache de pierre. . . . Cependant on eut avis que dans la montagne de Soñalec, qui est une des plus considérables de l'Inde, et qui s'étend dans le doux tiers de ce grand Empire, il s'étoit assemblé un grand nombre d'Indiens qui cherchoient à nous faire insulte.”—H. de Timur-Bec, par Chereffedin Ali d'Yezd (Fr. Tr. by Pétis de la Croix), Delf, 1723, iii. ch. xxv.-xxvi.

1523.—“The northern range of hills has been mentioned . . . after leaving Kashmir, these hills contain innumerable tribes and states, pergannahs and countries, and extend all the way to Bengal and the shores of the Great Ocean. . . . The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk-bags, the tails of the mountain cow, saffron, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewálík-Parbat. In the language of Hind Sawalák means a lak and a quarter (or 125,000), and Parbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from some parts of Hindústán, such as Lahore, Sehrend, and Sambal, it is seen white on them all the year round.”—Baber, p. 313.

c. 1545.—“Sher Sháh's dying regrets.

“On being remonstrated with for giving way to low spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after earnest solicitation, he said, ‘I have had three or four desires on my heart, which still remain without accomplishment. . . . One is, I wished to have depopulated the country of Roh, and to have transferred its inhabitants to the tract between the Niláb and Lahore, including the hills below Nindúna as far as the Siwálík.’”—Tárikh-i-Khán Jahán Lodi, in Elliot, v. 107-8. Nindúna was on Balnath, a hill over the Jelam (compare Elliot, ii. 450-1).

c. 1547-8.—“After their defeat the Názis took refuge with the Ghakkars, in the hill-country bordering on Kashmir. Isálm Sháh . . . during the space of two years was engaged in constant conflicts with the Ghakkars, whom he desired to subdue. . . . Skirting the hills he went thence to Múrin (?), and all the Rájás of the Siwálík presented themselves. . . . Parsurám, the Rájá of Gwálíor, became a staunch servant of the King . . . Gwálíor is a hill, which is on the right hand towards the South, amongst the hills, as you go to Kíngra and Nagarkot.” (See NUGGUR-COTE).—Tárikh-i-Dáúdí, in Elliot, iv. 493-4.

c. 1555.—“The Imperial forces encountered the Afghans near the Siwálík mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor. Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles. . . . Rájá Rám Chand, Rájá of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the Rájás of the hills, and he came and made his submission.”—Tabakát-i-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 248.

c. 1560.—“The Emperor (Akbar) then marched onwards towards the Siwálík hills, in pursuit of the Khán-Khánán. He reached the neighbourhood of Talwára, a district in the Siwálík, belonging to Rájá Gobind Chand. . . . A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword.”—Ibid. 287.

c. 1570.—“Husain Khán . . . set forth from Lucknow with the design of breaking down the idols, and demolishing the idol temples. For false reports of their unbounded treasures had come to his ears. He proceeded through Oudh, towards the Siwálík hills. . . . He then ravaged the whole country, as far as the Kashah of Wajráñ, in the country of Rájá Ranka, a powerful zamindár, and from that town to Ajmir which is his capital.”—Baddáñi, in Elliot, iv. 497.

1594-5.—“The force marched to the Siwálík hills, and the Bakshí resolved to begin by attacking Jammd, one of the strongest forts of that country.”—Albar Nāma, in Elliot, v. 125.

c. “Rám Deo . . . returned to Kanauj . . . after that he marched into the Siwálík hills, and made all the zamindárs tributary. The Rájá of Kanauj . . . came out against Rám Deo and gave him battle.”—Firishat's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 561.

1793.—“Mr. Daniel, with a party, also visited Sirinagur the same year [1789]: . . . It is situated in an exceedingly deep and very narrow valley; formed by Mount Sewalick, the northern boundary of Hindoostan, on the one side; and the vast range of snowy mountains of HIMALAYH or IMANUS, on the other; and from the report of the natives, it would appear, that the nearest part of the base of the latter (on which snow was actually falling in the month of May), was not more than 14 or 15 G. miles in direct distance to the N. or N.E. of Sirinagur town.

“In crossing the mountains of Sewalick, they met with vegetable productions, proper to the temperate climates.”—Rennell's Mem., ed. 1793, pp. [363-369].

1834.—“On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewalík, which commence at Roopur, on the Satlej, and run down a long way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Himálayas; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Soháranpur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jumna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Soháranpur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewalík hills.”—Falconer, in J.A.S.B. iii. 182.

1835.—“We have named the fossil Sivatherium from Siva the Hindu god, and therion, beltua. The Siwálík, or Sub-Himalayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Látiah or edge of the roof of Siva's dwelling on the Himálaya, and hence they are called the Siva-ala or Sib-ala, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewalík of the English.

“The fossil has been discovered in a tract which may be included in the Sewalík

* “Sewalick is the term, according to the common acceptation; but Capt. Kirkpatrick proves from the evident etymology of it, that it should be Sewa-luck.”—Note by Rennell.

range, and we have given the name of Sivatherium to it, to commemorate the remarkable formation, so rich in new animals. Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahant, or High Priest at Dehra, is as follows:—

"Sewālik, a corruption of Siva-vāla, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Ganges, from having been the residence of ISWARA SIVA and his son GANES."—Falconer and Cautley, in As. Res., xix. p. 2.

1879.—"These fringing ranges of the later formations are known generally as the Sub-Himalayas. The most important being the Siwālik hills, a term especially applied to the hills south of the Deyra Dūn, but frequently employed in a wider sense."—Medlicott and Blanford, Man. of the Geology of India, Intro. p. x.

[1899.—Even so late as this year the old inaccurate etymology of the word appears: "The term Shewālie is stated by one of the native historians to be a combination of two Hindoo words 'sewa' and 'lae' (sic), the word 'sewa' signifying one and a quarter, and the word 'lae' being the term which expresses the number of one hundred thousand."—Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbies, 213.]

SLAVE. We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1676.—"Of three Thieves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth."—The Court to Ft. St. Geo., March 7. In Notes and Exts. No. 1. p. 18.

1682.—"... making also proclamation by beat of drum that if any Slave would run away from us he should be free, and liberty to go where they pleased."—Hedges, Dury, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 38].

["... There being a great number of Slaves yearly exported from this place, to ye great grievance of many persons whose Children are very commonly stolen away from them, by those who are constant traders in this way, the Agent, &c., considering the Scandal that might accrue to ye Government, &c., the great losse that many parents may undergoe by such actions, have order'd that noe more Slaves be sent off the shoare again."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 70.]

1752.—"Sale of Slaves . . . Rs. 10 : 1 : 3."—Among Items of Revenue. In Long, 34.

1637.—"We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the West Coast with slaves, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose . . . to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head."—Court's Letter of Dec. 8. In Long, 293.

1761.—"That as an inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of Slaves as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every slave shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz. 13s. 4d. a head to the Commander, and 6s. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander is to be allowed the further sum of 6s. 8d. and the Chief Mate 3s. 4d. The Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each slave landed at Fort Marlborough."—Court's Letter, Feb. 22. In Long, 366.

1778.—Mr. Busteded has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing slaves and slave-girls, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and such offences.—Echoes of Old Calcutta, 117 seqq. [Also see extracts from newspapers, &c., in Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 71 seqq.]

1782.—"On Monday the 29th inst. will be sold by auction . . . a bay Buggy Horse, a Buggy and Harness . . . some out Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugarcandy . . . a quantity of the best Danish Claret . . . deliverable at Serampore; two Slave Girls about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles."—India Gazette, July 27.

1785.—"Malver. Hair-dresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with gauze flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price."—In Selon-Karr, i. 119. This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794.—"50 Rupees Reward for Discovery. "Run off about four Weeks ago from a Gentleman in Bombay, A Malay Slave called Cambing or Rumbing. He stole a Silk Purse, with 45 Venetians, and some Silver Buttons. . . ."—Bombay Courier, Feb. 22.

SLING, SELING, n.p. This is the name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mart in the direction of China which supplies various articles of trade. Its occurrence in Trade Returns at one time caused some discussion as to its identity, but there can be no doubt that it is Si-ning (Fu) in Kan-su. The name Sling is also applied, in Ladak and the Punjab, to a stuff of goat's wool made at the place so called.

c. 1730.—"Kokonor is also called Ti-nyombo, which means blue lake. . . . The Tibetans pretend that this lake belongs to them, and that the limits of Tibet adjoin those of the town of Shilin or Shillingh."—P. Oratio della Penna, E.T. in Marham's Tibet, 2d ed. 311.

1771.—"The natives of Kashmir, who like the Jews of Europe, or the Armenians in the Turkish Empire, scatter themselves over the Eastern kingdoms of Asia . . . have formed extensive establishments at Lhasa and all the principal towns in the country. Their agents, stationed on the coast of Coromandel, in Bengal, Benares, Nepal, and Kashmir, furnish them with the commodities of these different countries, which they dispose of in Tibet, or forward to their associates at Seling, a town on the borders of China."—Boyle's Narrative, in Marham's Tibet, 121.

1793.—". . . it is certain that the product of their looms (i.e. of Tibet and Nepal) is an inconsiderable in quantity as it is insignificant in quality. The Joss (read TOOS) or shannel procured from the former, were it really a fabric of Tibet, would perhaps be admitted as an exception to the latter part of this observation; but the fact is that it is made at Seling, a place situated on the western borders of China."—Kirkpatrick's Acc. of Nepal (1811), p. 131.

1851.—"List of Chinese Articles brought to India. . . . Siling, a soft and silky woollen of two kinds—1. Shirán. 2. Orán."—Cunningham's Ladak, 211-2.

1862.—"Sling is a 'Pushmina' (fine wool) cloth, manufactured of goat-wool, taken from Karabairh and Uramchi, and other districts of Turkish China, in a Chinese town called Sling."—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. ccxxix.

1871.—"There were two Calmucks at Yarkand, who had belonged to the suite of the Chinese Amban. . . . Their own home they say is Zilm" (qu. Zilin) "a country and town distant 1½ month's journey from either Aksoo or Khotan, and at an equal distance in point of time from Lhasa. . . . Zilm possesses manufactures of carpets, horse-trappings, pen-holders, &c. . . . This account is confirmed by the fact that articles such as those described are imported occasionally into Ladak, under the name of Zilm or Zirm goods."

"Now if the town of Zilm is six weeks journey from either Lhasa or Aksoo, its position may be guessed at."—Shaw, Vista to High Turtary, 38.

SLOTH, s. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

SNAKE-STONE, s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th vol. of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the results of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar, (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone. There is another article in the As. Res. xvi. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zahr Moherah, or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zahr muhra, where zahr is 'poison,' muhra, 'a kind of polished shell,' 'a bead,' applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

c. 1666.—"C'est dans cette Ville de Diu que se font les Pierres de Cobra si renommées: elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle, et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre; et après cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées. . . . Il faut faire sortir avec une éguille, un peu de sang de la plaie, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle-même."—Theriacal, v. 97.

1673.—“Here are also those Elephant Logged St. Thomeans, which the unbiassed Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venum of a certain Snake, by which the Jaugies (see JOGEE) or Pilgrims furnish them with a Factitious Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poyson of all deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poyson; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulency therein, discovered by its Greenness.”—Fryer, 53.

c. 1676.—“There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doubloon?); and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idoloter's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. . . . If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incised; and the Stone being appli'd thereto, will not fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in Womans-milk, or for want of that, in Cows-milk. . . . There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for there it will give a leap, and fix to the Palate. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; for if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boiling, and rise in little bubbles. . . .” —Tacerner, E.T., Pt. ii. 155, [ed. Hall, ii. 152]. Tavernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra: “This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drank in water,” &c. &c.—Ibid.

1690.—“The thing which he carried . . . is a Specific against the Poison of Snakes . . . and therefore obtained the name of Snake-stone. It is a small artificial Stone. . . . The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mixt with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu. . . .”—Orington, 260-261.

1712.—“Pedra de Cobra: ita dictus lapis, vocabulo a Lusitanis imposito, adversus viperarum morsus praestat auxilium, externè applicatus. In serpente, quod vulgè credunt, non invenitur, sed arte secretè fabricatur à Brahmanis. Pro dextro et felici usu, oportet adesso geminos, ut cum primus veneno saturatus vultu sculo decidit, alter arrogari illico in locum possit. . . . Quo ipso foror, ut istis lapidibus nihil efficaciam inesse credam, nisi quam actuali frigiditate suâ, vel absorbendo praestant.” —Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. 395-7.

1772.—“Being returned to Roode-Zand, the much celebrated Snake-stone (Slange-steen) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and cost several, frequently 10 or 12, six dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tubulated with very minute pores. . . . When it is applied to any part that has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; as soon as it is saturated, it falls off of itself. . . .”—Thunberg, Travels, E.T. i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796.—“Of the remedies to which cures of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Bramin.”—Patrick Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820.—“Another kind of snake-stone . . . was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthy smell when breathed on, and had no absorbent or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much valued, and for adequate reason if true, ‘it had saved the lives of four men.’”—Dr. Dary, in As. Res. xiii. 318.

1860.—“The use of the Pamboo-Kaloo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singhalese by the itinerant snake-charmers who resort to the island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses.” . . . (These follow.) “ . . . As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me, as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is ‘a piece of charred bone which has been filled with blood, perhaps several times, and then charred again.’ . . . The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has had time to be carried into the system. . . .”—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1861.—“‘Have you been bitten?’ ‘Yes, Sahib,’ he replied, calmly; ‘the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger,’ he added, extracting from the recesses of his mysterious bag a small piece of white stone. This he wetted, and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere. . . . he apparently suffered no . . . material hurt. I was thus effectually convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring, as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake stones are well known throughout India.”—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 91-92.

1872.—“With reference to the snake-stones, which, when applied to the bites, are said to absorb and suck out the poison,

. . . I have only to say that I believe they are perfectly powerless to produce any such effect . . . when we reflect on the quantity of poison, and the force and depth with and to which it is injected . . . and the extreme rapidity with which it is hurried along in the vascular system to the nerve centres, I think it is obvious that the application of one of these stones can be of little use in a real bit of a deadly snake, and that a belief in their efficacy is a dangerous delusion."—Fryer, Thanatophidia of India, pp. 38, 40.

[1880.—"It is stated that in the pouch-like throat appendages of the older birds (adjutants), the fang of a snake is sometimes to be found. This, if rubbed above the place where a poisonous snake has bitten a man, is supposed to prevent the venom spreading to the vital parts of the body. Again, it is believed that a so-called 'snake-stone' is contained within the head of the adjutant. This, if applied to a snake-bite, attaches itself to the punctures, and extracts all the venom. . . ."—Ball, Jungle Life, 82.]

SNEAKER, s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it sinigar. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from sini in the sense of 'china-ware,' or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a silver' (see CHINA, s.). But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grose's Lexicon Balatronicum, with the explanation 'a small bowl,' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of the 18th century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1711.—"Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these port phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter. . . .

"Past 2 o'clock and a frosty morning.

"I have just left the Right Worshipful and his myrmidons about a sneaker of 6 gallons." The whole magistracy was pretty well disguised before I gave them the slip."

The Spectator, No. 516.

1715.—

"Hugh Poters is making
A sneaker within For Luther, Buchanan,
John Knox, and Calvin;
And when they have tow'd off
A brace of full bowls,

3 H

You'll swear you ne'er met With honestor souls."

Ep. Burnett's Descent into Hell. In Political Ballads of the 17th and 18th centuries. Annotated by W. W. Williams, 1860, ii. 172.

1713.—"Wild . . . then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night-cellar, where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy."—Fielding, Jonathan Wild, Bk. ii. ch. iv.

1772.—"He received us with great cordiality, and entreated us all, five in number, to be seated in a bungalow, where there were only two broken chairs. This compliment we could not accept of; he then ordered five sneakers of a mixture which he denominated punch."—Letter in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 217.

[SNOW RUPEE, s. A term in use in S. India, which is an excellent example of a corruption of the 'Hobson-Jobson' type. It is an Anglo-Indian corruption of the Tel. sanauvu, 'authority, currency.']

SOFALA, n.p. Ar. Sufala, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more than 2° south of the Zambesi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1160.—"This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofala. . . . The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron; of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofala. The people of the islands . . . come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India . . . for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofala."—Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220.—"Sofala is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj . . . wares are carried to them, and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it. . . . Sofali gold is well-known among the Zenj merchants."—I'āqāt, Mu'jam al-Buldan, s.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yākūt describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilized races; e.g. in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in the Clove Islands; to the Veddas of Ceylon, to the Polars of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese. See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Prault, in J. R. A. Soc., xviii. 348 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tenant's Ceylon, I. 593 seq.; Ravallinson's Herodotus, under Bk. iv. ch. 196.

c. 1330.—“Sofala is situated in the country of the Zenj. According to the author of the Kānān, the inhabitants are Muslim. Ibn Sayd says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopard-skin.”—Abulfeda, Fr. Tr. i. 222.

“A merchant told me that the town of Sofala is a half month's march distant from Culua (Quiloa), and that from Sofala to Yüfi (Nüfi) . . . is a month's march. From Yüfi they bring gold-dust to Sofala.”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 192-3.

1499.—“Coming to Moçambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Sofala, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Sofala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea. . . .”—Corrae, Lendas, i. 134-135.

1518.—“ . . . at xviii. leagues from them there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors established themselves there a long time ago on account of the great trade in gold, which they carry on with the Gentiles of the mainland.”—Barbosa, 4.

1523.—“Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Ormuz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet to Sofala and the ports of that coast, as that is forbidden by the King our lord. . . .”—Treaty of Dom Duarte de Meneses, with the King of Ormuz, in Botelho, Tombo, 80.

1533.—“Vasco da Gama . . . was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Sofala, so famous in these parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade. . . .”—Barros, I. iv. 3.

“ . . . Fizemos desta costa algum desvio Deitando para o pégo toda a armada: Porque, ventando Noto manso e frio, Não nos apunhasse a agua da enseada, Que a costa faz alli daquella banda, Onde a rica Sofala o ouro manda.”

Camões, v. 73.

By Burton:

“off from the coast-line for a spell we stood, till deep blue water 'neath our kelsons lay;

for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leewards to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore.”

1605.—

“Mombaza and Quiloa and Melind,
And Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south.”

Paradise Lost, xi. 399 seq.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaces the accent, reading Sófala.

1721.—“Between Delagoa and Mosambique is a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Suffola and Cuama, but now by the Portuguese, who know that country best, is called Sena.”—A. Hamilton, i. 8 [ed. 1744].

SOLA, vulg. SOLAR, s. This is properly Hind. shold, corrupted by the Bengali inability to utter the shibboleth, to sold, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual “striving after meaning.” Sholú is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sola topees, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins, as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g. for slips of tinder, for making models, &c. The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 45 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, Mahr. bhenda, and in Tamil netti, [“breaking with a crackle.”] Solar hats are now often advertised in London. [Hats made of elder pith were used in S. Europe in the early 16th century. In Albert Durer's Diary in the Netherlands (1520-21) we find: “Also Tomasín has given me a plaited hat of elder-pith” (Mrs. Heaton, Life of Albrecht Durer, 269). Miss Eden, in 1839, speaks of Europeans wearing “broad white feather hats to keep off the sun” (Up the Country, ii. 56).

Illustrations of the various shapes of Sola hats used in Bengal about 1854 will be found in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 103 seq.]

1836.—“I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he used for his very large and heavy fishing-nets; each float was formed of eight pieces of shola, tied together by the ends. . . . When this light and spongy pith is wetted, it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 100.

1872.—“In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the solá; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp. . . .”—Gucinda Samanta, i. 10.

1873.—“My solar topce (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle.”—Life in the Mojauli, i. 161.

1885.—“I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar topce (or sun helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazars, in a grilling sunshine.”—A Professional Visit in Peru, St. James's Gazette, March 9.

[SOMBA, SOMBAY, s. A present. Malay sambah-an.

[1611.—“Sombay or presents.”—Foster, Letters, i. 112.

[1615.—“. . . concluded rather than pay the great Somba of eight hundred reals.”—Ibid. iv. 13.]

SOMBRERO, s. Port. sombreiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella. Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M. Gen. Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt that it is a corruption (by ‘striving after meaning’) of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1503.—“And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochin) in his boats which they call toncs (see DONEY) . . . and in the tonc of the King went his Sombreiros, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in height. These are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is royal in person, as it were his pennon or theroal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like.”—Corrae, i. 378.

1516.—“And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. . . .”—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 298.

1553.—“At this time Dom Jorgo discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro on a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by which token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city). . . .”—Barros, III. x. 9. Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

[1599.—“. . . a great broad sombreiro or shadow in their hands to defend them in the Summer from the Sunne, and in the Winter from the Raine.”—Hall, II. i. 261 (Stanf. Dut.).

[1602.—In his character of D. Pedro Mascarenhas, the Viceroy, Couto says he was anxious to change certain habits of the Portuguese in India: “One of these was to forbid the tall sombreiros for warding off the rain and sun, to relieve men of the expense of paying those who carried them; he himself did not have one, but used a woollen umbrella with small cords (?), which they called for many years Mascarinas. Afterward finding the sun intolerable and the rain immoderate, he permitted the use of tall umbrellas, on the condition that private slaves should bear them, to save the wages of the Hindus who carry them, and are called boys de sombreiro [see BOY].”—Couto, Dec. VII. bk. i. ch. 12.]

c. 1630.—“Betwixt towns men usually travel in Chariots drawn by Oxen, but in Towns upon Palankeens, and with Sombreiros de Sol over them.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1685, p. 46.

1657.—“A costé du cheval il y a un homme qui esente l’istoun, afin qu’il ne reçoive point d’incommodité soit par les mouches, ou par la chaleur; et à chaque costé on porte deux Zombreiros, afin que le Soleil ne luisse pas sur luy. . . .”—Abt. Roger, Fr. Tr. ed. 1670, p. 223.

1673.—“None but the Emperor has a Sumbrero among the Moguls.”—Fryer, 36.

1727.—“The Portuguese ladies . . . sent to beg the Favour that he would pick them out some lusty Dutch men to carry their Palenquens and Somerorras or Umbrellus.”—A. Hamilton, i. 338; [ed. 1711, i. 310].

1768-71.—“Close behind it, followed the heir-apparent, on foot, under a sambreel, or sunshade, of state.”—Sturmius, E.T. i. 87.

[1815.—“No open umbrellas or summer-heads allowed to pass through the gates.”—Public Notice on Gates of Bombay Town, in Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, 86.]

SOMBRERO, CHANNEL OF THE, n.p. The channel between the northern part of the Nicobar group, and the southern part embracing the Great and Little Nicobar, has had this name since the early Portuguese days. The origin of the name is given by A. Hamilton below. The indications in C. Federici and Hamilton are probably not accurate. They do not agree with those given by Horsburgh.

1566.—"Si passa per il canale di Nicular, ouero per quello del Sombbrero, li quali son per mezzo l'isola di Sumatra. . . ."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands off this Part of the Coast are the Nicubars. . . . The northernmost Cluster is low, and are called the Carnubars. . . . The middle Cluster is fine champaign Ground, and all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somerera Islands, because on the South End of the largest Island, is an Hill that resemblth the top of an Umbrella or Somerera."—A. Hamilton, ii. 68 [ed. 1744].

1843.—"Sombrero Channel, bounded on the north by the Islands of Katchuli and Noncowry, and by Merve or Pasago Island on the South side, is very safe and about seven leagues wide."—Horsburgh, ed. 1813, ii. 59-60.

SONAPARANTA, n.p. This is a quasi-classical name, of Indian origin, used by the Burmese Court in State documents and formal enumerations of the style of the King, to indicate the central part of his dominions; Skt. Suvarna (Pali Sona) prānta (or perhaps aparānta), 'golden frontier-land,' or something like that. There can be little doubt that it is a survival of the names which gave origin to the Chryse of the Greeks. And it is notable, that the same series of titles embraces Tambadipa ('Copper Island' or Region) which is also represented by the Chalcitis of Ptolemy. [Also see J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 103.]

(Ancient).—"There were two brothers resident in the country called Sunaparanta, merchants who went to trade with 500 wagons. . . ."—Legends of Gotama Buddha, in Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, 253.

1838.—"All comprised within the great districts . . . of Tsa-Koo, Tsa-lan, Laygain, Phoung-len, Kalé, and Thoung-thwot is constituted the Kingdom of Thunaparanta. All within the great districts of Pagán, Ava, Penya, and Myen-Zain, is constituted the Kingdom of Tampadewa. . . ." (&c.)—From an inscription at the Great Pagoda of Khong-Mhoo-dau, near Ava; from the M.S. Journal of Major H. Burney, accompanying a Letter from him, dated 11th September, 1830, in the Foreign Office, Calcutta. Burney adds: "The Ministers told me that by Thunaparanta, they mean all the countries to the northward of Ava, and by Tampadewa all to the southward. But this inscription shows that the Ministers themselves do not exactly understand what countries are comprised in Thunaparanta and Tampadewa." 1767.—"The King despotic; of great Merit, of great Power, Lord of the Countries Thonaproudah, Tompadewah, and Camboja, Sovereign of the Kingdom of BURAGUMAGIT (Burma), the Kingdom of Slam and Hughen (!), and the Kingdom of Cassay."—Letter from the King of Burma, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 108.

1795.—"The Lord of Earth and Air, the Monarch of extensive Countries, the Sovereign of the Kingdoms of Sonahparindá, Tombadewa. . . . etc. . . ."—Letter from the King to Sir John Shore, in Symes, 487.

1855.—"His great, glorious and most excellent Majesty, who reigns over the Kingdoms of Thunaparanta, Tampadewa, and all the great umbrella-wearing chiefs of the Eastern countries, the King of the Rising Sun, Lord of the Celestial Elephants, and Master of many white Elephants, and great Chief of Righteousness. . . ."—King's Letter to the Governor-General (Lord Dalhousie), Oct. 2, 1855.

SONTHALS, n.p. Properly Santals, [the name being said to come from a place called Saont, now Silda in Mednipur, where the tribe remained for a long time (Dalton, Descr. Eth. 210-11)]. The name of a non-Aryan people belonging to the Kolarian class, extensively settled in the hilly country to the west of the Hoogly R. and to the south of Bhāgalpur, from which they extended to Bālasore at interval, sometimes in considerable masses, but more generally much scattered. The territory in which they are chiefly settled is now formed into a separate district called Santāl Parganas, and sometimes Santaha. Their settlement in this tract is, however, quite modern; they have emigrated thither from the S.W. In Dr. F. Buchanan's statistical account of Bhāgalpur and its Hill people the Santāls are not mentioned. The earliest mention of this tribe that we have found is in Mr. Sutherland's Report on the Hill People, which is printed in the Appendix to Long. No date is given there, but we learn from Mr. Man's book, quoted below, that the date is 1817. [The word is, however, much older than this. Forbes (Or. Mem. ii. 374 seq.) gives an account taken from Lord Teignmouth of witch tests among the Soontaar.

[1798.—“ . . amongst a wild and unlettered tribe, denominated Soontaar, who have reduced the debetion and trial of persons suspected of witchcraft to a system.”—Is. Rev. iv. 359.]

1817.—“For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of lands. . . .”—Sutherland's Report, quoted in Long, 669.

1837.—“This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of property which, to my knowledge, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their horde of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah (Omlah) and pettifogging Mooktears, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows:—

“To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e. Assistant Commissioner.

“To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

“To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with the witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law.

“There were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognised the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicious, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. . . .”—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by E. G. Mann, Barrister at Law, &c. Calcutta, 1867, pp. 125-127.

SOODRA, SOODER, s. Skt. śūdra, [usually derived from root śuc, ‘to be afflicted,’ but probably of non-Aryan origin]. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India, there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the highest castes among the (so-called) Śūdras come next after the Brahmans in social rank, and śūdra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630.—“The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderics.”—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

1651.—“La quatrième lignée est celle des Soudraes; elle est composée du commun peuple: cette lignée a sous soy beaucoup of diverse familles, dont une chacune prétend surpasser l'autre. . . .”—Abr. Roger, Fr. ed. 1670, p. 8.

[c. 1665.—“The fourth caste is called Charados or Soudra.”—Tavernier, ed. Bull, ii. 181.

[1667.—“ . . and fourthly, the tribe of Seydra, or artisans and labourers.”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 325.]

1674.—“The . . . Chudrer (these are the Nayres).”—Faria y Sousa, ii. 710.

1717.—“The Brahmans and the Tschudirers are the proper persons to satisfy your Enquiries.”—Phillips, An Account of the Religion, &c., 14.

1853.—“Such of the Aborigines as yet remained were formed into a fourth class, the Cudra, a class which has no rights, but only duties.”—Whitney, Or. and Ling. Studies, ii. 6.

1867.—“A Brahman does not stand aloof from a Soudra with a keener pride than a Greek Christian shows towards a Copt.”—Dixon, New America, 7th ed. i. 276.

SOOJEE, SOOJY, s. Hind. sājī, [which comes probably from Skt. śuci, ‘pure’]; a word curiously misinterpreted (“the coarser part of pounded wheat”) by the usually accurate Shakespear. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for European tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. [Sājī “is a granular meal obtained by moistening the grain overnight, then grinding it. The fine flour passes through a coarse sieve, leaving the Suji and bran above. The latter is got rid of by winnowing, and the round, granular meal or Suji, composed of the harder pieces of the grain, remains” (IPatt. Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 167).] It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin simella; Germ. Semmelbrödtchen, and old English simmel-cakes. A kind of porridge made with soojee

is often called soojee simply. (See ROLONG.)

1810.—“Bread is not made of flour, but of the heart of the wheat, which is very fine, ground into what is called soojy. . . . Soojy is frequently boiled into ‘stirabout,’ for breakfast, and eaten with milk, salt, and butter; though some of the more zealous may be seen to moisten it with porter.”—Williamson, V.M. ii. 135-136.

1878.—“Suje flour, ground coarse, and water.”—Life in the Majumt, i. 213.

SOORKY, s. Pounded brick used to mix with lime to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. sarkhi, ‘red-stuff.’

c. 1770.—“The terrace roofs and floors of the rooms are laid with fine pulverized stones, which they call zurkee; these are mixed up with lime-water, and an inferior kind of molasses, and in a short time grow as hard and as smooth, as if the whole were one large stone.”—Nasirunnas, E.T. i. 511.

1777.—“The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so, some under sentence from him to beat Salkey.”—Report of Inqey and others, quoted in Stephen’s Nancomar and Inqey, ii. 201.

1781.—“One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1100 mounds of soorky.”—Notifu, in Seton-Kurr, i. 34; see also ii. 15.

1811.—“The road from Calcutta to Baracpore . . . like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them.”—Satyne, Les Hindous, iii. The word is misused as well as miswritten here. The substance in question is khaa (q v.).

SOORMA, s. Hind. from Pers. surma. Sulphuret of antimony, used for the purpose of darkening the eyes, kuhl of the Arabs, the simmi and stibium of the ancients. With this Jezebel “painted her eyes” (2 Kings, ix. 30; Jeremiah, iv. 30 R.V.) “With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called soornie (ie is the feminine termination in Hindust.), and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake not of recent occurrence only, as Sprengel says, ‘Distinguit vero Plinius matrem a femina’” (Boyle, on Ant. of Hindu Medicine, 100). [See Watt. Econ. Dict. i. 271.]

[1768.—“The powder is called by them surma; which they pretend refreshes and cools the eye, besides exciting its lustre, by the ambient blackness.”—Grove, 2nd ed. ii. 112.]

[1829.—“Soorma, or the oxide of antimony, is found on the western frontier.”—Ted. Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 13.

[1832.—“Sulmah—A prepared permanent black dye, from antimony. . . .”—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 72.]

SOOSIE, s. Hind. from Pers. sūsi. Some kind of silk cloth, but we know not what kind. [Sir G. Birdwood (Industr. Arts, 246) defines sūsis as “fine-coloured cloths, made chiefly at Battala and Sialkote, striped in the direction of the warp with silk, or cotton lines of a different colour, the cloth being called dokanni [dokhani], ‘in two stripes’ if the stripe has two lines, if three, tinkanni [tinkhani], and so on.’ In the Punjab it is ‘a striped stuff used for women’s trousers. This is made of fine thread, and is one of the fabrics in which English thread is now largely used’ (Francis, Mon. on Cotton Manufactures, 7). A silk fabric of the same name is made in the N.W.P., where it is classed as a variety of churkhāna, or check (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 93). Forbes Watson (Textile Manufactures, 85) speaks of Sousie as chiefly employed for trousering, being a mixture of cotton and silk. The word seems to derive its origin from Susa, the Biblical Shushan, the capital of Susiana or Elam, and from the time of Darius I. the chief residence of the Achaemenian kings. There is ample evidence to show that fabrics from Babylon were largely exported in early times. Such was perhaps the “Babylonish garment” found at Ai (Josh. vii. 21), which the R.V. marg. translates as a “mantle of Shinar”). This a writer in Smith’s Dict. of the Bible calls “robes trimmed with valuable furs, or the skins themselves ornamented with embroidery” (i. 452). These Babylonian fabrics have been often described (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 537; Maspero, Dawn of Civ., 470, 758; Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1286 seq.; Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 315 seq.). An early reference to this old trade in costly cloths will be found in the quotation from the Periplus under CHINA, which has been discussed by Sir H. Yule (Introd. to Gill, Riser of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 88 seq.). This Sūsi cloth appears in a log of 1746 as Soacie, and was known to the Portuguese in 1550 as Soajes (J. R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 168.)]

[1667.—". . . 2 patch of yo finest with what colours you thinke handsome for my own wear Chockoles and susaes."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxii.

SOPHY, n.p. The name by which the King of Persia was long known in Europe—"The Sophy," as the Sultan of Turkey was "The Turk" or "Grand Turk," and the King of Delhi the "Great Mogul." This title represented Sāfi, Sufavi, or Safi, the name of the dynasty which reigned over Persia for more than two centuries (1449-1722, nominally to 1730). The first king of the family was Isma'il, claiming descent from 'Alī and the Imāms, through a long line of persons of saintly reputation at Ardebil. The surname of Sūfi or Safi assumed by Isma'il is generally supposed to have been taken from Shaikh Safi-ud-din, the first of his more recent ancestors to become famous, and who belonged to the class of Sūfis or philosophic devotees. After Isma'il the most famous of the dynasty was Shāh Abbās (1585-1629).

c. 1521.—"Susiana, quae est Shushan Palatium illud regni Sophi."—Abraham Peritot, in Hyde, Synagoga Dissecta, i. 76.

[1568.—"The King of Persia (whom here we call the great Sophy) is not thero so called, but is called the Shaugh. It were dangerous to call him by the name of Sophy, because that Sophy in the Persian tongue is a beggar, and it were as much as to call him The great beggar."—Geffrey Duckett, ibid. i. 417.]

1593.—"And all the Kings continued so with the name of Xa, which in Persia is a King, and Ismael is a proper name, whereby Xa Ismael, and Xa Thamas are as much as to say King Ismael, and King Thamas, and of the Turkes and Rumes are called Suffy or Soffy, which signifieth a great Captaine."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 173].

I would attempt it."

Shaun. & Fleck., The Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

c. 1630.—"Ismael at his Coronation proclaim'd himself King of Persia by the name of Pot-shaw (Padshah)—Ismael-Sophy. Whence that word Sophy was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian idiom, signifying Wool, of which the Shashes are made that ennobled his new order. Whether the name was from Sophy his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophos imposed upon Aydar at his conquest of Trebisond by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia Sophy's: but I see no reason for it; since Ismael's son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Soffie, but casual."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1633, 286.

1605.—"As when the Tartar from his Russian foe,

1727.—“The whole Reign of the last Sophi or King, was managed by such Vermin, that the Ballouches and Macitrans . . . threw off the Yoke of Obedience first, and in full Bodies fell upon their Neighbours in Caramania.”—A. Hamilton, i. 103; [ed. 1744, i. 105].

1815.—“The Suffavean monarchs were revered and deemed holy on account of their descent from a saint.”—Malcolm, H. of Pers. ii. 427.

1828.—“It is thy happy destiny to follow in the train of that brilliant star whose light shall shed a lustre on Persia, unknown since the days of the earlier Scoffees.”—J. B. Fraser, The Kuzilbash, i. 192.

SOUBA, SOOBABH, s. Hind. from Pers. sāba. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Sūbah of the Deccan, the Sūbah of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Subadār (see SOUBADAR), ‘the Viceroy’ (over a sāba). It is also “among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 tarafs” (Wilson).

c. 1594.—“In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars. . . . The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Soobadar . . . upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lacks of beetle. The names of the Soobahs were Allahabad, Agra, Owdh, Ajmeer, Ahmedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Dehly, Cabul, Lahoor, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandeess, and Ahmednagar, they were formed into three Soobahs, increasing the number to 15.”—Ayren, ed. Glanville, ii. 1-5, [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

1763.—“Princes of this rank are called Subahs. Nizam al muluck was Subah of the Deccan (or Southern) provinces. . . . The Nabobs of Condanore, Cudajah, Carnatica, Patore, &c., the Kings of Tritchynopoly, Mysore, Tanjore, are subject to this Subahship. Here is a subject ruling a larger empire than any in Europe, excepting that of the Muscovite.”—Orme, Fragments, 398-399.

1760.—“Those Emirs or Nabobs, who govern great Provinces, are stiled Subahs, which imports the same as Lord-Lieutenants or Vice-Roys.”—Memoirs of the Revolution in Bengal, p. 6.

1763.—“From the word Soubah, signifying a province, the Viceroy of this vast territory (the Deccan) is called Soobahdar, and by the Europeans improperly Soobah.”—Orme, i. 35.

1765.—“Let us have done with this ringing of changes upon Soobahs; there's no end to it. Let us boldly dare to be Soobah ourselves. . . .”—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 183.

1783.—“They broke their treaty with him, in which they stipulated to pay 400,000*l.* a year to the Subah of Bengal.”—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, Works, iii. 468.

1804.—“It is impossible for persons to have behaved in a more shuffling manner than the Soobah's servants have. . . .”—Wellington, ed. 1837, iii. 11.

1809.—“These (pillars) had been removed from a sacred building by Monsieur Dupleix, when he assumed the rank of Soobah.”—Lord Valentia, i. 373.

1823.—“The Delhi Sovereigns whose vast empire was divided into Soobahs, or Governments, each of which was ruled by a Soobahdar or Viceroy.”—Malcolm, Cent. India, i. 2.

SOUBADAR, SUBADAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sūbadār, ‘one holding a sāba’ (see SOUBA).

a. The Viceroy, or Governor of a sāba.

b. A local commandant or chief officer.

c. The chief native officer of a company of Sepoys; under the original constitution of such companies, its actual captain.

a. See SOUBA.

b.—

1673.—“The Subidar of the Town being a Person of Quality . . . he (the Ambassador) thought good to give him a Visit.”—Fryer, 77.

1805.—“The first thing that the Subidar of Vire Rajendra Pettah did, to my utter astonishment, was to come up and give me such a shake by the hand, as would have done credit to a Scotsman.”—Letter in Leyden's Life, 49.

c.—

1747.—“14th September . . . Read the former from Tellicherry advising that . . . in a day or two they shall despatch another Subidar with 129 more Sepoys to our assistance.”—MS. Consultations at Fort St. David, in India Office.

1760.—“One was the Subahdar, equivalent to the Captain of a Company.”—Orme, iii. 610.

c. 1785.—“ . . . the Subahdars or commanding officers of the black troops.”—Carraccioli, L. of Clive, iii. 174.

1787.—“A Troop of Native Cavalry on the present Establishment consists of 1 European Subaltern, 1 European Serjeant, 1 Subidar, 3 Jemadars, 4 Havildars, 4 Naïques (malk), 1 Trumpeter, 1 Farrier, and 68 Privates.”—Regis. for the Hon. Comp.'s Black Troops on the Coast of Coromandel, &c., p. 8.

[SODAGUR, s. P.—H. saudt-gur, Pers. saudt, ‘goods for sale’; a merchant, trader; now very often applied to those who sell European goods in civil stations and cantonments.

[1603.—“... and kill the merchants (sodagares mercadores).”—Livres des Moncois, i. 183.

[c. 1800.—“The term Soudagur, which implies merely a principal merchant, is here (Behar) usually given to those who keep what the English of India call Europe shops; that is, shops where all sorts of goods imported from Europe, and chiefly consumed by Europeans, are retailed.”—Buchanan, Eastern India, i. 375.

[c. 1817.—“This shib was a very rich man, a Soudagur...”—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Booby, 81.]

a. The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the Custard apple. This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalised at Bombay. The terms soursop and sweetsoop are, we believe, West Indian.

b. In a note to the passage quoted below, Grainger identifies the soursop with the suirack of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the East Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the Common Jack fruit, the ‘sourjack,’ in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

a.—

1761.—

“... a neighbouring hill Which Nature to the Soursop had resigned.”

Grainger, Bk. 2.

b.—

1650.—“There is another kind of tree (in Ceylon) which they call Sursack... which has leaves like a laurel and bears its fruit, not like other trees on twigs from the branches, but on the trunk itself...” &c.
—Saur, ed. 1672, p. 81.

1661.—Walter Schulz says that the famous fruit Jaka was called by the Netherlanders in the Indies Soorasack.—p. 236.

1675.—“The whole is planted for the most part with coco-palms, mangoes, and suursacks.”—Ryloff van Goens, in Valentijn, Ceylon, 223.

1769-71.—“The Sursack-tree has a fruit of a similar kind with the durioon (durian), but it is not accompanied by such a fetid smell.”—Staourians, E.T. i. 236.

1778.—“The one which yields smaller fruit, without seed, I found at Columbo, Gale, and several other places. The name by which it is properly known here is the Maldivian Sour Sack, and its use here is less universal than that of the other sort, which... weighs 30 or 40 lbs.”—Thunberg, E.T. iv. 255.

[1833.—“Of the eatable fruited kinds above referred to, the most remarkable are the sweetsop, sour sop, and cherimoyer...”—Penny Cycl. ii. 51.]

SOWAR, SUWAR, s. Pers. sawdr, ‘a horseman.’ A native cavalry soldier; a mounted orderly. In the Greek provinces in Turkey, the word is familiar in the form σωβάς, pl. σωβάδες, for a mounted gendarme. [The regulations for sawdrs in the Mogul armies are given by Blochmann, Ann. i. 244 seq.]

1824-5.—“... The sowars who accompanied him.”—Heber, Orig. i. 401.

1827.—“Hartley had therefore no resource save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar... who rode before him.”—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

[1830.—“... Meerza, an Asswar well known on the Collector's establishment.”—Or. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 390.]

SOWAR, SHOOTER, s. Hind. from Pers. shutur-sawdr, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sowar is quite misused by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaun (q.v.)

[1815.—“As we approached the camp his mount-surwars (camel-riders) went ahead of us.”—Journal, Marquess of Hastings, i. 337.]

1834.—“I... found a fresh horse at Sufter Jung's tomb, and at the Kutub (cootub) a couple of riding camels and an attendant Shutur Suwar.”—Memo. of Col. Mountain, 129.

[1837.—“There are twenty Shooter Suwars (I have not an idea how I ought to spell those words), but they are native soldiers mounted on swift camels, very much trapped, and two of them always ride before our carriage."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 31.]

1840.—"Sent a Shuta Sarwar (camel driver) off with an express to Simla."—Osburne, Court and Camp of Runj. Singh, 179.

1842.—"At Peshawar, it appears by the papers I read last night, that they have camels, but no sowars, or drivers."—Letter of D. of Wellington, in Indian Administration of Ld. Ellenborough, 228.

1857.—"I have given general notice of the Shutar Sowar going into Meerut to all the Meerut men."—H. Greathed's Letters during Siege of Delhi, 42.

SOWARRY, SUWARREE, s. Hind. from Pers. sawāri. A cavalcade, a cortège of mounted attendants.

1803.—"They must have tents, elephants, and other sowary; and must have with them a sufficient body of troops to guard their persons."—A. Wellesey, in Life of Munro, i. 346.

1809.—"He had no sawarry."—Ld. Valentia, i. 388.

1814.—"I was often reprimanded by the Zemindars and native officers, for leaving the suwarree, or state attendants, at the outer gate of the city, when I took my evening excursion."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 120; [2nd ed. n. 372].

[1826.—"The 'aswary,' or suite of Trim-buckje, arrived at the palace."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 119.]

1827.—"Orders were given that on the next day all should be in readiness for the Sowarree, a grand procession, when the Prince was to receive the Begum as an honoured guest."—Sir Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

c. 1831.—"Je tâcherai d'éviter toute la poussière de ces immenses sowarris."—Jaquemont, Corresp. n. 121.

[1837.—"The Raja of Benares came with a very magnificent surwarree of elephants and camels."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 35.]

SOWARRY CAMEL, s. A swift or riding camel. See SOWAR, SHOOTER.

1835.—"I am told you dress a camel beautifully," said the young Princess, "and I was anxious to . . . ask you to instruct my people how to attire a sawāri camel." "This was flattering me on a very weak point: there is but one thing in the world that I perfectly understand, and that is how to dress a camel."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 36.

SOWCAR, s. Hind. sāhukār, alleged to be from Skt. sādhu, 'right,' with the Hind. affix kār, 'doer'; Guj.

Mahr. sāvakār. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803.—"You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any man who will give it you for bills."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 1.

1826.—"We were also sahoukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced moneys upon interest."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 251].

[In the following the word is confounded with Sowar:]

[1877.—"It was the habit of the sowars, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.]

SOY, s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese si-yau (a young Japanese fellow-passenger gave the pronunciation clearly as sho-yu.—A. B.), Chin. shi-yu. [Mr. Platts (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 475) points out that in Japanese as written with the native character soy would not be si-yau, but si-yau-yu; in the Romanised Japanese this is simplified to shoyu (colloquially this is still further reduced, by dropping the final vowel, to shoy or soy). Of this monosyllable only the so represents the classical si-yau; the final consonant (y) is a relic of the termination yu. The Japanese word is itself derived from the Chinese, which at Shanghai is sze-yu, at Amoy, si-yu, at Canton, shi-yau, of which the first element means 'salted beans,' or other fruits, dried and used as condiments; the second element merely means 'oil.' It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Himalaya and E. Asia, and much cultivated, viz. Glycine soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soya hispida, Moench.), boiled down and fermented. [In India the bean is eaten in places where it is cultivated, as in Chutia Nāgpur (Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 510 seq.)]

1679.—" . . . Mango and Saio, two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Journal of John Locke, in Ld. King's Life of L., i. 249.

1688.—"I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence the true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt."—Dampier, ii. 28.

1690.—" . . . Souy, the choicest of all Sawces."—Ovington, 397.

1712.—"Hoc legumen in coquina Japonica utramque replet paginam; ex eo namque conficitur: tum puls Miso dicta, quae ferulis pro consistentia, et butyri loco additur, butyrum enim hoc coclo res ignota est; tum Sooju dictum embamma, quod nisi ferulis, certe frictis et assatis omnibus affunditur."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. p. 339.

1778.—An elaborate account of the preparation of Soy is given by Thunberg, Travels, E.T. iv. 121-122; and more briefly by Kaempfer on the page quoted above.

[1900.—"Mu-hrooms shred into small pieces, flavoured with soyju" (soy).—Mrs. Fraser, A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, i. 238.]

SPIN, s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of 'Spinster.' [The Port. equivalent soltera (sollicera) was used in a derogatory sense (Gray, note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 128).]

SPONGE-CAKE, s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish-cake. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880.—"There is a cake called Lasateira resembling sponge-cake. . . . It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Custilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 235.

SPOTTED-DEER, s. Axis maculatus of Gray; [Cervus axis of Blanford (Mammalia, 540)]; Hind. chital, Skt. chitra, 'spotted.'

1678.—"The same Night we travelled easily to Megatana, using our Fowling-Pieces all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chitrels, or Spotted Deer."—Kryer, 71.

[1677.—"Spotted Deare we shall send home, some by y^e Europe ships, if they touch here."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.]

1679.—"There being convenience in this place for y^e breeding up of Spotted Deer, which the Hon^{ble} Company doe every year order to be sent home for His Majesty, it is ordered that care be taken to breed them up in this Factory (Madapollam), to be sent home accordingly."—Ft. St. George Council

(on Tour), 16th April, in Notes and Exts., Madras, 1871.

1682.—"This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 39].

SQUEEZE, s. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal exaction. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the malutolla of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1882.—"If the licence (of the Hong merchants) . . . was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeezees' for contributions to public works, . . . for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity . . . as well as for the often imaginary . . . damage caused by the overflowing of the 'Yangtse Keang' or the 'Yellow River.'"—The Panksee at Canton, p. 36.

STATION, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

[1832.—"The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a 'Station ball' . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 190.]

1866.—
"And if I told how much I ate at one Mofussil station, I'm sure 'twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."

Trevelyan, The Durk Bungulow, in Fraser, lxxiii. p. 391.

"Who asked the Station to dinner, and" allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 231.

STEVEDORE, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship and to unload it. The verb estivar [Lat. stipare] is used both in Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador in the sense of a wool-packer only is given in the Sp. Dictionaries, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Skeat, s.v.

STICK-INSECT, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects, of the family Phasmatidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1751.—"The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animated Stalk, of which there are different kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass. . . ."—Ict. 20.

1860.—"The Stick-insect. — The Phasmatidae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congeners do to green leaves. . . ."—Tenent, Ceylon, i. 252

[STICKLAC, s. Lac encrusted on sticks, which in this form is collected in the jungles of Central India.

[1880. — "Whore, however, there is a regular trade in stick-lac, the propagation of the insect is systematically carried on by those who wish for a certain and abundant crop."—Hall, Jungle Life, 303.]

STINK-WOOD, s. Boitidia Mauritianna, Lam., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant. "At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stink-wood into the pockets of respectable persons."—Birdwood (MS.).

STRIDHANA, STREEDHANA, s. Skt. stri-dhana, 'women's property.' A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises. [See Mayne, Hindu Law, 541 seqq.]

1875.—"The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhan."—Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

STUPA. See TOPE.

SUÁKIN, n.p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation. Arab. Sawákin.

c. 1331.—"This very day we arrived at the island of Sawákin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 161-2.

1526.—"The Præto continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Macuha, or in Quaquem, or in Zyla."—Correa, iii. 42; [see Dalboquerque, Comm. ii. 229].

[c. 1590.—" . . . thence it (the sea) washes both Persia and Ethiopia where are Dahlak and Suakin, and is called (the Gulf of) Omán and the Persian Sea."—Itin. ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

SUCKER-BUCKER, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sulhar on the right bank of the Indus, and the island fortress of Bulhar or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Koree-Bucker, from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkar, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Aror or Alor, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 352 seqq.]

c. 1333.—"I passed 5 days at Lihari . . . and quitted it to proceed to Bakár. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 114-115.

1521. — Shah Beg "then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after several days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Sakhar."—Turkân Nāma, in Elliot, i. 311.

1551.—"After a thousand sufferings we arrived at the end of some days' journey, at Súwan (Sikuan), and then, passing by Patana and Daríja, we entered the fortress of Bakr."—Sidi Ali, p. 136.

[c. 1590. — "Bhakkar (Bhukkar) is a notable fortress; in ancient chronicles it is called Mamárah."—Itin. ed. Jarrett, ii. 327.]

1618.—"Buckor, the Chief's Citie, is called Buckor Succor."—Terry, [ed. 1777, p. 76].

1753.—"Vient ensuite Bukor, ou comme il est écrit dans la Géographie Turque, Feker, ville située sur une colline, entre deux bras de l'Indus, qui en font une île . . . la géographie . . . ajoute que Louhri (i.e. Rom) est une autre ville située vis-à-vis de cette île du côté meridional, et que Sekar, autrement Bakor, est en même position du côté septentrional."—D'Inville, p. 37.

SUCKET, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweet-meats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean loaf-sugar? [Palmer (Folk Etymol. 378) says that the original meaning was a 'slice of melon or gourd,' Ital. zuccata, 'a kind of meat made of Pumpions or Gourdes' (Florio) from succa, 'a gourd or pumpkin,' which is a shortened form of cucurbita, a corruption of Lat. cucurbita (Dier.). This is perhaps the same word which appears in the quotation from Linschoten below, where the editor suggests that it is derived from Mahr sukatu, 'slightly dried, desiccated,' and Sir H. Yule suggests a corruption of H. south, 'dried ginger.']

[1537.—" . . . picked in a fraile, two little barrels of suckat. . . "—Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII. xii. pt. i. 451.]

1531.—"White sucket from Zindi" (i.e. Sind) "Cambai, and China."—Barrel, in Hall, ii. 412.

[1593.—"Ginger by the Arabians, Persians and Turkes is called Gangibil (see GINGER), in Gusurato, Docin, and Bengala, when it is fresh and green Adrac, and when dried sukte."—Linnæus, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

c. 1620-30.—

" For this,
This Candy wine, three merchants were undone,
The o suckets brake as many more."

Bacon, and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer, i. 1.

SUCLÁT, SACKCLOTH, &c., s.
Pers. sukallāt, sakallāt, saklātīn, saklātūn, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broadcloth. It is sometimes defined as scarlet broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. [Scarlet was the name of a material long before it denoted a colour. In the Liberate Roll of 14 Hen. III. (1230, quoted in N. & Q. 8 ser. i. 129) we read of sanguine scarlet, brown, red, white and scarlet coloris de Marbē.] It has, however, been supposed that our word scarlet comes from some form of the present word (see Skeat, s.v. Scarlet).^{*} But the fact that the Arab. dictionaries give a form sakirūt must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, probably taken from the European word, [as according to Skeat, the Turkish iskerlat is merely borrowed from the Ital. scarlatto.]

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form sicla- tonn, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 58, notes). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. sabl, 'polishing,' (see SICLEGUR); from Sicily (Ar. Sikiliya); and from the Lat. cyclas, cycladatus. In the Arabic Vocabulista of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), siklatūn is translated by ciclas. The conclusion came to in the note on Marco Polo, based, partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of sakallāt, was that saklātūn was probably a light woollen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as classe de soie, broché d'or, and the passage from Edrisi supports this undoubtedly. To the north of India the name suklat is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1010.—"The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of saklātūn of various colours. . . ."—Bukhari, in Elliot, ii. 148.

c. 1150.—"Almeria (Almaria) was a Muslim city at the time of the Moravides. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 800 silk looms, where they manufactured costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as Saklātūn Isfahānī . . . and various others silk tissues."—Edrisi (Joubert), ii. 40.

c. 1220.—"Tabriz. The chief city of Azərbayān. . . . They make there the stuffs called atābi (see TABBY), Siklātūn, Khizābi, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere."—Jāḥiz, in Barbier de Meynard, i. 133.

c. 1370.—

"His heer, his bord, was lyl: saffron
That to his girdel raughte adoun
His shoos of Cordovano,
Of Brugges wore his hosen brown
His Robe was of Syklatoun
That coste many a Jane."
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, 4 (Furnival, Ellesmere Text).

c. 1590.—

"Suklāt-i-Rūmī o Farangi o Portugālī" (Broadcloth of Turkey, of Europe, and of Portugal). . . .—Itā (orig.) i. 110. Blochmann renders 'Scarlet Broadcloth' (see above). [The same word, suklātī, is used later on of 'woollen stuffs,' made in Kashmir (Jarrett, Itā, ii. 355).]

1673.—"Suffahann is already full of London Cloath, or Sackcloth Londr, as they call it."—Fryer, 221.

"His Hose of London Sackcloth of any Colour."—Ibid. 391.

[1810.—" . . . his simple dress of sack-lant and flat black woollen cap. . . ."—Lloyd, Genard, Narr. i. 167.]

^{*} Here is an instance in which scarlet is used for 'scarlet broadcloth'.

c. 1605.—" . . . they laid them out, partly in fine Cotton Cloth . . . partly in Silken Stuffs stakrū with Gold and silver, to make Vests and Summer-Drawers of; partly in English Scarlet, to make two Arabian Vests of for their King . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 43; [ed. Constable, 139].

1854.—“Last of Chinese articles brought to India. . . Suklat, a kind of camelot made of camel's hair.”—Cunningham's Ladak, 212.

1862.—“In this season travellers wear garments of sheep-skin with sleeves, the fleecy side inwards, and the exterior covered with Sooklat, or blanket.”—Punjab Trade Report, 57.

“BROADCLOTH (Europe), ('Suklat,' 'Mahoot').”—Ibid. App. p. cccxx.

SUDDEN DEATH. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, the standing dish at a daw-k-bungalow in former days. The bird was caught in the yard, as the traveller entered, and was on the table by the time he had bathed and dressed.

[c. 1848.—“‘Sudden death’ means a young chicken about a month old, caught, killed, and grilled at the shortest notice.”—Berncastle, Voyage to China, i. 193.]

SUDDER, adj., but used as s. Literally ‘chief,’ being Ar. sadr. This term had a technical application under Mahommedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted below. The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

a. Sudder Board. This is the ‘Board of Revenue,’ of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called ‘Sudder Board’ there.

b. Sudder Court, i.e. ‘Sudder Adawlut (sadr ‘adilat). This was till 1862, in Calcutta and in the N.W.P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister-Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled the High Court of Judiciary. A similar Court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N.W.P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen (q.v.). This was the designation of the second class of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native

Judge was Principal Sudder Ameen; the 2nd rank, Sudder Ameen; the 3rd, Moonsiff. In the new classification there are in Bengal Subordinate Judges of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd grade, and Munsiffs (see MOONSIFF) of 4 grades; in Bombay, Subordinate Judges of the 1st class in 3 grades, and 2nd class in 4 grades; and in Madras Subordinate Judges in 3 grades, and Munsiffs in 4 grades.

d. Sudder Station. The chief station of a district, viz. that where the Collector, Judge, and other chief civil officials reside, and where their Courts are.

c. 1340.—“The Sadr-Jihān (‘Chief of the Word’) i.e. the Kadi-at-Kulāt (‘Judge of Judges’) (CAZEE) . . . possesses ten townships, producing a revenue of about 60,000 tankas. He is also called Sadr-al-Islām.”—Shihabuddin Dimishli, in Notes et Exs. xiii. 185.

SUFENA, s. Hind. sufina. This is the native corr. of subpoena. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word safina for ‘a blank-book, a note-book.’

SUGAR, s. This familiar word is of Skt. origin. Sarkara originally signifies ‘grit or gravel,’ thence crystallised sugar, and through a Prakrit form saklara gave the Pers. shakkar, the Greek σάκχαρ and σάκχαρον, and the late Latin saccharum. The Ar. is sukkar, or with the article as-sukkar, and it is probable that our modern forms, It. zucchero and succhero, Fr. sucré, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came as well as the Sp. azúcar, and Port. assucar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek. The Russian is sukhar; Polish zukier; Hung. zukur. In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugar-cane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see JAGGEY) is a much older product than that of the cane. [This is disputed by Watt (Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. p. 31), who is inclined to fix the home of the cane in E. India.] The original habitat of the cane is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words "habitat et colitur," which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending from Cochin-China to Bengal.

Though, as we have said, the knowledge which the ancients had of sugar was very dim, we are disposed greatly to question the thesis, which has been so confidently maintained by Salmasius and later writers, that the original saccharon of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboos, and used in medieval medicine under the name tabasheer (q.v.) (where see a quotation from Royle, taking the same view). It is just possible that Pliny in the passage quoted below may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White's Latin Dict. we read that by the word saccharon is meant (not sugar but) "a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo." This is nonsense. There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabasheer at all sweet. On the contrary it is slightly bitter and physicky in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica. It could never have been called "honey" (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. [The same view is taken in the Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xxii. 625, quoting Nol. et Extr. xxv. 267.] All the erroneous notices of σάκχαρος seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what-not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallised products of the sugar-cane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a symp or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shi-mi or 'stone-honey' as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of Taitung (627-650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chini (Cheeny) (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Misri (Misree) or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; loaf-sugar is called land.

c. A.D. 60.—

"Quilquo ferens rapidum diviso gurgito fontem Vastis Indus aquis mixtum non sentit Hydaspem:
Quilquo bibunt tenera dulcis ab arundine succos. . . ."
Lucan. iii. 235.

"Ajunt inveniri apud Indos mol in arundinum foliis, quod aut nos illius coeli, aut ipsius arundinis humor dulcis et pinguis gignat."—Senece, Epist. lxxxiv.

c. A.D. 65.—"It is called σάκχαρος, and is a kind of honey which solidifies in India, and in Arabia Felix; and is found upon canes, in its substance resembling salt, and crunched by the teeth as salt is. Mixed with water and drunk, it is good for the belly and stomach, and for affections of the bladder and kidneys."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. c. 101.

c. A.D. 70.—"Saccharon et Arabia fert, sed laudatius India. Est autem mol in harundinibus collectum, eamumum modo candidum, dentibus fragile, amplissimum nucis abellanae magnitudine, ad medicinas tantum usum."—Plin. Hist. Nat. xii. 8.

c. 170.—"But all these articles are hotter than is desirable, and so they aggravate fevers, much as wine would. But oxymeli alone does not aggravate fever, whilst it is an active purgative. . . . Not undervalued, I think, that saccharum may also be counted among things of this quality. . . ."
—Galen, Methodus Medendi, viii.

c. 636.—"In Indicis stagnis nasci arundines calamique dicuntur, ex quorum radicibus expressum suavissimum succum bibunt. Vnde et Varro ait:

Indica non magno in arbore crevit arundo;
Illius et lentis promitur radicibus humor, Dulcia qui noqueant succo concedere mella."

1298.—"Baungala est una provincia versu midii. . . . Il font grant morchandise, car il ont espi o galanga o gingibor o succaro ot de maintes autres chieres especes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. cxvii.

1298.—"Je voz di que en ceste provenances" (Qinsai or Chokiang), "naist et se fait plus sucre que ne fait en tout le autre monde, et ce est encore grandissime vente."—Ibid. ch. ciii.

1298.—"And before this city" (a place near Fu-chau) "came under the Great Can these people knew not how to make fine sugar (zucchero); they only used to boil and skim the juice, which, when cold, left a black paste. But after they came under the Great Can some men of Babylon" (i.e. of Cairo) "who happened to be at the Court proceeded to this city and taught the people to refine sugar with the ashes of certain trees."—Idem. in Ramusio, ii. 49.

c. 1343 — "In Cyprus the following articles are sold by the hundred-weight (centau di peso) and at a price in besants: Round pepper, sugar in powder (polvere di zucchero) . . . sugars in loaves (zucchero in pani), bees' honey, sugar-cane honey, and carob-honey (miele d'ape, miele di cannuneli, miele di carrube). . . ."—Pegolotti, 61.

"Loaf sugars are of several sorts, viz. zucchero muckhera, caffettino, and bambillon, and musciatto, and dommaschino; and the muckhera is the best sugar there is; for it is more thoroughly boiled, and its paste is whiter, and more solid, than any other sugar; it is in the form of the bambillon sugar like this Δ; and of this muckhera kind but little comes to the west, because nearly the whole is kept for the mouth and for the use of the Soldan himself.

"Zucchero caffettino is the next best after the muckera . . .

"Zucchero Bambillon is the best next after the best caffettino.

"Zucchero musciatto is the best after that of Bambillon."

* * * * *

"Zucchero chandi, the bigger the pieces are, and the whiter, and the brighter, so much is it the better and finer, and there should not be too much small stuff.

"Powdered sugars are of many kinds, as of Cyprus, of Rhodes, of the Cranco of Monreale, and of Alexandria; and they are all made originally in entire loaves; but as they are not so thoroughly done, as the other sugars that keep their loaf shape . . . the leaves tumble to pieces, and return to powder, and so it is called powdered sugar . . ." (and a great deal more).—Ibid. 362-366. We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bambillon is 'Sugar of Babylon,' i.e. of Cairo, and Dommaschino of Damascus. Muckhera (see CANDY (SUGAR), the second quotation), Caffettino, and Musciatto, no doubt all represent Arabic terms used in the trade at Alexandria, but we cannot identify them.

c. 1345.—"J'ai vu vendre dans le Bengale . . . un rikkil (rotelle) de sucre (al-sukkar), poids de Dihly, pour quatre drachmes."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 211.

1516.—"Moreover they make in this city (Bengala, i.e. probably Chittagong) much and good white cana sugar (aquagere branco de canas), but they do not know how to consolidate it and make loaves of it, so they wrap up the powder in certain wrappers of raw hide, very well stitched up; and make great loads of it, which are despatched for sale to many parts, for it is a great traffic."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 362.

[1630.—"Let us have a word or two of the prices of sugar and sugar candy."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 5.]

1807.—"Chacun sait que par effet des regards de Farid, des monceaux de terre se changeaient en sucre. Tel est le motif du surnom de Schakar ganj, 'tresor du sucre' qui lui a été donné."—Arâish-i-Mahfil, quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. 95. (This is the saint, Farid-uddin Shakkarganj (d. A.D. 1288) whose shrine is at Pak Paltan in the Punjab.) [See Crooke, Popular Religion, &c. i. 214 seqq.]

1810.—"Although the sugar cane is supposed by many to be indigenous in India, yet it has only been within the last 50 years that it has been cultivated to any great extent. . . . Strange to say, the only sugar-candy used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe that it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 133.

SULTAN, s. Ar. sultân, 'a Prince, a Monarch.' But this concrete sense is, in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.' The corresponding words in Hebrew and Aramaic have, as usual, sh or s. Thus sholtân in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingdom") is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sultân in its post-classical sense, is shaltî, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xlii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yûsuf Salâh-ad-dîn) was not the first Joseph who was sultan of Egypt. ["In Arabia it is a not uncommon proper name; and as a title it is taken by a host of petty kinglets. The Abbaside Caliphs (as Al-Wâsik . . .) formerly created these Sultans as their regents. Al Tâi bi'llah (A.D. 974) invested the famous Sabuktagin with the office . . . Sabuktagin's son, the famous Mahmûd of the Ghaznavite dynasty in 1002, was the first to adopt 'Sultân' as an independent title some 200 years after the death of Harûn-al-Rashîd" (Burton, Arab. Nights, i. 188.)]

a. n.p. This name has been applied to the great island since about A.D. 1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have originated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Samudra, was certainly not far from Pasei, the Pacem of the early Portuguese writers, the Passir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 276 seqq.). This view is corroborated by a letter from C. W. J. Wenniker (Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volkenkunde van Nederlandisch Indie, ser. iv. vol. 6. (1882), p. 298) from which we learn that in 1881 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Pasei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Pasei) came upon a kampung, or village, called Samudra. We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name is probably to be recognised in Samara, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this coast, intervening between Basma, or Pacem, and Dagroian or Dragoian, which last seems to correspond with Pedir. This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that it has disappeared accidentally from Polo's Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the etymology of the name, and others have been suggested; but in all probability it was the Skt. Samudra, the 'sea.' [See Miscellaneous Papers relating to Indo-China, 2nd ser. ii. 60; Leyden, Malay Annals, 65.] At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwira Samudra in S. India (see DOOR SUMMUND).

The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumutala. The chief of this State is called in the Chinese record Tu-han-pa-ti (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 606), which seems to exactly represent the Malay words Tuan-Pati, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumutra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lamori had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Lambri, which was then the State and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolo Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shamuthera. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Siamotra or Tuprobane. The confusion with Tuprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading State upon the coast, and certainly no State known as Samudra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Ain, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognise the existence of a place called Samudra or Samotdara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achin, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamsuddin Shamatrani, which seems to point to a place called Shamatra as his birth-place. And a distinct mention of "the island of Samatra" as named from "a city of this northern part" occurs in the soi-disant "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malacca" in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbosa. This man, on leaving Pedir and going down the coast, says: "I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatra," and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But, though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be mere plunder from Varthema. Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way; for there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

There is, however, a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502) and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island" (see in De Gubernatis, Viagg. Ital. 391).

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining States of Paei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send to one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantala). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Paei, and very near where Paei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account "of about A.D. 1413" accompanied the map. This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Tulu-mangkin (qu. Telu-Samawe). A curious passage also will be found below, extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Bijdragen).

c. 1300.—"Beyond it (Lamuri, or Lambri, near Achin) lies the country of Samutra, and beyond that Darband Nils, which is a dependency of Java."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1323.—"In this same island, towards the south, is another Kingdom by name Sumoltra, in which is a singular generation of people."—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., i. 277.

c. 1346.—"... after a voyage of 25 days we arrived at the island of Jāwa" (i.e. the Java Minor of Marco Polo, or Sumatra). "... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say into the city of Sumuthra. It is large and handsome, and is encompassed with a wall and towers of timber."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 228-230.

1416.—"SUMATRA [Su-men-ta-la]. This country is situated on the great road of western trade. When a ship leaves Malacca for the west, and goes with a fair eastern wind for five days and nights, it first comes to a village on the sea-coast called Ta-lu-man; and anchoring here and going south-east for about 10 li (3 miles) one arrives at the said place.

"This country has no walled city. There is a large brook running out into the sea, with two tides every day; the waves at the mouth of it are very high, and ships continually founder there. . . ."—Chinese work, quoted by Groeneveldt, p. 85.

c. 1430.—"He afterwards went to a fine city of the island Taprobana, which island is called by the natives Sciamuthera."—Conti, in India in XVth. Cent., 9.

1459.—"Isola Siamotra."—Fra Mauro.

1498.—"... Camatarra is of the Christians; it is distant from Calicut a voyage of 30 days with a good wind."—Roteiro, 109.

1510.—"Wherefore we took a junk and went towards Sumatra to a city called Pider."—Varthema, 228.

1522.—"... We left the island of Timor, and entered upon the great sea called Lant Chidol, and taking a west-south-west course, we left to the right and the north, for fear of the Portuguese, the island of Zumatra, anciently called Taprobana; also Pegu, Bengala, Urizza, Chelim (see KLING) where are the Malabars, subjects of the King of Narsinga."—Ligajetta, Hak. Soc. 159.

Camões, x. 124.

By Burton :

"From this Peninsula, they say, the sea parted with puissant waves, and entering tore Samatra's noble island, wont to be joined to the Main as soon by men of yore. 'Twas called Chersoneso, and such degree it gained by earth that yielded golden ore, they gave a golden epithet to the ground : Some be who fancy Ophir here was found."

c. 1590.—"The zabād (i.e. civet) which i brought from the harbour, town of Sumatra, from the territory of Achin, goes by the name of Sumatra zabād (chūn az bandar-i Sāmātrāi az muzāfat-i Achin awurdand, Sāmātrāi goyand)."—Atin, Blochmann, i. 79, (orig. i. 93). [And see a reference to Lāmiri in Atin, ed. Jarrett, iii. 48.]

1612.—"It is related that Raja Shaher-ul-Nawi (see SARNAU) was a sovereign of great power, and on hearing that Samadra was a fine and flourishing land he said to his warriors—which of you will take the Rajah of Samadra?"—Syura Malayu, in J. Ind. Archip. v. 316.

c. .—"Sou-men-t'ala, est située au sud-ouest de Tchen-tching (la Cochinchine) . . . jusqu'à la fin du règne de Tching-tou (in 1425), ce roi ne cessa d'envoyer son tribut à la cour. Pendant les années wen-hi (1573-1615) ce royaume se partagea en deux, dont le nouveau se nomma A-lehi. . . Par la suite on n'en entendit plus parler."—Grande Geog. Impériale, quoted by Pauthier, Maie Pol, 567.

SUMATRA, s. Sudden squalls, precisely such as are described by Lockyer and the others below, and which are common in the narrow sea between the Malay Peninsula and the island of Sumatra, are called by this name.

1616.—"... it befel that the galliot of Miguel de Macedo was lost on the Ilha Grande of Malacca (?), where he had come to anchor, when a Samatra arose that drove him on the island, the vessel going to pieces, though the crew and most part of what she carried were saved."—Bocarro, Decada, 626.

1711.—"Frequent squalls . . . these are often accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, and continue very fierce for Half an Hour, more or less. Our English Sailors call them Sumatras, because they always meet with them on the Coasts of this Island."—Lockyer, 56.

1726.—"At Malacca the straits are not above 4 Leagues broad; for though the opposite shore on Sumatra is very low, yet it may easily be seen on a clear Day, which is the Reason that the Sea is always as smooth as a Mill-pond, except it is ruffled with Squalls of Wind, which seldom come without Lightning, Thunder, and Rain, and though they come with great Violence, yet they are soon over, not often exceeding an Hour."—A. Hamilton, ii. 79, [ed. 1744].

1843.—"Sumatras, or squalls from the S. Westward, are often experienced in the S.W. Monsoon. . . . Sumatras generally come off the land during the first part of the night, and are sometimes sudden and severe, accompanied with loud thunder, lightning, and rain."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 215.

[SUMJAO, v. This is properly the imp. of the H. verb samjahna, 'to cause to know, warn, correct,' usually with the implication of physical coercion. Other examples of a similar formation will be found under PUCKEROW.

[1826. — ". . . in this case they apply themselves to sumjao, the defendant." — Pundurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 170.]

[SUMPITAN, s. The Malay blowing-tube, by means of which arrows, often poisoned, are discharged. The weapon is discussed under SARBATANE. The word is Malay sumpit, properly 'a narrow thing,' from sumpit, 'narrow, strait.' There is an elaborate account of it, with illustrations, in Ling Roth, Natives of Sarawak and Br. N. Borneo, ii. 184 seqq. Also see Scott, Malayan Words, 104 seqq.

[c. 1630. — "Sempitana." See under UPAS.

[1811. — "In advancing, the sumpitan is carried at the mouth and elevated, and they will discharge at least five arrows to one compared with a musket." — Brooke, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, i. 261.

[1883. — "Their (the Samangs') weapon is the sumpitan, a blow-gun, from which poisoned arrows are expelled." — Miss Bud, The Golden Chersonese, 16.]

SUNDA, n.p. The western and most mountainous part of the island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manners, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country. The Dutch call them Sundanese (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e. embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java. Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in "Java," a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island. From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor "the Sunda Islands."

[Mr. Whitway adds: "There was another Sunda near Goa, but above the Ghäts, where an offspring of the Vijayanagara family ruled. It was founded at the end of the 16th century, and in the 18th the Portuguese had much to do with it, till Tippoo Sultân absorbed it, and the ruler became a Portuguese pensioner."]

1516. — "And having passed Samatara towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is much good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China." — Das Vost, 196.

1520. — "Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeot and a foist, went into the port of Gunda, which is at the end of the island of Samatara, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandize exported thence. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them." — Correa, iii. 92.

1553. — "Of the land of Jalla we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. . . . But the Jaos themselves do not reckon two islands of Jaoa, but one only, of the length that has been stated . . . about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak. The natives of that part consider their country to be an island divided from Jalla by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Chiamo or Chonano, which cuts off right from the sea,* all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Jalla they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Chiamo, and on the east by the island of Bale, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea. . . ." &c. — Barros, IV. i. 12.

1554. — "The information we have of this port of Calapa, which is the same as Gunda, and of another port called Boca, these two being 15 leagues one from the other, and

* ". . . hum rio . . . que corta do mar todo aquella terço do terra." . . . We are not quite sure how to translate. Crawford renders: "This (river) intersects the whole island from sea to sea," which seems very free. But it is true, as we have said, that several old maps show Java and Sunda thus divided from sea to sea.

both under one King, is to the effect that the supply of pepper one year with another will be xxx thousand quintals,* that is to say, xx thousand in one year, and x thousand the next year; also that it is very good pepper, as good as that of Malabar, and it is purchased with cloths of Cambaya, Bengalla, and Choromandel."—J. Nunez, in Sabidios, 12.

"Os Sundas o Malaius con pimenta,
Com uassas, e noz ricos Bandaneas,
Com roupa e droga Cambai e opulenta,
E com cravo os longinquos Malaguezas."
Aut. des. Abreu, Dr. de Malacca.

1598.—Linschoten does not recognize the two islands. To him Sunda is only a place in Java:—

"... there is a straight or narrow passage between Sumatra and Java, called the straight of Sunda, of a place so called, lying not far from thence within the Ile of Java. . . . The principall haven in the land is Sunda Calaja,† whereof the straight beareth the name; in this place of Suda there is much Pepper."—p. 31.

SUNDERBUNDS, n.p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hoogly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) on the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain. Sundara-rana, 'beautiful forest'; Sundari-rana, or -ban, 'forest of the Sundari tree'; Chandra-ban, and Chandra-band, 'moon-forest' or 'moon-embankment'; Chunda-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers; ‡ Chandra dip-ban from a large zenituary called Chandra-dip in the Bakerganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology, we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundari. [As to the derivation from the Sundari tree which is perhaps most usually accepted, Mr. Beveridge (Man. of Bakerganj, 24, 167, 32) remarks that this tree is by no means common in many parts of the Bakerganj Sunderbunds; he suggests that the word means 'beautiful wood' and was possibly given by the Brahmans.] The name has never (except in one quotation below) been in English mouths, or in English popular orthography, Soonderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sandra or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers, we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Brucke's map (1660) which was published in Valentijn's East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hoogly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Dasandhari, located near the exit into the Hoogly of what represents the old Samswati R., which enters the former at Sankral, not far below the Botanical Gardens, and 5 or 6 miles below Fort William. This has led Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sundari Bosch with the old Mahall Dasandhari which appears in the Ain as belonging to the Sirkar of Sulimabad (Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Jarratt, ii. 140; Blochm. in J.A.S.B. xlii. pt. i. p. 232), and which formed one of the original "xxiv. Pergunnas."* Undoubtedly this is the Dasandari of V. den Broucke's map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Dasandari and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sundarban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to misplace the latter. We should gather from Schulz† that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankral, which he mentions. But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we appre-

* Dasandhari is also mentioned by Mr. James Grant (1760) in his View of the Revenues of Bengal, as the Pergunna of Ellu-busendru; and by A. Hamilton as a place on the Damodar, producing much good sugar (15th Report, p. 403; A. Ham. ii. 43). It would seem to have been the present Pergunna of Halia, some 13 or 14 miles west of the northern part of Calcutta. See Hunter's Bengal Gaz. i. 365.
† So called in the German version which we use; but in the Dutch original he is Schouten.

* Apparently 30,000 quintals every two years.
† Sunda Kalaja was the same as Jacatra, on the site of which the Dutch founded Batavia in 1619.

‡ These are mentioned in a copper tablet inscription of A.D. 1136; see Blochmann, as quoted further on, p. 223.

hend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 169).

1661.—“We got under sail again” (just after meeting the Arakan pirates) “in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonia.”—Walter Schulz, 155.

c. 1666.—“And thence it is” (from piratical raids of the Mugs, &c.) “that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine Isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other Inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Tygers.”—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 442].

1726.—“This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sulthaan Iskender, and in their historians Iskender Doulcarnain, was . . . they can show you the exact place where King Porus held his court. The natives will prate much of this matter; for example, that in front of the SANDERIS-WOOD (Sanderie Bosch, which we show in the map, and which they call properly after him Iskenderie) he was stopped by the great and rushing streams.”—Valentijn, v. 179.

1728.—“But your petitioners did not arrive off Sunderbund Wood till four in the evening, where they rowed backward and forward for six days, with which labour and want of provisions three of the people died.”—Petition of Sheik Mahmud Ameen and others, to Govr. of Ft. St. Geo, in Wheeler, iii. 41.

1764.—“On the 11th Bhaudan, whilst the Boats were at Kerma in Soonderbund, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manjes to put off with the Budgerow. . . .”—Native Letter regarding Murder of Captain John Ross by a Native Crew, in Lang, 383. This instance is an exception to the general remark made above that the English popular orthography has always been Sunder, and not Soonderbunds.

1786.—“If the Jelinggy be navigable we shall soon be in Calcutta; if not, we must pass a second time through the Sundarbans.”—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 83.

“A portion of the Sunderbunds . . . for the most part overflowed by the tide, as indicated by the original Hindoo name of Chunderbund, signifying mounds, or offspring of the moon.”—James Grant, in App. to Fifth Report, p. 260. In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from “Soonder wood,” and “Soonder-ban,” “beautiful wood,” and proceeds: “But we adhere to our own etymology rather . . . here all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprized in the ancient Zemindarry pergunnah of Chunder deep, or lunar territory.”

1792.—“Many of these lands, what is called the Sundra bunds, and others at the mouth of the Ganges, if we may believe the history of Bengal, was formerly well inhabited.”—Forrest, V. to Mergui, Pref. p. 5.

1793.—“That part of the delta bordering on the sea, is composed of a labyrinth of rivers and creeks, . . . this tract known by the name of the Woods, or Sunderbunds, is in extent equal to the principality of Wales.”—Rennell, Mem. of Map of Hind., 3rd ed., p. 359.

1853.—“The scenery, too, exceeded his expectations; the terrible forest solitude of the Sunderbunds was full of interest to an European imagination.”—Outfield, i. 38.

[SUNGAR, s. Pers. sanga, sang, ‘a stone.’ A rude stone breastwork, such as is commonly erected for defence by the Afridis and other tribes on the Indian N.W. frontier. The word has now come into general military use, and has been adopted in the S. African war.

[1857.—“ . . . breastworks of wood and stone (murcha and sanga respectively). . . .”—Belleo, Journal of Mission, 127.

[1900.—“Conspicuous sungars are constructed to draw the enemy’s fire.”—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

The same word seems to be used in the Hills in the sense of a rude wooden bridge supported by stone piers, used for crossing a torrent.

[1833.—“Across a deep ravine . . . his Lordship erected a neat sangah, or mountain bridge of pines.”—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1853, p. 117.

[1871.—“A sungah bridge is formed as follows: on either side the river piers of rubble masonry, laced with cross-beams of timber, are built up; and into these are inserted stout poles, one above the other in successively projecting tiers, the interstices between the latter being filled up with cross-beams,” &c.—Harcourt, Himalayan Districts of Kooloo, p. 67 seq.]

SUNG TARA, s. Pers. sangtara. The name of a kind of orange, probably from Cintra. See under ORANGE a quotation regarding the fruit of Cintra, from Abulfeda.

c. 1526.—“The Sengtareh . . . is another fruit. . . . In colour and appearance it is like the citron (Tarans), but the skin of the fruit is smooth.”—Naber, 323.

c. 1590.—“Sirkar Silhet is very mountainous. . . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara (suntara) in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form.”—Ayren, by Gladwin, ii. 10; [Jarrett (ii. 124) writes Suntarah].

1793.—“The people of this country have infinitely more reason to be proud of their oranges, which appear to me to be very superior to those of Silhet, and probably indeed are not surpassed by any in the world. They are here called Santdu, which I take to be a corruption of Sengterrah, the name by which a similar species of orange is known in the Upper Provinces of India.”—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 129.

1835.—“The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them ‘cintra.’”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 99.

SUNN, s. Beng. and Hind. san, from Skt. śana; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N.O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp. It is of course in no way kindred to true hemp, except in its economic use. In the following passage from the Āin the reference is to the Hibiscus canabinnus (see Walt, Econ. Dict. ii. 597).

[c. 1590.—“Hemp grows in clusters like a no-egg. . . . One species bears a flower like the cotton-shrub, and this is called in Hindostan, sun-pant. It makes a very soft rope.”—Ayem, by Gladwin, ii. 89; in Blackmann (i. 87) Patazan.]

1838.—“Sunn . . . a plant the bark of which is used as hemp, and is usually sown around cotton fields.”—Playfair, Taleef-i-Sherref, 96.

[SUNNEE, SOONNEE, s. Ar. sunni, which is really a Pers. form and stands for that which is expressed by the Ar. Ahlu's-Sunnah, ‘the people of the Path,’ a ‘Traditionist.’ The term applied to the large Mahomedan sect who acknowledge the first four Khalifas to have been the rightful descendants of the Prophet, and are thus opposed to the Shacahs. The latter are much less numerous than the former, the proportion being, according to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's estimate, 15 millions Shi'as to 145 millions of Sunnis.

[c. 1590.—“The Mahomedans (of Kashmir) are partly Sunnas, and others of the sects of Aly and Noorbukshahy; and they are frequently engaged in wars with each other.”—Ayem, by Gladwin, ii. 125; ed. Jarrett, ii. 352.

[1623.—“The other two . . . are Soani, as the Turks and Moghols.”—P. della Valle, Itak. Soc. i. 152.

[1812.—“A fellow told me with the gravest face, that a lion of their own country would never hurt a Shayah . . . but would always devour a Sunni.”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 62.]

SUNNUD, s. Hind. from Ar. sanad. A diploma, patent, or deed of grant by the government of office, privilege, or right. The corresponding Skt.—H. is śasana.

[c. 1590.—“A paper authenticated by proper signatures is called a sunnud. . . .”—Ayem, by Gladwin, i. 211; ed. Blackmann, i. 259.]

1758.—“They likewise brought sunnuds, or the commission for the nabobship.”—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, ii. 281.

1769.—“That your Petitioners, being the Brahmans, &c. . . . were permitted by Sunnud from the President and Council to collect daily alms from each shop or doocan (Doocann) of this place, at 5 cowries per item.”—In Long, 181.

1776.—“If the path to and from a House . . . be in the Territories of another Person, that Person, who always hath passed to and fro, shall continue to do so, the other Person aforesaid, though he hath a Right of Property in the Ground, and hath an attested Sunnud thereof, shall not have Authority to command any Let or Molestation.”—Rathod, Cole, 160-161.

1799.—“I enclose you sunnuds for pension for the Killadar of Chittledroog.”—Wellington, i. 45.

1800.—“I wished to have traced the nature of landed property in Soonlah . . . by a chain of Sunnuds up to the 8th century.”—Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 249.

1809.—“This sunnud is the foundation of all the rights and privileges annexed to a Jageer (Jagheer).”—Harington's Analysis, ii. 410.

SUNYÁSEE, s. Skt. saṃnyāṣī, lit. ‘one who resigns, or abandons,’ scil. ‘wordly affairs’; a Hindu religious mendicant. The name of Sunyāsee was applied familiarly in Bengal, c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himalaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kāsim ‘Alī (1760-64) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1768 the great geographer James Rennell, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch (see COOCH) Bihār, was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

[c. 200 A.D.—“Having thus performed religious acts in a forest during the third portion of his life, let him become a Sannyasi for the fourth portion of it, abandoning all sensual affection.”—Manu, vi. 33.]

[c. 1590.—“The fourth period is Sannyāsa, which is an extraordinary state of austerity that nothing can surpass. . . . Such a person His Majesty calls Sannyāsi.”—Āin, ed. Jarrick, iii. 278.]

1616.—“Sunt autem Sannases apud illos Brachmanes quidam, sanctimoniae opinione habentes, ab hominum scilicet consortio semoti in solitudine degentes et nonnunquam totū nudū corpus in publicū prodeuntes.”—Jarric, Thea, i. 663.

1626.—“Some (an unlearned kind) are called Sannases.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 519.

1651.—“The Sanyasya are people who set the world and worldly joys, as they say, on one side. They are indeed more precise and strict in their lives than the foregoing.”—Rogierius, 21.

1674.—“Saniade, or Saniasl, is a dignity greater than that of Kings.”—Furia y Sousa, Asia Port. n. 711.

1726.—“The San-yasés are men who, forsaking the world and all its fruits, bethake themselves to a very strict and retired manner of life.”—Valentijn, Choro. 76.

1766.—“The Sanashy Faquirs (part of the same Tribe which plundered Dacca in Cossim Ally's Time*) were in arms to the number of 7 or 800 at the Time I was surveying Bâgr (a small Province near Boutan), and had taken and plundered the Capital of that name within a few Coss of my route. . . . I came up with Morrison immediately after he had defeated the Sanashys in a pitched Battle. . . . Our Escorte, which were a few Horse, rode off, and the Enemy with drawn Sabres immediately surrounded us. Morrison escaped unhurt, Richards, my Brother officer, received only a slight Wound, and fought his Way off; my Armenian Assistant was killed, and the Sopoy Adjutant much wounded. . . . I was put in a Palankeen, and Morrison made an attack on the Enemy and cut most of them to Pieces. I was now in a most shocking Condition indeed, being deprived of the Use of both my Arms, . . . a cut of a Sabre (sic) had cut through my right Shoulder Bone, and laid me open for nearly a Foot down the Back, cutting thro' and wounding some of my Ribs. I had besides a Cut on the left Elbow which took off the Muscular part of the breadth of a Hand, a Stab in the Arm, and a large Cut on the head. . . .”—MS. Letter from James Rennell, dd. August 30, in possession of his grandson Major Rodd.

1707.—“A body of 5000 Sinnasses have lately entered the Sircar Sarong country; the Phousdar sent two companies of Sepoys after them, under the command of a serjeant. . . . the Sinnasses stood their ground, and after the Sepoys had fired away their ammunition, fell on them, killed and wounded near 80, and put the rest to flight. . . .”—Letter to President at Ft. William, from Thomas Rumbold, Chief at Patna, dd. April 20, in Long, p. 626.

1773.—“You will hear of great disturbances committed by the Sinnasses, or wandering Fakcers, who annually infest the provinces about this time of the year, in pilgrimage to Juggernaut, going in bodies of 1000 and sometimes even 10,000 men.”—Letter of Warren Hastings, dd. February 2, in Oleig, i. 252.

” “At this time we have five battalions of Sepoys in pursuit of them.”—Do. do., March 31, in Oleig, i. 291.

1771.—“The history of these people is curious. . . . They . . . rove continually from place to place, recruiting their numbers with the healthiest children they can steal. . . . Thus they are the stoutest and most active men in India. . . . Such are the Senassies, the gypsies of Hindostan.”—Do. do., dd. August 25, in Oleig, 303-4. See the same vol., also pp. 234, 296-7-8, 395.

1826.—“Being looked upon with an evil eye by many persons in society, I pretended to bewail my brother's loss, and gave out my intention of becoming a Sunyasse, and retiring from the world.”—Pandurang Huri, 394; [ed. 1873, ii. 267; also i. 189].

SUPÁRA, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of Western India; in Skt. Sārpataka,* popularly Supāra. It was near Wasāl (Bacaim of the Portuguese—see (1) Bassein)—which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached

* This affair is alluded to in one of the extracts in Long (p. 342): “Agreed . . . that the Faklers who were made prisoners at the retaking of Dacca may be employed as Coolies in the repair of the Factory.”—Proceeds of Council at Ft. William, Dec. 6, 1769.

* Williams (Skt. Dic. s.v.) gives Sūpāraka as “the name of a mythical country”; but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Sūpāraka on the coast of Orissa, Συπάρκα of Ptolemy.

it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahābhārata as a very holy place, and in other old Sanskrit works, as well as in cave inscriptions at Kūrlī and Nāsik, going back to the 1st and 2nd centuries of the Christian era. Excavations affording interesting Buddhist relics, were made in 1882 by Mr. (now Sir) J. M. Campbell (see his interesting notice in Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 314-342; xvi. 125) and Pundit Indrajī Bhagwānlāl. The name of Supāra is one of those which have been plausibly connected, through Sophr, the Coptic name of India, with the Ophir of Scripture. Some Arab writers call it the Sofala of India.

SUPREME COURT. The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the subject of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court. The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the ‘High Court,’ the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.

The Charter of Charles II., of 1661, gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1683 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor’s Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council of each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason. Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1763. The Mayor’s Court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1797, when (by 37 Geo. III. ch. 142) a Recorder’s Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823.

SURA, s. Toddy (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild-date. It is the Skt. sura, 'vinous liquor,' which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity, applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies sura in the same way. Bluteau, curiously, calls this a Cafre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit. iv. 293).

c. 515.—"The Argell" (i.e. Nargil, or nargela, or coco nut) "is at first full of very sweet water, which the Indians drink, using it instead of wine. This drink is called Almonco sura," and is exceedingly pleasant."—Cosmas, in Callag, &c., cixavi.

[1551.—"Cura." See under ARRACK.]

1663.—"They grow two qualities of palm-tree, one kind for the fruit, and the other to give cura."—Guzerat, f. 67.

1578.—"Sura, which is, as it were, wine made."—Leclerc, 160.

1593.—". . . in that sort the pot in short space is full of water, which they call Sura, and is very pleasant to drink, like sweet whey, and somewhat better."—Linschoten, 101; [Blak. Soc. ii. 43].

1609-10.—". . . A goodly country and fertile . . . abounding with Date Trees, whence they draw a liquor, called Turree (Toddy) or Suro. . . ."—Purch. in Purchas, i. 130.

1613.—"La si fis boire mes mariniers de telle sorte que peu s'en salut qu'ils ne remuer-arent notre almahie ou latteau: Ce breuvage estoit du sura, qui est du vin fait de palmes."—Meryet, Voyages, 252.

c. 1650.—"Nor could they drink either Wine, or Sury, or Strong Water, by reason of the great Imposts which he laid upon them."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 86; [ed. Hall, i. 343].

1653.—"Les Portugais appellent ce lari ou vin des Indes, Souro . . . de cette liqueur le singa, et la grande chaudiere-souris . . . sont extrêmement amateurs, aussi bien que les Indous Musulmans (sic), Persis, et quelques tribus d'Indou. . . ."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 263.

SURAT, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accented Suratt; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Sūrāt. In the Āin, however (see below), it is written Sūrat; also in Sādik Isfahānī (p. 106). Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahomedan kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. (now Sir J.) Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Saurāṣṭra was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently-spelt and pronounced Sorath (see SURATH). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus: "The names 'Surat' and 'Sūrat' are identical, both being derived from the Sanskrit Saurāṣṭra; but as they belong to different places a distinction in spelling has been maintained. 'Surat' is the city; 'Sūrat' is a prant or district of Kattywar, of which Junagarh is the chief town" (Elliot, v. 350; see also 197). Also: "The Sanskrit Saurāṣṭra and Gurjara survive in the modern names Surat and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Saurāṣṭra nor Guzerat in Gurjara. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolemy's Surastræne comprises Surat. . . ." (Dorson (1) ibid. i. 359). This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolemy's Adria, not in Syaparrh, which represents, like Saurāṣṭra, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connection between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Saurāṣṭra or Sorath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only came to notice as a place of any importance about the very end of the 15th century, when a rich Hindu trader, Gopi by name, is stated to have established himself on the spot, and founded the town. The way, however, in which it is spoken of by Barbosa previous to 1516 shows that the rise of its prosperity must have been rapid.

[Surat in English slang is equivalent to the French Rafiot, in the sense of 'no great shakes,' an adulterated article of inferior quality (Barrère, s.v. Rafiot). This perhaps was accounted for by the fact that "until lately the character of Indian cotton in the Liverpool market stood very low, and the name 'Surats,' the description under which the cotton of this province is still included, was a byword and a general term of contempt" (Barar Gazetteer, 226 seq.)]

1510.—"Don Afonso" (de Noronha, nephew of Albuquerque) "in the storm not knowing whither they went, entered the Gulf of Cambay, and struck upon a shoal in front of Currate. Trying to save themselves by swimming or on planks many perished, and among them Don Afonso."—Correa, ii. 29.

1516.—"Having passed beyond the river of Roynel, on the other side there is a city which they call Curate, peopled by Moors, and close upon the river; they deal there in many kinds of wares, and carry on a great trade; for many ships of Malabar and other parts sail thither, and sell what they bring, and return loaded with what they choose. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 280.

1525.—"The corja (Corge) of cotton cloths of Curate, of 14 yards each, is worth . . . 250 fezas."—Lembrança, 45.

1528.—"Hoytor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Currate and Roynel, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison. . . ."—Correa, iii. 277.

1553.—"Thence he proceeded to the bar of the river Tapti, above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat, 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Roynel, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank. . . . The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilisation, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from this city that most of the foists and ships of the King of Cambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Banyans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths."—Barros, IV. iv. 8.

1554.—"So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surat."—Sili' Ali, p. 83.

1573.—"Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress. . . . During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaimán, from the name of Sulaimán Sultan of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarát, he sent these . . . with a large army by sea. As the Turks . . . were obliged to return, they left these mortars. . . . The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudáwánd Khán built the fort of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Súráth was taken to the fort of Júnágarh by the ruler of that country."—Tabakát-i-Albárí, in Elliot, v. 350.

c. 1590.—"Súrat is among famous ports. The river Tapti runs hard by, and at seven coss distance joins the salt sea. Ráñir on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Súrat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khandeví and Balsár are also annexed to Súrat. Fruit, and especially the ananás, is abundant. . . . The sectaries of Zardasht, emigrant from Fars, have made their dwelling here; they rovere the Zhand and Pazhand and erect their dakhmas (or places for exposing the dead). . . . Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commandants of the troops (sipah-salárán, Sipah Selar), a considerable tract of this Sirkár is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g. Daman, Sanján (St. John's), Tarápúr, Múhim, and Basal (see (1) Basseln), that are both cities and forts."—Am, orig. i. 488; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 213].

[1615.—"To the Right Honourable Sir Thomas Roe . . . these in Zuratt."—Foster, Letters, iii. 196.]

1638.—"Within a League of the Road we entered into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indians are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapti . . . is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 80 Tun can hardly come into it."—Mandelslo, p. 12.

1690.—"Suratt is reckon'd the most fam'd Emporium of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible. . . . And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Hoys and Yachts, and Country Boats."—Ovington, 218.

1779.—"There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bender-Sourat . . . but the truth of this God knows."—Seir Mutag, iii. 328.

SURATH, more properly Sōrath, and Sōrēth, u.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Saurāshtra and Greek Systrātrēnē, names which applied to what we now call the Kattywar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the sea-coast. ["Saurāshtra, the land of the Sus, afterwards Sanskritized into Saurāshtra the Goodly Land, preserves its name in Sorath the southern part of Kāthiāwāda. The name appears as Surāshtra in the Mahābhārata and Pāṇini's Guanapadtha, in Rudradāman's (A.D. 150) and Skandagupta's (A.D. 450) Gurmār inscriptions, and in several Valabhi copper-plates. Its Pāṇini form appears as Suratha in the Nāsik inscription of Gotamiputra (A.D. 150) and in later Pāṇini as Suraththa in the Tirthakalpā of Jinaprabhāsuri of the 13th or 14th century. Its earliest foreign mention is perhaps Strabo's Sarasus and Pliny's Orutura" (Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 6)]. The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Aśoka (n.c. 250) on a rock at Gurmār, near Junāgarh in Saurāshtra, shows that the dominion of that great sovereign, whose capital was at Pataliputra (Παλιμπόδρα) or Patna, extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sūrath or Sōrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prāntas or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prāntas containing a number of small States, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sorath occupies the south-western portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles.

1516.—"Passing this city and following the sea-coast, you come to another place which has also a good port, and is called Gurati Mangalor," and here, as at the other, put in many vessels of Malabar for horses, grain, cloths, and cottons, and for vegetables and other goods prized in India, and they bring hither coco-nuts, Jagara (Jaggery), which is sugar that they make drink of, emery, wax, cardamoms, and every other kind of spice, a trade in which great gain is made in a short time."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. t. 298.

1573.—See quotation of this date under preceding article, in which both the names Surat and Sūrath, occur.

1581.—"After his second defeat Muzaffar Gujarati retreated by way of Champānir, Bīrpūr, and Jālāwār, to the country of Sūrath, and rested at the town of Gondal, 12 kos from the fort of Junāgarh. . . . He gave a lac of Mahmūdīs and a jewelled dagger to Amin Khān Ghorī, ruler of Sūrath, and so won his support."—Tabaṭṭak-i-Albarī, in Elliot, v. 137-138.

c. 1590.—"Sircar Surat (Sūrath) was formerly an independent territory; the chief was of the Ghelolo tribe, and commanded 50,000 cavalry, and 100,000 infantry. Its length from the port of Ghogeh (Gogo) to the port of Aramroy (Ardmuri) measures 125 cose; and the breadth from Sindehar (Sindhar), to the port of Diu, is a distance of 72 cose."—Iyzen, by Gladwin, ii. 73; [ed. Jurrott, ii. 243].

1616.—"7 Soret, the chief city, is called Junagar; it is but a little Province, yet very rich; it lyes upon Guzarat; it hath the Ocean to the South."—Ferry, ed. 1685, p. 351.

SURKUNDA, s. Hind. sarkandū, [Skt. śara, 'reed-grass,' kunda, 'joint, section']. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Saccharum Sara, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Saccharum procerum, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a howda on the back of a tall elephant. It is from the upper part of the flower-bearing stalk of sirkunda that sirky (q.v.) is derived. A most intelligent visitor to India was led into a curious mistake about the name of this grass by some official, who ought to have known better. We quote the passage. ———'s story about the main branch of a river channel probably rests on no better foundation.

* Mangalore (q.v.) on this coast, no doubt called Sorathi Mangalor to distinguish it from the well-known Mangalor of Canara.

1875.—"As I drove yesterday with —, I asked him if he knew the scientific name of the tall grass which I heard called tiger-grass at Ahmedabad, and which is very abundant here (about Lahore). I think it is a saccharum, but am not quite sure. 'No,' he said, 'but the people in the neighbourhood call it Sikunder's Grass, as they still call the main branch of a river 'Sikander's channel.' Strange, is it not?—how that great individuality looms through history."—Grant Duff, Notes of an Indian Journey, 105.

SURPOOSE, s. Pers. sar-posh, 'head-cover,' [which again becomes corrupted into our Tarboosh (tarbūsh), and 'Tarbrush' of the wandering Briton]. A cover, as of a basin, dish, hooka-bowl, &c.

1829.—"Tugging away at your bookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam (see CHILLUM) and surpoose."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 159.

SURRAPURDA, s. Pers. sard-purda. A canvas screen surrounding royal tents or the like (see CANAUT).

1401.—"And round this pavilion stood an enclosure, as it were, of a town or castle made of silk of many colours, inlaid in many ways, with battlements at the top, and with cords to strain it outside and inside, and with poles inside to hold it up. . . . And there was a gateway of great height forming an arch, with doors within and without made in the same fashion as the wall . . . and above the gateway a square tower with battlements: however fine the said wall was with its many devices and artifices, the said gateway, arch and tower, was of much more exquisite work still. And this enclosure they call Zalaparda."—Clavius, s. cxvi.

c. 1590.—"The Sarāpardah was made in former times of coarse canvass, but his Majesty has now caused it to be made of carpeting, and thereby improved its appearance and usefulness."—Ata, i. 54.

[1839.—"The camp contained numerous enclosures of serrapurdahs or canvass screens. . . ."—Elphinstone, Cabul, 2nd ed. i. 101.]

SURRINJAUM, s. Pers. sar-anjam, lit. 'beginning-ending.' Used in India for 'apparatus,' 'goods and chattels,' and the like. But in the Mahratta provinces it has a special application to grants of land, or rather assignments of revenue, for special objects, such as keeping up a contingent of troops for service; to civil officers for the maintenance of their state; or for charitable purposes.

[1823.—"It was by accident I discovered the deed for this tenure (for the support of troops), which is termed sarinjam. The Pundit of Dhar showed some alarm; at which I smiled, and told him that his master had now the best tenure in India. . . ." Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 103.]

[1877.—"Government . . . did not accede to the recommendation of the political agent immediately to confiscate his sarinjam, or territories."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 166.]

SURRINJAUMEE GRAM, s. Hind. grām-saranjāmi; Skt. grāma, 'a village,' and saranjām (see SURRINJAUM); explained in the quotation.

1767.—"Gram-serenjammees, or peons and pykes stationed in every village of the province to assist the farmers in the collections, and to watch the villages and the crops on the ground, who are also responsible for all thefts within the village they belong to. . . . (Rs.) 1,54,521 : 11."—Revenue Accounts of Burdwan. In Long, 507.

SURROW, SEROW, &c., s. Hind. sardo. A big, odd, awkward-looking antelope in the Himalaya, 'something in appearance between a jackass and a Tahir' (Tehr or Him. wild goat).—Col. Markham in Jerdon. It is Nemorhoedus bubalina, Jerdon; [N. bubalinus, Blanford (Mammalia, 513)].

SURWAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. sardān, sārdān, from sār in the sense of camel, a camel-man.

[1828.—" . . . camels roaring and blubbing, and resisting every effort, soothing or forcible, of their serwans to induce them to embark."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 185.]

1844.—" . . . armed Surwans, or camel-drivers."—G. O. of Sir G. Napier, 93.

SUTLEDGE, n.p. The most easterly of the Five Rivers of the Punjab, the great tributaries of the Indus. Hind. Satlej, with certain variations in spelling and pronuncia-of S. India, the rite is forbidden (Anuchitraniṣṇa, v. 26). The cases mentioned by Teixeira below, and in the Lettres Édifiantes, occurred at Tanjore and Madura. A (Maharatta) Brahman at Tanjore told one of the present writers that he had to perform commemorative funeral rites for his grandfather and grandmother on the same day, and this indicated that his grandmother had been a sati.

The practice has prevailed in various regions besides India. Thus it seems to have been an early custom among the heathen Russians, or at least among nations on the Volga called Russians by Mayūdi and Ibn Fozlān. Herodotus (Bk. v. ch. 5) describes it among certain tribes of Thracians. It was in vogue in Tonga and the Fiji Islands. It has prevailed in the island of Bali within our own time, though there accompanying Hindu rites, and perhaps of Hindu origin,—certainly modified by Hindu influence. A full account of Suttee as practised in those Malay Islands will be found in Zollinger's account of the Religion of Sassak in J. Ind. Arch. ii. 166; also see Friedrich's Bali as in note preceding. [A large number of references to Suttee are collected in Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 198 seqq.]

In Diodorus we have a long account of the rivalry as to which of the two wives of Kēteus, a leader of the Indian contingent in the army of Eumenes, should perform suttee. One is rejected as with child. The history of the other terminates thus:

B.C. 317.—“Finally, having taken leave of those of the household, she was set upon the pyre by her own brother, and was regarded with wonder by the crowd that had run together to the spectacle, and heroically ended her life; the whole force with their arms thrice marching round the pyre before it was kindled. But she, laying herself beside her husband, and even at the violence of the flame giving utterance to no unbecoming cry, stirred pity indeed in others of the spectators, and in some excess of eulogy; not but what there were some of the Greeks present who reprobated such rites as barbarous and cruel. . . .”—Diocl. Sic. Biblioth. xix. 33-31.

c. B.C. 30.

“Felix Eois lux funeris una maritis
Quos Aurora suis rubra colorat equis; Namque ubi mortifero jacta est fax ultima lecto
Uxorum fuscis stat pia turba comis;
Et certamen habet luctu, quoque viva sequatur
Conjugium; pudor est non licuisse mori.

Ardent viatrices; et flammæ pectora præobant,

Imponuntque suis ora porusta viris.”

Propertius, Lib. iii. xiii. 15-22.

c. B.C. 20.—“Ho (Aristobulus) says that he had heard from some persons of wives burning themselves voluntarily with their deceased husbands, and that those women who refused to submit to this custom were disgraced.”—Strabo, xv. 62 (E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer, iii. 112).

A.D. c. 390.—“Indi, ut omnes fero barbari uxores plurimas habent. Apud eos lex est, ut uxor carissima cum defuncto marito cremetur. Hæc igitur contendunt inter se de amore viri, et ambitio summa certantium est, ac testimonium castitatis, dignam morte decerni. Itaque viatrix in habitu ornatuque pristino juxta cadaver accubat, amplexans illud et deusculans et supposito igne prudentia laude contemnens.”—St. Jerome, Advers. Jovinianum, in ed. Vallart, ii. 311.

c. 531.—“All the Indians burn their dead. Serendib is the furthest out of the islands dependent upon India. Sometimes when they burn the body of a King, his wives cast themselves on the pile, and burn with him; but it is at their choice to abstain.”—Reinard, Relation, &c. i. 50.

c. 1200.—“Hearing the Raja was dead, the Parmari became a sati:—dying she said—‘The son of the Jadvant will rule the country, may my blessing be on him!’—Chand Bardai, in Ind. Ant. i. 227. We cannot be sure that sati is in the original, as this is a condensed version by Mr. Beames.

1293.—“Many of the women also, when their husbands die and are placed on the pile to be burnt, do burn themselves along with the bodies.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1322.—“The idolaters of this realm have one detestable custom (that I must mention). For when any man dies they burn him; and if he leave a wife they burn her alive with him, saying that she ought to go and keep her husband company in the other world. But if the woman have sons by her husband she may abide with them, as she will.”—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., i. 79.

Also in Zampa or Champa: “When a married man dies in this country his body is burned, and his living wife along with it. For they say that she should go to keep company with her husband in the other world also.”—Ibid. 97.

c. 1323.—“In this India, on the death of a noble, or of any people of substance, their bodies are burned; and also their wives follow them alive to the fire, and for the sake of worldly glory, and for the love of their husbands, and for eternal life, burn along with them, with as much joy as if they were going to be wedded. And those who do this have the higher repute for virtue and perfection among the rest."—Fr. Jordans, 20.

c. 1343.—"The burning of the wife after the death of her husband is an act among the Indians recommended, but not obligatory. If a widow burns herself, the members of the family get the glory thereof, and the fame of fidelity in fulfilling their duties. She who does not give herself up to the flames puts on coarse raiment and abides with her kindred, wretched and despised for having failed in duty. But she is not compelled to burn herself." (There follows an interesting account of instances witnessed by the traveller.)—Ibn Batuta, ii. 133.

c. 1330.—"In Media vero India mortui comburantur, cumque his, ut plurimum vivas uxores . . . una pluresve, prout fuit matrimonii conventio. Prior ex lege uritur, etiam quae unica est. Sumuntur autem et aliae uxores quaedam eo pacto, ut morte futurus sua exornent, isque haud parvis apud eos honores ducitur . . . submissa igne uxor ornatori cultu inter tubas tibicinasque et cantus, et ipsa pallentia more alacris rogi magno comitatu cirent. Adstat interea et sacerdos . . . hortando suadens. Cum circumierit fila saepius ignem prope suggestum consistit, vestesque oxuens, loto do more prius corpore, tum sindonem albam induta, ad exhortationem deantis in ignem prosilit."—N. Conti, in Poggius de l'ur. Fort. iv.

c. 1520.—"There are in this Kingdom (the Deccan) many heathen, natives of the country, whose custom it is that when they die they are burnt, and their wives along with them; and if these will not do it they remain in disgrace with all their kindred. And as it happens oft times that they are unwilling to do it, their Bramin kinsfolk persuade them thereto, and thus in order that such a fine custom should not be broken and fall into oblivion."—Sommario de' Genti, in Ramusio, i. f. 329.

"In this country of Camboja . . . when the King dies, the lords voluntarily burn themselves, and so do the King's wives at the same time, and so also do other women on the death of their husbands."—Ibid. f. 336.

1522.—"They told us that in Java Major it was the custom, when one of the chief men died, to burn his body; and then his principal wife, adorned with garlands of flowers, has herself carried in a chair by four men . . . comforting her relations, who are afflicted because she is going to burn herself with the corpse of her husband . . . saying to them, 'I am going this evening to sup with my dear husband and to sleep with him this night.' . . . After again consoling them (she) casts herself into the fire and is burned. If she did not do this she would not be looked upon as an honourable woman, nor as a faithful wife."—Pignatelli, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., 151.

c. 1666.—Cesare Federici notices the rite as peculiar to the Kingdom of "Deccan" (see BISHNAGAR): "vidi cose strane e bestiali di quella gentilità; v'ano prima-mento abbruscicare i corpi morti così d'huomini como di donne nobili; e si l'huomo è maritato, la moglie è obligata ad abbruscicarsi viva col corpo del marito."—Orig. ed. p. 38. This traveller gives a good account of a Suttee.

1593.—"In the interior of Hindustan it is the custom when a husband dies, for his widow willingly and cheerfully to cast herself into the flames (of the funeral pile), although she may not have lived happily with him. Occasionally love of life holds her back, and then her husband's relations assemble, light the pile, and place her upon it, thinking that they thereby preserve the honour and character of the family. But since the country had come under the rule of his gracious Majesty [Akbar], inspectors had been appointed in every city and district, who were to watch carefully over these two cases, to discriminate between them, and to prevent any woman being forcibly burnt."—Ibn'l Faiz, Akbar Nāmah, in Elliot, vi. 69.

1593.—"Among other sights I saw one I may note as wonderful. When I landed (at Negapatnam) from the vessel, I saw a pit full of kindled charcoal; and at that moment a young and beautiful woman was brought by her people on a litter, with a great company of other women, friends of hers, with great festivity, she holding a mirror in her left hand, and a lemon in her right hand. . . . —and so forth."—G. Balli, f. 82c. 53.

1596.—"The custom of the country (Java) is, that whosoever the King doeth die, they take the body so dead and burn it, and preserve the ashes of him, and within five dayes next after, the wives of the said King so dead, according to the custome and use of their country, every one of them goe together to a place appointed, and the chiefs of the women which was nearest to him in accompt, hath a ball in her hand, and throweth it from her, and the place where the ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turne their faces to the Eastward, and every one with a dagger in their hand (which dagger they call a crise (see CREASE), and is as sharpe as a razor), stab themselves in their owne blood, and fall a-grouneling on their faces, and so ende their dayes."—T. Candish, in Hall, iv. 333. This passage refers to Blambangan at the east end of Java, which till a late date was subject to Bali, in which such practices have continued to our day. It seems probable that the Hindu rito here came in contact with the old Polynesian practices of a like kind, which prevailed e.g. in Fiji, quite recently. The narrative referred to below under 1633, where the victims were the slaves of a deceased queen, points to the latter origin. W. Humboldt thus alludes to similar passages in old Javanese literature: "Thus we may reckon as one of the finest episodes in the Brata Yuda, the story how Satya Wati, when she had sought out her slain husband among the wide-spread heap of corpses on the battlefield, stabs herself by his side with a dagger."—Kawi-Sprache, i. 89 (and see the whole section, pp. 87-95).

[c. 1590.—“When he (the Rajah of Asham) dies, his principal attendants of both sexes voluntarily bury themselves alive in his grave.”—Asiatic Researches, ii. 118.]

1593.—The usual account is given by Linschoten, ch. xxxvii., with a plate; [Hak. Soc. i. 219].

[c. 1610.—See an account in Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 391.]

1611.—“When I was in India, on the death of the Naigue (see NAIKE) of Maduré, a country situated between that of Malabar and that of Choromandel, 100 wives of his burned themselves along with him.”—Travels, i. 9.

c. 1620.—“The author . . . when in the territory of the Karnatik . . . arrived in company with his father at the city of Southern Muthura (Madura), where, after a few days, the ruler died and went to hell. The chief had 700 wives, and they all throw themselves at the same time into the fire.”—Muhammad Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 139.

1623.—“When I asked further if force was ever used in these cases, they told me that usually it was not so, but only at times among persons of quality, when some one had left a young and handsome widow, and there was a risk either of her desiring to marry again (which they consider a great scandal) or of a worse mishap,—in such a case the relations of her husband, if they were very strict, would compel her, even against her will, to burn . . . a barbarous and cruel law indeed! But in short, as regarded Gineama, no one exercised either compulsion or persuasion; and she did the thing of her own free choice; both her husband and herself exulting in it, as in an act magnanimous (which in sooth it was) and held in high honour among them. And when I asked about the ornaments and flowers that she wore, they told me this was customary as a sign of the joyousness of the Masti (Masti is what they call a woman who gives herself up to be burnt upon the death of her husband).”—P. della Valle, ii. 671; [Hak. Soc. ii. 275, and see ii. 286 seq.].

1633.—“The same day, about noon, the queen's body was burnt without the city, with two and twenty of her female slaves; and we consider ourselves bound to render an exact account of the barbarous ceremonies practised in this place on such occasions as we were witness to. . . .”—Narrative of a Dutch Mission to Bali, quoted by Crauford, H. of Ind. Arch., ii. 211-253, from Preest. It is very interesting, but too long for extract.

c. 1650.—“They say that when a woman becomes a Sutte, that is burns herself with the deceased, the Almighty pardons all the sins committed by the wife and husband and that they remain a long time in paradise; nay if the husband were in the infernal regions, the wife by this means draws him from thence and takes him to paradise. . . . Moreover the Sutte, in a future birth, returns not to the female sex . . . but she who becomes not a Sutte, and passes her life in widowhood, is never emancipated from the female state. . . . It is however criminal to force a woman into the fire, and equally to prevent her who voluntarily devotes herself.”—Dabistan, ii. 75-76.

c. 1650-60.—Tavernier gives a full account of the different manners of Sutte, which he had witnessed often, and in various parts of India, but does not use the word. We extract the following:

c. 1618.—“ . . . there fell of a sudden so violent a Shower, that the Priests, willing to get out of the Rain, thrust the Woman all along into the Fire. But the Shower was so vehement, and endured so long, that the Fire was quenched, and the Woman was not burnt. About midnight she arose, and went and knock'd at one of her Kinsmen's Houses, whose Father Zeon and many Hollanders saw her, looking so sadly and grimly, that it was enough to have scared them; however the pain she endured did not so far terrify her, but that three days after, accompanied by her Kindred, she went and was burnt according to her first intention.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 81; [ed. Bull, i. 219].

Again:

“In most places upon the Coast of Coromandel, the Women are not burnt with their deceased Husbands, but they are buried alive with them in holes, which the Bramins make a foot deeper than the tallness of the man and woman. Usually they choose a sandy place; so that when the man and woman are both let down together, all the Company with Baskets of Sand fill up the hole above half a foot higher than the surface of the ground, after which they jump and dance upon it, till they believe the woman to be still'd.”—Ibid. 171; [ed. Bull, ii. 210].

c. 1667.—Bernier also has several highly interesting pages on this subject, in his “Letter written to M. Chapelan, sent from Chiruz in Persia.” We extract a few sentences: “Concerning the Women that have actually burnt themselves, I have so often been present at such dreadful spectacles, that at length I could endure no more to see it, and I retain still some horror when I think on't. . . . The Pile of Wood was presently all on fire, because stores of Oil and Butter had been thrown upon it, and I saw at the time through the flames that the Fire took hold of the Cloaths of the Woman. . . . All this I saw, but observed not that the Woman was at all disturbed; yea it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce with great force these two words, Pie, Pie, to signify, according to the Opinion of those who hold the Soul's Transmigration, that this was the 5th time she had burnt herself with the same Husband, and that there remain'd but two times for perfection; as if she had at that time this Remembrance, or some Prophetic Spirit.”—E.T. p. 99; [ed. Constable, 306 seq.].

1677.—Suttee, described by A. Bussing, in Valentin v. (Ceylon) 300.

1713.—“Co fut cotto année de 1710, quo mourut le Prince de Marava, Agé de plus de quatre-vingt-ans; ses femmes, on nombre de quarante sept, se brûlèrent avec le corps du Prince. . . .” (details follow). — Père Martin (of the Madura Mission), in Lett. Edif. ed. 1781, tom. xii., pp. 123 & 77.

1727.—“I have seen several burned several Ways. . . . I heard a Story of a Lady that had received Addresses from a Gentleman who afterwards deserted her, and her Relations died shortly after the Marriage . . . and as the Fire was well kindled . . . she espied her former Admirer, and beckned him to come to her. When he came she took him in her Arms, as if she had a Mind to embrace him; but being stronger than he, she carried him into the Flames in her Arms, where they were both consumed, with the Corps of her Husband.” — J. Hamilton, i. 278; [ed. 1711, i. 280].

“The Country about (Calcutta) being overspread with Paganism, the Custom of Wives burning themselves with their deceased Husbands, is also practised here. Before the Mughal's War, Mr. Channock went one time with his Ordinary Guard of Soldiers, to see a young Widow act that tragical Catastrophe, but he was so smitten with the Widow's Beauty, that he sent his Guards to take her by Force from her Executioner, and conducted her to his own Lodgings. They lived lovingly many Years, and had several Children, at length she died, after he had settled in Calcutta, but instead of converting her to Christianity, she made him a Proselyte to Paganism, and the only part of Christianity that was remarkable in him, was burying her decently, and he built a Tomb over her, where all his Life after her Death, he kept the anniversary Day of her Death by sacrificing a Cock on her Tomb, after the Pagan Manner.” — Ibid. [ed. 1711, ii. 6-7. [With this compare the curious lines described as an Epitaph on “Joseph Townsend, Pilot of the Ganges” (5 ser. Notes & Queries, i. 186 sq.).]

1771.—“Here (in Bali) not only women often kill themselves, or burn with their deceased husbands, but men also burn in honour of their deceased masters.” — Forster, V. to N. Guinea, 170.

1787.—“Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed the suttee (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed. . . .” — Sir C. Malet, in Parly. Papers of 1821, p. 1 (“Hindoo Widows”).

“My Father, said he (Pundit Rhadacant), died at the age of one hundred years, and my mother, who was eighty years old, became a sati, and burned herself to expiate sins.” — Lettor of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 120.

1792.—“In the course of my endeavours I found the poor suttee had no relations at Poonah.” — Lettor from Sir C. Malet, in Forster, Or. Mem. ii. 391; [2nd ed. ii. 28, and see i. 178, in which the previous passage is quoted].

1803.—“These proceedings (Hindu marriage ceremonies in Guzerat) take place in the presence of a Brahmin. . . . And farther, now the young woman vows that her affections shall be fixed upon her Lord alone, not only in all this life, but will follow in death, or to the next, that she will die, that she may burn with him, through as many transmigrations as shall secure their joint immortal bliss. Seven successions of suttees (a woman seven times born and burning, thus, as often) secure to the loving couple a seat among the gods.” — R. Drummond.

1809.—

“O sight of misery!
You cannot hear her cries . . . their sound
In that wild dissonance is drowned; . . .

But in her face you see
The supplication and the agony . . .
See in her swelling throat the desperate strength

That with vain effort struggles yet for life;

Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,

Now wildly at full length,
Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread, . . .

They force her on, they bind her to the dead.”

Kekama, i. 12.

In all the poem and its copious notes, the word suttee does not occur.

[1815.—“In reference to this mark of strong attachment (of Sati for Siva), a Hindoo widow burning with her husband on the funeral pile is called suttee.” — Ward, Hindoos, 2nd ed. ii. 25.]

1828.—“After having bathed in the river, the widow lighted a brand, walked round the pile, set it on fire, and then mounted cheerfully: the flame caught and blazed up instantly; she sat down, placing the head of the corpse on her lap, and repeated several times the usual form, ‘Ram, Ram, Suttee; Ram, Ram, Suttee.’” — Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 91-92.

1829.—“Regulation XVII.

“A REGULATION for declaring the practice of Suttee, or of burning or burying alive the widows of Hindoos, illegal, and punishable by the Criminal Courts.” — Passed by the G. G. in C., Dec. 4.

1839.—“Have you yet heard in England of the horrors that took place at the funeral of that wretched old Runjeet Singh? Four wives, and seven slave-girls were burnt with him; not a word of remonstrance from the British Government.” — Letters from Madras, 278.

1843.—“It is lamentable to think how long after our power was firmly established in Bengal, we, grossly neglecting the first and plainest duty of the civil magistrate, suffered the practices of infanticide and suttee to continue unchecked.” — Macaulay's Speech on Gates of Sonmauh.

1856.—“The pile of the sutes is unusually large; heavy cart-wheels are placed upon it, to which her limbs are bound, or sometimes a canopy of massive logs is raised above it, to crush her by its fall. . . . It is a fatal omen to hear the sutes's groan; therefore as the fire springs up from the pile, there rises simultaneously with it a deafening shout of ‘Victory to Umbá! Victory to Ranchor!’ and the horn and the hard rattling drum sound their loudest, until the sacrifice is consumed.”—Rds Malá, ii. 435; [ed. 1878, p. 691].

[1870.—A case in this year is recorded by Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.]

1871.—“Our bridal finery of dress and feast too often proves to be no better than the Hindu woman's ‘bravery,’ when she comes to perform suttee.”—Cornhill Mag. vol. xxiv. 675.

1872.—“La coutume du suicide de la Satl n'en est pas moins fort ancienne, puisque déjà les Grecs d'Alexandre la trouvèrent en usage chez un peuple au moins du Ponjâb. Le premier témoignage brahmanique qu'on en trouve est celui de la Brihaddevatâ qui, peut-être, remonte tout aussi haut. A l'origine elle paraît avoir été propre à l'aristocratie militaire.”—Barth, Les Religions de l'Inde, 89.

SWALLOW, SWALLOE, s. The old trade-name of the sea-slug, or tripang (q.v.). It is a corruption of the Bugi (Makassar) name of the creature, suwala (see Crawford's Malay Dict.; [Scott, Malayan Words, 107]).

1783.—“I have been told by several Buggesses that they sail in their Padunkans to the northern parts of New Holland . . . to gather Swallow (Biche de Mer), which they sell to the annual China junk at Macassar.”—Forrest, V. to Meryu, 83.

SWALLY, SWALLY ROADS, SWALLY MARINE, SWALLY HOLE, n.p. Suwali, the once familiar name of the roadstead north of the mouth of the Tapti, where ships for Surat usually anchored, and discharged or took in cargo. It was perhaps Ar. sawâhil, ‘the shores’ (?). [Others suggest Skt. Sivâlâya, ‘abode of Siva.’]

[1615.—“The Osiander proving so leaky through the worm through the foulness of the sea-water at Sually.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 22. Also see Birdwood, Report on Old Recs. 209.]

1623.—“At the beach there was no kind of vehicle to be found; so the Captain went on foot to a town about a mile distant called Sohali. . . . The Franks have houses there for the goods which they continually despatch for embarkation.”—J. deltu Valle, ii. 603.

1675.—“As also passing by . . . eight ships riding at Surat River's Mouth, we then came to Swally Marine, where were lying the Colours of the Three Nations, English, French, and Dutch . . . who here land and ship off all Goods, without molestation.”—Fryer, 82.

1677.—“The 22d of February 1677 from Swally hole the Ship was despatched alone.”—Ibid. 217.

1690.—“In a little time we happily arriv'd at Sualybar, and the Tide serving, came to an Anchor very near the Shoar.”—Ovington, 163.

1727.—“One Season the English had eight good large Ships riding at Swally . . . The Place where all Goods were unloaded from the Shipping, and all Goods for Exportation were there shipp'd off.”—A. Hamilton, i. 166; [ed. 1744].

1841.—“These are sometimes called the inner and the outer sands of Swallow, and are both dry at low water.”—Horsburgh's India Directory, ed. 1841, i. 474.

SWAMY, SAMMY, s. This word is a corruption of Skt. sudmin, ‘Lord.’ It is especially used in S. India, in two senses: (a) a Hindu idol, especially applied to those of Siva or Subramanyam; especially, as Sammy, in the dialect of the British soldier. This comes from the usual Tamil pronunciation sâmi. (b) The Skt. word is used by Hindus as a term of respectful address, especially to Brahmins.

a.—

1755.—“Towards the upper end there is a dark repository, where they keep their Swamme, that is their chief god.”—Ives, 70.

1794.—“The gold might for us as well have been worshipped in the shape of a Sawmy at Juggernaut.”—The Indian Observer, p. 187.

1838.—“The Government lately presented a shawl to a Hindu idol, and the Government officer . . . was ordered to superintend the delivery of it . . . so he went with the shawl in his tonjon, and told the Bramins that they might come and take it, for that he would not touch it with his fingers to present it to a Swamy.”—Letters from Madras, 183.

b.—

1516.—“These people are commonly called Jogues (see JOGEE), and in their own speech they are called Zoame, which means Servant of God.”—Darbois, 99.

1615.—“Tunc ad suos conversus: Eia Brachmanes, inquit, quid vobis videtur? Illi mirabundi nihil præter Suami, Suami, id est Domine, Domine, retulerunt.”—Jarrie, Thes., i. 664.

SWAMY-HOUSE, SAMMY-HOUSE, s. An idol-temple, or pagoda. The Sammy-house of the Delhi ridge in 1837 will not soon be forgotten.

1760.—"The French cavalry were advancing before their infantry; and it was the intention of Colliard that his own should wait until they came in a line with the flank fire of the field-pieces of the Swamy-house." Oran, iii. 113.

1829.—"Here too was a little detached Swamee-house (or chapel) with a lamp burning before a little idol."—Mem. of Col. Molesworth, 193.

1857.—"We met Wilby at the advanced post, the 'Sammy House,' within 600 yards of the bastion. It was a curious place for three brothers to meet in. The view was charming. Delhi is as green as an emerald just now, and the Jumna, Muhi and Pichwa are beautiful objects, though held by Indians."—Letter written during the Siege of Delhi, by Henry Grenfell, p. 112.

[SWAMY JEWELRY, s. A kind of gold and silver jewelry, made chiefly at Trichinopoly, in European shapes covered with grotesque mythological figures.

1880.—"In the characteristic Swami work of the Madras Presidency the ornamentation consists of figures of the Puranic gods in high relief, either fastened on to the surface, or adhered to it, whether by soldering, or welding, or screwing them on."—Buddhist in India, 132.]

SWAMY-PAGODA, s. A coin formerly current at Madras; probably so called from the figure of an idol on it. Milburn gives 100 Swamy Pagodas = 110 Star Pagodas. A "three swami pagoda" was a name given to a gold coin bearing on the obverse the effigy of Chenna Keswami Swami (a title of Krishna) and on the reverse Lakshmi and Rukmini (C.P.B.).

SWATCH, s. This is a marine term which probably has various applications beyond Indian limits. But the only two instances of its application are both Indian, viz. "the Swatch of No Ground," or elliptically "The Swatch," marked in all the charts just off the Ganges Delta, and a space bearing the same name, and probably produced by analogous tidal action, off the Indus Delta. [The word is not to be found in Smyth, Sailor's Word-book.]

1726.—In Valentijn's first map of Bengal, though no name is applied there is a space marked "no ground with 60 raam (fathoms) of line."

1863.—(Ganges). "There is still one other phenomenon, . . . This is the existence of a great depression, or hole, in the middle of the Bay of Bengal, known in the charts as the 'Swatch of No Ground.'"—Ferguson, on Recent Changes in the Delta of the Ganges, Q. Jour. Geol. Soc., Aug. 1863.

1877.—(Andam). "This is the famous Swatch of no ground where the land falls at once into 250 fathoms."—Burt's, Sea and Beach, 21.

(1878.—"Ho (Capt. Lloyd, in 1840) describes the remarkable phenomenon at the head of the Bay of Bengal, similar to that reported by Captain Selby off the mouth of the Indus, called 'the Swatch of no ground.' It is a deep channel, open to seaward and very steep on the north-west side, with no soundings at 220 fathoms."—Monkton, Mem. of Indian Service, 21.]

[SWEET APPLE, s. An Anglo-Indian corruption of Alphonso, the fruit of Sitka, the Musk Melon, Pe. Poliana. Cucurbita melon (see CUSTAARD-APPLE).

SWEET OLEANDER, s. This is in fact the common oleander, Nerium oleander, Ait.

1820.—"Nothing is more charming than, even in the upland valleys of the Mahratta country, to come out of a wood of all cultivated trees and flowers suddenly on the dry winter hill-side to see a mountain stream, grown along the banks, or on the little islets of verdure in mid (shingle) stream, with clumps of mixed timber and lovely blooming oleander."—Simcox, MSS.

SWEET POTATO, s. The root of Eschscholzia, Choisy (Convolvulus Eschscholzi, L.), N.O. Convolvaceae; a very palatable vegetable, grown in most parts of India. Though extensively cultivated in America, and in the W. Indies, it has been alleged in various books (e.g. in Eng. Cyclop., Nat. Hist. Section, and in Drury's Useful Plants of India) that the plant is a native of the Malay islands. The Eng. Cyc. even states that batatas is the Malay name. But the whole allegation is probably founded in error. The Malay names of the plant, as given by Crawford, are Kudak, Ubi Jawa, and Ubi Kudila, the last two names meaning 'Java yam,' and 'Spanish yam,' and indicating the foreign origin of the vegetable. In India, at least in the Bengal Presidency, natives commonly call it shakar-kand, P.—Ar., literally 'sugar-candy,' a name equally suggesting that it is not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement :

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spaguola and in the others . . . and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a marchpane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. . . . When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one; for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit."—In Ramuzo, iii. f. 131.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Kun-chu (the first syllable = 'sweet'). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-45), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l'origine américaine."

The "Sanskrit name" Ruktalo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Ala is properly an esculent Arum, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Ruktala, more commonly rat-dālā, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rakt- or rat-dālā means simply 'red potato'; a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan. There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the potato, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of brazil-wood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the 'potato' of the fourth and others of the following quotations. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 117 seqq.]

1519.—"At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batata, pigno (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness. . . ."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of . . ., p. 43.

1510.—"The root which among the Indians of Spaguola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomè (C. Verde group) called Iguame, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e. the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branchlets; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of San Tomè under the Equinoctial, Ravanna, i. 117.

c. 1550.—"They have two other sorts of roots, one called batata. . . . They generate windiness, and are commonly cooked in the embers. Some say they taste like almond cakes, or sugared chestnuts; but in my opinion chestnuts, even without sugar, are better."—Girol. Bencon, Hak. Soc. 86.

1588.—"Wee met with sixteen or seventeen sayles of Canoes full of Saueges, who came off to Sea unto us, and brought with them in their Boates, Plantans, Cocos, Potato-roots, and fresh fish."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candlish, Purchas, i. 66.

1600.—"The Battatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like *Yam*us (see YAM), and taste like Earth-nuts."—In Purchas, ii. 937.

1615.—"I took a garden this day, and planted it with Pottatos brought from the Liquea, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a day, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cock's Diary, i. 11.

1615.—". . . pattato; c'est une racine comme naucaux, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tres-bon goust, mais si l'on en mange souvent, ello degoute fort, et est assez ventouse."—Mucquel, Voyages, 83.

1781.—
"There lot Potatos mantle o'er the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Granger, Bk. iv.

SYCE, s. Hind. from Ar. sūs. A groom. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz. ghoridwālā (see GORAWALLAH). The Ar. verb, of which sūs is the participle, seems to be a loan-word from Syriac, sūsī, 'to coax.'

[1759.—In list of servants' wages: "Syce, Rs. 2."—In Long, 182.]

1779.—"The bearer and scise, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Ducaroll. I took hold of Mr. Sheo and carried him up. The bearer and scise took Mr. Ducaroll out. Mr. Keoble was standing on his own house looking, and asked, 'What is the matter!'

The bearer and scise said to Mr. Keeble, "These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out."—Evidence on Trial of Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 230.

1810.—"The Syce, or groom, attends but one horse."—Williamson, V.M. i. 254.

c. 1858 :—

"Tandis que les çais veillent les chiens rodeurs."

Lecote de Lisle.

SYCEE, s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.). The origin of the name is said to be si (pron. at Canton sai and sei) = sz, i.e. 'fine silk'; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads. [Linschoten (1598) speaks of: "Peeces of cut silver, in which sort they pay and receive all their money" (Hak. Soc. i. 132).]

1711.—"Formerly they used to sell for Sisee, or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter'd."—Lockyer, 135.

SYRAS, CYRUS. See under CYRUS.

SYRIAM, n.p. A place on the Pegu R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-lyeng, but probably the Talaing name was nearer that which foreigners give it. [See Burma Gazetteer, ii. 672. Mr. St John (J. R. As. Soc., 1894, p. 151) suggests the Mvra word sarany or siring, 'a swinging cradle.'] Syriam was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587.—"To Cirion a Port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woollen Cloth, Scarlets, Velvets, Opium, and such like."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 393.

1600.—"I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fifteene dayes arrived at Sirian the chiefe Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Rueres set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now overwhelmed with ruines of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the wayes and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of carckasses prohibith the way and passage of ships."—The Jesuit Andreas Bures, in Purchas ii. 1748.

c. 1608.—"Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serido), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom of Pegu, and with the ports of Martavan, Tavay, Tenasserim, and Juncelon. . . . Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coromandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian."—Boatrow, 135.

1695.—"9th. That the Old house and Ground at Syrian, formerly belonging to the English Company, may still be continued to them, and that they may have liberty of building dwelling-houses, and warehouses, for the securing their Goods, as shall be necessary, and that more Ground be given them, if what they formerly had be not sufficient." Petition presented to the K. of Burma at Ava, by Ed. Fleetwood, in Dalrymple, O.R. ii. 374.

1728.—Zierjang (Syriam) in Valentijn, Choro., &c., 127.

1727.—"About 60 Miles to the Eastward of China Backnar (see CHINA-BUCKER) is the Bar of Syrian, the only port now open for Trade in all the Pegu Dominions. . . . It was many Years in Possession of the Portuguez, till by their Insolence and Pride they were obliged to quit it."—A. Hamilton, ii. 31-32; [ed. 1744].

SYUD, s. Ar. saiyid, 'a lord.' The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed. But the usage of Saiyid and Sharif varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia. ["As a rule (much disputed) the Sayyid is a descendant from Mahommed through his grandchild Hasan, and is a man of the pen; whereas the Sharif derives from Husayn and is a man of the sword" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 209).]

1404.—"On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahomad."—Clavijo, § cxiv. (Murkam, p. 141-2).

1869.—"Il y a dans l'Inde quatre classes de musulmans: les Saiyids ou descendants de Mahomet par Hucain, les Schailhs ou Arabes, nommés vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afgans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune fourni à la religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent désignés par ces dénominations, et par d'autres spécialement consacrées à chacune d'elles, telles que Mir pour les Saiyids, Khan pour les Pathans, Mirza, Bey, Agâ, et Khetja pour les Mogols."—Garcin de Tassy, Religion Mus. dans l'Inde, 22.

(The learned author is mistaken here in supposing that the obsolete term Moor was in India specially applied to Arabs. It was applied, following Portuguese custom, to all Mahomedans.)

T

TABASHEER, s. 'Sugar of Bamboo.' A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as medicine, [also known in India as Bān-lochan or Bānshupār]. The word is Pers. tabshīr, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, trākshīra, and lavakk-shīra. The substance is often confounded, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spodium and is sometimes called ipodio di canna. See Ges. Fulcrici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 seqq.). [See SUGAR.]

c. 1150.—"Tanah (miswritten Banah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe . . . Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le . . . kana et le . . . tabshīr . . . Quant au tébachir, on le fabrique en le mélangeant avec du lin coudre d'ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu'on extrait des racines du ro-can dit . . . al Sharki."—Elrisi, i. 179.

1533.—"And much less are the roots of the cane tabaxir; so that according to both the translations Avicenna is wrong; and Averrois says that it is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal."—Garcia, f. 195c.

c. 1570.—"Il Spodio si congela d'acqua in alcune canne, e io n'ho trovato assai nel Perù quando faceno fabricar la mia casa."—Ges. Fulcrici, in Itanium, iii. 397.

1578.—"The Spodium or Tabaxir of the Persians . . . was not known to the Greeks."—Icosta, 295.

c. 1580.—"Spodium Tabaxir vocant, quo nomine vulgus pharmacopocorum Spodium facilius, quippe metallicum, intelligunt. At eruditiores viri eo nomine lacrymam quandam, ex caudice arboris proceras in India nascentis, albicantem, odoratam, facultatis refrigeratorioe, et cor maxime roborantis itidem intelligunt."—Prosper Alpinius, Rerum Egyptianarum, lib. III. vii.

1598.—". . . these Mambus have a certain Matter within them, which is (as it were) the pith of it . . . the Indians call it Sugar Mambu, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mambu, and is a very deep Medicinable thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabians, Persians, and Moores, that call it Tabaxir."—Linschoten, p. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 66].

1837.—"Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccharum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccharum, or the substance known by this name to the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer. . . . Considering that this substance is pure siles, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of πρὶ Σακχαρὸν μέλιτος."—Royle on the Ant. of Hindoo Medicine, p. 53. This confirms the views expressed in the article SUGAR.

1851.—"In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a starchy secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries."—Engl. Cycl. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

TABBY, s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabi, Ital. tabino, Fr. tabis, from Ar. attābi, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Bagdad called al-attābiya; and this derived its name from a prince of the 'Omāiyad family called Attāb. [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 371.]

12th cent.—"The Attābiya . . . here are made the stuffs, called Attābiya, which are silk and cottons of divers colours."—Ibn Jubair, p. 227.

[c. 1220.—"Attābi." See under SUG-LAT.]

TABOOT, s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahomedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kербela, which is carried in procession during the Moharram (see Herklots, 2nd ed. 119 seqq., and Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. dans l'Inde, 36). [The word is Ar. tabūt, 'a wooden box, coffin.' The term used in N. India is ta'ziya (see TAZEEA).]

[1859.—"There is generally over the vault in which the corpse is deposited an oblong monument of stone or brick (called 'tarkobah') or wood (in which case it is called 'taboot')."—Lane, Med. Egypt., 6th ed. i. 299.]

[TACK-RAVAN, s. A litter carried on men's shoulders, used only by royal personages. It is Pers. takht-ravān, 'travelling-throne.' In the Hindi of Behar the word is corrupted into tartarudin.

[c. 1660.—". . . several articles of Chinese and Javan workmanship; among which were a patky and a tack-ravan, or travelling throne, of exquisite beauty, and much admired."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 123; in 370, tack-ravan.

[1753.—"Mahommed Shah, emperor of Hindostan, seated in a royal litter (takht ravan, which signifies a moving throne) issued from his camp. . . ."—Hanway, iv. 169.]

TAEI, s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz., $\frac{1}{16}$ of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called "the ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or tai is, according to Dr. Wells Williams, = 579.84 grs. troy. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tsien, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tai used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 8d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review puts it at 5s. 7½d. (Sept. p. 362); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13, 1885, was 4s. 9½d.; [on Oct. 3, 1901, 2s. 7½d.]. The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tahil is the name of a weight; and this again, as Crawford indicates, is probably from the India tola (q.v.). [Mr. Pringle writes: "Sir H. Yule does not refer to such forms as tahs (see below), taies (plural in Fryer's New Account, p. 210, sub Machavo), Taye (see quotation below from Saris), tayes (see quotation below from Mocquet), or taey, and taeys (Philip's translation of Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 149). These probably come through the medium of the Portuguese, in which the final l of the singular tai is changed into s in the plural. Such a form as taies might easily suggest a singular wanting the final s, and from such a singular French and English plurals of the ordinary type would in turn be fashioned" (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 126).]

The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels=1 catty, 100 catties=1 pecul=133½ lbs. avoird. Milburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copings (see KOPANG)=1 mace, 5 mace=1 mayum, 16 mayum=

1 tale (see TAEI), 5 tales=1 buncal, 20 buncals=1 catty, 200 catties=1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as=2 lbs. 1 oz. 13 dr. Of these names, mace, tale and bahar (q.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, mayum, bangkul, and kati Malay.

1540.—"And those three junks which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (taeis), which are in our money 300,000 crucados, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598.—"A Tael is a full ounce and a half Portugale weight."—Linschoten, 41; [Hak. Soc. i. 119].

1599.—"Est et ponderis genus, quod Tael vocant in Malacca. Tael unum in Malacca pendet 10 massas."—De Bry, ii. 61.

"Four hundred cashes make a coeypan (see KOPANG). Four coeypans are one mas. Four masses make a Perdao (= PAEDAO). Four Perdaes make a Tayel."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 123.

c. 1603.—"Bezar stones are thus bought by the Taile . . . which is one Ounce, and the third part English."—Saris, in do., 392.

1613.—"A Taye is five shilling sterling."—Saris, in do. 369.

TAHSEELDAR, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (tahsil, conf. Pergunnah, Talook) of a district (see ZILLAH). Hind. from Pers. tahsilddr, and that from Ar. tahsil, 'collection.' This is a term of the Mahommedan administration which we have adopted. It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cashier-keeper in a firm or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.

[Possibly there was a confusion with lakshildar, 'a cashier.']

[1772.—"Tahsildar, or Sekant, an officer employed for a monthly salary to collect the revenues."—Glossary, in Verelst, King of Bengal, &c.]

1799.—" . . . Ho (Tippoo) divided his country into 37 Provinces under Dowans (see DEWAUN) . . . and he subdivided these again into 1025 inferior districts, having each a Tahsildar."—Letter of Munro, in Life, i. 215.

TAILOR-BIRD, s. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together "one leaf or more, generally two leaves, on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after putting the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it" (Jordan). It is Orthotomus longicauda, Gmelin (sub-fam. Dryocinidae).

[1813.—"Equally curious in the structure of its nest, and far superior (to the baya) in the variety and elegance of its plumage, is the tailor-bird of Hindostan" (here follows a description of its nest).—Forbes, Or. Men., 2nd ed. i. 33.]

1883.—"Clear and loud above all . . . sounds the to-who, to-who, to-who of the tailor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrious spouse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the durree, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very doorstep, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little tailors."—Tribes on My Frontier, 115.

TAJ, s. Pers. tāj, 'a crown.' The most famous and beautiful mausoleum in Asia; the Tāj Mahal at Agra, erected by Shāh Jahān over the burial-place of his favourite wife Mumtāz-i-Mahal ('Ornament of the Palace') Banū Begam.

1663.—"I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Ellar, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Tāj Mehal, which I am now going to describe to you . . . judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Tāj-Mehale, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Indianism; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 91-96; [ed. Constable, 293].

1665.—"Of all the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Chah-Jehan is the most magnificent; she caus'd it to be set up on purpose near the Taj-mahal, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Tajmahal [! Tāj-i-mukām, 'Place of the Tāj'] is a great Bazar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass'd with Portico's; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. . . . The monument of this Bynum or Sultana, stands on the East side of the City. . . . I saw the beginning and completion of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 50; [ed. Bell, i. 109].

1856.—
"But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, Seen from old Agra's towering battlement,
And mirrored clear in Jumna's silent stream;
Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem
Set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon
Dims the white marble with a softer light, Like some queneed maiden, veiled in dainty hue,
And waiting for her bridegroom, stately,
pale,
But yet trans-cendent in her loveliness."
The Banyan Tree.

TALAING, n.p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternately conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Mān or Mān (see MONE).

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay On the History of Pegu (J. As. Soc. Beng., vol. xlii. Pt. i.): "The names given in the histories of Tha-htun and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin . . . may be recognised as Karnáta, Kalinga, Venga and Vizianagaram . . . probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar. . . . The word Talingana never occurs in the Peguan histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33). "The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rámanya by settlers from Talingana, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talaing, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmese and all peoples of the west. But the Peguans call themselves by a different name . . . Mun, Mun, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talaing archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view. He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of 18th century) the name Talaing was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, and that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talaing' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of their Burmese conqueror. They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatised them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. 'Talaing means' (in the Mun language) 'one who is trodden under foot, a slave.' . . . Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substituting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talaing' and 'Telingana' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological . . . from the resemblance . . . must necessarily be void ab initio" (Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, Pt. ii. pp. 11-12, Rangoon, 1884).

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied. But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talaing earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talaing literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof. Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talaing or Mun people with the so-called Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one. (Mr. Baines notes coincidences between the Mou and Munda languages, and accepts the connection of Talaing with Telinga (Census Report, 1891, i. p. 129).]

1795.—"The present King of the Birmans . . . has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Tallens, or native Peguers. Justice is now impartially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Tallen, consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

TALAPOIN, s. A word used by the Portuguese, and after them by French and other Continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the expression is obscure. M. de la Moignon, in his Desc. du Royaume Thai ou Siam (ii. 23) says: "Les Européens les ont appelés talapoin, probablement du nom de l'éventail qu'ils tiennent à la main, lequel s'appelle talapat, qui signifie feuille de palmier." Childers gives Talapannam, Pali, 'a leaf used in writing, &c.' This at first sight seems to have nothing to support it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by Koeppen (Rel. des Buddhas, i. 331 note), and by Bishop Bigandet (J. Ind. Archip. iv. 220). [Others, however, derive it from Peguan Talapoim, tala (not tila), 'lord,' poim, 'wealth.']

c. 1818.—"A certain priest or Talapoia conceived an inordinate affection for a garment of an elegant shape, which he possessed, and which he diligently preserved to prevent its wearing out. He died without correcting his irregular affection, and immediately becoming a louse, took up his abode in his favourite garment."—Singer-mano, p. 20.

1880.—"The Phongyias (Poongees), or Buddhist Monks, sometimes called Talapoins, a name given to them, and introduced into Europe by the Portuguese, from their carrying a fan formed of tila-pat, or palm-leaves."—Sing. Rev., Feb. 21, p. 266, quoting Hp. Bigandet.

TALEE, s. Tam. tali. A small trinket of gold which is fastened by a string round the neck of a married woman in S. India. It may be a curious question whether the word may not be an adaptation from the Ar. talhil, "qui signifie proprement: prononcer la formule lā idha illā 'lilh. ... Cette formule, écrite sur un morceau de papier, servait d'amulette ... le tout était renfermé dans un étui auquel on donnait le nom de talhil" (Dozy & Engelmann, 346). These Mahomedan talhils were worn by a band, and were the origin of the Span. word tali, "a baldric." [But the talee is a Hindu, not a Mahomedan ornament, and there seems no doubt that it takes its name from Skt. tāla, 'the palmyra' (see TALIPOT), it being the original practice for women to wear this leaf dipped in saffron-water (Mad. Gloss, s.v. Logan, Malabar, i. 134.) The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogerius, but the custom is alluded to by early writers, e.g. Gouvea, Synodo, f. 43v.

1651.—"So the Bridegroom takes this Tali, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogerius, 45.

1672.—"Among some of the Christians there is also an evil custom, that they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage bond, allow the Bridegroom to tie a Tali or little band round the Bride's neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that it is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Baldarus, Zeyton (German), 408.

1674.—"The bridegroom attaches to the neck of the bride a line from which hang three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods: and this they call Tale; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1704.—"Praeterea, quum moris hujus Regionis sit, ut infantes sex vel septem annorum, interdum etiam in teneriori aetate, ex genitorum consensu, matrimonium indissolubile de praesenti contrahant, per impositionem Tali, seu aureae tesserae nuptialis, uxoris collo pensilis: missionarius mandamus ne hujusmodi irrita matrimonia inter Christianos fieri permittant."—*Decree of Card. [1800.—"In every village a particular officer, called Tallari, keeps watch at night, and is answerable for all that may be stolen."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 3.]

TALIPOT, s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Corypha umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tāla-pattra, Hind. tālpāt, 'leaf of the tāla tree,' properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, &c. See OLLAH, PALMYRA, TALAPOIN. Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common. The quotation from Jordanus, though using no name, refers to this tree. [Arrian says: "These trees were called in Indian speech tala, and there grew on them, as there grows at the tops of the palm-trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool" (Indika, vii).]

c. 1328.—"In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordanus, 29-30.

c. 1430.—"These leaves are used in this country for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: "There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write."—N. Conti, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672.—"Talpets or sunshades."—Baldarus, Dutch ed., 102.

1681.—"There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is Talipot. . . ."—Knox, 15.

"They (the priests) have the honour of carrying the Talipot with the broad end over their heads foremost; which none but the King does."—Ibid. 74. [See TALAPOIN.]

1803.—"The talipot tree . . . affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-coat tree would be in this. A leaf of the talipot-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. iii. 15.

1874.—“... dans les embrasures ...
 s'élevaient des bananiers, des talipots. ...”
 —États, Souvenirs d'un Conquérant, ch. iv.

1881.—“The lofty head of the talipot palm ... the proud queen of the tribe in Ceylon, towers above the scrub on every side. Its trunk is perfectly straight and white, like a slender marble column, and often more than 100 feet high. Each of the fans that compose the crown of leaves covers a semicircle of from 12 to 16 feet radius, a surface of 150 to 200 square feet.”—Hueclit's Visit to Ceylon, F.T. p. 122.

TALISMAN, s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahommedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Ar. term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. talimāna, ‘disciples, students’? [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ix. 165.] On this Prof. Robertson Smith writes: “I have got some fresh light on your Talisman.
 “W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alkoran, published (1615) along with the Mohammedia Impetrata, and Arabian Trudy-mum, has the following, quoted from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: ‘Hæc precatio (the fatihā) illis est communis ut nobis dominica: et ita quilibet dum ad battologiam usque recitatur ut centies idem, aut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Al-hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, et cetera ejus vocabula eodem modo. Idque facit in publicâ oratione Taalima, id est sacrificulus, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut en repetitione suppleat eorum erroribus ... Quidam medio in campo tam assidue, ut defessi conditant; alii circumgirando corpus,’ etc.

“Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seem to be tālīmā, ‘a very learned man.’ This, owing to the influence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time tālīmā is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talimā, a shortened form, recognised by Jawhari, and other lexicographers, of talāmīdh, ‘disciples.’ That students should turn a penny by saying prayers for others is very natural.” This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

1471.—“In questa città è una fessa d’acqua nel modo di una fontana, la qual’ è guardata da quelli suoi Thalassimani, cioè protti; quest’ acqua dicono che ha gran virtù contra la lebra, e contra lo canelotto.”—Giosafte Barbaro, in Itanuso, ii. f. 107.

TALOOK, s. This word, Ar. ta'alluk, from root 'alaḡ, 'to hang or depend,' has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a district, presided over as regards revenue matters by a tahseeldar. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of proprietary land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zemindaries, and sometimes subordinate to or dependent on Zemindars. In the N.W. Prov. and Oudh the ta'alluk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors, one being superior, the other inferior (see TALOOKDAR). Ta'alluk is also used in Hind. for 'department' of administration.

1835.—"In October, 1779, the Dacca Council were greatly disturbed in their minds by the appearance amongst them of John Doe, who was then still in his prime. One Chundermonee deomised to John Doe and his assigns certain lands in the pergunna Buller . . . whereupon George III., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, commanded the Sheriff of Calcutta to give John Doe possession. At this Mr. Shakspeare burst into fury, and in language which must have surprised John Doe, proposed 'that a seawal be appointed for the collection of Patparrah Talook, with directions to pay the same into Buller's cutcherry.'"—Sir J. Stephen, Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 159-60. A sawal is "an officer specially appointed to collect the revenue of an estate, from the management of which the owner or farmer has been removed."—(Wilson).

TALOOKDĀR, s. Hind. from Pers. ta'alluddār, 'the holder of a ta'alluk' (see TALOOK) in either of the senses of that word; i.e. either a Government officer collecting the revenue of a ta'alluk (though in this sense it is probably now obsolete everywhere), or the holder of an estate so designated. The famous Talookdars of Oudh are large landowners, possessing both villages of which they are sole proprietors, and other villages, in which there are subordinate holders, in which the Talookdar is only the superior proprietor (see Carnegie, Kachari Technicalities).

[1769.—". . . inticements are frequently employed by the Talookdars to augment the concourse to their lands."—Verelst, Vico of Dengal, App. 233. In his Glossary he defines "Talookdar, the Zemeen-dar of a small district."]

TAMARIND, s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamarindus indica, L., N.O. Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa. The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar. tamar-w'l-Hind, 'date of India,' or perhaps rather in Persian form, tamar-i-Hind. It is possible that the original name may have been thamar, 'fruit' of India, rather than tamar, 'date.'

1293.—"When they have taken a merchant vessel, they force the merchants to swallow a stuff called Tamarindi, mixed in sea-water, which produces a violent purging."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 383.

c. 1335.—"L'arbre appelé hammar, c'est à dire al-tamar-al-Hindi, est un arbre sauvage qui couvre les montagnes."—Masalik-al-abgar, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 175.

1563.—"It is called in Malabar puti, and in Guzerat ambli, and this is the name they have among all the other people of this India; and the Arab calls it tamarindi, because tamar, as you well know, is our tamar, or, as the Castilians say, datil [i.e. date], so that tamarindi are 'dates of India'; and this was because the Arabs could not think of a name more appropriate on account of its having stones inside, and not because either the tree or the fruit had any resemblance."—Garcia, f. 200. [Puli is the Malayāli name; ambili is probably Hind. ambli, Skt. ambika, 'the Tamarind.']

c. 1550.—"In febris vord pestilentibus, atque omnibus aliis ex putridis, oxurontibus, aquam, in qua multa copia Tamarindorum infusa fuerit cum saccharo exhibant."—Prosper Alpinus (De Plantis Aegypti) ed. Lugd. Bat. 1735, ii. 20.

1582.—"They have a great store of Tamarindos. . . ."—Castañeda, by N.L. f. 91.

[1598.—"Tamarinde is by the Egyptians called Dereh-side (qu. dār-al-sayyid, 'Our Lady's tree'?)."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 121.]

1611.—"That wood which we cut for firewood did all hang traced with eods of greene fruit (as big as a Bean-cod in England) called Tamerim; it hath a very soure tast, and by the Apothecaries is held good against the Scurvie."—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 277.

[1623.—"Tamarinds, which the Indians call Huabele" (mali, as in quotation from Garcia above).—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 92.]

1820.—"A singularly beautiful Tamarind tree (over the most graceful, and amongst the most magnificent of trees). . . ."—Miss. of Col. Mountain, 93.

1877.—"The natives have a saying that sleeping beneath the 'Date of Hind' gives you fever, which you cure by sleeping under a nia tree (Melia azadirachta), the lilac of Persia."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 92. The nia (see NEEMI) (pare (Capt. Burton) is not the 'lilac of Persia' (see BUCKYNE). The prejudice against encamping or sleeping under a tamarind tree is general in India. But, curiously, Bp. Pallegoix speaks of it as the practice of the Siamese "to rest and play under the beneficent shade of the Tamarind."—(Desc. du Royaume Siam ou Siam, i. 136).

TAMARIND-FISH, s. This is an excellent rest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in tamarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short, and in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:—

"The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seir fish (see SEER-FISH), and from the Latesculatifer, known as Cockup in Calcutta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polynemus (or Rou-bail, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish. The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Cochin. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar

I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

TAMBERANEE, s. Malayāli, tamburān, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Saiva monks in the Tamil countries. [The word is derived from Mal. tam, 'one's own,' purān, 'lord.' The junior male members of the Malayāli Rāja's family, until they come of age, are called Tambān, and after that Tamburān. The female members are similarly styled Tambatti and Tamburatti (Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.).]

1510.—"Dico l'altro Tamarai: zoo Per Dio! L'altro respōdo Tamarani: zoo Per Dio."—Varthema, ed. 1517, f. 15.

[c. 1610.—"They (the Nairs) call the King in their language Tambiraine, meaning 'God.'"—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 357.]

TANA, TANNA, n.p. Thāna, a town on the Island of Salsette on the strait ('River of Tann') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 m. N.E. of Bombay, and in the early Middle Ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see CONCAN), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1020.—"From Dhār southwards to the river Nerbudda, nine; thence to Mahrades. . . eighteen; thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasang."—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 60.

[c. 1160.—"Tanah," un-written Banah. See under TABASHEER.]

1203.—"Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the West. . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 27.

1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supera (Supara)."—Letter of Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

c. 1323.—"And having thus embarked I passed over in 23 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom. . . The land is under the dominion of the Saracens. . . ."—Fr. Odoric, Ibid. i. 67-68.

1516.—"25 leagues further on the coast is a fortress of the before-named king, called Tana-Mayambu" (this is perhaps rather Bombay).—Barbosa, 68.

1529.—"And because the norwest winds blew strong, winds contrary to his course, after going a little way he turned and anchored in sight of the island, where were stationed the foists with their captain-in-chief Aliva, who seeing our fleet in motion put on his oars and assembled at the River of Tana, and when the wind came round our fleet made sail, and anchored at the mouth of the River of Tana, for the wind would not allow of its entering."—Correa, iii. 290.

1673.—"The Chief City of this Island is called Tanaw; in which are Seven Churches and Colleges, the chiefest one of the Paulistines (see PAULIST). . . Here are made good Stuffs of Silk and Cotton."—Fryer, 73.

TANA, THANA, s. A Police station. Hind. thāna, thānā, [Skt. sthāna, 'a place of standing, a post']. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

c. 1640-50.—"Thānah means a corps of cavalry, matchlockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thānah, and to despatch provisions (rasud, see RUSSUD) to the next Thānah."—Pāṇishāh nāmāh, quoted by Blockmann, in Asiā, i. 345.

TANADAR, THANADAR, s. The chief of a police station (see TANA), Hind. thānadār. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516.—In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e. 1516), the King Don Manoel constitutes João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa.—Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 5, 1-3.

1519.—"Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tanadar of this Isle of Tygoari (i.e. Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will now encharge you with."—Ibid., p. 35.

c. 1548.—"In Agraci is a great mosque (mezquita), which is occupied by the tenadars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain pelayas (yards) in which dade (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness."—Tombos in Subsídios, 216.

1602.—"So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his bastard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabul), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . .—Couto, IV. i. 9.

[1813.—"The third in succession was a Tandar, or petty officer of a district. . . ."]
—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 5.]

TANGA, s. Mahr. tānk, Turki tanga. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkestan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 74d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanka is of Chagatai Turki origin, being derived from tang, which in that language means 'white' (H. of Baber and Humayun, i. 546). Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Barbaro, who says this, viz. that certain silver coins are called by the Mingrelians tetari, by the Greeks aspri, by the Turks alcha, and by the Zagatais tengh, all of which words in the respective languages signify 'white.' We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambéry or of Pavet de Courteille;—the latter only having tangah, 'fer-blanc.' And the obvious derivation is the Skt. ṭāṇka, 'a weight (of silver) equal to 4 māshas . . . a stamped coin.' The word in the forms ṭākā (see TUCKA) and tanga (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, "in all dialects, laxly used for money in general" (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmūd of Ghaznī, A.H. 418-419 (A.D. 1027-28), we find on the Skt. legend of the reverse the word tanka in correspondence with the dirham of the Ar. obverse (see Thomas, Pathan Kings, p. 49). Tanka or Tanga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the rupee (q.v.) of later days. In fact this application of the word in the form ṭākā (see TUCKA) is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333-1313 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current a tanku or dinār of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver dinārs. These silver dinārs (or rupees) are called by the author of the Maṣālik-ul-Abār (c. 1340) the "silver tanka of India." The gold and silver tanka continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Feroz Shāh, the son of Mahommed (1351-1389), and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Bahlol (1488-1517), we find black (or copper) tankas, of which 20 went to the old silver tanka. We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkestan.

But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Linchoten and Grose. Indeed the name still survives in Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tanga of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form dengi. See a quotation under COPECK, and compare PARDAO.

c. 1335.—"According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red luk (see LACK) contains 100,000 golden tankas, and the white luk 100,000 (silver) tankas. The golden tanka, called in this country the red bulāq, is equivalent to three mithālāt, and the silver tanka is equivalent to 8 hāshikāt dirhams, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirham current in Egypt and Syria."—Maṣālik-ul-Abār, in Not. et Extr. xiii. 211.

c. 1310.—"Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 6233 tankas, i.e. the equivalent of the 55,000 dinārs (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after of course deducting the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tanka is 2½ dinārs in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126. (Here the gold tanga is spoken of.)

c. 1370.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coin. There was the gold tanka, and the silver tanka." &c.—Tārīkh-i-Fīrūz Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 357.

1101.—"... vna sua moneda de plata que llaman Tangaes."—Clavijo, f. 406.

1516.—"... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a seanon (see PANAM) of Calicut, ... and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tanga, and they are of very fine silver."—Barbosa, 45.

[1519.—Rules regulating ferry-dues at Goa: "they may demand for this one tangua only."—Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 5, p. 18.]

c. 1511.—"Todar ... fixed first a golden ashrafi (see ASHRAFEE) at the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the thakkars to flock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay gradually fell to 5 tankas, till the fortress (Rohās) was completed."—Tārīkh-i-Khān-Jahān Lodi, in Elliot, v. 115 (These are the Bahlol or Sikandari tankas of copper, as are also those in the next quotation from Elliot.)

1559.—"The old Muscovite money is not round but oblong or egg-shaped, and is called denga. ... 100 of these coins make a Hungarian gold-piece, 6 dengas make an alon; 20 a grjva, 100 a pollina; and 200 a ruble."—Holberton, in Ramusio, n. f. 153v.

[1571.—"Gujarati tankas at 100 tankas to the rupee. At the present time the rupee is fixed at 10 dinārs. ... As the current value of the tankas of Pattan, etc., was less than that of Gujarat."—Mirāt-i-Albani, in Bayley, Gujarat, pp. 6, 11.

[1591.—"Dingoes." See under RUBLE.]

1592-3.—"At the present time, namely, A.D. 1002, Hindustan contains 3200 towns, and upon each town are dependent 200, 500, 1000, or 1500 villages. The whole yields a revenue of 610 liors (see GRORE) murāddi tankas."—Tuhfat-i-Albani, in Elliot, v. 186.

1593.—"There is also a kind of reckoning of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling, five Tangas is one ParDAO (see PARDAO), or Xeraphin badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde, for four Tangas good money are as much as five Tangas badde money."—Linchoten, ch. 35, [Hak. Soc. i. 211].

[c. 1610.—"The silver money of Goa is perlos, larins, Tangues, the last named worth 7-ols, 6 deniers a piece."—Pyramid de Lavat, Hak. Soc. ii. 69.]

1615.—"Their moneye in Persia of silver, are the ... the rest of copper, like the Tangas and Piros (see PIGE) of India."—Richard Steele, in Purchas, f. 513.

[c. 1630.—"There he expended fifty thousand Crow (see GRORE) of tacks ... sometimes twenty tack make one Roopoe."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 61.]

1673.—"Tango." See under REAS.

[1638.—"Their (at Surat) ordinary way of accounting is by lacs, each of which is worth 100,000 ropias (see RUPEE), and 100 lacs make a crow, or carroa (see GRORE), and 10 carroas make an Arab. A Thiel (see TOLA, TAEI) of silver (1 gold) makes 11, 12, or 13 royas ready money. A massa (mishā) and a half make a Thiel of silver, 10 whereof make a Thiel of gold. They call their brass and copper-money Tacques.—Mandelslo, 107.]

c. 1750-60.—“Throughout Malabar and Goa, they use tangas, vintins, and Pardoo (see PARDAO) xeraphin.”—Grose, i. 283. The Goa tanga was worth 60 reis, that of Ormus 62 $\frac{2}{3}$ to 69 $\frac{2}{3}$ reis.

[1753.—In Khiva “... Tongas, a small piece of copper, of which 1500 are equal to a ducat.”—Hamway, i. 351.]

1815.—“... one tungah ... a coin about the value of fivepence.”—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 250.

[1876.—“... it seemed strange to me to find that the Russian word for money, denga or dengi, in the form tenga, meant everywhere in Central Asia a coin of twenty kopeks. . . .”—Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 133.]

TANGUN, TANYAN, s. Hind. tānghān, tāngan; apparently from Tibetan rTānān, the vernacular name of this kind of horse (rTa, ‘horse’). The strong little pony of Bluthān and Tibet.

c. 1590.—“In the confines of Bengal, near Kach [-Bahār], another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gūā (see GOONT) and Turkish horses, and are called tānghān: they are strong and powerful.”—Am, i. 133.

1774.—“2d. That for the possession of the Chitthanotta Province, the Deb Raja shall pay an annual tribute of five Tangan Horses to the Honorable Company, which was the acknowledgment paid to the Deb Raja.”—Treaty of Peace between the H.E.I.C. and the Rajah of Bhojan, in Atchison's Treaties, i. 144.

“We were provided with two tangan ponies of a mean appearance, and were prejudiced against them unjustly. On better acquaintance they turned out patient, sure-footed, and could climb the Monument.”—Bogle's Narrative, in Markham, 17.

1780.—“... had purchased 35 Jhawah or young elephants, of 8 or 9 years old, 80 Tankun, or ponies of Manila and Pegu.”—H. of Hydr Nait, 383.

“... small horses brought from the mountains on the eastern side of Bengal. These horses are called tanyans, and are mostly pyebald.”—Hodges, Travels, 31.

1782.—“To be sold, a Phaeton, in good condition, with a pair of young Tanyan Horses, well broke.”—India Gazette, Oct. 26.

1793.—“As to the Tanguns or Tanyans, so much esteemed in India for their hardiness, they come entirely from the Upper Tibet, and notwithstanding their make, are so sure footed that the people of Nepal ride them without fear over very steep mountains, and along the brink of the deepest precipices.”—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 135.

1851.—“These animals, called Tanghan, are wonderfully strong and enduring; they are never shod, and the hoof often cracks. . . . The Tibetans give the foals of value messes of pig's blood and raw liver, which they devour greedily, and it is said to strengthen them wonderfully; the custom is, I believe, general in Central Asia.”—Hooter, Himalayan Journals, 1st ed. ii. 131.

TANJORE, n.p. A city and District of S. India; properly Tānjāvūr (‘Low Town’), so written in the inscription on the great Tanjore Pagoda (11th century). [The Madras Manual gives two derivations: “Tānjāvūr, familiarly called Tānjai by the natives. It is more fully given as Tānjai-mānagaram, Tānjai's great city, after its founder. Tānjai means ‘refuge, shelter’” (ii. 216). The Gloss. gives Tānjāvūr, Tam. tañjam, ‘asylum,’ ār, ‘village.’]

[1816.—“The Tanjore Pill, it is said, is made use of with great success in India against the bite of mad dogs, and that of the most venomous serpents.”—Asiatic Journal, ii. 331.]

TANK, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word, Shakespear gives: “Tānkāh (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water.” [And so Platts.] Wilson gives: “Tānkey or tāken, Mahr. . . . Tānkāh (said to be Guzeratī). A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tānkā, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well.” R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzeratte, &c., gives: “Tanka (Mah.) and Tankoo (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick or lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses. . . . They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down.” . . . “In the towns of Bikaner,” says Tod, “most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tankas, filled by the rains” (Rajputana, ii. 202). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Mīdhrā, he says; “they collect the rain water in reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness" (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J.A.S.B. ix, pt. 2, 891), describing a journey in the Nerubudda Basin, cites the word, and notes: "I first heard this word used by a native in the Betool district; on asking him if at the top of Bowerguzh there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukla (stone and cement) for holding water." Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-1882, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: "These cisterns or wells are called by the people tinkas" (App. p. 12). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of the word, which may possibly be from Skt. tataga, tataga, tatika, 'a pond, pool, or tank.'

Fr. Paulino, on the other hand, says the word tangus used by the Portuguese in India was Portuguese corrolta, which is vague. But in fact tangue is a word which appears in all Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed could it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajpūtāna, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word. This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzerati and Mahratti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tink in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship. Indeed the Port. tangue is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagno, Fr. old estany and estan, mod. étang, Sp. tanque, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

1559.—"They had in them stanges or pondes of water full of fish of sundrie sortes."
—Parkes's Mendocin, Hak. Soc. ii. 46.

c. 1785.—

"I never drank the Muscovy stank, Castalia's burn and a' that;
But there it streams, and richly reams,
My Helicon I ca' that."—Burns.

It will be seen that Pymon de Laval uses étang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1193.—"And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their portraiture was in a divers kind, for their teeth were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tanque wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way."
—Relatório de Vasco da Gama, 57.

"So the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelho to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchediva) a building, a church of great ashlar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tanque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 1 fathom, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrio."
—Ibid. 95.

1510.—"Early in the morning the Pagan's go to wash at a tank, which tank is a pond of still water (—ol' uno Tancho il qual Tancho è una fossa d'acqua morta)."
—Vartheim, 119.

"Near to Calicut there is a temple in the midst of a tank, that is, in the middle of a pond of water."—Ibid. 175.

1553.—"In this place where the King (Bahādur Shāh) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tank (tanque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter's waters, they make these tanka (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big that many are more than a league in compass."
—Burrow, IV. vi. 6.

c. 1610.—"Son logis estoit cloigné près d'une lieue du palais Royal, situé sur un estang, et basty de pierres, ayant bien desmy lieues de tour, comme rous le virez autres estangs."—Pymon de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 262; [Hak. Soc. i. 367].

[1615.—"I rode early . . . to the tancko to take the ayre."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 78.]

1616.—"Besides their Rivers . . . they have many Ponds, which they call Tankeas."
—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1170.

1633.—"A very faire Tauko, which is a square pit paved with gray marble."—W. Bruton, in Hall, v. 60.

1618.—". . . a standing water or Tanck.
". . . Van Twist, Gen. Besch. 11.

1672.—"Outside and round about Suratte, there are elegant and delightful houses for recreation, and stately cemeteries in the usual fashion of the Moors, and also divers Tanks and reservoirs built of hard and solid stone."—Baldæus, p. 12.

1673.—"Within a square Court, to which a stately Gate-house makes a Passage, in the middle whereof a Tank vaulted. . . ."—Fryer, 27.

1754.—"The post in which the party intended to halt had formerly been one of those reservoirs of water called tanks, which occur so frequently in the arid plains of this country."—Orme, i. 351.

1799.—"One crop under a tank in Mysore or the Carnatic yields more than three here."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 241.

1809.—

"Water so cool and clear,
The peasants drink not from the humble well.

* * * * *

Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense
To those in towns who dwell,
The work of kings in their beneficence."

Kekama, xiii. 6.

1883.—". . . all through sheets* 124, 125, 126, and 131, the only drinking water is from 'tankas,' or from 'tols.' The former are circular pits puddled with clay, and covered in with wattle and daub domes, in the top of which are small trap doors, which are kept locked; in these the villages store rain-water; the latter are small and somewhat deep ponds dug in the valleys where the soil is clayey, and are filled by the rain; these latter of course do not last long, and then the inhabitants are entirely dependent on their tankas, whilst their cattle migrate to places where the well-water is fit for use."—Report on Cent. Ind. and Rajputana Topogr. Survey (Bickaneer and Jaisalmeer). By Major C. Strachan, R.E., in Report of the Survey in India, 1882-83, App. p. 4. [The writer in the Rajputana Gazetteer (Bikanir) (i. 182) calls these covered pits lund, and the simple excavations sār.]

TANOR, n.p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Tyndis of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin. [The name is Malayāḷ. Tānūr, tanui, the tree Terminalis bellerica, ār, village.]

1516.—"Further on . . . are two places of Moors 5 leagues from one another. One is called Paravanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from these towns is a lord to whom they belong, and he has many Nairs, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 153.

1521.—"Cotate was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who went to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and casks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, inasmuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian. . . ."—Correa, ii. 679.

1528.—"And in the year (A.H.) 935, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor. . . . Now the Ray of that place affording aid to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that chieftain having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks."—Tohfut-ul-Mujahideen, E.T. 124-125.

1553.—"For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochim after his victory over the Camorin, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter's vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Camorin by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal."—Burros, I. vii. 10.

1727.—"Four leagues more southerly is Tannore, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans."—A. Hamilton, i. 322; [ed. 1744].

TAPPAUL, s. The word used in S. India for 'post,' in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connection with the Fr. étape (which is the same originally as the Eng. staple). It is sometimes found in the end of the 18th century written tappa or tappy. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write tappā as a singular of tappālu, taking the latter for a plural (C.P.B.). Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the South and West, Mr. Beames assigns to it an Aryan origin: "tappā 'post-office,' i.e. place where

* These are sheets of the Atlas of India, within Bhawalpur and Jaisalmir, on the borders of Bikaner.

letters are stamped, tappal 'letter-post' (tappā + aya = 'stamping-house')," connecting it radically with tāpa 'a coop,' tāpāt 'to tap,' 'flatten,' 'beat down,' tāpāk 'a sledge hammer,' tāpāt 'to press,' &c. [with which Platts agrees.]

1799.—"You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tappal to Poona."—Wellington, i. 50.

1800.—"The Tappal does not go 30 miles a day."—T. Munro, in Lyr, i. 211.

1809.—"Requiring only two sets of bearers I knew I might go by tappal the whole way to Seringapatam."—Ld. Valentia, i. 35.

TAPTEE B., n.p. Tāpti; also called Tāpī, [Skt. Tāpī, 'that which is hot']. The river that runs by the city of Surat.

[1533.—"Tapi." See under GODAVERY.]

c. 1630.—"Surat is . . . watered with a sweet River named Tappes (or Tandis), as broad as the Thames at Windsor."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 36.

1813.—"The sacred groves of Pulparra are the general resort for all the Yogees (Jogees), Senascees (Sunyascees), and Hindoo pilgrims . . . the whole district is holy, and the Tappes in that part has more than common sanctity."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 285; [2nd ed. i. 181, and compare i. 176].

"Tappee or Tapty."—Ibid. 211; [2nd ed. i. 119].

TABA, TARE, s. The name of a small silver coin current in S. India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about 4½d., was a tari, generally considered to be a corruption of dirhem. I see Sir Walter Elliot has mooted this very question in his Coins of S. India (p. 138). [The word is certainly Mahyāl. tāram, defined in the Madras Gloss. as "a copper coin, value 1½ pias." Mr. Gray in his note to the passage from Pyrrard de Laval quoted below, suggests that it took its name from tārā, 'a star.'] 1112.—"They cast (at Vijayanagar), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the fanom, which they call tar."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XV. Cent. 26.

1506.—(The Viceroy, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet in Cochin). "As the people were numerous they made quite a big town with a number of houses covered with upper stories of timber, and streets also where the people of the country set up their stalls in which they sold plenty of victuals, and cheap. Thus for a vinton of silver you got in chango 20 silver coins that they called taras, something like the scale of a yardline, and for such coin they gave you 12 or 15 figs, or 4 or 5 eggs, and for a single vintem 3 or 4 fowls, and for one tara fish enough to fill two men's bellies, or rice enough for a day's victuals, dinner and supper too. Bread there was none, for there was no wheat except in the territory of the Moors."—Corra, i. 621.

1510.—The King of Nar-inga (or Vijayanagar) "counts a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go 16 to a fanom."—Larthen, 130.

[c. 1610.—"Each man receives four tarents, which are small silver coins, each of the value of one-sixteenth of a larin."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 311. Later on (i. 112) he says "16 tarens go to a Phanan".]

1673.—(at Calicut). "Their coin admits no Copper; Silver Tarra, 23 of which make a Pinan, passing instead thereof."—Fryer, 55.

" " Calicut.

"Tarra are the peculiar Coin, the rest are common to India."—Ibid. 207.

1727.—"Calicut . . . coins are 10 Tar to a Panam, 11 Panams to a Rupex."—J. Hamilton, ii. 318; [ed. 1711].

[1737.—"We are to allow each man 1 measures of rice and 1 tar per diem."—Agreement in Logan, Malabar, iii. 95, and see "tarris" in iii. 192. Mr. Logan (vol. iii. Gloss. s.v.) defines the tara as equal to 2 pias.]

TARE AND TRET. Whence comes this odd firm in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Ar. tarāḥa, 'to reject,' as pointed out by Daz. Tret is alleged to be from It. tritare, 'to crumble or grind,' perhaps rather from trito, 'ground or triturated.' [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives it from Fr. traité, 'a draught,' and that from Lat. tractus, trahere, 'to draw.']

TAREGA, s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the hong merchants of Canton in former days) in Pegu, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Tel. taraga, 'the occupation of a broker'; Tam. taragari, 'a broker.'

1568.—"Sono in Pegu otto sensari del Ro che si chiamano Tarego li quali sono obligati di far vendere tutto lo mercantio . . . per il prezzo corrente."—Ces. Falerici, in Rassano, lit. 395.

1593.—" . . . e so fosse alcuno che a tempo del pagamento per non pagar si absentasse dalla città, o si acondesse, il Tarrecà o obligato pagar per lui . . . i Tarrecà così si domandano i sensari."—U. Balbi, f. 107r, 103.

1597.—"There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tareghs, which are bound to sell your goods at the price they be Woorth, and you give them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your marchandise upon their word."—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 393.

TARIFF, s. This comes from Ar. tashrif, tashrif, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port, and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

[1591.—"So that helping your memorie with certain Tablii or Tariffas made of purpose to know the numbers of the soldiers that are to enter into ranks."—Garrand, Art Warre, p. 221 (Stanh. Dict.).

[1617.—" . . . a brief Tareg of Persia."—Burford, First Letter Boob, 162.]

TAROUK, TAROUP, n.p. Burm. Turuk, Turup. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Turuk-mau, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the Middle Ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsin; though the coupled names Turuk and Tart, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Turuk is a form of Türk, whilst Tart is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Turuk and Tart are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burma, pp. 8, 11, 56). [Mr. Scott (Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 193) suggests a connection with the Teru or Tero State, which developed about the 11th century, the race having been expelled from China in 778 A.D.]

TASHREEF, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "conferring honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, pre-enting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation" (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonious politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' 'to condescend to visit'—. The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement. In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1671.—"Ho (Lingay), nak of Poonamaleo had, he said, carried a tashariff to the English, and they had refused to take it. . . ."—Op. cit. i. 51.

1680.—"It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona being deceased), resolved Bera Pedda Vineatadry, do succeed and the Tashariffs be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlet to Pedda Vineatadry, and 2½ yards each to four others. . . .

"The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholly and would not eat because her husband had received no Tashariff, he also is Tashariff with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. Geo. Coasts, April 6. In Notes and Etc., Madras, 1873, p. 15.

1685.—"Gopall Pandit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue . . . that we may engage him . . . to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cuddalore) than we have as yet—It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tashariff as followeth" (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 119. [And see the same phrase in Pringle, Diary, &c., i. 1.]

TATTOO, and abbreviated, TAT, s. A native-bred pony. Hind. tattā, [which Platts connects with Skt. tara, 'passing over'].

c. 1321.—"Tughlak sent his son Mahommed to bring Khurā back. Mahommed seized the latter and brought him to his father mounted on a tatt, i.e. a pack-horse."—Asiatick Res., ii. 297.

1781.—"On their arrival at the Choultry they found a miserable display and 15 tattoo horses."—In S. A. K. R., i. 15.

1785.—"We also direct that strict injunction be given to the baggage department, for loading all the lean Tattoos, bullocks, &c., to grass, the rainy season being now at hand."—Tyler's Letters, 195.

1821.—"They can be got for 25 rupees each per annum upon an average; but, I believe, when they receive only this sum they better tattoos. . . . From 30 to 35 rupees each horse is the sum paid to the best tattoo men."—W. H. Jones, iii. 171.

1803.—"These tattoos are a breed of small ponies, and are the most useful and hardy little animals in India."—Bryce's Letters, 159, [i. 172, 117].

1810.—"Every servant . . . has a horse in the tattoo . . . which carries his baggage."—Williams, iii. 311.

1821.—"Tattoos. These are a kind of small, unshorn, and ill-looking ponies; but they are hardy and walk faster than oxen."—Asiatick Res., vi. 11.

1825.—" . . . when I mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen persons on my behalf, and to effect my other services."—Forbes's Memoirs, 21, [ed. 173, i. 25].

1850.—"When making our tats, we were in the habit of procuring honeycombs. . . ."
—Oriental Sport Magazine, i. 173, i. 337.]

c. 1831.—" . . . lean tattoo cat feet no longer do it table d'hôte arabes. . . ."
—Asiatick Res., vi. 317.

c. 1840.
"With its light horse patent axle, and its gentle honeycombed tats, And its ever jolly harness, which was always made by Watts. . . ."
—A few lines in honour of the late Mr. Smith, in Punch's Rule Book, 1851, ii. 215.

1853.—" . . . Smith's plucky proposal to run his noble tat, Pickles."—Outlook, i. 21.

1875.—"You young Gentlemen rode over on your tats, I suppose. The Subaltern's tat—that is the name, you know, they give to a pony in this country—is the most useful animal you can imagine."—The Informant, ch. ii.

TATTY, s. Hind. tatt and tati, [which Platts connects with Skt. tantra, 'a thread, the warp in a loom']. A screen or mat made of the roots of fragrant grass (see CUSCUS) with which door or window opening, are filled up in the season of hot wind. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also THERMANTIDOTE. The principle of the tatty is involved in the quotation from Dr. Fryer, though he does not mention the grass-mats.

c. 1645.—" . . . or having in lieu of Cellarage certain Kus-Kumats, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Reeds, that are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre . . . that in the servants may easily with their Persian bottles, water them from without."—Beaumont, B. T. 79, [ed. Constable, 217].

1673.—"They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together . . . repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloth, continually hanging before the chamber windows."—Fryer, 17.

1729.—"The introduction of tatties into Calcutta is mentioned in a letter from Dr. Campbell, dated May 10, 1729:—"We have had very hot winds and delightful cool breezes. Everglady use tatties now. . . . Tatties are however of no use when you are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."—In Oude G. O. d. B., i. 30.]

1803.—" . . . now, when the hot winds blow on them, and we are obliged to make use of tatties, a kind of screen made of the roots of a coarse grass called Kus."—Beaumont's Letters, 119; [ed. 172, p. 83].

1809.—"Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be in-sufferable, were it not for the tatties which are only applied to a house one story high."—Ed. Taylor, i. 101.

1810.—"During the hot winds tats (a kind of mat made of the root of the koo-a grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows."—Martin Graham, 125.

1811.—"Under the roof, throughout all the apartments, are iron rings, from which the tatties or screens of sweet scented grass, were suspended."—Fishes, Or. Men., iv. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 362].

1824.—"An early breakfast was over; the well watered tatties were applied to the windows, and diffused through the apartment a cool and refreshing atmosphere which was most comfortably contrasted with the white heat and roar of the fierce wind without."—The Kinsallash, l. ii.

TAUT, s. Hind. tat, [Skt. tantra, 'defence,' or tantri, 'made of threads'], Sackcloth.

[c. 1810.—"In this district (Dinajpoor) large quantities of this cloth (Tat or Choti) are made. . . ."
—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 551.]

1820.—" . . . made into coarse cloth taut, by the Brinjaries and people who use pack bullocks for making bags (gonies, see GUNNY) for holding grain, &c."—Tr. Bo. Lit. Soc. iii. 211.

TAVOY, n.p. A town and district of what we call the Tenasserim Province of B. Burma. The Burmese call it Dha-wei; but our name is probably adopted from a Malay form. The original name is supposed to be Siamese. [The Burmah Gazetteer (ii. 681) gives the choice of three etymologies. 'landing place of bamboos'; from its name (dha, 'a sword,' wei, 'to buy'); from Ita-way, taken from a cross-legged Buddha.]

1553.—"The greater part of this tract is mountainous, and inhabited by the nation of Burawads and Jangonats, who interpose on the east of this kingdom (Pegu) between it and the great kingdom of Siam; which kingdom of Siam borders the sea from the city of Tavoy downwards."—Burmes, III. iii. 4.

1553.—"Also some of the rich people in a place subject to the Kingdom of Pegu, called Tavay, where is produced a quantity of what they call in their language Cahua, but which in our language is called Cahua (see CALAY), in summer leave their houses and go into the country, where they make some sheds to cover them, and there they stop three months, leaving their usual dwellings with food in them for the devil, and thus they do in order that in the other nine months he may give them no trouble, but rather be propitious and favourable to them."—G. Halli, i. 125.

1557.—"... Island of Tavi, from which cometh great store of Tinne which serveth all India."—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 395.

1695.—"10th. That your Majesty, of your wonted favour and charity to all distresses, would be pleased to look with Eyes of Pity, upon the poor English Captive, Thomas Brivene, who is the only one surviving of four that were accidentally drove into Tauwy by Storm, as they were going for Atchen about 10 years ago, in the service of the English Company."—Petition to the King of Britain, presented at Ava by Edward Fletwood, in Darymple, Or. Report. ii. 371.

[TAWEEZ, s. Ar. ta-wi-z, lit. 'praying for protection by invoking God, or by uttering a charm'; then 'an amulet or phylactery'; and, as in the quotation from Herklots, 'a structure of brick or stone-work over a tomb.']

[1819.—"The Jemidar . . . as he is very superstitious, all his stud have turweez or charms. . . ."—Lt.-Col. Fitzclarence, Journal of a Route across India, 141.

[1520.—"Let her who doth this Taweez wear, Guard against the Gossain's snare," Pandurang Hari, ed. 1573, l. 143.

[1532.—"The generality of people have tombs made of mud or stone . . . forming first three square taweezes or platforms. . . ."—Herklots, Quintessence of Islam, 2nd ed. 231.]

[TAZEE, s. Pers. tdzi, 'invading, invader,' from tdz, 'running.' A favourite variety of horse, usually of Indian breed. The word is also used of a variety of greyhound.

[c. 1549.—"Horses have been divided into seven classes. . . . Arabs, Persian horses, Mujunias, Turki horses, Yabuz (see YABOO) and Janglah horses. . . . The last two classes are also mostly Indian breed. The best kind is called Tazi. . . ."—Id., i. 231-5.

[1552.—"A good breed of the Indian kind, called Tauzee, is also found in Bamoo and Dumam. . . ."—Elphinstone, Cashmir, ed. 1812, l. 129.

[1553.—"The 'Tazies,' or greyhounds are not looked upon as unclean. . . ."—Wills, Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 564.]

TAZEEA, n. A.—P.—H. ta-zee-a, 'mourning for the dead.' In India the word is applied to the taboot, or representation, in clumsy material, of the tombs of Hussein and Hassan which are carried about in the Muharram (see MOHURRUM) processions. In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season. At the close of the procession the ta-zee-a must be thrown into water; if there be no sufficient mass of water they should be buried. [See Sir L. Pelly, The Miracle Play of Hasan and Hussein.] The word has been carried to the W. Indies by the coolies, whose great festival (whether they be Mahomedans or Hindus) the Muharram has become. And the attempt to carry the Tazeeas through one of the towns of Trinidad, in spite of orders to the contrary, led in the end of 1884 to a sad catastrophe. [Mahomedan Lascars have an annual celebration at the London Docks.]

1509.—"There were more than a hundred Taziyas, each followed by a long train of Fuqueers, dressed in the most extravagant manner, beating their breasts . . . such of the Mahratta Sirdars as are not Brahmins frequently construct Taziyas at their own tents, and expend large sums of money upon them."—Broughton, Letters, 72; [ed. 1892, 53].

1869. — "En lisant la description . . . de ces fêtes on croira souvent qu'il s'agit de fêtes hindous. Telle est par exemple la solennité du ta'zia ou deuil, établie en commémoration du martyre de Hûcain, laquelle est semblable en bien de points à celle du Durga-pujâ. . . . Le ta'ziya dure dix jours comme le Durga-pujâ. Le dixième jour, les Hindous précipitent dans la rivière la statue de la déesse au milieu d'une foule immense, avec un grand appareil et au son de mille instruments de musique; la même chose a lieu pour les représentations du tombeau de Hûcain."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. p. 11.

TEA, s. Crawford alleges that we got this word in its various European forms from the Malay Té, the Chinese name being Chhá. The latter is indeed the pronunciation attached, when reading in the 'mandarin dialect,' to the character representing the tea-plant, and is the form which has accompanied the knowledge of tea to India, Persia, Portugal, Greece (τράν) and Russia. But though it may be probable that Té, like several other names of articles of trade, may have come to us through the Malay, the word is, not the less, originally Chinese, Té (or Tay as Medhurst writes it) being the utterance attached to the character in the Fuh-kien dialect. The original pronunciation, whether direct from Fuh-kien or through the Malay, accompanied the introduction of tea to England as well as other countries of Western Europe. This is shown by several couplets in Pope, e.g.

1711.—

" . . . There stands a structure of majestic frame

Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name.

Here thou, great ANNA, whom three Realms obey, Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes tea."

Rape of the Lock, iii.

Here tuy was evidently the pronunciation, as in Fuh-kien. The Rape of the Lock was published in 1711. In Gray's Trivia, published in 1720, we find tea rhyme to pay, in a passage needless to quote (ii. 206). Fifty years later there seems no room for doubt that the pronunciation had changed to that now in use, as is shown by Johnson's extemporised verses (c. 1770):

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear,
That thou wilt give to me
With cream and sugar soften'd well, Another dish of tea"—and so on.

Johnsoniana, ed. Boswell, 1835, ix. 194.

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea,
And in the house of Mrs. F."

The Trial of Sarah, &c.

[But the two forms of pronunciation seem to have been in use earlier, as appears from the following advertisement in The Gazette of Sept. 9, 1658 (quoted in 8 ser. N. & Q. vi. 266): "That excellent, and by all Physicians approved, China Drink, called by the Chimeans Toha, by other nations Tay, alias Tee, is sold at the Sultanness Head, a coffee house in Sweetings Rents by the Royal Exchange, London." And in Zedler's Lexicon (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or Tau, but pronounce it Tiy, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation. ["Strange to say, the Italians, however, have two names for tea, cia and te, the latter, of course, is from the Chinese word te, noticed above, while the former is derived from the word ch'u. It is curious to note in this connection that an early mention, if not the first notice, of the word in English is under the form cha (in an English Glossary of A.D. 1671); we are also told that it was once spelt tcha—both evidently derived from the Cantonese form of the word: but 13 years later we have the word derived from the Fokienese te, but borrowed through the French and spelt as in the latter language the; the next change in the word is early in the following century when it drops the French spelling and adopts the present form of tea, though the Fokienese pronunciation, which the French still retain, is not dropped for the modern pronunciation of the now wholly Anglicised word tea till comparatively lately. It will thus be seen that we, like the Italians, might have had two forms of the word, had we not discarded the first, which seemed to have made but little lodgement with us, for the second" (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 583 seq.).]

Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Rh-yu, which is believed to date long before our era, under the names Kia and K'u-tu (K'u=‘bitter’), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th century A.D. describes it, adding “From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage” (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13). But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the T'ang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the next century, in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea, but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shāh Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-21).^{*} The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio's (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigazioni e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommed, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chai-Catai (i.e. Pers. Chai-i-Khitāi, ‘Tea of China’), concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendocça on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below. Milburn gives some curious extracts from the E.I. Co.'s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, 1666, June 30, among certain “varieties,” chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

^{*} Mr. Major, in his Introduction to Parke's Mendocça for the Hak Soc. says of this embassy, that at their halt in the desert 12 marches from Sh-chau, they were regaled “with a variety of strong liquors, together with a pot of Chinese tea.” It is not stated by Mr. Major whence he took the account; but there is nothing about tea in the translation of M. Quatremère (Not. et. Ex. xiv. pt. 1), nor in the Persian text given by him, nor in the translation by Mr. Rehatsek in the Ind. Ant. II. 73 segg.

“22½ lbs. of thea at 50s. per lb. = £56 17 6
For the two cheefe persons that attended his Majesty, thea. 6 15 6”

In 1667 the E.I. Co.'s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: “to send home by these ships 100lb. weight of the best tey that you can get.” The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143½ lbs. (Milburn, ii. 531.) [The earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of the India Office is in a letter from Mr. R. Wickham, the Company's Agent at Firando, in Japan, who, writing, June 27, 1616, to Mr. Eaton at Miaco, asks for “a pt. of the best sort of chaw” (see Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 26, where the early references are collected).]

A.D. 851.—“The King (of China) reserves to himself . . . a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sākh. It has more leaves than the rail'ah (Medicago sativa recens) and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances.”—Relation, &c., trad. par Reinaud, i. 40.

c. 1516.—“Moreover, seeing the great delight that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chaggi Memet, i.e. Hajji Mahommed) told me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chiai Catai: it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cachan-fu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all those regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and boil it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailments which I can't now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if any one chanced to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him, and judging from what he said these people come to any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of Chiai Cufai. These people of Cathay say (he told us) that if in our country, and in Persia, and the land of the Franks, it was known, merchants would no longer invest their money in Rauand Chini as they call rhubarb."—Ramusio, Dichiarationi, in ii. f. 15.

c. 1560.—"Whatsoever per-on or persones come to any mans house of qualitee, hee hath a custome to offer him in a fine basket one Porcelaine . . . with a kinde of drinke which they call cha, which is somewhat bitter, red, and medicinall, which they are wont to make with a certayne concoction of herbes."—De Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 150.

1563.—"Ritus est Japoniorum . . . benevolentiae causa praeberis spectanda, quae apud se pretiosissima sunt, si est, omne instrumentum necessarium ad potionem herbarum ejuandam in pulverem redactae, suavem gustu, nomine Chia. Est autem modus potitionis ejusmodi: pulveris ejus, quantum uno juglandis putamine continetur, conjungitur in fictile vas ex corum genere, quae procellana (Porcelain) vulgus appellat. Inde calanti admodum aqua dilutum ebibunt. Habent autem in eis usus ollam antiquissimi operis ferream, signum poculum, cochlearia, infundibulum elucendo figlino, tripodem, foveolum denique potioni calefaciendae."—Letter from Japan, of L. Aburada, in Massey, Litt. Select. et Indus, Lib. iv.

1568.—"Ceterum (apud Chineses) ex herba quadam expressus liquor admodum salutarius, nomine Chia, calidus hauritur, ut apud Japonios."—Massey, Hist. Ind. vi.

"Cum vitis ignorant (Japonii): oryzæ expriment vinum: Sed ipsi quoque ante omnia delectantur haustibus aquae potius ferventis, inperso quem supra diximus pulveri Chia. Circa eam potionem diligentissimi sunt, ac principes interdum viri suis ipsi manibus vident temperando ac miscendo, amicorum honoris causa, dant operam."—Ibid. Lib. xii.

1593.—" . . . the afore-said warme water is made with the powder of a certaine herbe called chaa."—Linschoten, 46; [Hak. Soc. i. 157].

1611.—"Of the same fashion is the cha of China, and taken in the same manner; except that the Cha is the small leaf of a herb, from a certain plant brought from Tartary, which was shown me when I was at Malacca."—Teisera, i. 19.

1616.—"I bought 3 chay cups covered with silver plates. . . ."—Cock, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 292, [and see ii. 11].

1623.—"They use much the powder of a certaine Herbe called Chia, of which they put as much as a Walnut-shell may containe, into a dish of Porcelaine, and drinke it with hot water."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 537.

1631.—"Dur. You have mentioned the drinke of the Chineses called Theo; what is your opinion thereof? . . . Bent. . . . the Chinese regard this beverage almost as something sacred . . . and they are not thought to have fulfilled the rites of hospitality to you until they have served you with it, just like the Mahometans with their Caveah (see COFFEE). It is of a drying quality, and lazie-les sleep . . . it is beneficial to asthmatic and wheezing patients."—Jac. Bonnius, Hist. Nat. et Med. Ind. Or. Lib. i. Dial. vi. p. 11.

1633.—"Dans les as-semblées ordinaires (à Sourat) que nous faisons tous les jours, nous ne prenons que du Thé, dont l'usage est fort commun par toutes les Indes."—Mandelslo, ed. Paris, 1639, p. 113.

1653.—"Non mirum est, multos etiam nunc in illo errore verari, quasi diversae speciei plantae essent The et Tsia, cum contra eadem sit, ejus decoctum Chinesibus The, Japonensibus Tsia nomen audiat; licet horum Tsia, ob magnam contributionem et coctionem, nigrum The appellatur."—Bontius, Hist. Nat. Japonis Annot., p. 87.

1660.—(September) "23th. . . I did send for a cup of tea (a China drink) of which I never had drank before."—Pepys's Diary, [Both Ld. Braybrooke (1th ed. i. 116) and Wheatley (i. 219) read tea, and give the date as Sept. 25.]

1667.—(June) "22th. . . Home and there find my wife making of tea; a drink which Mr. Pelling, the Potticary, tells her is good for her cold and deluxions."—Ibid. [Wheatley, vi. 323].

1672.—"There is among our people, and particularly among the womankind a great abuse of Thee, not only that too much is drunk . . . but this is also an evil custom to drink it with a full stomach; it is better and more wholesome to make use of it when the process of digestion is pretty well finished. . . . It is also a great folly to use sugar candy with Thee."—Kiddens, Germ. ed. 179. (This author devotes two columns to tea, and its use and abuse in India).

1677.—"Planta dicitur Châ, vel . . . Châ, . . . ejus usus in Chinae claustris nescius in Europae quoque palatinis seculis inuicem attentat. . . . Et quamvis Turcarum Cate (see COFFEE) et Mexicanorum Cocoluta eundem praestent effectum, Châ tamen, quam nonnulli quoque Te vocant, ea multum superat," etc.—Kircher, China Illustr. 180.

"Maer do Clâ (of Thee) sonder achtung op eijnsje tijt to hebben, is novit schadelijk."—Vermeulen, 30.

1683.—"Lord Russell . . . went into his chamber six or seven times in the morning, and prayed by himself, and then came out to Tillotson and me; he drank a little tea and some sherry."—Burnet, Hist. of Own Time, Oxford ed. 1623, ii. 375.

1683.—
"Venus her Myrtle, Phœbus has his Bays; Tea both excels which She* vouchsafes to praise,
The best of Queens, and best of Herbs we owe

* Queen Catharine.

To that bold Nation which the Way did show
To the fair Region where the Sun does rise, Whose rich Productions we so justly prize."—Waller.

1690.—". . . Of all the followers of Mahomet . . . none are so rigidly Abstemious as the Arabians of Muscat. . . . For Tea and Coffee, which are judg'd the privileg'd Liquors of all the Mahometans, as well as Turks, as those of Persia, India, and other parts of Arabia, are condemned by them as unlawful. . . ."—Orington, 427.

1726—"I remember well how in 1681 I for the first time in my life drank thee at the house of an Indian Chaplain, and how I could not understand how sensible men could think it a treat to drink what tasted no better than hay-water."—Valentijn, v. 190.

1789.—
"And now her vase a modest Naiad fills With liquid crystal from her pebbly rills;
Piles the dry cedar round her silver urn, (Bright climbs the blaze, the crackling faggots burn).
Culls the green herb of China's envy'd bowers,
In gaudy cups the steaming treasure pours;
And sweetly smiling, on her bended knee,
Presents the fragrant quintessence of Tea."

Durcin, Botanic Garden, Loves of the Plants, Canto ii.

1844.—"The Polish word for tea, Herbata, signifies more properly 'herb,' and in fact there is little more of the genuine Chinese beverage in the article itself than in its name, so that we often thought with longing of the delightful Russian Tshai, genuine in word and fact."—J. I. Kohl, Austria, p. 444.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (TEA) BOHEA. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Ba-i)-shan Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-kien, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawford points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea."
Epistle to Mrs Teren Mount.

[The earliest examples in the N.E.D. carry back the use of the word to the first years of the 18th century.]

1711.—"There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohee Tea to be sold at 26s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southampton Street in the Strand."—Advt. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

1711.—

"Oh had I rather unadmired remained
On some lone isle or distant northern land;
Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste bohea."
Belinda, in Rape of the Lock, iv, 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohay. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market. The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711.—"Bohea is of little Worth among the *Moor*s and Gentoos of India, Arabs and Persians . . . that of 45 Tale (see TAEI) would not fetch the Price of Green Tea of 10 Tale a Pecull."—Lockyer, 116.

1721.—

"Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,
On odoriferous plains the leaves do grow,
Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame,
Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name."

Allan Ramsay's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 213-14.

1726—"Anne 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts . . . Congo . . . Pego . . . Tongge, Rosmaryn Tea, rare and very dear."—Valentijn, iv. 11.

1727.—"In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm dry Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea."—A. Hamilton, ii. 289; [ed. 1744, ii. 288].

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Thee gives Thee Bohea as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade-names, according to Zedler, were Thee-Peco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucon best of all.

2. (TEA) CAMPOY, a black tea also. Kam-pui, the Canton pron. of the characters Kien-pei, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (TEA) CONGOU (a black tea). This is Kang-hu (tê) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fu, 'work or labour.' [Mr. Pratt (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 26) writes: "The N.E.D.

under Cangou derives it from the standard Chinese Kung-fu (which happens also to be the Cantonese spelling); 'the omission of the f' we are told, 'is the foreigner's corruption.' It is nothing of the kind. The Amoy name for this tea is Kung-hu, so that the omission of the f is due to the local Chinese dialect."

4. HYSON (a green tea). This is He- (hot and at in the south) ch'un, 'bright spring,' [which Mr. Ball (Things Chinese, 586) writes yu-ch'in, 'before the rain'], characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Lo, who was in the trade in the dist. of Hun-ning (S.W. of Haug-chau) about 1760; others say that He-chun was Lo's daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson. [Mr. Ball says that it is so called, "the young hy-on being half-opened leaves plucked in April before the spring rains."]

c. 1772.—

"And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair pattern of her beauty, hath ordained
'Celestial Tea':—a fountain that can cure
The ill of passion, and can free from frown."

To her, ye fair! in adoration bow!
Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve,
Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant beard
With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congo crown'd."

R. Ferguson, Poems.

5. OOLONG (bl. tea). Wu-lung, 'black dragon'; respecting which there is a legend to account for the name. ["A black snake (and snakes are sometimes looked upon as dragons in China) was coiled round a plant of this tea, and hence the name" (Ball, op. cit. 586).]

6. PEKOE (do.). Pak-ho, Canton pron. of characters p'ih-hao, 'white-down.'

7. POUCHONG (do.). Pao-chung, 'fold-sort.' So called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-pouchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places prepare and pack it.

8. SOUCHONG (do.). Siu-chung, Canton for Siao-chung, 'little-sort.'

1781.—"Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thés connus sous les noms de thé bouy, thé vert, et thé saochon."—Souvenir, n. 249.

9. TWANKAY (green tea). From Tun-ki, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chau-fu in Ngan-hwei. Bp. Moule says (perhaps after W. Williams) from Tun-ki, name of a stream near Yen-hau-fu in Chik-kiang. [Mr. Pratt (loc. cit.) writes; "The Amoy Tun-lo is nearer, and the Cantonese Tun-lo never still, its second syllable being absolutely the same in sound as the English. The Twankay is a stream in the E. of the province of Nganhwei, where Twankay tea grows."] Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for 'tea.'

10. YOUNG HYSON. This is called by the Chinese Yü-fai-n, 'tam-before,' or 'Yü-fai,' because picked before Kuk-yu, a term falling about 20th April (see HYSON above). According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Yeham, which seems to represent the Chinese name. In an "Account of the Prices at which Teas have been put up to Sale, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785" (MS. India Office Records) the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):—

"Bohea Tea.	Single (1),
Congou, Souchong, Hyson."

TEA-CADDY, s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawford suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.). A 'catty-box,' meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.) A friend adds the remark that in his youth 'Tea-caddy' was a Londoner's name for Harley Street, due to the number of E.I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.

TEAPOY, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connection with tea, and hence, in London shops for japanned ware and the like, a teapoy means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous. Tipāi is a Hindustāni, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustāni word for a tripod, from Hind. tīn, 3, and Pers. pāi, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is stipāi (properly sihpāya), and the legitimate Hindi word tirpad or tripad, but tipāi or tepay was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from inaccuracy, possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word sepay, seapoy. [Platts, however, gives tipāi as a regular Hind. word, Skt. tri-pād-ika.] The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any very small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry. Sihpāya occurs in 'Alī of Yezd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging over the Indus (Elliot, iii. 482). A teapoy is called in Chinese by a name having reference to tea: viz. Ch'ach'rh. It has 4 legs.

[c. 1809.—“(Dinajpore) Sepaya, a wooden stand for a lamp or candle with three feet.”—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 945.]

1844.—“‘Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd;—and the old gentleman chuckled,—‘most odd to find a person who don’t know what a teapoy is. . . . Well, then, a teapoy or tinpay is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right.’”

“‘Why, that table has four legs,’ cried Peregrine.

“‘It’s a teapoy all the same,’ said Mr. Havethelacks.”—Peregrine Pullency, i. 112.

TEAK, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to botanists as Tectona grandis, L., N.O. Verbenaceae. The word is Malayāl. tekka, Tam. tekku. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pegu being the other. The Skt. name of the tree is śaka, whence the modern Hind. name sāguān or sāgūn and the Mahr. śāg. From this last probably was taken śāj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the σαγαλβα of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sāgālī, ‘made of the teak, belonging to teak.’ The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great palace of the Sassanid Kings at Seleucia or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. [See Birdwood, First Letter Book, Intro. XXIX.] Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskāl, quoted by Royle (Hindu Medicine, 128). The gopher-wood of Genesis is translated śāj in the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Royle). [It was probably cedar (see Encycl. Bibl. s.v.)]

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber (which however is indexless), and the only mention we can find in the Āin, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name “Sāgaun” has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann’s E.T. i. p. 228).

c. A.D. 80.—“In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apologos, lying near Pasino Charax and the river Euphrates.

“Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 6 days you reach another port of Persia called Ōmann. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (ξύλων σαγαλίων καὶ δοκῶν), and horns and spars of shisham (see SISSOO) (σασαμύων), and of ebony. . . .”—Peripl. Maris Erythr. § 35-36.

c. 800.—(under Hārūn al Rashīd) “Faḡl continued his story ‘. . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . they told me he had been struck with the quām, that his body was swollen and all black. . . . I went to Rashīd to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies. . . . I myself said the funeral prayer. As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together; an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (śāj). . . .”—Quotation in Maḡāzī, Fāriqas d’Or, vi. 298-299.

c. 880.—“From Kol to Sindān, where they collect teak-wood (śāj) and cane, 18 far-sakhs."—Ibn Khuradadba, in J. As. S. VI. tom. v. 231.

c. 910.—". . . The teak-tree (sāf). This tree, which is taller than the date-palm, and more bulky than the walnut, can shelter under its branches a great number of men and cattle, and you may judge of its dimensions by the logs that arrive, of their natural length, at the depôts of Basra, of Irak, and of Egypt. . . ."—Mas'ûti, iii. 12.

Before 1200.—Abu'l-dhalî' the Sindian, describing the regions of Hind, has these verses:

"By my life! it is a land where, when the rain falls, Jacinths and pearls spring up for him who wants ornaments.

There too are produced musk and camphor and ambegria and agala,

And ivory there, and teak (al-sāf) and aloeswood and sandal. . . ."

Quoted by Kāzîni, in Gildewinter, 217-218.

The following order, in a King's Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber:

1537.—"We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Achem (see ACHEEN), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Achem."—In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. ii. 663.

1602.—". . . It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the town, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (teca), which is a wood not subject to decay. . . ."—Sousa, Oriente Conquist. (1710), ii. 265.

"Of many of the roughest thickets of bamboo, and of the largest and best wood in the world, that is teca."—Couto, Dec. VII. Bk. vi. ch. d. He goes on to explain that all the ships and boats made either by Moors or Gentiles since the Portuguese came to India, were of this wood which came from the inexhaustible forests at the back of Damaun.]

1631.—Bontius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title "Quercus Indica, Kiati Malais dieta."—Lib. vi. cap. 18. On this Rhœde, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Mortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kiati but Jati: Kiati seems to be a mistake of some kind growing out of Kayu-jati, 'Teak-wood.'

1611.—"Hã nestas terras do Damam muyta o boa madoyra do Teca, a melhor do toda a India, o tambem do muyta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy facil do laurar ho perduravel, o particularmente nam lho tocando agoa."—Lucarro, MS.

1675.—"At Cock-erow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teke (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Bee-hive."—Fryer, 112.

". . . Teke by the Portuguese, Sogwan by the Moors, is the firmest Wood they have for Building . . . in Height the lofty Pine exceeds it not, nor the sturdy Oak in Bulk and Substance. . . . This Prince of the Indian Forest was not so attractive, though mightily glorious, but that . . ."—Hut. 178.

1727.—"Guadalupe is next, where good Quantities of Teak Timber are cut, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships."—A. Hamilton, i. 173; [ed. 1711].

1711.—"Teeka is the name of costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays."—Zeller, Trav. Læon, &c.

1759.—"They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timber also, but they lying in a swampy place, could not take fire."—Capt. Aker, Report on Loss of Nygrus, in Indrapur, i. 319.

c. 1760.—"As to the wood it is a sort called Teak, to the full as durable as oak."—Grove, i. 103.

1777.—"Experience hath long since shown, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of tekowood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts."—Price's Tracts, i. 191.

1793.—"The teak forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship-timber, lie along the western side of the Gaut mountains . . . on the north and north-east of Bascon. . . . I cannot close this subject without remarking the unpardonable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas."—Reynell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 260.

[1800.—"Tayca, Tectona Robusta."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 26.]

TEE, s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chatras [chhattras] or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burm. h'ti, 'an umbrella.'

1800.—". . . In particular the Téo, or umbrella, which, composed of open iron-work, crowned the spire, had been thrown down."—Symes, i. 193.

1855.—". . . gleaming in its white plaster, with numerous pinnacles and tall central spire, we had seen it (Gaudapala Temple at Pagan) from far down the Irawadi rising like a dim vision of Milan Cathedral. . . . It is cruciform in plan . . . exhibiting a massive basement with porches, and rising above in a pyramidal gradation of terraces, crowned by a spire and base. The latter has broken from its stays at one side, and now leans over almost horizontally. . . ."—Tate, Mission to Ava, 1853, p. 42.

1876.—". . . a feature known to Indian archaeologists as a Teo. . . ."—Ferguson, Ind. and East. Archæol. 61.

TEEK, adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious, [a meaning which Platts does not record]. Used in N. India. Hind. thik.

[1813.—"They all feel that the good old rule of right (teek), as long as a man does his duty well, can no longer be relied upon"—G. W. Johnson, Stranger in India, i. 230.]

[1878.—". . . it is necessary to send an explanation to the magistrate, and the return does not look so thék (a word expressing all excellence)."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 253.]

TEERUT, TEERTHA, s. Skt. and Hind. tirth, tirtha. A holy place of pilgrimage and of bathing for the good of the soul, such as Hardwar, or the confluence at Praga (Allahabad).

[1623.—"The Gentiles call it Ramtirt, that is, Holy Water."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. n. 205.]

c. 1790.—"Au temple l'enfant est reçu par les dévahschies (Deva-dasi) des mains de ses parents, et après l'avoir baigné dans le tirtha ou étang du temple, elles lui mettent des vêtements neufs. . . ."—Hautfuer, ii. 114.

[1858.—"He then summoned to the place no less than three crores and half, or thirty millions and half of teeruts, or angels (sic) who preside each over his special place of religious worship."—Stewart, Journey through Oudh, ii. 4.]

TEHR, TAIR, &c., s. The wild goat of the Himalaya; Hemitragus jemlaicus, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 509]. In Nepal it is called ghural. (See SURROW).

TEJPAT, s. Hind. tejpāt, Skt. teja-patra, 'pungent leaf.' The native name for malabathrum.

1833.—"Last night as I was writing a long description of the tē-j-pāt, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pickles beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the Laurus nobilis. . . ."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872.—Tejpāt is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Oorinda Samanta, i. 223.

(1) TELINGA, n.p. Hind. Tilangā, Skt. Tailanga. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the Middle Ages, Tiliṅgāna or Tilangāna, sometimes Tiling or Tilang. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Triliṅga, the habitual application of Tri-Kuliṅga, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Tilinga, and the example of actual use of Triliṅga, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Sp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, 2nd ed. Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article KLING in this book).

A. D. c. 150.—"Τρίκλιον, τὸ καὶ Τρίλιγγον Βασίλειον . . . κ. τ. λ."—Ptolemy, vi. 2, 23.

1309.—"On Saturday the 10th of Sha'ban, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islām might be planted and flourish in the soil of Tilang, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force. . . . When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal (Warangal, N.E. of Hyderabad), the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 80.

1321.—"In the year 721 H. the Sultan (Ghiyās-uddīn) sent his eldest son, Ulugh Khān, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Tilang."—Zīd-uddīn Barānī, Ibid. 231.

c. 1335.—"For every mile along the road there are three dūdāl (post stations). . . . and so the road continues for six months' marching, till one reaches the countries of Tiling and Ma'bar. . . ."—Ibn Batūta, iii. 192.

"In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Delhi, given by Shihāb-ud-dīn Dimishki, we find both Talang and Talanj, probably through some mistake."—Nat. et Exot. Pt. 1. 170-171.

c. 1590.—"Šūba Berir. . . . Its length from Batūla (or Patūla) to Bairāgarh is 200 kuroh (or kos); its breadth from Bidar to Hindia 160. On the east of Bairāgarh it marches with Bastar; on the north with Hindia; on the south with Tiliṅgāna; on the west with Mahkarābid. . . ."—Ain (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 223; and see 230, 237].

1608.—“In the southern lands of India since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i.e. Mahomedans) conquered Magadha, many abodes of Learning were founded; and though they were inconsiderable, the continuance of instruction and exercise was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Trilinga.”—Tārānātha's H. of Buddhism (Germ. ed. of Schiefner), p. 261. See also 116, 153, 166.

c. 1611.—“Up to that time none of the zamindars of distant lands, such as the Rājā of Tilang, Pegu, and Malabar, had ventured upon disobedience or rebellion.”—Firishta, in Elliot, vi. 549.

1793.—“Tellingana, of which Warangoll was the capital, comprehended the tract lying between the Kistnah and Godavary rivers, and east of Visapour. . . .”—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [cxi.]

(2) TELINGA, v. This term in the 18th century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with sepoys, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion, [and is still commonly used by natives to indicate a sepoy or armed policeman in N. India], no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz. Madras.

1758.—“ . . . the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and accoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Telingas.”—Sir Mordaunt, ii. 92.

c. 1760.—“ . . . Sepoys, sometimes called Telingas.”—Howe, in his Gha. arg., see vol. I. xiv.

1760.—“300 Tellingees are run away, and entered into the Beerloom Rajah's service.”—In Long, 235; see also 236, 237, and (1761) p. 253, “Tellingera.”

c. 1765.—“Somro's force, which amounted to 15 or 16 field-pieces and 6000 or 7000 of those foot soldiers called Tellinghas, and which are armed with flint muskets, and accoutred as well as disciplined in the Franghi or European manner.”—Sir Mordaunt, iii. 251.

1768.—“ . . . Gardi (see GARDEE), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal . . . where they are still called Talingas, because the first Sipahies that came in Bengal (Clive) were all Talingas or Teloungous born . . . speaking hardly any language but their native. . . .”—Note by Tr. of Sir Mordaunt, ii. 93.

c. 1805.—“The battalions, according to the old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts. . . . The Telingas, composed mostly of Hindoos, from Oude, were disciplined according to the old English exercise of 1780. . . .”—Sketch of the Regular Corps, &c., in Service of Native Princes, by Major Lewis Ferdinand Smith, p. 60.

1827.—“You are a Sahib Angrezie. . . . I have been a Telinga . . . in the Company's service, and have eaten their salt. I will do your errand.”—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1833.—“We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive's army were known to the Bengalis of Nuddea as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras.”—Saty. Review, Jan. 29, p. 120.

TELOOGOO, n.p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is “spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicat” (24 m. N. of Madras) “where it supersedes Tamil, to Chucacole, where it begins to yield to the Oriya (see OORIYA), and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Maratha country and Mysore, including within its range the ‘Ceded Districts’ and Karnul (see KURNOOL), a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam . . . and a portion of the Nagpur country and Gondwana” (Bp. Caldwell's Dravid. Gram. Introd., p. 29). Telugu is the name given to the language of the people themselves (other forms being, according to Bp. Caldwell, Telunga, Telinga, Tailinga, Tenugu, and Tenungu), as the language of Telingana (see TELINGA (1)). It is this language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is, called Gentoo at Madras. [Also see BADEGA.]

1673.—“Their Language they call generally Gentu . . . the peculiar name of their speech is Telinga.”—Fryer, 33.

1793.—“The Telinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Pennar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance.”—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [cxi.]

TEMBOOL, Betel-leaf. Skt. tambūla, adopted in Pers. as tambūl, and in Ar. al-tambūl. [It gives its name to the Tambolis or Tamolis, sellers of betel in the N. Indian bazars.]

1298.—“All the people of this city, as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain loaf called Tembui. . . .—Marco Polo, ii. 368.

1493.—“And he hold in his left hand a very great cup of gold as high as a half almude pot . . . into which he spat a certain herb which the men of this country chew for solace, and which herb they call atambor.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 53.

1510.—“He also eats certain leaves of herbs, which are like the leaves of the sour orange, called by some tamboli.”—Varthema, 110.

1563.—“Only you should know that Avicenna calls the betel (Betel) tembui, which seems a word somewhat corrupted, since everybody pronounces it tambui, and not tembui.”—Garcia, f. 37h.

TENASSERIM, n.p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irawadi, after the war of 1824-26, these were officially known as “the Martaban and Tenasserim Province,” or often as “the Tenasserim Provinces.” We have the name probably from the Malay form Tanasari. We do not know to what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-nen-tha-ra. [“The name Tenasserim (Malay Tanah-sari), ‘the land of happiness or delight,’ was long ago given by the Malays to the Burma province, which still keeps it, the Burmese corruption being Tunang-sari” (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, quoted below).]

c. 1130.—“Relicta Taprobano ad urbem Tenasserim supra ostium fluvii eodem nomino vocitati diebus XVI tempestate actus est. Quae regio et elephantis et vorzano (brazil-wood) abundat.”—Nic. Conti, in Poggio de Var. Fort. lib. iv.

1442.—“The inhabitants of the shores of the Ocean come thither (to Hormuz) from the countries of Chin (China), Javah, Bangala, the cities of Zibbad (q.v.), of Tenaseri, of Sokotara, of Shahriniao (see SAERNAU), of the Isles of Diwah Mahal (Maldives).”—Abdur-ruzzak, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 429.

1498.—“Tenagar is peopled by Christians, and the King is also a Christian . . . in this land is much brasyll, which makes a fine vermilion, as good as the grain, and it costs here 3 cruzados a bahar, whilst in Quayro (Cairo) it costs 60; also there is here aloeswood, but not much.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 110.

1501.—Tanasar appears in the list of places in the East Indies of which Amerigo Vespucci had heard from the Portuguese fleet at O. Verde. Printed in Baldelli Boni's Il Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1508.—“At Tenazar grows all the terzi (brazil), and it costs 1½ ducats the baar (bahar), equal to 1 lankura. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence come pepper, cinnamon, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten. . . . This is indeed the first mart of spices in India.”—Leonardo Cu' Musser, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. p. 23.

1510.—“The city of Tarnassari is situated near the sea, etc.”—Varthema, 196. This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coromandel.

1516.—“And from the Kingdom of Peigu as far as a city which has a seaport, and is named Tanasary, there are a hundred leagues. . . .”—Barbosa, 183.

1593.—“The Pilot told us that we were by his altitude not farre from a citie called Tanasary, in the Kingdom of Pegu.”—C. Frederick, in Hall ii. 339. See Lancaster.

c. 1590.—“In Kambayat (Cambay) a Nakhuda (Nacoda) gets 800 R. . . . In Pegu and Dahnasari, he gets half as much again as in Cambay.”—Lin, i. 231.

[1593.—“Between two Islands the coast runneth inwards like a bow, wherein lyeth the towne of Tanassarien.”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 103. In the same page he writes Tanassaria.

[1608.—“The small quantities they have here come from Tannaseryo.”—Dunier, Letters, i. 22.

[c. 1610.—“Some Indians call it (Ceylon) Tanasiria, signifying land of delights, or earthly paradise.”—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 110, with Gray's note (Hak. Soc.) quoted above.]

1727.—“Mr. Samuel White was made Shawbandaar (Shahbunder) or Custom-Master at Mergoo (Mergui) and Tanaceria, and Captain Williams was Admiral of the King's Navy.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 64; [ed. 1741].

1783.—“Tannasserim. . . .”—Forrest V. to Mergui, i.

TERAI, TERYE, s. Hind. tardī, ‘moist (land)’ from tar, ‘moist’ or ‘green.’ [Others, however, connect it with tara, talū, ‘beneath (the Himālaya).’] The term is specially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himālaya north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture which has sunk into the talus of porous material exudes. A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bhāgalpūr, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terry (q.v.).

1793.—“Holloura, though standing very little below the level of Cheoria Ghat's top is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepal . . . Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepal, as well as the low tract bordering immediately on the Company's northern frontier.—Kirkpatrick's Nepal (1811), p. 10.

1821.—“Mr. Boulder-on said he was sorry to learn from the raja that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over . . . I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsook these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively deserts them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain . . . and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude.”—Heber, ed. 1811, 250-251.

[The word is used as an adj. to describe a severe form of malarial fever, and also a sort of double felt hat, worn when the sun is not so powerful as to require the use of a sola topee.

[1879.—“Remittent has been called Junglo Fever, Teral Fever, Bengal Fever, &c., from the locality in which it originated. . . .”—Moore, Family Med. for India, 211.

[1880.—“A Teral hat is sufficient for a Collector.”—Ali Baba, 65.]

THAKOOR, s. Hind. thākūr, from Skt. thakkura, ‘an idol, a deity.’ Used as a term of respect, Lord, Master, &c., but with a variety of specific applications, of which the most familiar is as the style of Rājput nobles. It is also in some parts the honorific designation of a barber, after the odd fashion which styles a tailor khalifa (see CALEEFA); a bikishit, jamat-dār (see JEMADAR); a sweeper, mehtar. And in Bengal it is the name of a Brahman family, which its members have Anglicised as Tagore, of whom several have been men of character and note, the best known being Dwārkanāth Tagore, “a man of liberal opinions and enterprising character” (Wilson), who died in London in 1840.

[c. 1610.—“The nobles in blood (in the Maldives) add to their name Tacourou.”—Pyrrard de Laun, Hak. Soc. i. 217.

[1798.—“The Thacur (so Rājput chieftains are called) was naked from the waist upward, except the sacrificial thread or scarf on his shoulders and a turban on his head.”—L. of Col. Brooke, 462.

[1881.—“After the sons have gone to their respective offices, the mother changing her clothes retires into the thakurghar (the place of worship), and goes through her morning service. . . .”—S. C. Bose, The Hindoos as they are, 13.]

THERMANTIDOTE, s. This learned word (“heat-antidote”) was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32 to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and increased in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot, dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1831.—“To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, iced-water, and the thermantidote, which answered admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d. I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned . . . by standing or sleeping before it.”—Wanderings of a Physician, i. 208.

[Mr. Parker saw for the first time a thermantidote at Cawnpore in 1830.—Ibid. i. 131.]

1810.—“ . . . The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tatties, phermantidotes,* and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat.”—Osborne, Count and Camp of Runjet Singh, 132.

1853.—“ . . . then came punkahs by day, and next punkahs by night, and then tatties, and then therm antidotes, till at last May came round again, and found the unhappy Anglo-Indian world once more surrounded with all the necessary but uncomfortable sweltering panoply of the hot weather.”—Oakley, i. 263-4.

1878.—“They now began (c. 1810) to have the benefit of thermantidotes, which however were first introduced in 1831; the name of the inventor is not recorded.”—Calcutta Rev. cxvii. 718.

1880.—“ . . . low and heavy punkahs wing overhead; a sweet breathing of wet thushka grass comes out of the thermantidote.”—Sir Ali Baba, 112.

THUG, s. Hind. thug, Mahr. thuk, Skt. thuga, ‘a cheat, a swindler.’ And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in R. Drummond’s Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c. (1808). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson:

* This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was lunatic of this quaint error.

"Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sallied forth in a gang . . . and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and burying their bodies." The proper specific designation of these criminals was, phatusigar or phatusigar, from phat, 'a noose.'

According to Mackenzie (in A. Res. xiii.) the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Smat. The Phatusigars (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, "The English in India," which one of the pre-ent writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1626 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman's book "Ramaseema;" or a Vocabulary of the peculiar language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression," Calcutta, 1830; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxiv. 367). One of Col. Meadows Taylor's Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839), has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir W. (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck. [The question of the Thugs and their modern successors has been again discussed in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1901.]

c. 1665.—"Les Voleurs de ce pais-là sont les plus adroits du monde; ils ont l'usage d'un certain laçot à nouer coulant, qu'ils savent jeter si subtilement au col d'un homme, quand ils sont à sa portée, qu'ils ne le manquent jamais; en sorte qu'en un moment ils l'étranglent . . ." ke.—Theracud, v. 123.

1673.—"They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow Lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts, . . . they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that winding it about their Necks, they pulled them from their Beasts and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had . . . they were sentenced to Lee Tahonia, to be hang'd; wherefore being delivered to the Cutal or Sheriff's Men, they led them two Miles with Ropes round their Necks to some Wild Date-tree: In their way thither they were cheerful, and went singing, and smoking Tobacco . . . as jolly as if going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were not 11 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men. . . ."—Fryer, 97.

1755.—"Several men were taken up for a most cruel method of robbery and murder, practised on travellers, by a tribe called phanseegurs, or stranglers . . . under the pretence of travelling the same way, they enter into conversation with the strangers, have their sweetmeats, and pay them other little attentions, until an opportunity offers of suddenly throwing a rope round their necks with a slip-knot, by which they dexterously contrive to strangle them on the spot."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 13; [2nd ed. ii. 397].

1803.—"Phanseco. A term of abuse in Guzerat, applied also, truly, to thieves or robbers who strangle children in secret or travellers on the road."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

1820.—"In the more northern parts of India these murderers are called Thugs, signifying, deceivers."—Id. Res. xiii. 250.

1823.—"The Thugs are composed of all castes, Mahomedans even were admitted; but the great majority are Hindus; and among these the Brahmins, chiefly of the Bundelcund tribes, are in the greatest numbers, and generally direct the operations of the different bands."—Mulcolm, Central India, ii. 187.

1831.—"The inhabitants of Jubbulpore were this morning assembled to witness the execution of 25 Thugs. . . . The number of Thugs in the neighbouring countries is enormous; 115, I believe, belonged to the party of which 25 were executed, and the remainder are to be transported; and report says there are as many in Sauger Jail."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 201-202.

1843.—"It is by the command, and under the special protection of the most powerful goddesses that the Thugs join themselves to the unsuspecting traveller, make friends with him, slip the noose round his neck, plunge their knives in his eyes, hide him in the earth, and divide his money and baggage."—Macaulay, Speech on Tibet at Southampton.

1871.—"If a Thug makes strangling of travellers a part of his religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it."—H. Newman, in Fortnightly Rev., N.S. xv. 181.

[Tavernier writes: "The remainder of the people, who do not belong to either of these four castes, are called Pauzécour." This word Mr. Ball (ii. 185) suggests to be equivalent to either pariah or phansigar. Here he is in error. Pauzécour is really Skt. Pancha-Gauda, the five classes of northern Brahmans, for which see Wilson, (Indian Caste, ii. 124 seq.)]

TIBET, n.p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which may be said roughly to extend from the Indus elbow, N.W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see SLING) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a distance of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahomedans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the 9th century.

Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of the name (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Couperie) was Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R. (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 5th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a State to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tibet, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkestan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroboration from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpini and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhinor several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidt), Täbet and Töbet.

[c. 530.—"Tobbat." See under INDIA.]

851.—"On this side of China are the countries of the Tagharghas and the Khā-kān of Tibbat; and that is the termination of China on the side of the Turks."—Relation, &c., tr. par Reinaud, pt. i. p. 60.

c. 880.—"Quand un étranger arrive au Tibet (al-Tibbat), il éprouve, sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte, un sentiment de gaieté et de bien être qui persiste jusqu'au départ."—Ibn Khwādhar, in J. As. Ser. vi. tom. v. 522.

c. 910.—"The country in which lives the goat which produces the musk of China, and that which produces the musk of Tibbat are one and the same; only the Chinese got into their hands the goats which are nearest their side, and the people of Tibbat do likewise. The superiority of the musk of Tibbat over that of China is due to two causes; first, that the musk-goat on the Tibbat side of the frontier finds aromatic plants, whilst the goats on the Chinese side only produce plants of a common kind."—Relation, &c., pt. 2, pp. 114-115.

c. 930.—"This country has been named Tibbat because of the establishment there of the Himsyarites, the word thabat signifying to fix or establish one-self. That etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that Dī'āl, son of Alī-al-Khuzā'i, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumair he exalts the descendants of Kaṭlān above those of Nizār, saying:

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Merv,
And who were writers at the gate of Chin,

"Tis they who have bestowed on Samarkand the name of Shamir,
And who have transported thither the Tibetans" (al-Tubbātina)."

Mas'ādi, i. 352.

c. 978.—"From the sea to Tibet is 1 months' journey, and from the sea of Fāz to the country of Kannuj is 3 months' journey."—Ibn Haukal, in Elliot, i. 33.

* This refers to an Arab legend that Samarkand was founded in very remote times by Toblā'al-Akbar, Himsyarite King of Yemen, (see e.g. Périset, by Joubert, ii. 198), and the following: "The author of the Treatise on the Figure of the Earth says on this subject: "This is what was told me by Abu-Bakr-Dimashki—"I have seen over the great gate of Samarkand an iron tablet bearing an inscription, which, according to the people of the place, was engraved in Himsyarite characters, and as an old tradition related, had been the work of 'Tobla.'"—Shahabuddin Dimashki, in Not. et Ess. xiii. 251.

c. 1020.—"Bhūta-ar is the first city on the borders of Tibet. There the language, costume, and appearance of the people are different. Thence to the top of the highest mountain, of which no spoke . . . is a distance of 20 parasangs. From the top of it Tibet looks red and Hind black."—Al-Mirātī, in Kllivā, i. 57.

1076.—"Τὸ ὑμέτερον, διάφορα εἶδη εἰσὶν ὧν ὁ ἀρετῶν γίνεται ἐν πόλει τιτὶ πολὺ τοῦ Χορδῆ ἀνατολικότερα, λεγομένη Τουπάτα· ἐστὶ δὲ τὴν χροίαν ὑπόξανον· τοῦτον δὲ ἦσαν ὁ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰνδίας μεταμορφωμένος· ῥέπει δὲ ἐπὶ τὸ μέλαιτον· καὶ τοῖτον πάλιν ὑποδέσμετος ὁ ἀπὸ τῶν Σινων ἀγόμενος· πάντες δὲ ἐν οὐφαλῷ ἀπογεννῶνται ζῶον τιτὸς μορφέματος μέγιστον οὐαίου δοράδος."—Symeon Seth, quoted by Dochart, Histor. III. xxvi.

1105.—"This prince is called in Arabic Sultan al-Farī al-Kābar . . . and his empire extendeth from the banks of the Shat-al-Arab to the City of Samarkand . . . and reaches as far as Thibet, in the forests of which country that quadruped is found which yields the musk."—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright's Early Travels, 106.

c. 1200.—

"He went from Hindustan to the Tibet-land. . . .
From Tibet he entered the boundaries of Chin."

Sikandar Nāmā, E.T. by Cup.
H. W. Clarke, R.E., p. 555.

1217.—"Et dum reverteretur exercitus illo, videlicet Mongolorum, venit ad terram Buri-Thabæt, quos bello vicerunt: qui sunt pagani. Qui consuetudinem mirabilem uno potius miserabilem habent: quia cum aliquis pater humano naturæ oblitum solvit, omnem congregat parentelam ut comedant eum, sicut nobis dicebatur pro certo."—Jean, de Plano Carpini, in Rec. de Voyages, iv. 655.

1253.—"Post istos sunt Tobet, homines solentes comedere parentes suos defunctos, ut causa pietatis non facerent aliud sepulchrum eis nisi viscera sua."—Rubroy, in Recueil de Voyages, &c. iv. 259.

1293.—"Tobet est uno grandissimo province quo lengajes ont por elles, et sunt ydres. . . . Il sunt maint grant laironz. . . . Il sunt mau eustomés; il ont grandismes cheuz mastin quo sunt grant como asnes et sunt mout buen a prendre bestes saurajes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text. ch. cxvi.

1330.—"Passando questa provincia grande perveni a un altro gran regno che si chiama Tibet, ch'èno no confini d'India ed o tutta al gran Cano . . . la gente di questa contrada dimora in tendo che sono fatto di feltri neri. Odorico*, Palatino MS., in Cathay, &c. App. p. 131.

c. 1310.—"The said mountain (Karakūl, the Himālaya) extends in length a space of 3 months' journey, and at the base is the country of Thabbat, which has the antelopes which give musk."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 133-139.

TICAL, s. This (tikal) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This weight is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the viss (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about $1\frac{1}{2}$ rupee in value. The origin of the word tikal is doubtful. Sir A. Phayre suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese word ta-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian taka (see TUCKA). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bat. In Siam the tikal is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 225 grs. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.*

[1554.—"Ticals." See MAGAO b. Also see VISS.]

1585.—"Aunortendosì cho vna bice di peso d per 10 onco Venetiano, o ogni bice d teccali cento, o vn grilo val teccali 25, o vn alvero val teccali 12."—G. Balbi (in Pegu), f. 103.

[1615.—"Cloth to the value of six catties (Catty) less three tiggalls."—Foster, Letters, iv. 107.

[1639.—"Four Ticals make a Tyl (Tael)."—Mandello, E.T. ii. 130.]

1688.—"The proportion of their (Siamese) Money to ours is, that their Tical, which weighs no more than half a Crown, is yet worth three shillings and three half-pence."—La Loubère, E.T. p. 72.

1727.—"Pegu Weight.

1 Pice is . . . 39 ou. Troy, or 1 Pice . . . 100 Taula.
110 Pice . . . a Thauar (see BAHAR).

The Rikhar is 3 Pecul China."—J. Hamilton, ii. 317; [ed. 1741].

c. 1759.—" . . . a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tical (little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ a Crown)."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 121.

*[Col. Temple notes that the pronunciation has always been twofold. At present in Burma it is usual to pronounce it like fielle, and in Siam like taeau. He regards it as certain that it comes from talā through Talaing and Peguan &c.]

1775.—Stevens, New and Complete Guide to E.I. Trade, gives
"Pegu weight:

100 moo = 1 Tual (read Tical).

100 tual (Tical) = 1 vis (see VISS) = 3 lb.

6 oz. 5 dr. avr.

150 vis = 1 candy."

And under Siam:

"80 Tuals (Ticals) = 1 Catty.

50 Catties = 1 Pecul."

1783.—"The merchandize is sold for teecalls, a round piece of silver, stamped and weighing about one rupee and a quarter."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, p. vii.

TICCA, and vulg. TICKER, adj. This is applied to any person or thing engaged by the job, or on contract. Thus a ticca gurry is a hired carriage, a ticca doctor is a surgeon not in the regular service but temporarily engaged by Government. From Hind. ṭhika, ṭhikah, 'hire, fare, fixed price.'

[1813.—"Teeka, hire, fare, contract, job."—Gloss. to Fifth Report, s.v.]

1827.—"A Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Port William in Bengal, and for regulating the number and fare of Teeka Palankeens, and Teeka Bearers in the Town of Calcutta . . . registered in the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the 27th June, 1827."—Bengal Regulations of 1827.

1878.—"Leaving our servants to jabber over our heavier baggage, we got into a 'ticca gharry,' 'hired trap,' a bit of civilization I had hardly expected to find so far in the Mofussil."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 94.

[TIOKA, s. Hind. ṭikā, Skt. tilaka, a mark on the forehead made with coloured earth or unguents, as an ornament, to mark sectarian distinction, accession to the throne, at betrothal, &c; also a sort of spangle worn on the forehead by women. The word has now been given the additional meaning of the mark made in vaccination, and the ṭikawala Ṣahib is the vaccination officer.

[c. 1796.—" . . . another was sent to Kutch to bring thence the tika. . . ."—Mir Hussein Ali, Life of Tipu, 251]

[1832.—"In the centre of their foreheads is a teeka (or spot) of lamp-black."—Herklotz, Quanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 139.

[c. 1878.—"When a sudden stampede of the children, accompanied by violent yells and sudden falls, has taken place as I entered a village, I have been informed, by way of apology, that it was not I whom the children feared, but that they supposed that I was the Tika-wala Sahib."—Punjab Gazetteer, Rohtak, p. 9.]

TICKY-TOOK. This is an unmeaning refrain used in some French songs, and by foreign singing masters in their scales. It would appear from the following quotations to be of Indian origin.

c. 1755.—"These gentry (the band with nautch-girls) are called Tickytaw boys, from the two words Ticky and Taw, which they continually repeat, and which they chaunt with great vehemence."—Lies, 76.

[c. 1833.—"Each pair of boys then, having privately arranged to represent two separate articles . . . comes up to the captains, and one of the pair says dik dik, daun daun, which apparently has about as much meaning as the analogous English nursery saying, 'Dickory, dickory dock.'"—Punjab Gazetteer, Hoshiarpur, p. 35.]

[TIER-CUTTY, s. This is Malayāl. tiyar-kutti, the knife used by a Tiyan or toddy-drawer for scarifying the palm-trees. The Tiyan caste take their title from Malayāl. thyyan, which again comes from Malayāl. ṭṭu, Skt. dripta, 'an island,' and derive their name from their supposed origin in Ceylon.

[1792.—"12 Tier Catties."—Account, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 169.

[1799.—"The negadeo (ṇagdi, 'cash-payment') on houses, banksauls (see BANK-SHALL), Tiers' knives."—Ibid. iii. 321.]

TIFFIN, s. Luncheon, Anglo-Indian and Hindustani, at least in English households. Also to Tiff, v. to take luncheon. Some have derived this word from Ar. ṭufannun, 'diversion, amusement,' but without history, or evidence of such an application of the Arabic word. Others have derived it from Chinese ch'ih-fan, 'eat-rice,' which is only an additional example that anything whatever may be plausibly resolved into Chinese monosyllables. We believe the word to be a local survival of an English colloquial or slang term. Thus we find in the Lexicon Balatronicum, compiled originally by Capt. Gross (1785): "Tiffing, eating or drinking out of meal-times," besides other meanings. Wright (Dict. of Obsolete and Provincial English) has: "Tiff, s. (1) a draught of liquor, (2) small beer;" and Mr. Davies (Supplemental English Glossary) gives some good quotations both of this substantive and of a verb "to tiff," in the sense of 'take off a draught.' We should conjecture that Grose's sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffing" was a participial noun from the verb tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffing" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to Tiff." [This view is accepted by Prof. Skeat, who derives tiff from Norwegian, 'a drawing in of the breath, sniff,' teia, 'to sniff' (Concise Dict. s.v.; and see 9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 425, 460, 506; v. 13).] Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Toddy and the like he says:

"Homines autem qui eas (potiones) colligunt ac preparent, dicuntur Portugalico nomine Tiffadores, atque opus ipsum Tiffar; nostratibus Belgis tyfferen" (Herb. Jambouneris, i. 5).

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India.

We now give examples of the various uses:

TIFF, a. In the old English senses (in which it occurs also in the form tip, and is probably allied to tipple and tipsy); [see Prof. Skeat, quoted above].

(1) For a draught:

1758.—"Monday . . . Seven. Returned to my room. Made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine."—Journal of a Senior Fellow, in the Teller, No. 33.

(2) For small beer:

1604.—
". . . make waste more prodigal Than when our beer was good, that John may float
To Styx in beer, and lift up Charon's boat
With wholesome waves: and as the conduits ran
With claret at the Coronation,
So let your channels flow with single tiff,
For John I hope is crown'd. . . ."

On John Dawson, Butler of Christ Church, in Bishop Comber's Poems, ed. 1807, pp. 207-8.

TO TIFF, v. in the sense of taking off a draught.

1812.—

"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."
Combe, Dr. Syntax, I. Canto v.
(This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

TIFFIN (the Indian substantive).

1807.—"Many persons are in the habit of sitting down to a repast at one o'clock, which is called tiffin, and is in fact an early dinner."—Cordiner's Ceylon, i. 83.

1810.—"The (Mahomedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in *tiffin*s (slight repasts), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, V.M. i. 352.

"(published 1812) 'The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home.'"—Maria Graham, 29.

1811.—"Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who . . . detailed the delights of India, and the routine of its day; the changing linen, the curry-combing . . . the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay *tiffin*s, were all delightful to her in reciting. . . ."
—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, by Lætitia Maria Hawlin, ii. 12.

1824.—"The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin. . . ."
—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iii.

c. 1832.—"Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian Uncle . . . everybody has an Indian Uncle. . . . He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking tiffin; and such a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon: but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin."—De Quincey, Cassinistry of Roman Meals, in Works, vi. 259.

1847.—"'Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin,' a voice cried behind him, as a pudgy hand was laid on his shoulder. . . . But the Captain had no heart to go a-feasting with Joe Sedley."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 235.

1850.—"A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants . . . may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman."—Sir C. Napier, Farewell Address.

1853.—"This was the case for the prosecution. The court now adjourned for tiffin."
—Oakfield, i. 319.

1882.—"The last and most vulgar form of 'nobbling' the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotel-keepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale. . . ."
—Saty. Rev., March 23, 1877,

TO TIFE, in the Indian sense.

1803.—“He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to tiff at Floyer’s. After tiffin Closs said he should be glad to go.”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 118.

1811.—“We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to tiff on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After tiffin, I was cold and unwell.”—Ibid. p. 253. Tiffin here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun tiffin would be originally formed.

1816.—

“The huntsman now informed them all They were to tiff at Bobbry Hall. Mounted again, the party starts, Upsets the hackeries and carts, Hammers (see HUMMAUL) and palanquins and doolies, Dolies (see DEOBY) and burrawas (t) and coolies.”

The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Ht, by Quiz (Canto viii.) [Burrawa is probably H. Churud, ‘a pander.’]

1829.—“I was tiffing with him one day, when the subject turned on the sagacity of elephants. . . .”—John Shapp, ii. 207.

1859.—“Go home, Jack. I will tiff with you to-day at half-past two.”—J. Lang, Wanderings in India, p. 16.

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Anglo-Indian use:

1885.—“Look here, RANDOLPH, don’t you know,” said Sir PELL, . . . “Here you’ve been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and tiffing with Rajahs. . . .”—Punch, Essence of Parliament, April 25, p. 201.

TIGER, s. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin tygris, tigris, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, tigra, which gives the modern Pers. (and Hind.) tīr.*

* Sir H. Rawlinson gives tigra as old Persian for an arrow (see Herod. vol. iii, p. 352). Vulliamz seems to consider it rather an induction than a known word for an arrow. He says: “Besides the name of that river (Tigris) Arvand, which often occurs in the Shâhnâm, and which properly signifies ‘running’ or ‘swift’; another Medo-persian name Tigra is found in the cuneiform inscriptions, and is cognate with the Zend word tegha, tejerec, and Pehlvi teghra, i.e. ‘a running river,’ which is entered in Anquetil’s vocabulary. And these, along with the Persian tīr ‘an arrow,’ tegh ‘a sword,’ tikh and tegh ‘sharp,’ are to be referred Pliny says of the River Tigris: “a celeritate Tigris incipit vocari. Ita appellatur Madi sagittam” (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its “velocitatis tremendar,” Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour. [This view of the origin of the name is accepted by Schrader (Prehist. Ant. of the Aryan Peoples, E.T. 250), who writes: “Nothing like so far back in the history of the Indo-Europeans does the lion’s dreadful rival for supremacy over the beasts, the tiger, go. In India the songs of the Rigveda have nothing to say about him; his name (ryāghrā) first occurs in the Atharvaveda, i.e. at a time when the Indian immigration must have extended much farther towards the Ganges; for it is in the reeds and grasses of Bengal that we have to look for the tiger’s proper home. Nor is he mentioned among the beasts of prey in the Avesta. The district of Hyrcania, whose numerous tigers the later writers of antiquity speak of with especial frequency, was then called Frhrkama, ‘wolf-land.’ It is, therefore, not improbable . . . that the tiger has spread in relatively late times from India over portions of W. and N. Asia.”]

c. B.C. 325.—“The Indians think the Tiger (τὸν τῆγριν) a great deal stronger than the elephant. Neanehus says he saw the skin of a tiger, but did not see the beast itself, and that the Indians assert the tiger to be as big as the biggest horse; whilst in swiftness and strength there is no creature to be compared to him. And when he engages the elephant he springs on its head, and easily throttles it. Moreover, the creatures which we have seen and call tigres are only jackals which are dappled, and of a kind bigger than ordinary jackals.”—Arrian, Indica, xv. We apprehend that this big dappled jackal (δῶς) is meant for a hyæna.

c. B.C. 322.—“In the island of Tylos . . . there is also another wonderful thing they say . . . for there is a certain tree, from which they cut sticks, and these are very handsome articles, having a certain variegated colour, like the skin of a tiger. The wood is very heavy; but if it is struck against any solid substance it shivers like a piece of to the Zend root tikhsh, Skt. tij, ‘to sharpen.’ The Persian word tīr, ‘an arrow,’ may be of the same origin, since its primitive form appears to be tigra, from which it seems to come by elision of the g, as the Skt. tīr, ‘arrow,’ comes from tīra for tigra, where r seems to have taken the place of g. From the word tigra . . . we can also be derived the usual names of the river Tigris, Pers. Dikhla, Ar. Dijlah” (Valliers, s.v. tīr).

c. B.C. 321.—"And Ulpianus . . . said: 'Do we anywhere find the word used a masculine, τὸν τίγριν for I know that Philemon says thus in his Negara:

'1. We've seen the tigress (τὴν τίγριν) that Seleucus sent us;

Are we not bound to send Seleucus back
Some beast in fair exchange!'"

In Athenaeus, xiii. 57.

c. B.C. 320.—"According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prasii, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its hinder leg, overpowered it, and dragged it to him."—Strabo, xv. ch. 1, § 37 (Hamilton and Falconer's E.T. ii. 67).

c. B.C. 19.—"And Augustus came to Samos, and again passed the winter there . . . and all sorts of embassies came to him; and the Indians who had previously sent messages proclaiming friendship, now sent to make a solemn treaty, with presents, and among other things including tigers, which were then sent for the first time by the Romans; and if I am not mistaken by the Greeks also."—Dio Cassius, liv. 9. [See Maricute, Hist. Romane, ed. 1865, iv. 176.]

c. B.C. 19—

. . . duris genuit to cauitibus horrens Caucasus, Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera tigres."—Jen. iv. 366-7.

c. A.D. 70.—"The Emperor Augustus . . . in the year that Q. Tubero and Fabius Maximus were Consuls together . . . was the first of all others that showed a tame tygre within a cage: but the Emperor Claudius found at once. . . Tygres are bred in Hircania and India: this beast is most dreadful for incomparable swiftness."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, i. 201.

c. 80-90.—"Wherefore the land is called Dachenabadis (see DECCAN), for the South is called Duchanis in their tongue. And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τίγρεις) and elephants, and immense serpents (ὄφιδες) and hyenas (ὑπὸκρίτας) and cynocephalus of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 50.

c. A.D. 180.—"That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martiora (Martichora), and by the Greeks Androphagus (Man-eater), I am convinced is really the tiger (τίγρις). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp prickles at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer, I don't believe it to be true, but only to have been generated by the excessive fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour;—no doubt when they see him in the bright sunlight he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, IX. xxi. 4. [See Frazer's tr. i. 470; v. 88. Martichorus is here Pers. wardumkhadr, 'eater of men.']

1293.—"Enchore sachies qe lo Grant Sire a lion leopars asez qe tuit sunt bon da chacer et da prendre bestes. . . Il ha plosors lyons grandis-mes, gruignors asez qe colo do Babilonie. Il sunt do mout blaus poil et do mout blaus color, car il sunt tout verges por lone, noir et vermoil et blanc. Il sunt afités a prandro sengler sauvages et les buell sauvages, et orres et aines sauvages et corf et carrolz et autres bestes."—Marco Polo, Quog. Text, ch. xcii. Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and red and white, as of a Lion. And a medieval Bestiary has a chapter on the Tiger which begins: "Une Beste est qui est apelée Tigre, c'est une maniere do serpent."—(In Cahier et Martin, Mélanges d'Irrehol. ii. 110).

1171.—"This meano while there came in certein men sent from a Prince of India, wth certain strange beastes, the first whereof was a lionca leddu in a chayno by one that had skyl, which they call in their language Baburth. She is like unto a lyonesse; but she is redde coloured, streaked all over wth black strykes; her face is redde wth certain white and blacke spotted, the bealy white, and tyled like the lyon: seemyng to be a marvailouse fiers beast."—Josafat Barbaro, Hak. Soc. pp. 53-51. Here again is an excellent description of a tiger, but that name seems unknown to the traveller. Baburth is in the Ital. original Baburth, Pers. babr, a tiger.

1553.—". . . Beginning from the point of Cingapura and all the way to Pullocombilaw, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malacca . . . there is no other town with a name except this City of Malacca, only some havens of fishermen, and in the interior a very few villages. And indeed the most of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are so numerous that many come into the city itself at night in search of prey. And it has happened, since we took the place, that a tiger leapt into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence, and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the heels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."—Barrow, II. vi. 1. Lest I am doing the great historian wrong as to this Munchausen-like story, I give the original: "E já aconteceu . . . saltar hum tigre em hum quntal cercado de madeira bem alto, o levou hum tronco de madeira com trez (tres ?) escravos que estavam prezos nelle, com os quaes saltou de claro em claro per cima da cerca."

1583.—"We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts" (the Pegu delta) "and prey on whatever they can get at. And although we were on that account anchored in midstream, nevertheless it was asserted that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey."—Gaspard Balbi, f. 91c.

1586.—"We went through the wilderness because the right way was full of thieves; when we passed the country of fourra, where we found but few villages, but almost all wilderness, and saw many Buffs, Swine, and Deers, Grass longer than a man, and very many Tigris."—R. Fitch, in Purchas, ii. 173b.

1673.—"Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Combes (Koonbes), the Body tied to a long Bamboo, the Tail extended . . . it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail, Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat . . . the Visage Fierce and Majestic, the Teeth gnawing. . . ."—Fraser, 170.

1683.—"In ye afternoon they found a great Tiger, one of ye black men shot a barbed arrow into his Buttock. Mr. Froucheville and Capt. Haynes alighted off their horses and advanced towards the thicket where ye Tiger lay. The people making a great noise, ye Tiger flew out upon Mr. Froucheville, and he shot him with a brace of Bullets into ye breast: at which he made a great noise, and returned again to his den. The Black Men seeing of him wounded fell upon him, but the Tiger had so much strength as to kill 2 men, and wound a third, before he died. At Night ye Ruger sent me the Tiger."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 66-67.

1751.—"There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tyger was baited with Solemnity, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Novelty, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division. . . ."—A Collection of Letters relating to the E. I. Company, &c. (Tract), 1751, p. 13.

1869.—"Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des pirs (see PEER); aussi les naturels du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. p. 21.

1872.—"One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. . . . This was his story:—

'Sahib, I was going along with the letters . . . which I had received from your highness . . . a great tiger came out and stood in the path. Then I feared for my life; and the tiger stood, and I stood, and we looked at each other. I had no weapon but my kukri (Koolery) . . . and the Government letters. So I said, 'My lord Tiger, here are the Government letters, the letters of the Honourable Kumpany Bahadur . . . and it is necessary for me to go on with them.' The tiger never ceased looking at me, and when I had done speaking he growled, but he never offered to get out of the way. On this I was much more afraid, so I kneeled down and made obeisance to him; but he did not take any more notice of that either, so at last I told him I should report the matter to the Sahib, and I throw down the letters in front of him, and came here as fast as I was able. Sahib, I now ask for your justice against that tiger.'"—Ed. Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 411.

TINCALL, s. Bornx. Pers. tinkār, but apparently originally Skt. ṭapkaṇa, and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it, in the Himalaya—Tāṛṇava of Ptolemy. [Mr. Atkinson (Himalayan Gaz. ii. 357) connects the name of this people with that of the tangun pony.]

1525.—"Tymquall, small, 60 tangas a maund."—Lembrança, 50.

1563.—"It is called borax and criscola; and in Arabic thacra, and so the Guzeratis call it. . . ."—Garcia, f. 78.

c. 1590.—"Having reduced the Eharat to small lumps, he adds to every maund of it 1½ sers of tangar (borax) and 3 sers of pounded natrum, and kneads them together."—Ibn, i. 20.

[1757.—"A small quantity of Tutenege (Tootsnague), Tinkal and Japan Copper was also found here. . . ."—Jus, 105.]

TINDAL, s. Malayäl. taṇḍal, Telug. taṇḍalu, also in Mahr. and other vernaculars ṭaṇḍel, ṭaṇḍail, [which Platts connects with ṭāṇḍā, Skt. tantra, 'a line of men,' but the Madras Gloss. derives the S. Indian forms from Mal. tandu, 'an ear,' calli, 'to pull.'] The head or commander of a body of men; but in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascars, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1318.—"The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailakari this princess invited the nāḥkotalah (Nacoda) or owner of the ship, the ḥarāni (see GRANNY) or clerk, the merchants, the persons of distinction, the taṇḍil. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250. The Moorish traveller explains the word as muḥ-addum (Mocaddum, q.v.) al-rajāl, which the French translators render as "général des pistons," but we may hazard the correction of "Master of the crew."

c. 1590.—"In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nākhudd, or owner of the ship. . . . 3. The Tandil, or chief of the Maldia (see CLASSY) or sailors. . . ."—Iin, i. 230.

1673.—"The Captain is called Nucquedah, the boatswain Tindal. . . ."—Fryer, 107.

1753.—"One Tindal, or Corporal of Las-cars."—Orme, ii. 339.

[1826.—"I desired the tindal, or steers-man to answer, 'Bombay.'"—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 157.]

TINNEVELLY, n.p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tiru-nel-vēli, 'Sacred Rice-hedge,' [The Madras Gloss gives 'Sacred Paddy-village.'] The district formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura Kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawāb of Arcot (Caldwell, H. of Tinnevely).

TIPAREY, s. Beng. and Hind. tipāri, tepari, the fruit of Physalis peruviana, L., N.O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as 'Cape gooseberry,' [which is usually said to take its name from the Cape of Good Hope, but as it is a native of tropical America, Mr. Ferguson (8 ser. N. & Q. xi. 106) suggests that the word may really be cape or cap, from the peculiarity of its structure noted below.] It is sometimes known as 'Brazil cherry.' It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (pōra). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam. We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word tehpā, 'inflated,' which gives its name to a species of tetrodon or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner. The native name of the fruit in N.W. India is māk or māko, but tipāri is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian Island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

1815.—"On Makia they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives 'teipara'; this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste."—F.S. Expedition, by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

1878.—". . . The enticing tipari in its crackly covering. . . ."—P. Robinson, in My Indian Garden, 49-50.

TIPPOO SAHIB, n.p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipū Sultan, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad. [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, i. 522, ed. 1869), says that the tomb is at Arcot.]

TIRKUT, s.—Foresail. Sea Hind. from Port. triguette (Roebuck).

TIYAN, n.p. Malayāl. Tiyan, or Tiran, pl. Tiyar or Tivar. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) of Malabar. The word signifies 'islander,' [from Mal. tiyu, Skt. dīpa, 'an island']; and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon (see TIER CUTTY).

1510.—"The third class of Pagans are called Tiya, who are artisans."—Varthema, 142.

1516.—"The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tivas (read Tivas), who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything . . . for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country."—Barboza, Lisbon ed. 335.

[1800.—"All Tirs can eat together, and intermarry. The proper duty of the cast is to extract the juice from palm-trees, to boil it down to Jagory (Jaggery), and to distil it into spirituous liquors; but they are also very diligent as cultivators, porters, and cutters of firewood."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 415, and see Logan, Malabar, i. 110, 142.]

TOBACCO, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

[? c. 1550.—". . . Abū Kīr would carry the cloth to the market-street and sell it, and with its price buy meat and vegetables and tobacco. . . ."—Burton, Arab. Nights, vii. 210. The only mention in the Nights and the insertion of some scribe.]

"It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabacco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and stinking smoke, I was obliged to go away in haste, and seek some other place."—Girolamo Benzoni, Hak. Soc. p. 81. [The word tabaco is from the language of Hayti, and meant, first, the pipe, secondly, the plant, thirdly, the sleep which followed its use (Mrs. J. Platt, 9 ser. N. & Q. viii. 322).]

1585.—"Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indicam illam plantam quam Tabaccam vocant et Nicotiam, qua contra cruditates ab Indis edocti, usi erant, in Angliam primi, quod suum, intulerunt. Ex illo sane tempore usu coepit esse creberrimum, et magno pretio, dum quam plurimi graveolentem illius fumum, alii lascivientes, alii valetudini consulentes, per tubulum testaceum inaccessibili aviditate passim hauriunt, et mox e naribus efflant; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccanae non minus quam cervisariae et vinariae passim per oppida habeantur. Ut Anglorum corpora (quod salus ille dixit) qui hac plantam tantopere delectantur in Barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur; quum iisdem quibus Barbari delectentur et sanari se posse credant."—Gul. Camdeni, Annal. Rerum Anglicanum . . . regn. Elizabetha, ed. 1717, ii. 449.

1592.—

"Into the woods thence forth in haste shee went

To seek for hearbes that mote him remedy;

For shee of herbes had great intendment,
Taught of the Nympe which from her infancy

Her noursed had in true Nobility:

This whether yt divine Tobacco were,

Or Panachaea, or Polygony,

Shee fownd, and brought it to her patient deare

Who at this while lay bleeding out his hart-blood nere."

The Faerie Queen, III. v. 32.

1597.—"His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villafranca). "made no answer, but called for tobacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took tobacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting."—Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1598.—"Col. Ods me I marle what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoke and embers: there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the bell went for yesternight; one of them they say will never seape it; he voided a bushel of soot yesterday upward and downward . . . its little better than rats-bane or toaker."—Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

1604.—"Oct. 19. Demise to Tho: Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Impost of 8s. 8d., and the old Custom of 2d. per pound on tobacco."—Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1605.—"In Bijápúr I had found some tobacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work. . . . His Majesty (Akbar) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appurtenances: he expressed great surprise and examined the tobacco, which was made up in pipefuls; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khán-i-Azam replied: 'This is tobacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pipeful. He began to smoke it, when his physician approached and forbade his doing so" . . . (omitting much that is curious). "As I had brought a large supply of tobacco and pipes, I sent some to several of the nobles, while others sent to ask for some; indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly."—Laud Beg, in Elliot, vi. 155-167.

1610.—"The Turks are also incredible takers of Opium . . . carrying it about with them both in peace and in warre; which they say expelleth all feare, and makes them courageous; but I rather thinke giddy headed. . . . And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have ioyned vnto them great heads of wood to containe it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes lookt into (for Morat Bassa not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turke, and so to be led in derision through the Cities), no question but it would prove a principall commodity. Nevertheless they will take it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doth passe here amongst them for most excellent."—Sandys, Journey, 66.

1615.—"Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di pigliar in conversazione per guato: ma io non ho voluto mai provarne, e ne avera cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinale Crescenzo qualche volta per medicamento insegnatogli dal Signor don Virginio Orsino, cha primo di tutti, se io non fallo, gli anni addietro lo portò in Roma d'Inghilterra."—P. della Valle, i. 76.

1616.—"Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures all sorts of diseases (which neuer any drugga could do before) in all persons and at all times. . . . It cures the gout in the foot and (which is miraculous) in that very instant when the smoke thereof, as light, flies up into the head, the virtue thereof, as heavy, runs down to the little toe. It helps all sorts of agues. It refreshes a weary man, and yet makes a man hungry. Being taken when they go to bed, it makes one sleep soundly, and yet being taken when a man is sleepy and drowsie, it will, as they say, awake his braine, and quicken his understanding. . . . O omnipotent power of Tobacco! And if it could by the smoke thereof chase out devils, as the smoke of Tobias fish did (which I am sure could smell no stronger) it would serve for a precious Relique, both for the Superstitious Priests, and the insolent Puritanes, to cast out devils withall."—K. James I., Counter-blast to Tobacco, in Works, pp. 219-220.

1617.—"As the smoking of tobacco (tambákú) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Sháh 'Abbás, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Irán. But Khán-i-'Alam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and often smoked."—Memoirs of Jahángir, in Elliot, v. 851. See the same passage rendered by Blochmann, in Ind. Antig. i. 161.

1623.—"Incipit nostro seculo in immensum crescere usus tabacco, atque afflicti homines oculita quidem delectatione, ut qui illi semel assueti sunt, difficile postea abstinant."—Bacon, H. Vitæ et Mortis, in B. Montague's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Yule, written in India about the beginning of last century: *

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medicinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, its rarity prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal, within a short period after its introduction into Hindostan; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehan (commenced A.H. 1037) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, nay even often over the necessities of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So rooted was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this deleterious Plant! Nature recoils at the very idea of touching the Saliva of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pass the moistened Tube from one mouth to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acrid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connoisseur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of radical Heat. Without doubt the Hookah is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Counsellor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Apartments: it gives joy to the Beholder in our public Halls. The Music of its sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the Fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with extatic delight. . . ."—(extera desunt).

c. 1760.—"Tambákú. It is known from the Madsir-i-Rakimí that the tobacco came from Europe to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akbar Sháh (1556-1605), since which time it has been in general use."—Bahár-i-'Ajam, quoted by Blochmann, in Ind. Antig. i. 161.

1878.—It appears from Miss Bird's Japan that tobacco was not cultivated in that country till 1805. In 1612 and 1615 the Shogun prohibited both culture and use of tabako. — See the work, i. 276-77. [According to Mr. Chamberlain (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 402) by 1651 the law was so far relaxed that smoking was permitted, but only out-of-doors.]

TOBRA, s. Hind. tobra, [which, according to Platts, is Skt. protha, 'nose of a horse,' inverted]. The leather nose-bag in which a horse's feed is administered. "In the Ner-budda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobras" (Pl.-Gen. R. II.

* Some notice of Major Yule, whose valuable Oriental MSS. were presented to the British Museum after his death, will be found in Dr. Rien's Preface to the Catalogue of Persian MSS. (vol. iii. p. xviii.)

Keatinge). As we should say, 'buckets.' [The use of the nosebag is referred to by Sir T. Herbert (ed. 1634): "The horses (of the Persians) feed usually of barley and chopt-straw put into a bag, and fastened about their heads, which implies the nanger." Also see TURA.]

1808.—" . . . stable-boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra, or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostler loathe and leave it alone."—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

[1875.—"One of the horsemen dropped his tobra or nose-bag."—Drew, Jummo, 230.]

TODDY, s. A corruption of Hind. tārī, i.e. the fermented sap of the tār or palmyra, Skt. tāla, and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryota urens; palm-wine. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced. The tāla-tree seems to be indicated, though confusedly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. n.c. 320.—"Megasthenes tells us . . . the Indians were in old times nomadic . . . were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (!) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tala, and that there grow on them as there grows at the tops of the (date) palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool."—Arrian, Indica, vii, tr. by McCrindle.

c. 1330.—" . . . There is another tree of a different species, which . . . gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tari."—Fr. Jordanus, 16.

[1531.—"There is in Gujarat a tree of the palm-tribe, called tari agadi (millet tree). From its branches cups are suspended, and when the cut end of a branch is placed into one of these vessels, a sweet liquid, something of the nature of arrack, flows out in a continuous stream . . . and presently changes into a most wonderful wine."—Travels of Sidi Ali Reis, trans. A. Vambéry, p. 29.]

[1609-10.—"Tarree." See under SURA.]

1611.—"Palmito Wine, which they call Taddy."—N. Downton, in Puchas, i. 298.

[1614.—"A sort of wine that distillth out of the Palmotto trees, called Tadie."—Foster, Letters, iii. 4.]

1615.—

" . . . And then more to glad yee Weele have a health to al our friends in Tadee."

Verses to T. Coryat, in Crudities,
iii. 47.

1623.—" . . . on board of which we stayed till nightfall, entertaining with conversation and drinking tari, a liquor which is drawn from the coco-nut trees, of a whitish colour, a little turbid, and of a somewhat rough taste, though with a blending in sweetness, and not unpalatable, something like one of our vin piquant. It will also intoxicate, like wine, if drunk over freely."—P. della Valle, ii. 530; [Hak. Soc. i. 62].

[1631.—"The Toddy-tree is like the Date of Palm; the Wine called Toddy is got by wounding and piercing the Tree, and putting a Jar or Pitcher under it, so as the Liquor may drop into it."—Sir T. Herbert, in Harris, i. 408.]

1643.—"The country . . . is planted with palmito-trees, from which a sap is drawn called Terry, that they very commonly drink."—Van Twick, 12.

1653.—" . . . le tari qui est le vin ordinaire des Indes."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 216.

1673.—"The Natives singing and roaring all Night long; being drunk with Toddy, the Wine of the Cocco."—Fryer, 53.

"As for the rest, they are very respectful, unless the Seamen and Soldiers get drunk, either with Toddy or Bang."—Ibid. 91.

1686.—"Besides the Liquor or Water in the Fruit, there is also a sort of Wine drawn from the Tree called Toddy, which looks like Whay."—Dampier, i. 293.

1705.—" . . . cettte liqueurs s'appelle tari."—Lullier, 13.

1710.—This word was in common use at Madras.—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1750.—"J. Was vor Louto trincken Taddy? C. Die Soldaten, die Land Portugiesen, die Parroier (see PARIAH) und Schiffleute trincken diesen Taddy."—Madras, older Fort St. George, &c., Halle, 1750.

1857.—"It is the unfermented juice of the Palmyra which is used as food: when allowed to ferment, which it will do before midday, if left to itself, it is changed into a sweet, intoxicating drink called 'kal' or 'toddy.'"—Bp. Caldwell, Lectures on Tinnevely Mission, p. 33.

¶ "The Rat, returning home full of Toddy, said, If I meet the Cat, I will tear him in pieces."—Ceylon Proverb, in Ind. Antig. i. 59.

Of the Scotch application of the word we can find but one example in Burns, and, strange to say, no mention in Jameson's Dictionary:

1785.—
 "The lads an' lasses, blytholy bent
 To mind baith saul an' body,
 Sit round the table, weel content
 An' steer about the toddy. . . ."
Burns, The Holy Fair.

1798.—"Action of the caso, for giving her a dose in some toddy, to intoxicate and inflame her passions."—Root's Reports, i. 80.

1801.—
 "... I've nae fear for't;
 For siller, faith, ye no'er did care for't,
 Unless to help a needful body,
 An' got an ainrin glass o' toddy."
Tannahill, Epistle to James Barr.

TODDY-BIRD, s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya, or Weaver-bird (Ploceus Baya, Blyth):
 but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder. [Another bird, the Artamus fuscus, is, according to Balfour (Cycl. s.v.) called the toddy shrike.]

[1673.—"For here is a Bird (having its name from the Tree it chus'es for its Sanctuary, the toddy-tree). . . ."—Fryer, 76.]

e. 1750-60.—"It is in this tree (see PALMYRA, BRAB) that the toddy-birds, so called from their attachment to that tree, make their exquisitely curious nests, wrought out of the thinnest reeds and filaments of branches, with an inimitable mechanism, and are about the likeness of a partridge (!) The birds themselves are of no value. . . ."—Thurc. i. 18.

TODDY-CAT, s. This name is in
 S. India applied to the Paradolurus Mnangu, Jerdon: [the P. niger, the Indian Palm-Civet of Blanford (Mammalia, 106).] It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see CHUTT). Its name is given for its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

[TOKO, s. Slang for 'a thrashing.'
 The word is improper. Hind. tolnd, 'to censure, blame,' and has been converted into a noun on the analogy of bunnow and other words of the same kind.

[1823.—"Toco for yam—Yams are food for negroes in the W. Indies . . . and if, instead of receiving his proper ration of these,
 blackee gets a whip (toco) about his back, why 'he has caught toco' instead of yam."
 —John Bee, Slang Dict.

[1867.—"Toko for Yam. An expression peculiar to negroes for crying out before being hurt."—Smyth, Sailor's Word-Book, s.v.]

TOLA, s. An Indian weight (chiefly of gold or silver), not of extreme antiquity. Hind. tolā, Skt. tolā, 'a balance,' tol, 'to lift up, to weigh.' The Hindu scale is 8 rattis (see RUTTEE) = 1 maṭha, 12 maṭhas =
 1 tolā. Thus the tolā was equal to 96 rattis. The proper weight of the ratti, which was the old Indian unit of weight, has been determined by Mr. E.
 Thomas as 1.75 grains, and the medieval tanga which was the prototype of the rupee was of 100 rattis weight. "But . . . the fictitious ratti of the Muslims was merely an aliquot part— $\frac{1}{2}$ of the comparatively recent tolā, and $\frac{1}{2}$ of the newly devised rupee." By the Regulation VII. of 1833, putting the British India coinage on its present footing (see under SEER) the tolā weighing 180 grs., which is also the weight of the rupee, is established by the same Regulation, as the unit of the system of weights, 80 tolas = 1 ser, 40 seras = 1 Mauud.

1563.—"I knew a secretary of Nizamoxa (see NIZADIALUCO), a native of Coraṇi, who ate every day three tolas (of opium), which is the weight of ten cruzanos and a half; but this Coraṇi (Khoraṇi), though he was a man of letters and a great scribe and official, was always nodding or sleeping."—Macart. i. 155b.

1610.—"A Tola is a rupee challany of silver, and ten of these Tolas are the value of one of gold."—Hackins, in Purchas, i.
 217.

1615-18.—"Two tola and a half being an ounce."—Sir T. Rice, in Purchas, i. 545; [Hak. Soc. i. 189].

1678.—"Over all the Empire of the Great Mogul, all the Gold and Silver is weigh'd with Weights, which they call Tolla, which amounts to 9 deniers and eight grams of our weight."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 15; [ed. Bull,
 i. 14].

TOMAUN, s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 7s. 6d. [In 1899 the exchange was about 53 crans to the £1; 10 Crans = 1 tumān.] Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dīnārs; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degene-rating in value. The tomaun in Fryer's time (1677) is reckoned by him as equal to £3, 6s. 8d. P. della Valle's estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4, 10s. 0d., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert's valuation (5 × 13s. 8d.) is the same as Fryer's. In the first and third of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

1293.—"You see when a Tartar prince goes forth to war, he takes with him, say, 100,000 horse . . . they call the corps of 100,000 men a Tuc; that of 10,000 they call a Toman."—Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 51.

c. 1310.—"Ces deux portions réunies forment un total de 800 toumans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems."—Shahabuddin, Masbuk-ul-Idris, in Nat. d'États, xiii. 191.

c. 1317.—"I was informed . . . that when the Kân assembled his troops, and called the army of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amir Tumân, or lord of 10,000."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 293-300.

A form of the Tartar word seems to have passed into Russian:

c. 1559.—"One thousand in the language of the people is called Tasut; likewise ten thousand in a single word Tma: twenty thousand and Ducuma: thirty thousand and Titma."—Herbertstein, Delle Moscovie, Racconto, iii. 153.

[c. 1590.—In the Sarkâr of Kandahâr "eighteen dinârs make a tumân, and each tumân is equivalent to 800 dinârs. The tumân of Khurasân is equal in value to 30 rupees and the tumân of Irak to 10."—Ibn Jureth, ii. 393-91.]

1619.—"L'ambasciadore Indiano . . . ordinò che donasse a tutti un tomano, cioè dieci zecchini per uno."—P. della Valle, ii. 22.

c. 1630.—"But how miserable so ere it comes to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; sowing every year his insatiable coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five marks sterling)."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

[c. 1665.—In Persia "the ahâsi is worth 4 shâhis, and the tomân 50 ahâsis or 200 shâhis."—Tavernier, ed. Dall, i. 21.]

1677.—" . . . Receipt of Custom (at Gombroon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thomands, every Thomand making Three pound and a Noble in our Account, Half which we have a Right to."—Fryer, 222.

1711.—"Camels, Horses, &c., are generally sold by the Tomand, which is 200 Shahues or 50 Abasces; and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Tomands, as we reckon by Pound in England."—Lockyer, 229.

[1853.—"Girwar Singh, Tomandar, came up with a detachment of the special police."—Stecman, Journey through Outh, ii. 17.]

TOMBACK, s. An alloy of copper and zinc, i.e. a particular modification of brass, formerly imported from Indo-Chinese countries. Port. tambaca, from Malay tâmbaga and tâmbaga, 'copper,' which is again from Skt. tamprika and tâmbra.

1602.—"Their drummers are huge pannoes made of a metall called Tombaga, which makes a most hollow sound."—Scott, Discourse of Java, in Purchas, i. 180.

1690.—"This Tombac is a kind of Metal, whose scarcity renders it more valuable than Gold. . . . 'Tis thought to be a kind of natural Compound of Gold, Silver, and Brass, and in some places the mixture is very Rich, as at Burao, and the Monelloes, in others more alloyed, as at Siam."—Ovington, 510.

1759.—"The Productions of this Country (Siam) are prodigious quantities of Grain, Cotton, Benjamin . . . and Tambacck."—In Dalrymple, i. 119.

TOM-TOM, s. Tamtam, a native drum. The word comes from India, and is chiefly used there. Forbes (Ras-Mala, in. 401) [ed. 1878, p. 665] says the thing is so called because used by criers who beat it tâm-tâm, 'place by place,' i.e. first at one place, then at another. But it is rather an onomatopœia, not belonging to any language in particular. In Ceylon it takes the form tamattama, in Tel. tappeta, in Tam. tambattam; in Malay it is tan-tan, all with the same meaning. (When badminton was introduced at Satâra natives called it Tamtam phât khel, tam-tam meaning 'battledore,' and the shuttlecock looked like a flower (phât). Tommy Atkins promptly turned this into "Tom Fool" (Calcutta Rev. xvi. 316).] In French the word tamtam is used, not for a drum of any kind, but for a Chinese gong (q.v.). M. Littré, however, in the Supplement to his Dict., remarks that this use is erroneous.

1693.—"It is ordered that to-morrow morning the Choultry Justices do cause the Tom Tom to be beat through all the Streets of the Black Town. . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 265.

1711.—"Their small Pipes, and Tom Toms, instead of Harmony made the Discord the greater."—Lockyer, 235.

1755.—In the Calcutta Mayor's expenses we find:

"Tom Tom, R. 1 1 0."—In Long, 58.

1761.—"You will give strict orders to the Zemindars to furnish Oil and Mushauls, and Tom Toms and Pikemen, &c., according to custom."—Ibid. 391.

1770.—“... An instrument of brass which the Europeans lately borrowed from the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tam” (!).—Ibid. Reynal, tr. 1777, i. 30.

1789.—“An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng. . . .”—Munro, Narrative, 73.

1801.—“I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the bazar by beat of tom-tom.”—Wellington, iii. 188.

1821.—“The Mahattas in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tamtams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible.”—Scrymgeour, Memoirs of Elliott, ch. iv.

1836.—For the use of the word by Dickens, see under GUM-GUM.

1862.—“The first musical instruments were without doubt percussive sticks, calabashes, tomtoms.”—Herbert Spencer, First Principles, 350.

1881.—“The tom-tom is ubiquitous. It knows no rest. It is content with depriving man of his. It selects by preference the hours of the night as the time for its malign influence to assert its most potent sway. It reverberates its dull unmeaning monotonous through the fitful dreams which sheer exhaustion brings. It inspires delusive hopes by a brief lull only to break forth with refreshed vigour into wilder ecstasies of maniacal fury—accompanied with nasal incantations and protracted howls. . . .”—Oberland Times of India, April 11.

TONGA, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. danūd, [Skt. tamāṅga, ‘a platform’]. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla, Darjeeling, and other hill-stations. [Tavernier speaks of a carriage of this kind, but does not use the word :

[c. 1665.—“They have also, for travelling, small, very light, carriages which contain two persons; but usually one travels alone . . . to which they harness a pair of oxen only. These carriages, which are provided, like ours, with curtains and cushions, are not slung. . . .”—Tavernier, ed. Bull, i. 41.]

1871.—“The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poona or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances. . . . The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion.”—Settlement Report of Adik.

1879.—“A tongha dāk has at last been started between Rajpore and Dehra. The first tongha took only 5½ hours from Rajpore to Saharanpore.”—Pioneer Mail.

1880.—“In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that ‘Syud Mahomed Padsbah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain moolahs of tonga dāk.’ . . . Is the relentless tonga a region of country or a religious organization! . . . The original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after ‘certain moolahs.’ Then came an independent sentence about the tonga dāk working admirably between Peshawar and Jallalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times, interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen, associating the ominous mystery with the moolahs, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own.”—Pioneer Mail, June 10.

1881.—“Bearing in mind Mr. Framji’s extraordinary services, notably those rendered during the mutiny, and . . . that he is crippled for life . . . by wounds received while gallantly defending the mail tonga cart in which he was travelling, when attacked by dacoits. . . .”—Letter from Bombay Govt. to Govt. of India, June 17, 1881.

TONICATCHY, TUNNYKETCH, s. In Madras this is the name of the domestic water-carrier, who is generally a woman, and acts as a kind of under-housemaid. It is a corr. of Tamil tannir-kāṣṭi, tannikkāṣṭi, an abbreviation of tannir-kāṣṭi, ‘water-woman.’

c. 1780.—“‘Voudriez-vous me permettre de faire ce trajet avec mes gens et mes bagages, qui ne consistent qu’en deux malles, quatre caisses de vin, deux ballots de toiles, et deux femmes, dont l’une est ma cuisinière, et l’autre, ma tannir-kāṣṭi ou portouse d’eau.’”—Hausner, i. 212.

1792.—“The Armenian . . . now mounts a bit of blood . . . and . . . dashes the mud about through the streets of the Black Town, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tawny-kertches.”—Madras Courier, April 26.

TONJON, and vulg. TOMJOHN, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palankin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jompon (q.v.), for use in a hilly country, has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung. We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given, by Williamson below, unless it is intended for thām-jāṅgh, which might mean ‘support-thigh.’ Mr. Platts gives as forms in Hind. tāmjhān and thāmjhān. The word is perhaps adopted from some trans-gangetic language. A rude contrivance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a 'Tellicherry chair' (ii. 40).

c. 1801.—"I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283.

1810.—"About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jaung, i.e. 'a support to the feet.'"—Williamson, V.M.S. 322-23.

"Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palankeen, to meet me."—Maria Graham, 166.

[1827.—"In accordance with Lady D'Oyly's earnest wish I go out every morning in her tonjin."—Diary of Mrs. Fenton, 100.]

1829.—"I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson's tonjon, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it."—Mem. of Col. Mountbain, 88.

[1832.—". . . I never seat myself in the palankeen or thonjaun without a feeling bordering on self-reproach. . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 320.]

1839.—"He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlebow, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!"—Letters from Madras, 290.

[1819.—"We proceeded to Nawabgunge, the minister riding out with me, for some miles, to take leave, as I sat in my tonjohn."—Seeaman, Journey through Oudh, i. 2.]

TOOLSY, s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocimum sanctum, L.). Skt. tulsi or tulasi, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of masonry in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastic quoted below. See also Waril's Hindoes, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

[c. 1650.—"They who bear the tulasi round the neck . . . they are Vaishnavas, and sanctify the world."—Bhakti Mala, in H. Wilson's Works, i. 41.]

1672.—"Almost all the Hindus . . . adore a plant like our Basilica gentile, but of more pungent odour. . . . Every one before his house has a little altar, girl with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers, and in these the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas."—P. Vincenzo Murru, 300.

1673.—"They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little place or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Culaminth, or (by them called) Tulce, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence."—Fryer, 199.

1812.—"Veneram a planta chamada Tulosso, por dizem 6 do pateo dos Deoses, e por isso 6 commun no pateo de suas casas, e todas as manhas lho vao tributar veneração."—Anuário Maritimo, iii. 153.

1872.—"At the head of the ghât, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant . . . placed on a high pedestal of masonry."—Guedes Samanta, i. 18.

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in S. Europe:

1885.—"I have frequently realised how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystic properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ's grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil's day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. On returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embroideries and silk and raiment will be free from the visitation of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period."—J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 328.

TOOMONGONG, s. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johôr, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johôr are the representatives of the old Mahomedan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johôr, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tuanangung was a minister who had in Peshwa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure: and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawford says: "The word is most probably Javanese; and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office" (Malay Dict. s.v.)

[1774.—"Paid a visit to the Sultan . . . and Iangaram Toomongong."—Diary of J. Herbert, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, ii. 433.

[1830.—“This (Bopāti), however, is rather a title of office than of mere rank, as these governors are sometimes Tumungungas, An'gōāis, and of still inferior rank.”—Raffles, Java, 2nd ed. i. 293.]

1881.—“Singapore had originally been purchased from two Malay chiefs; the Sultan and Tumangong of Johore. The former, when Sir Stamford Raffles entered into the arrangement with them, was the titular sovereign, whilst the latter, who held an hereditary office, was the real ruler.”—Cavenagh, Reminis. of an Indian Official, 273.

TOON, TOON-WOOD, s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Meliaceae. Hind. tun, tūn, Skt. tunna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner's work in many parts of India. It is identified by Benthams with the Red Cedar of N.S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller). See Brandis, Forest Flora, 73. A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch'un, which looks like the same word.

[1793.—The tree first described by Sir W. Jones, As. Res. iv. 253.]

1810.—“The toon, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal. . . .”—Marquand, 101.

1837.—“Rosellini informs us that there is an Egyptian harp at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Athenarum, July 22, 1837). This may be the Cedrela Toona.”—Royle's Hindu Medicine, 30.

TOORKEY, s. A Turki horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeders of Asia Minor.

1298.—“... the Turcomans . . . dwell among mountains and downs where they find good pasture, for their occupation is cattle-keeping. Excellent horses, known as Turquans, are reared in their country. . . .”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 2.

1782.—“Wanted one or two Tanyans (see TANGUN) rising six years old, Wanted also a Bay Toorkey, or lly Tazzi (see TAZEE) Horse for a Buggy. . . .”—India Gazette, Feb. 9.

“To be disposed of at Ghyratty . . . a Buggy, almost new . . . a pair of uncommonly beautiful spotted Toorkays.”—Ibid. March 2.

TOOTNAGUE, s. Port. tutenaga. This word appears to have two different applications. a. A Chinese alloy of copper, zinc, and nickel, sometimes called ‘white copper’ (i.e. peh-tung of the Chinese). The finest qualities are alleged to contain arsenic.* The best comes from Yunnan, and Mr. Joubert of the Garnier Expedition, came to the conclusion that it was produced by a direct mixture of the ores in the furnace (Voyage d'Exploration, ii. 160). b. It is used in Indian trade in the same loose way that spelter is used, for either zinc or pewter (peh-yuen, or ‘white lead’ of the Chinese). The base of the word is no doubt the Pers. tūtiya, Skt. tuttha, an oxide of zinc, generally in India applied to blue vitriol or sulphate of copper, but the formation of the word is obscure. Possibly the last syllable is merely an adjective affix, in which way nāḥ is used in Persian. Or it may be nāga in the sense of lead, which is one of the senses given by Shakespeare. In one of the quotations given below, tutenague is confounded with culin (see CALAY). Moodeen Sheriff gives as synonyms for zinc, Tam. tutunāgam [tutundgam], Tel. tutundgam [tutindgamu], Mahr. and Guz. tutti-nāga. Sir G. Staunton is curiously wrong in supposing (as his mode of writing seems to imply) that tutenague is a Chinese word. [The word has been finally corrupted in

* St. Julien et P. Champion, Industries Anciennes et Modernes de l'Empire Chinois, 1869, p. 73. Wells Williams says: “The peh-tung argentum, or white copper of the Chinese, is an alloy of copper 40 4, zinc 25 4, nickel 31 4, and iron 2 4, and occasionally a little silver; and these proportions are nearly those of German silver.”—Middle Kingdom, ed. 1883, li. 19.

[1757.—Speaking of the freemen enrolled at Nottingham in 1757, Bailey (Annals of Nottinghamshire, iii. 1235) mentions as one of them William Tutin, buckle-maker, and then goes on to say: "It was a son of this latter person who was the inventor of that beautiful composite white metal, the introduction of which created such a change in numerous articles of ordinary table service in England. This metal, in honour of the inventor, was called Tutinic, but which word, by one of the most absurd perversions of language ever known, became transferred into 'Tooth and Egg', the name by which it was almost uniformly recognised in the shops."—Quoted in 2 ser. N. & Q. x. 111.]

1797.—"Tu-to-nag is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamino; the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Stanton's Acct. of Lord Macartney's Embassy, 4to ed. ii. 540.

TOPAZ, TOPASS, &c., s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of Pers. (from Turkish) top-chi, 'a gunner.' It may be a slight support to this derivation that Itabans were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 16th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topi, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topeawalas (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class call themselves gente de chupco (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misrendering of topaz from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, propounds in another passage that topaz is a corruption of do-bhāshiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of Dubash, q.v.), viz. using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 50 and 144). [The Madras Gloss. assumes Mal. topāshi to be a corruption of dubash.] The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1602.—"The 12th ditto we saw to seaward another Champaigne (Sampan) wherein were 20 men, Nestigos (see MUSTEES) and Toupas."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 31, pub. 1618.

[1672. — "Toepasses." See under MADRAS.]

1673.—"To the Fort then belonged 300 English, and 400 Topazes, or Portugal Fire— men."—Fryer, 66. In his glossarial Index he gives "Topazes, Musketeers."

1680.—"It is resolved and ordered to entertain about 100 Topazes, or Black Portuguese, into pay."—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686.—"It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependence on them."—In ditto, 159.

1690.—"A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one Abdal Ghaford, was taken by Mat-men, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans."—Ovington, 411.

1705.—"... Topases, qui sont des gens du pais qu'on élève et qu'on habille à la Française, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholique par quelques uns de nos Missionnaires."—Luillier, 45-46.

1711.—"The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanhams, or 1*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Mungrel Portuguese, at 50, or 52 Fanhams per Month."—Lockyer, 14.

1727.—"Some Portuguese are called Topasses . . . will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany."—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744, i. 326].

1745.—"Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mestices (see MUSTEES) et Topasses, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères."—Norbert, ii. 31.

1747.—"The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coffrees (see CAFFER), and Seapoys (see SEPOY), altogether about Two Thousand (2000)."—M.S. Consns. at Ft. St. David, March 1. (In India Office).

1749.—"600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crowd of useless Topasses and Peons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed."—In a Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co. p. 67.

"The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madras knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the antient Portuguese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vitious withal, and for the most Part as weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites of a Soldier."—Ibid. App. p. 103.

1756.—" . . . in this plight, from half an hour after eleven till near two in the morning, I sustained the weight of a heavy man, with his knees on my back, and the pressure of his whole body on my head; a Dutch sergeant, who had taken his seat upon my left shoulder, and a Topaz bearing on my right."—Holwell's Narr. of the Black Hole, [ed. 1758, p. 19].

1758.—"There is a distinction said to be made by you . . . which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab."—Court's Letter, in Long, 133.

c. 1735.—"Topasses, black foot soldiers, descended from Portuguese marrying natives, called topasses because they wear hats."—Curraciel's Clive, iv. 564. The same explanation in Orme, i. 80.

1787.—" . . . Assuredly the mixture of Moormen, Rajahpoots, Gentoo, and Malabars in the same corps is extremely beneficial. . . . I have also recommended the corps of Topasses or descendants of Europeans, who retain the characteristic qualities of their progenitors."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1789.—"Topasses are the sons of Europeans and black women, or low Portuguese, who are trained to arms."—Munro, Narr. 321.

1817.—"Topasses, or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portuguese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith."—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

TOPE, s. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. Hind. top, 'a cannon.' This is Turkish töp, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further. [Mr. Platts regards T. tob, top, as meaning originally 'a round mass,' from Skt. stūpa, for which see below.]

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tam. tōppu, Tel. tōpu, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tam. togu, 'to collect,'] and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bāgh.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word tōp is in local use in the N.W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from Skt. stūpa through the Pali or Prakrit thāpo. According to Sir H. Elliot (i. 505), Stupa in Icelandic signifies 'a Tower.' We cannot find it in Cleasby. The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikyala in the Rawul Pindi district.

[1687.—"Tope." See under TOPE-KHANA.

[1831.—"The big gun near the Central Museum of Lahore called the Zam-Zamnah or Bhanjjanvali top, seems to have held much the same place with the Sikhs as the Malik-i-Maidan held in Bijapur."—Bombay Gazetteer, xliii. 612.]

b.—

1673.—". . . flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoes, Guinavas."—Fryer, 40.

"The Country is Sandy; yet plentiful in Provisions; in all places, Tops of Trees."—Ibid. 41.

1717.—"The Topes and Walks of Trees in and about the Bounds will furnish them with firewood to burn, and Clay for Bricks is almost everywhere."—Report of a Council of War at Ft. St. David, in Couns. of May 5, MS. in India Office.

1751.—"A multitude of People set to the work finished in a few days an entrenchment, with a stout mud wall, at a place called Facquiro's Tope, or the grove of the Facquire."—Orme, i. 273.

1799.—"Upon looking at the Tope as I came in just now, it appeared to me, that when you get possession of the bank of the Nullah, you have the Tope as a matter of course."—Wellington, Desp. i. 23.

1809.—". . . behind that a rich country, covered with rice fields and topes."—Ld. Valentia, i. 557.

1811.—"It is a general practice when a plantation of mango trees is made, to dig a well on one side of it. The well and the tope are married, a ceremony at which all the village attends, and large sums are often expended."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 56.

c.—

[1839.—"Tope is an expression used for a mound or barrow as far west as Peshawar. . . ."—Elphinstone, Cutch, 2nd ed. i. 103.]

TOPE-KHANA, s. The Artillery, Artillery Park, or Ordnance Department, Turco-Pers. top-khāna, 'cannon-house' or 'cannon-department.' The word is the same that appears so often in reports from Constantinople as the Tophaneh. Unless the traditions of Donna Tofana are historical, we are strongly disposed to suspect that Aqua Tofana may have had its name from this word.

1687.—"The Toptchi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Chambers; their Quarters are at Tophana, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople."—Rycauld's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 91.

1726.—"Isfandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Darogor (see DAROGA) of the Toppscanna)."—Valentia, iv. (Saratie), 276.

1765.—"Ho and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (see DAROGA), the cannon were loaded with powder only."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 96.

TOPEE, s. A hat, Hind. topī. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, 'a top-knot', and topele, a 'toupee'), which is probably identical with English and Dutch top, L. German topp, Fr. topet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind. word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived. With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

1193.—In the vocabulary ("Este he a linguaagem de Cultem") we have: "barrote (i.e. a cap): tuppy."—Roteiro, 118.

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed: "Trazem em a moleira huuns topotes por signall que sam Christãos."—Ibid. 62.

1819.—"Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi, to keep off his importunacy."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1833.—"Topees, a solar helmet."—Wille, Modern Persia, 233.

TOPEEWALA, s. Hind. topīwālā, 'one who wears a hat,' generally a European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1808) Topeeewala and Puggrywala were used in Guzerat and the Mahratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.' [The S. Indian form is Toppikar.] The author of the Persian Life of Hydrur Naik (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls Europeans Kalah-posh, i.e. 'hat-wearers' (p. 85).

1803.—"The descendants of the Portuguese . . . unfortunately the ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3d. ed. iii. 5.

[1823.—"It was now evident we should have to encounter the Topea wallas."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 71.]

1871.—". . . you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All topiwallas . . . are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren."—Gorinda Samanta, ii. 211.

TORCULL, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malay-alam tiru-koyil, [Tam. tiru, Skt. śrī, 'holy' koyil, 'temple']. See i. 253, 254; also the English Trans. of 1682, f. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed. of the 1st book of Castanheda turcoll occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions. [Tricalore in S. Arcot is in Tam. Tirukoyilār, with the same meaning.]

TOSHACONNA, s. P.—II. to-ha-khāna. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man's establishment. The toshā-khāna is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

[1610.—"Now indeed the atashekannoo was become a right stage."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 300.]

[1742.—". . . the Treasury, Jewels, tolshik-khanna . . . that belonged to the Emperor. . . ."—Fraser, H. of Nadir Shah, 173.]

1799.—"After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swazles (q.v.), which were in the toshakanah were given to the brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Macleod and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them."—Wellington, i. 56.

[1835.—"When money is presented to the Viceroy, he always 'remits' it, but when presents of jewels, arms, stuffs, horses, or other things of value are given him, they are accepted, and are immediately handed over to the tosh khana or Government Treasury. . . ."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 76.]

TOSTDAUN, s. Military Hind. tosdān for a cartouche-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshadn, 'provision-holder,' a wallet.

[1811.—"This last was, however, merely 'tos-dan lee avas,'—a cartouch-box report—as our scops oddly phrase a vague rumour."—Society in India, ii. 223.]

TOTY, s. Tam. toti, Canar. lotiga, from Tam. todu, 'to dig,' properly a low-caste labourer in S. India, and a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, &c., for the community, like the gorayt of N. India.

1730.—"Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appelé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques."—Lett. Édif. xiii. 371.

[1833.—"The name Toty being considered objectionable, the same officers in the new arrangements are called Tutaiaris (see TALIAE) when assigned to Police, and Veltans when employed in Revenue duties."—Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 211.]

TOUCAN, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Ducerus, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying 'a worker,' from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Rhamphastes or Zygodactyle. Tukang is really in Malay a 'craftsman or artificer'; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird. We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay 'an artificer,' but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan 'carpintero' from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thevet's, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Oviedo (c. 1635), but he mentions only the name by which "the Christians" called it,—in Ramusio's Italian Picuto (Beccuto; Sommario, in Ramusio, iii. f. 60). [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives only the Brazilian derivation.

The question is still further discussed, without any very definite result, save that it is probably an imitation of the cry of the bird, in N. & Q. 9 ser. vii. 486; viii. 22, 67, 85, 171, 250.]

1550.—“Sur la cote de la marine, la plus fréquente marchandise est le plumage d'un oiseau, qu'ils appellent en leur langue Toucan, lequel deservons sommairement puis qu'il vient à propos. Cest oiseau est de la grandeur d'un pigeon. . . . Au reste cest oiseau est merueilleusement difforme et monstrueux, ayant le bec plus gros et plus long quasi que le resto du corps.”—Les Singularitez de la France Antarctique, autrement nommée Amerique. . . . Par T. Aublet Thevet, Natf d'Angoulême, Paris, 1558, f. 91.

1619.—“Tucana sive Toucan Brasilien-sibus: avis piceo aut plumbeo magnitudino. . . . Rostrum hibet ingens et nonnunquam palmum longum, exterius strum. . . . Mirum est autem videri posset quomodo tantilla avis tam grande rostrum ferat; sed levissimum est.”—Georgi Margraef de Lichfeld, Hist. Rerum Natur. Brasiliæ. Lib. V. cap. xv., in Hist. Natur. Brasil. Lugd. Bat. 1618, p. 217.

See also (1559) Atrocandus, Ornithology. lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucham.

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given :

1855.—“Soopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. . . . I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch, and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball . . . through the head just at its junction with the handsome orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it. Down came the toucan with outspread wings, dead apparently; but when my peon Manoel raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a succession of roars more like a bull than a bird.”—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, &c. pp. 37-38.

TOWLEEA, s. Hind. tauliya, ‘a towel.’ This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. toulha (Panjab N. & Q., 1885, ii. 117).

TRAGA, s. [Molesworth gives “S. tridy, Guj. tridy”; tridy does not appear in Monier-Williams’s Skt. Diet., and Wilson queries the word as doubtful. Dr. Grierson writes: “I cannot trace its origin back to Skt. One is tempted to connect it with the Skt. root tra, or trā, ‘to protect,’ but the termination gā presents difficulties which I cannot get over. One would expect it to be derived from some Skt. word like traka, but no such word exists.”] The extreme form of dhurna (q.v.) among the Rājputs and connected tribes, in which the complainant puts himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode for bringing vengeance on the oppressor. The tone adopted by some persons and papers at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of traga intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him. [For a case in Greece, see Pausanias, X. i. 6. Another name for this self-sacrifice is Chandi, which is perhaps Skt. chanda, ‘passionate’ (see Malcolm, Cent. Indus, 2nd ed. ii. 137). Also compare the jāhar of the Rājputs (Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 74). And for Kūr, see As. Res. iv. 357 seqq.]

1800.—A case of traga is recorded in Sir Jasper Nicoll’s Journal, at the capture of Gawilgarh, by Sir A. Wellesley. See note to Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 337.

1813.—“Every attempt to lory an assassin is succeeded by the Tarakaw, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 91; [2nd ed. i. 378; and see i. 211].

1819.—For an affecting story of Traga, see Macaulay, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 231.

[TRANKEY, s. A kind of boat used in the Persian Gulf and adjoining seas. All attempts to connect it with any Indian or Persian word have been unsuccessful. It has been supposed to be connected with the Port. trincador, a sort of flat-bottomed coasting vessel with a high stern, and with trinquart, a herring-boat used in the English Channel. Smyth (Sailor’s Word-book, s.v.) has: “Tranke or Trankies, a large boat of the Gulf of Persia.” See N. & Q. 8 ser. vii. 167, 376.

[1531.—“He sent certain spies who went in Terranquins dressed as fishermen who caught fish inside the straits.”—Couto, Dec. VI. Bk. x. ch. 20.

[c. 1760.—“ . . . he remained some years in obscurity, till an Arab tranky being driven in there by stress of weather, he made himself known to his countrymen. . . .”—Grose, 1st ed. 25.

[1763.—“Taghi Khan . . . soon after embarked a great number of men in small vessels.” In the note tarranquins.—Ham-nay, iv. 181.

[1773.—"Accordingly we resolved to hire one of the common, but uncomfortable vessels of the Gulph, called a Trankoy. . . ."
—Ibid, 203.]

TRANQUEBAR, n.p. A report of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1815. The true name is said to be Tarangumbuli, 'Sea-Town' or 'Wave-Town'; [so the Madras Gloss.; but in the Man. (n. 216) it is interpreted 'Street of the Telugu people.']

1610.—"The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they do much service to God in their establishment at Negapatam, both among Portuguese and natives, and that there is a settlement of newly converted Christians who are looked after by the catechumens of the parish (freguesia) of Trangambar. . . ."
—King's Letter, in Lettres des Monsieus, p. 235.

[1633-1.—"This Morning the Portuguese ship that came from Vizagapatam sailed hence for Trangambar."—Pringle's Diary, Ed. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 16.]

TRAVANCORE, n.p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the ruling dynasty of the kingdom which is known by the name has been called. The true name is said to be Tiru-viddu-ladu, shortened to Tiruvinkodu. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tiruvitinkur, tiru, Skt. śrī, 'the goddess of prosperity,' viddu, 'to reside,' lār, 'part.']

[1511.—"As to the money due from the Raja of Travancor. . . ."
—Albuquerque, Curtis, p. 270.]

1533.—"And at the place called Travancor, where this Kingdom of Coulam terminates, there begins another Kingdom, taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the Rey Grande, because he is greater in his dominion, and in the state which he keeps, than those other princes of Malabar; and he is subject to the King of Narsinga."—Barnes, I. ix. 1.

1609.—"The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come."—King of Spain's Letter, in Lettres des Monsieus, p. 257.

TRIBENY, n.p. Skt. tri-venī, 'threefold braid'; a name which properly belongs to Prayāga (Allahā-bad), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Jumna, and (unseen) Sarasvati are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by bestowing the name of Jumna and Sarasvati on two streams connected with the Hughli. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the melas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

1632.—". . . if I refused to stay there he would certainly stop me again at Trippany some miles further up the River."—Madras Diary, Oct. 11; [Hak. Soc. I. 35].

1705.—". . . pendant la Lune de Mars . . . il arrive la Fête de Trippigny, c'est un Dieu enfermé dans une manière de petite Mosquée, qui est dans le milieu d'une très-grande piscine . . . au bord du Gange."—Ludlier, 69.

1753.—"Au-dessous de Nudhi, à Tripinl, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde île renfermée dans la première."—D'Acaulle, 61.

TRICHIES, TRITCHIES, s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Trichinopoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns. But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see CHEROOT). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1570.—"Between whiles we smoked, generally Manilla, now supplanted by tonl Dindiguls and fatul Trichies."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 7.

TRICHINOPOLY, n.p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India. The etymology and proper form of the name has been the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiruti-palli, 'Little-Town.' But this may be safely rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1520) as Tiru-śhilla-palli, apparently 'Holy-rock-town.' In the Tevāram the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-sira-puram, 'Three-head-town,' with allusion to a 'three-headed demon.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tiruttinūppalli, tiru, 'holy,' shina, 'the plant cissampelos pareira, L. pulli, 'village.'] 1677.—"Tritchenapali."—A. Bussing, in Uden'ijn, v. (Ceylon), 300.

1711.—"The Maratas concluded the campaign by putting this whole Peninsula under contribution as far as C. Cumerim, attacking, conquering, and retaining the city of Tiruxerapali, capital of Madura, and taking prior the Nabab who governed it."—Report of the Post. Viceroy, in Esquejo das Possesões, &c., Documentos, ed. 1853, iii. 19.

1753.—"Ces embouchures sont en grand nombre, & la division de ce fleuve en différents bras ou canaux, à remonter jusqu'à Tirishirapali, et à la pagode de Shirangham."—D. Arille, 115.

1761.—"After the battle Mahommed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, fled to Truchinapoli, a place of great strength."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, p. 3.

TRINCOMALEE, n.p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukko-natha-malai, or Tarang-malai. The last ('Sea-Hill') seems conceived to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-kona-malai, for 'Three-peak Hill.' There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Trikoneswara; [so the Madras Man. (ii. 210)].

1553.—"And then along the coast towards the north, above Baticalon, there is the kingdom of Triguinamale."—Barros, II. ii. cap. 1.

1602.—"This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds unknowing whither he went. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Ceilon), where he made the land at a haven called Preaturé, between Triquillimalé and the point of Jafanapatam."—Couto, V. i. 5.

1672.—"Trinquenemale hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, yea one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Belligamaine, Gale, or Colombo."—Bulducus, 113.

1675.—"The Cinghaleso themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from another country . . . that some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanassery . . . came to land near the Hill of Trincommale with 1800 or 2000 men. . . ."—Ryklof van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 210.

1685.—"Triquinimale. . . ."—Ribeyro, Fr. Tr. 6.

1726.—"Trinkenemale, properly Tricoenmale" (i.e. Trikunmala).—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

"Trinkomale. . . ."—Ibid. 103.

1727.—". . . that vigilant Dutchman was soon after them with his Fleet, and forced them to fight disadvantageously in Trankmalaya Bay, wherein the French lost one half of their Fleet, being either sunk or burnt."—A. Hamilton, i. 313, [ed. 1744].

1761.—"We arrived at Trincommale in Ceylono (which is one of the finest, if not the best and most capacious Harbours in the World) the first of November, and employed that and part of the ensuing Month in preparing our Ships for the next Campaign."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, Jan. 31.

TRIPANG, s. The sea-slug. This is the Malay name, tripang, teripang. See SWALLOW, and BECHE-DE-MER.

[1817.—"Bieh do mar is well known to be a dried sea slug used in the dishes of the Chinese; it is known among the Malayan Islands by the name of Tripang. . . ."—Agiles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 232.]

TRIPLICANE, n.p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the "Nabob of the Carnatic" is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-valli-kēdi, 'sacred-creeper-tank,' Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-alli-kēni, 'sacred lily- (Nymphaea rubra) tank,' [and so the Madras Gloss. giving the word as Tiruvallikkēni.]

1671.—"There is an absolute necessity to go on fortifying this place in the best manner we can, our enemies at sea and land being within less than musket shot, and better fortified in their camp at Trivellicane than we are here."—Ft. St. Geo. Consols, Feb. 2. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1671, No. I. p. 28.

1679.—"The Didwan (Dewaan) from Conjeveram, who pretends to have come from Court, having sent word from Treplicane that unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phyrmaund he would carry it back to Court again, answer is returned that it hath not been accustomed for the Governors to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund except there come therewith a Serpow (see SEERPAW) or a Tasheriff" (see TASHREEF).—Do., do., Dec. 2. Ibid. 1679, No. III. p. 40.

[1682-1.—"Triblicane, Treblicane Trivoty."—Diary Ft. St. Geo. ed. Pringle, i. 63; iii. 151.]

TRIVANDRUM, n.p. The modern capital of the State now known as Travancore (q.v.). Properly Tiru-vanamāla-puram, 'Sacred Vishnu-Town.'

TRUMPÁK, n.p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormus on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is known by Lt. Studd's account of this island (Geogr. Mag., i. 13) to have been Tárun-dáph, 'Garden of Tárun,' and it was properly the palace of the old King, of whom more than one bore the name of Tárun or Turun Sháh.

1597.—"When the people of the city saw that they were to be annihilated, that from that direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a guard for the wells of Turumbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them. . . ."—Chron. de Albuquerque, i. f. by Bock, i. 175.

"Meanwhile the Captain Major ordered Alonso Lopez de Cerda and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Turumbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some juniper trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water boats were not arriving, at sometimes by jetties leading to a contrary wind."—Chron., i. 175.

1610.—"The island has fresh water . . . only in Turumbaque, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Viceroy take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything which is planted."—Tercera, Rel. de la Reyna de Navarra, 113.

1682.—"Behind the hills, to the S.E.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Turumbake . . . here one sees the ancient pleasure house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sandy date palms. There are also here two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Turumbake'; which water is the most wholesome and the freshest in the whole island."—Niederhof, See an Land-Reise, ii. 89.

TUAN, s. Malay tuun and tucaun, 'lord, master.' The word is used in the English and Dutch settlements of the Archipelago exactly as sahib is in India. [An early Chinese form of the word is referred to under SUMATRA.]

1553.—"Dom Paulo da Gama, who was a worthy son of his father in his zeal to do the King good service . . . equipped a good fleet, of which the King of Ugentana

(see UJUNG TANAH) had previously taken, who in all respect set forth his own, consisting of 50 lancearars, with a large force on board, and in command of which he put a valiant Moor called Tuam-lar, to whom the King gave orders that as soon as war broke out he should the first of all Malacca let leaving enough people to defend it, he should attack the town of the Indes (see KLEBO) in 11 men and destroy as much as he could."—Chron., ii. 170.

1553.—"For where this great Raja is now, derived from the king's title, is attached to a person on whom the King bestows the title, almost as among us that of Count, whilst the style Tuam is like our de, is only the latter of the two is put before the person's proper name, whilst the former is put after it, as was in the names of these two princes, Viceroy Raja, and Tuam-lar."—Chron., ii. 173.

[1553.—" . . . the only talked over the affairs of the Tuam-lar (English gentleman) to a crowd of natives."—W. B. Woodcock, A Visit to Java, 115.]

TUCKA, s. Hind. tuká, Beng. túka, [Skt. gintaka, 'stamped silver money']. This is the word commonly used among Bengalis for a rupee. But in other parts of India it (or at least paid) is used differently; as for aggregates of 1, or of 2 pie (generally in N.W.P. pai is paid paid—the paid of pie, 20 pie). Compare TANGA.

[1599.—"A request of a few tukhas, or stamped pie, to be made upon each shop. . . ."—Proc. Mos. Soc., i. f. 11. Chron., ed. 1592, p. 81.]

1571.—" . . . How much did my father pay for her?"

"He paid only ten takis."

"I may state here that the word rupya, or as it is commonly written rupee or rupee, is unknown to the peasantry of Bengal, at least to Bengali Hindu peasants; the word they invariably use is takis."—Chron., ed. 1592, p. 81.

TUCKÁVEE, s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar.—H. tukávi, from Ar. tuká, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

[1500.—"A great many of them, who have now been forced to work as labourers, would have thankfully received tacary, to be repaid, by instalments, in the course of two or three years."—Bichard, Mysore, ii. 138.]

1820.—"When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it . . . it sold them almost always for a muamla (see NUZZERANA). It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced takāvi to the tenant or owner."—Minutes of Sir T. Munro, i. 71. These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

TUCKEED, s. An official reminder. Ar.—H. takid, 'emphasis, injunction', and verb tākūl kurnā, 'to enjoin stringently, to insist.'

1802.—"I can hardly describe to you my life—work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and session cases, and a continual irritation of tuckeeds and offensive remarks . . . these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery."—Letter from Col. J. R. Becher, in (unpublished) Memoir, p. 28.

[TUCKIAH, s. Pers. takya, literally 'a pillow or cushion'; but commonly used in the sense of a hut or hermitage occupied by a fakīr or holy man.

[1800.—"He declared . . . that two of the people charged . . . had been at his tuckiah."—Wellington, Desp. i. 78.

[1847.—"In the centre of the wood was a Fakir's Talkiat (sic) or Place of Prayer, situated on a little mound."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c. ii. 47.]

TULWAUR, s. Hind. talwār and tarwār, 'a sabre.' Williams gives Skt. taravāri and tarabālika. ["Talwār is a general term applied to shorter or more or less curved side-arms, while those that are lighter and shorter still are often styled nimchas" (Sir IV. Elliot, in Ind. Antiq. xv. 29). Also see Eyerton, Handbook, 138.]

[1799.—" . . . Ahmood Sollay . . . drew his tolwa on one of them."—Jackson, Journey from India, 49.

[1829.—" . . . the panchās huzār turwar Rahtorān, meaning the 'fifty thousand Rahtore swords,' is the proverbial phrase to denote the muster of Maroo. . . ."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 179.]

1853.—"The old native officer who carried the royal colour of the regiments was cut down by a blow of a Sikh tulwar."—Oakfield, ii. 78.

TUMASHA, s. An entertainment, a spectacle (in the French sense), a popular excitement. It is Ar. tamāshi, 'going about to look at anything entertaining.' The word is in use in Turkestan (see Schuyler, below).

1610.—"Heere are also the ruines of Ranichand (qu. Ramechand's) Castle and Houses which the Indians acknowledge for the great God, saying that he took flesh vpon him to see the Tamasha of the World."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 436.

1631.—"Hic quoque meridiem prospicit, ut spectet Thamasham id est pugnas Elephantum Leonum Bufalorum et aliarum ferarum. . . ."—De Laet, De Imperio Magni Mogolis, 127. (For this quotation I am indebted to a communication from Mr. Archibald Constable of the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway.—Y.)

1673.—" . . . We were discovered by some that told our Banyan . . . that two Englishmen were come to the Tomasia, or Sight. . . ."—Fryer, 159.

1705.—"Tamachars. Co sont des réjonissances que les Gentils font en l'honneur de quelquesunes de leurs divinités."—Luillier, Tab. des Matières.

1840.—"Runjeet replied, 'Don't go yet; I am going myself in a few days, and then we will have burra tomacha.'"—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 120-121.

1876.—"If you told them that you did not want to buy anything, but had merely come for tomasha, or amusement, they were always ready to explain and show you everything you wished to see."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 176.

TUMLET, s. Domestic Hind. tūmlet, being a corruption of tumbler.

TUMLOOK, n.p. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hoogly near its mouth, formerly called Tāmralipti or -lipta. It occurs in the Mahābhārata and many other Sanskrit words. "In the Dasa Kumdra and Vrihat Katha, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as a great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean" (Prof. H. H. Wilson, in J. R. As. Soc. v. 135). [Also see Cunningham, Anct. Geog. p. 504.]

c. 150.—
" . . . καὶ πρὸς αὐτῷ τῷ ποταμῷ (Γάγγη)
* πολεῖς *
* * *

Παλιμῶδρα βασιλειον Ταμαλίτης."

—Ptolemy's Tables, Bk. VII. i. 78.

c. 410.—"From this, continuing to go eastward nearly 50 yōjanas, we arrive at the Kingdom of Tamralipti. Here it is the river (Ganges) empties itself into the sea. Fah Hian remained here for two years, writing out copies of the Sacred Books. . . . He then shipped himself on board a great merchant vessel. . . ."—Beal, Travels of Fah Hian, &c. (1869), pp. 147-148.

[c. 1070.—" . . . a merchant named Harshagupta, who had arrived from Tamralipti, having heard of that event, came there full of curiosity."—Turning, Kotliu Sirt Sijou, i. 329.]

1679.—In going down the Hooghly:

"Before daybreak overtook the Ships at Barnagar, met the Arrival 7 days out from Ballasore, and at night passed the Lilly at Tumbaleo"—Fr. St. Geo. (Council on Tour). In Notes & Lists, No. II, p. 69.

1685.—"January 2.—We fell down below Tumbaleo River.

"January 3.—We anchored at the Channel Tree, and lay here 30th and 28th for want of a gale to carry us over to Redgem."—Holger, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 175.

[1691.—"The Royal James and Mary . . . fell on a sand on this side Tumbaleo point. . ."—First vol. Report on Old Branch, 59.]

1725.—"Tumboll and Bama are two Portuguese villages, where they have their churches, and salt business."—Fab. Syn., v. 159.

[1753.—"Tomball." See under KEDGE-REE.]

TUMTUM, v. A dog-eat. We do not know the origin. [It is almost certainly a corr. of English tandem, the slang use of which in the sense of a conveyance (according to the Slang Dict.) dates from 1807. Even now English-speaking natives often speak of a dog-eat with a single horse as a tandem.]

1806.—"We had only 3 cows to go, and we should have met a pair of tumtums which would have taken us on."—Traveler's, The Desert Huaglan, 321.

[1889.—"A G.B.T. cart once married a bathing machine, and they called the child Tum-tum."—R. Kipling, The City of Dreadful Night, 71.]

TUNOA, TUNOAW, &c., v. P.—H. tunkhurdh, pron. tunkhd. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern sense it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant. For a full account of the special older uses of the word see Hilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1758.—"Roydoloh . . . has taken the discharge of the tuncaws and the arrears of the Nabob's army upon himself."—Obit., iii. [ii. 361].

1760.—"You have been under the necessity of writing to Mr. Holwell (who was sent to collect in the tuncars). . . . The low men that are employed in the tuncars are not to be depended on."—The Nabob in the Pres. and Council of Fr. Wm., in Long, 233.

1778.—"These receipts are called tuncaws, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in."—Oras, ii. 276.

[1783.—"The Grassah or Rajja or chiefs . . . were satisfied with a fixed and known tanka, or tribute from certain territories, on which they had a real or pretended claim."—Mahab. Gest. Indu, 244. ed. i. 335.

[1851.—"The Sikh detachments . . . used to be paid by tunkhaws, or assignments of the provincial collectors of revenue."—Edwards, A Year on the Peshawar Frontier, i. 13.]

TURA, v. Or. Turk. tura. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahommedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have misread the truth. The explanation of tur which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show these turas to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is 'a gibbon.' Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tubras, and says: "Tubras are musk-bags, but . . . Balauni makes the meaning plain, by saying that they were filled with earth (Turk-i-Badshahi, f. 136). . . . The sacks used by Sher Shah as temporary fortifications on his march towards Rājputāna were tubras" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident, however, that Baber's tūras were no tobras, whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 403) regarding Sher Shah shows that the use of bags filled with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The tubras of Balauni may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gibbons implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1520.—(At the Battle of Pānigat) "I directed that, according to the custom of Rām, the gun-carriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carriages were 6 or 7 tūras (or breast-work). The matchlockmen stood behind these guns and tūras, and discharged their matchlocks. . . . It was settled, that as Pānigat was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses while we might fortify our front by tūras. . . ."—Baber, p. 301.

1528.—(At the siege of Chāndert) "over-seers and pioneers were appointed to construct works on which the guns were to be planted. All the men of the army were directed to prepare tūras and scaling-ladders, and to serve the tūras which are used in attacking forts. . . ."—Ibid. p. 376. The editor's note at the former passage is: "The meaning (viz. 'breastwork') assigned to Tūra here, and in several other places is merely conjectural, founded on Patis de la Croix's explanation, and on the meaning given by Meninski to Tūr, viz. reticulatus. The Tūras may have been formed by the branches of trees, interwoven like basket-work . . . or they may have been covered defences from arrows and missiles. . . ." Again: "The o Tūras, so often mentioned, appear to have been a sort of ustudo, under cover of which the assailants advanced, and sometimes breached the wall. . . ."

TURAKA, n.p. This word is applied both in Marhatti and in Telugu to the Mahomedans (Turks). [The usual form in the inscriptions is Turushka (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 189).] Like this is Turāk (see TAROUK) which the Burmese now apply to the Chinese.

TURBAN, s. Some have supposed this well-known English word to be a corruption of the P.—H. sirkund, 'head-wrap,' as in the following:

1727.—"I bought a few seorbunds and stances there (at Cuttack) to know the difference of the prices."—J. Hamilton, i. 391 (see PIECE-GOODS).

This, however, is quite inconsistent with the history of the word. Wedgewood's suggestion that the word may be derived from Fr. turbin, 'a whelk,' is equally to be rejected. It is really a corruption of one which, though it seems to be out of use in modern Turkish, was evidently used by the Turks when Europe first became familiar with the Ottomans and their ways. This is set forth in the quotation below from Zedler's Lexicon, which is corroborated by those from Ryeaut and from Galland, &c. The proper word was apparently dulband. Some modern Persian dictionaries give the only meaning of this as 'a sash.' But Meninski explains it as 'a cloth of fine white muslin; a wrapper for the head'; and Vullers also gives it this meaning, as well as that of a 'sash or belt.'*. In doing so he quotes Shakespear's Dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could hardly have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab. dul, 'coltrev,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipant, Tolliban, Turbant, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban, [a view accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v. tulip, turban)].*

TURKEY, s. This fowl is called in Hindustani pera, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chili did. In Tamil the bird is called chilôri, 'great fowl.' Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey could appear to have been originally applied to another of the Paroquies, the guinea fowl, Melagris of the ancients. Mun-hen's explanation (quoted below) shows strange confusions between the two birds. The French coq d'Inde or Dindon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calcutische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Hahn and the specific in error as indicating the origin of the Turkey in the East. This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicut, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowl of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Batuta (quoted below) makes quaint mention. Zeller's great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1715, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calcutische and Indische because they were brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast. Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And native scholar, instead of admitting the anachronism, have boldly maintained that the turkey had always been found in India (Dracidian Gramin. 2nd ed. p. 137). Padre Paulino was apparently of the same opinion, for while explaining that the etymology of Calicut is "Castle of the Fowls," he asserts that Turkeys (Galli d'India) came originally from India; being herein, as he often is, positive and wrong. In 1615 we find W. Edward, the E.I. Co.'s agent at Ajmir, writing to send the Mogul "three or four Turkey cocks and hens, for he hath three cocks but no hens" (Colonial Paper, E. i. c. 348). Here, however, the ambiguity between the real turkey and the guinea-fowl may possibly arise. In Egypt the bird is called Dir-Râm, 'fowl of Râm' (i.e. of Turkey), probably a rendering of the English term.

TURNÉE, TUNNEE. s. An English supercargo, Sea-Hind, and probably a corruption of attorney. (Rehuck).

TURPAUL, s. Sea-Hind. A tarpanin (ibid). [The word (tipid) has now come into common native use.]

TUSSAH, TUSSER. s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly exported to England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in sa as a vulgarity, like the use of solar for sola (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though it is written by Milburn (1813) tu-sha, and tus-sh (ii. 158, 214), we find it in the Tin-i-Akbari as tasar, and in Dr. Buchanan as tasar (see below). The term is supposed to be adopted from Skt. tasara, trasarā, Hind. tasar, 'a shuttle'; perhaps from the form of the cocoon? The moth whose worm produced this silk is generally identified with Antheraea peripha, but Capt. Hutton has shown that there are several species known as tasar worms. These are found almost throughout the whole extent of the forest tracts of India. But the chief seat of the manufacture of stuffs, wholly or partly of tasar silk, has long been Bhagalpur on the Ganges. [See also Allen, Mon. on Silk Cloth of Assam, 1699; Yunf Ali, Silk Fabrics of N.H.P., 1900.] The first mention of tasar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangpūr, as cited below in the Linnean Transactions of 1801 by Dr. Roxburgh; (see Official Report on Sericulture in India, by J. Geophagan, Calcutta, 1872), and the elaborate article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iii. 98 seq.]

TUTICORIN, n.p. A sea-port of Tinnevely, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tamil Tittukkudi, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tann. tattu, ‘to scatter,’ ludi, ‘habitation’]. According to Fra Paolino the name is Tutukodi, ‘a place where nets are washed,’ but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from turu, ‘a bush.’ But see Bp. Caldwell below.

1544.—“At this time the King of Cape Comorin, who calls himself the Great King (see TRAVANCORE), went to war with a neighbour of his who was king of the places beyond the Cape, called Manapp and Totucury, inhabited by the Christians that were made there by Miguel Vaz, Vicar General of India at the time.”—Correa, iv. 403.

1831.—“The final u in Tuticorin was added for some such euphonic reason as turned Kochchi into Cochim and Kumari into Comorin. The meaning of the name Tittulludi is said to be ‘the town where the wells get filled up’; from tattu (properly tattu), ‘to fill up a well,’ and ludi, ‘a place of habitation, a town.’ This derivation, whether the true one or not, has at least the merit of being appropriate. . . .”—Bp. Caldwell, Hist. of Tinnevely, 75.

TYCONNA, TYEKANA, s. A room in the basement or cellarage, or dug in the ground, in which it has in some parts of India been the practice to pass the hottest part of the day during the hottest season of the year. Pers. tah-khana, ‘nether-house,’ i.e. ‘subterraneous apartment.’ [“In the centre of the court is an elevated platform, the roof of a subterraneous chamber called a zeera zameen, whither travellers retire during the great heats of the summer” (Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 81). Another name for such a place is sardabeh (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 314).]

1663.—“ . . . in these hot Countries, to entitle an House to the name of Good and Fair it is required it should be . . . furnish'd also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffy. . . .”—Bernier, E.T. 79; [ed. Constable, 217].

c. 1763.—“The throng that accompanied that minister proved so very great that the floor of the house, which happened to have a Tah-Qhana, and possibly was at that moment under a secret influence, gave way, and the body, the Vizir, and all his company fell into the apartment underneath.”—Seir Mutagherin, iii. 19.

TYPHOON, s. A tornado or cyclone-wind; a sudden storm, a ‘nor-wester’ (n.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog. 57) ridicules “learned antiquarians” for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables, ta-fung, ‘Great Wind.’ His ridicule is misplaced. With a mono-syllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English ‘taugh ‘un.’” Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow’s) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a ‘great wind.’ The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language. E.g. Mandarín, pagoda, chop, coolie, tulénague;—none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the taifū, which our sailors made into taifun and then into typhoon, as they got the monfū which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

The Arabic word is tāfān, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning ‘an overpowering rain, . . . Noah’s flood,’ etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τεφῶν or τεφῶν. [But Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 237) alleges that it is pure Arabic, and comes from the root taf, ‘going round.’] This word τεφῶν (the etymologists say, from τιφῶ, ‘I raise smoke’) was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called ‘a Devil or Pisachoo’) to a ‘waterspout,’ and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. ‘Waterspout’ seems evidently the meaning of τεφῶν in the Meteorology of Aristotle (ἐπὶ τῶν αὐτῶν αὐτῶν . . . κ.τ.λ.) iii. 1; the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly; and also in the quotation which we give from Julius Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-tāfān) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii. 131, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, afāf in s. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Dr. F. Hirth, again (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. i. 260), advocates the quasi-Chinese origin of the word. Dr. Hirth has found the word Tai (and also with the addition of fung, ‘wind’) to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formosa, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1691. Dr. Hirth thinks tai as here used (which is not the Chinese word ta or tai, ‘great,’ and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formosan term; and is of opinion that the combination tai-fung is “a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China Sea.” Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendes Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says taifū is the Chinese name for such storms. Dr. Hirth’s paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tufão distinctly represents tāfān and not tai-fung, and the oldest English form 'tuffon' does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were first applied in the China Sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon's use of the word typhoons in his Latin below; also that tāfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to ῥυφῶν, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani. This is shown by the quotations below (1810-1836); and Platts defines tāfān as "a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon; a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge" etc.; also tāfānī, "stormy, tempestuous . . . boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous."

Little importance is to be attached to Pinto's linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropt by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming topo (in the sense of 'grove') to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhoon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of monsoon, simoom; and it is quite possible that the Formosan mariners took up their (unexplained) tai-fung from the Dutch or Portuguese.

On the origin of the Ar. word the late Prof. Robertson-Smith forwarded the following note:

"The question of the origin of Tāfān appears to be somewhat tangled.

"ῥυφῶν, 'whirlwind, waterspout,' connected with ῥυφῶν seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Séphôn, the northern one, in Joel, ii. 20, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon.

"On the other hand Tāfān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Tāfān, for Noah's flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true Semitic root tāf 'to overflow.'

"But again, the sense of whirlwind is not recognised in classical Arabic. Even Dozy in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Boethor's) for the sense, Tourbillon, tourbe. Bistakī in the Moht el Moht does not give this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root tāf means 'to go round,' and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of ῥυφῶν, typho, or tifone. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of tāfān."

[Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives: "Sometimes claimed as a Chinese word meaning 'a great wind' . . . but this seems to be a late mystification. In old authors the forms are tuffon, tuffoon, typhon, &c.—Arab. tāfān, a hurricane, storm. Gk. ῥυφῶν, better ῥυφῶν, a whirlwind. The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes."]

1551.—"Não se ouve por pequena maravilha cessarem os tufões na paragem da ilha do Sichio."—Letter in Sousa, Oriente Conquist. i. 680.

[c. 1551.—" . . . suddenly from the west arose a great storm known as il Tofani (literally 'Elephant's flood, comp. ELEPHANTA, b.)."—Travels of Sidi Ali, Reis, ed. Fanny, p. 17.]

1567.—“I went aboarde a shippe of Bengala, at which time it was the yeare of Touffon, concerning which Touffon ye are to vnderstand that in the East Indies often times, there are not stormes as in other countreys; but every 10 or 12 yeares there are such tempests and stormes that it is a thing incredible . . . neither do they know certainly what yeare they will come.”—Master Cuesar Fruterile, in Hall, ii. 370 [369].

1575.—“But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blow so furiously upon us, that it wound our great Sail round about our main Mast. . . . These Winds arise from a Wind that is called by the Greeks Typhon; and Pliny calleth it Vortex and Vortex; but as dangerous as they are, as they arise suddenly, so quickly are they laid again also.”—Rauwolf's Travels, in Ray's Collection, ed. 1705, p. 320. Here the traveller seems to intimate (though we are not certain) that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds; in any case it was exactly the fūjū of India.

1602.—“This Junk seeking to make the port of Chincleo met with a tremendous storm such as the natives call Tufão, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the spirits of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seems to raise a scud of flame, whilst in the space of one turning of the sand-glass the wind shall veer round to every point of the compass, seeming to blow more furiously from each in succession.

“Such is this phenomenon that the very birds of heaven, by some natural instinct, know of its coming 8 days beforehand, and are seen to take their nests down from the tree-tops and hide them in crevices of rock. Eight days before, the clouds also are seen to float so low as almost to graze men's heads, whilst in these days the seas seem beaten down as it were, and of a deep blue colour. And before the storm breaks forth, the sky exhibits a token well-known to all, a great object which seamen call the Ox-Eye (Olho de Boi) all of different colours, but so gloomy and appalling that it strikes fear in all who see it. And as the Bow of Heaven, when it appears, is the token of fair weather, and calm, so this seems to portend the Wrath of God, as we may well call such a storm. . . .” &c.—Couto, V. viii. 12.

1610.—“But at the breaking vp, commeth alway a cruell Storme, which they call the Tuffon, fearful even to men on land; which is not alike extreame euery yeare.”—Finch, in Purchas, i. 423.

1613.—“E porque a terra he salitrosa e ventosa, he muy sogeita a tempestades, ora menor aquella chamada Eneophia (Ekephias), ora maior chamada Tiphon (Tiphon), aquelle do ordinario chamamos Tufão ou Tormenta desfolta . . . e corre com tanta furia o impeto que desfas os tectos das casas e arranca arvores, o as vezes do mar lança as embarcações em terra nos campos do sertão.”—Godinho de Eredia, i. 30r.

1615.—“And about midnight Capt. Adams went out in a bark aboard the Hozander with many other barks to tow her in, we fearing a tuffon.”—Cock's Diary, i. 50.

1621.—“3. Typhones majores, qui per latitudinem aliquam corripunt, et corrupti sorbent in sursum, raro hunt; at vorices, sive turbines exigui et quasi ludieri, frequentior.

“4. Omnes procellae et typhones, et turbines majores, habent manifestum motum praecipiti, aut vibrationis deorsum magis quam alii venti.”—Baron, Hist. Ventorum, in E. Montagu's ed. of Works, x. 49. In the translation by R. G. (1671) the words are rendered “the greater typhones.”—Ibid. xiv. 268.

1626.—“Fraus Fernandez writeth, that in the way from Malacca to Japan they are encountered with great stormes which they call Tuffons, that blow foue and twentie houres, beginning from the North to the East, and so about the Compass.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 600.

1688.—“Tuffoons are a particular kind of violent Storms blowing on the Coast of Tonquin . . . it comes on fierce and blows very violent, at N.E. twelve hours more or less. . . . When the Wind begins to abate it dies away suddenly, and falling flat calm it continues so an hour, more or less; then the Wind comes round about to the S.W. and it blows and rains as fierce from thence, as it did before at N.E. and as long.”—Dampier, ii. 30.

1712.—“Non v'è spavento paragonabile a quello de' naviganti, quali in mezzo all' oceano assallati d'ogni intorno da turbini o da tifoni.”—P. Paolo Sgriveri, Mann. dell' Anima, Ottobre 14. (Borrowed from Della Crusca Voc.).

1721.—“I told them they were all strangers to the nature of the Moussoons and Tuffoons on the coast of India and China.”—Shellock's Voyage, 383.

1727.—“ . . . by the Beginning of September, they reacht the Coast of China, where meeting with a Tuffoon, or a North East Storm, that often blows violently about that Season, they were forced to bear away for Johore.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 69; [ed. 1711, ii. 68].

1727.—“In the dread Ocean, undulating wide,
Beneath the radiant line that girds the globe,
The circling Typhon, whirl'd from point to point, Exhausting all the rage of all the Sky. . . .”
Thomson, Summer.

“PROGNOSTIC of a Tuffoon on the Coast of China. By ANTONIO PASCAL DE ROSA, a Portuguese Pilot of MACAO.”

c. 1810.—(Mr. Martyn) “was with us during a most tremendous touffan, and no one who has not been in a tropical region can, I think, imagine what these storms are.”—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 382.

1826.—“A most terrific toofaun . . . came on that seemed likely to tear the very trees up by the roots.”—John Shipp, ii. 235.

“I thanked him, and enquired how this toofaun or storm had arisen.”—Pandurang Hari, [ed. 1873, i. 59].

1830.—“A hurricane has blown over since gunfire; clouds of dust are borne along upon the rushing wind; not a drop of rain; nothing is to be seen but the whirling clouds of the tiffan. The old peepul-tree moans, and the wind roars in it as if the storm would tear it up by the roots.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 53.

1840.—“Slavers throwing overboard the Dead and Dying—Typhoon coming on.

“‘Aloft all hands, strike the topmasts and belly;

Yon angry setting sun, and fierce-edged clouds

Declare the Typhoon’s coming’ &c.
(Fallacies of Hope).”

J. M. W. Turner, in the R.A. Catalogue.

Mr. Ruskin appears to have had no doubt as to the etymology of Typhoon, for the rain-cloud from this meteor is engraved in Modern Painters, vol. iv. as “The Locks of Typhon.” See Mr. Hamerton’s Life of Turner, pp. 258, 291, 315.

Punch parodied Turner in the following imaginary entry from the R.A. Catalogue:

“34.—A Typhoon bursting in a Simoon over the Whirlpool of Maelstrom, Norway, with a ship on fire, an eclipse and the effect of a lunar rainbow.”

1853.—“ . . . pointing as he spoke to a dark dirty line which was becoming more and more visible in the horizon:

“‘By Jove, yes!’ cried Stanton, ‘that’s a typhaan coming up, sure enough.’”—Oakfield, i. 122.

1859.—“The weather was sultry and unsettled, and my Jemadar, Ramdeen Tewarry . . . opined that we ought to make ready for the coming tufhan or tempest. . . . A darkness that might be felt, and that no lamp could illumine, shrouded our camp. The wind roared and yelled. It was a hurricane.”—Lt. Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 62.

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that given above from Couto respecting the Olho de Boi:

1885.—“The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of ‘lady’s eyebrows,’ so called from their being curbed in a narrow black-arched wisp, and these most surely foretold the approach of the tornado.”—Ibid., 176.

TYRE, s. Tamil and Malayāl, tayir. The common term in S. India for curdled milk. It is the Skt. dadhi, Hind. dahi of Upper India, and probably the name is a corruption of that word.

1626.—“Many reasoned with the Jesuits, and some held vain Discourses of the Creation, as that there were seven seas; one of Salt water, the second of Fresh, the third of Honey, the fourth of Milk, the fifth of Tair (which is Cream beginning to curdle). . . .”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 561.

1651.—“Tayer, dat is dieke Melch, die wie Sien noemen.”—Rogetius, 133.

1672.—“Curdled milk, Tayer, or what we call Sanne, is a thing very grateful to them, for it is very cooling, and used by them as a remedy, especially in hot fevers and smallpox, which is very prevalent in the country.”—Baldacrus, Zeylon, 403.

1776.—“If a Bramin applies himself to commerce, he shall not sell . . . Camphire and other aromatics, or Honey, or Water, or Poison, or Fleth, or Milk, or Tyer (Sour Cream) or Ghee, or bitter Oil. . . .”—Haklud, Code, 41.

1782.—“Les uns en furent affligés pour avoir passé les nuits et dormi en plein air; d’autres pour avoir mangé du riz froid avec du Tair.”—Sonnarut, i. 201.

c. 1781.—“The Sanissi (Sunyasee), who lived near the chaudrie (see CHOUTRY), took charge of preparing my meal, which consisted of rice, vegetables, tayar (lait caillé), and a little molegonir” (eau poirée—see MULLIGATAWNY).—Hagfner, i. 117.

[1800.—“The boiled milk, that the family has not used, is allowed to cool in the same vessel; and a little of the former day’s tyre, or curdled milk, is added to promote its coagulation. . . .”—Duchanan, Mysore, ii. 14.]

1822.—“He was indeed poor, but he was charitable; so he spread before them a repast, in which there was no lack of ghee, or milk, or tyer.”—The Gooroo Paramarian, E.T. by Babinpton, p. 60.

U

UJUNGTAHAI, n.p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to ‘Land’s End,’ from Ujung, ‘point or promontory,’ and tanah, ‘land’) of the extreme end of the Malay Peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. Romania. In Godinho de Eredia’s Declaração de Malaca the term is applied to the whole Peninsula, but owing to the interchangeable use of u, r, and of j, i, it appears there throughout as Viontana. The name is often applied by the Portuguese writers to the Kingdom of Johor, in which the Malay dynasty of Malacca established itself when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511; and it is even applied (as in the quotation from Barros) to their capital.

c. 1539.—"After that the King of Jantana had taken that oath before a great Caes (Casia) of his, called Ram Marhana, upon a festival day when as they solemnized their Ramadan (Ramdam) . . ."—Pinto, in Cyclopædia, p. 59.

1553.—"And that you may understand the position of the city of Ufantana, which Don Stephen went to attack, you must know that Ufantana is the most southerly and the most easterly point of the mainland of the Malacca coast, which from this Point (distant from the equator about a degree, and from Malacca something more than 10 leagues) turns north in the direction of the Kingdom of Siam. . . . On the western side of this Point a river runs into the sea, so deep that ships can run up it 1 league beyond the bar, and along its banks, well inland, King Abudin had established a big town. . . ."—Barros, IV. xi. 13.

1551.—" . . . en Muar, in Ofantana. . . ."—Batavia, Tarika, 105.

UMBRELLA, s. This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe. We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander; it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, on Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashantee. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignolli (c. 1350), Ituy Clavijo (c. 1401), Barbosa (1510), John de Barros (1553), and Minshien (1617). See also CHATTA, and SOMBRERO.

"The gentleman, who carried away a brown silk umbrella from the — Section yesterday, may have the cover belonging to it, which is of no further use to the Owner, by applying to the Porter at the Royal Hotel."—(From Personal Recollection.)—It is a curious parallel to the advertisement above from the Female Tatler.

UPAS, s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word upas is Javanese for poison; [Mr. Scott writes: "The Malay word apas, means simply 'poison.' It is Javanese hupas, Sundanese upas, Balinese hupas, 'poison.' It commonly refers to vegetable poison, because such are more common. In the Lanipong language upas means 'sickness.'"] It became familiar in Europe in connection with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which such stories were attached is one which has in the last century been described under the name of Antiaris toxicaria, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz. Antjar, or Anchar (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.

[According to Mr. Scott "the Malay name for the 'poison-tree,' or any poison-tree, is pohun apas; pohun apas, represented in English by bohon-upas. The names of two poison-trees, the Javanese anchar (Malay also anchar) and chetik, appear occasionally in English books. . . The Sundanese name for the poison tree is bulo onplo."] It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see SUMPITAN, SARBATANE).

The story of some deadly poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavernier, Cleyer, and Kämpfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connection with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from whom a quotation is given below, with others. There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whencever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March 1666 the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Ambonense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Ambon where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill-founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ipa, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbor toxicaria.* Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray's Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The professed author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.† This person describes the tree, called bohon-upas, as situated "about 27 leagues† from Batavia, 11 from Sonra Kartia, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe" (probably for Tjinkjoe, i.e. Djokjo-Karta), "the present residence of the Sultan of Java." Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Surakarta in February 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may, however, have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch's story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there was really a person of that name in the medical

* It must be kept in mind that though Rumphius (George E. and Rumphius) died in 1693, his great work was not printed till nearly fifty years afterwards (1711).

† Foersch was a surgeon of the third class at Samarang in the year 1773.—Horsfield, in Pat. Trans., as quoted below.

† This distance is probably a clerical error. It is quite inconsistent with the other two assigned.

service in Java at the time indicated. In our article ANACONDA we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary clat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquebert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D'Entrecasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. i., which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct as far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch's romance, and it was at Surakarta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

The tree from which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 ft. at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds, however, that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz. Antiaris toxicaria (N.O. Artocarpaceae)*.

M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own. He saw the Antiaris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwangi. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang, on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japara, and one near Onarang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as anchar.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield's Plantae Javanicae Rariorae, 1838-52, pp. 52 seqq., together with a figure of a flowering branch pl. xiii.; and in Blume's Kunphia (Brussel, 1836), pp. 46 seqq., and pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance. Blume gives a drawing, for the truth of which he vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as "rustas, arduas, et a ceteris segregatas,"—solitary.

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antiaris, viz. the kleut, called sometimes Upas kofa, the plant producing which is a Strychnos, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upas is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upas of English metaphor, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Upas (a form of Upas) of Macassar is the Antiaris; the Upas of the Borneo Dayaks is the Tritu.

and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe), but not for any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out 'wings' or buttresses (see Horsfield in the Lit. Trans., and Blume's Pl.) like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connection with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of exhalations of carbonic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, alluding particularly to a paper by M. Loudoun (a Dutch official of Scotch descent), in the Edinburgh New Phil. Journal for 1832, p. 102, containing a formidable description of the Guwo Upas or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces. We may observe, however, that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudoun have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of "Java." And if the Foersch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Ray), Valentijn, Spiechaan, Kaempfer, and Rumphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putida commentatio, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerschian Upas-myth, a kind of melodrama, called the Lair of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11, 1822. We give some quotations below.*

Lindley, in his Vegetable Kingdom, in a short notice of Antiaris toxicaria, says that, though the accounts are greatly exaggerated, yet the facts are notable enough. He says cloth made from the tough fibre is so acrid as to verify the Shirt of Nessus. My friend Gen. MacLagan, noticing Lindley's remark to me, adds: "Do you remember in our High School days (at Edinburgh) a grand Diorama called The Upas Tree? It showed a large wild valley, with a single tree in the middle, and illustrated the safety of approach on the windward side, and the desolation it dealt on the other."

c. 1630.—"And (in Macassar) which is no less a infernall, the men use long cimes or trunche (call'd Sempitan—see SUMPTAN), out of which they can (and use it) blow a little pricking quill, which if it draw the least drop of blood from any part of the body, it makes him (though the strongest man living) die immediately, some venoms operate in an houre, other, in a moment, the veins and body (by the virulence of the poison) corrupting and rotting presently, to any man's terror and amarement, and serve to live where such abominations pre-dominate."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1634, p. 329.

c. 1631—"I will now conclude; but I first must say something of the poison used by the King of Macassar in the Island of Celebes to envenom those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it can be plucked from the bones like so much mucus. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilent influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftness and other effects snatches the man from among the living.

Denn Sie sich auf die Baume setzten, und kleine Fischgeraht damit schmierten, und durch ein gehblert Rohrlein, von einem Baum, auf unser Volck schoossen, nit grossen nachtigen Schaden.” —Suar, Ost-Indische Fünfzehn-Jährige Krieger-Dienste . . . 1672, pp. 46-47.

1682.—“The especial weapons of the Makassar soldiers, which they use against their enemies, are certain pointed arrowlets about a foot in length. At the foremost end these are fitted with a sharp and pointed fish-tooth, and at the butt with a knob of spongy wood.

“The points of these arrows, long before they are to be used, are dypt in poison and then dried.

“This poison is a sap that drips from the bark of the branches of a certain tree, like resin, from pine-trees.

“The tree grows on the Island Makassar, in the interior, and on three or four islands of the *Bugis*es (see BUGIS), round about Makassar. It is about the height of the clove-tree, and has leaves very similar.

“The fresh sap of this tree is a very deadly poison; indeed its virulence is incurable.

“The arrowlets prepared with this poison are not, by the Makassar soldiers, shot with a bow, but blown from certain blow-pipes (nit zekere spatien gepat); just as here, in the country, people shoot birds by blowing round pellets of clay.

“They can with these in still weather hit their mark at a distance of 4 rods.

“They say the Makassers themselves know no remedy against this poison . . . for the poison presses swiftly into the blood and vital spirits, and causes a violent inflammation. They hold (however) that the surest remedy for this poison is . . .” (and so on, repeating the antidote already mentioned). —Joan Nieuhof's Zee en Land Reize, &c., pp. 217-218.

c. 1681.—“Artor Toxicaria, Ipo.

“I have never yet met with any poison more horrible and hateful, produced by any vegetable growth, than that which is derived from this lactescent tree.

Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone-cast, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow; the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were . . . and the atmosphere about it is so polluted and poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead . . . all things perish which are touched by its emanations, insomuch that every animal shuns it and keeps away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it.

“No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen . . . for Death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree. . . .” (He then tells of a venomous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree). . . .

“The Malays call it Cayu Upas, but in Macassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

“It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it.”

—Rumphii, Herbarium Amboinense, ii. 263-268.

1685.—“I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, II. Cornelius Spielman. . . . The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and wounding with these, insomuch that if the skin be but slightly scratched the wounded die in a twinkling.”

(Then the old story of the only antidote).

The account follows extracted from the Journal.

“There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is highest quality. . . . From the princes (or Rajas) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass nor any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bruise or cut made in the bark of those trees, oozing out as sap does from plants that afford milky juices. . . . When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the joints become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboos, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it speedily hardens."—Du. Corn. Spio'man . . . *de Tethis delictorio Veneno infectis in Macassar, et aliis Regnis Insular Celebes; ex ejus Diario extracta. 1783.—"The following description of the Bohon Upas, or Poison Tree, which grows in the Island of Java, and renders it unwholesome by its noxious vapours, has been procured for the London Magazine, from Mr. Heydinger, who was employed to translate it from the original Dutch, by the author, Mr. Foersch, who, we are informed, is at present abroad, in the capacity of surgeon on board an English vessel. . . .

"In the year 1771, I was stationed at Batavia, as a surgeon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company. During my residence there I received several different accounts of the Bohon-Upas, and the violent effects of its poison. They all then seemed incredible to me, but raised my curiosity in so high a degree, that I resolved to investigate this subject thoroughly. . . . I had procured a recommendation from an old Malayan priest to another priest, who lives on the nearest habitable spot to the tree, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles distant. The latter proved of great service to me on my undertaking, as that priest is employed by the Emperor to reside there, in order to prepare for eternity the souls of those who, for different crimes, are sentenced to approach the tree, and to procure the poison. . . . Malefactors, who, for their crimes, are sentenced to die, are the only persons to fetch the poison; and this is the only chance they have of saving their lives. . . . They are then provided with a silver or tortoise-shell box, in which they are to put the poisonous gum, and are properly instructed how to proceed, while they are upon their dangerous expedition. Among other particulars, they are always told to attend to the direction of the winds; as they are to go towards the tree before the wind, so that the alluvia from the tree are always blown from them. . . . They are afterwards sent to the house of the old priest, to which place they are commonly attended by their friends and relations. Here they generally remain some days, in expectation of a favourable breeze. During that time the ecclesiastic prepares them for their future fate by prayers and admonitions. When the hour of their departure arrives the priest puts them on a long leather cap with two glasses before their eyes, which comes down as far as their breast, and also provides them with a pair of leather gloves. . . .

"The worthy old ecclesiastic has assured me, that during his residence there, for upwards of thirty years, he had dismissed above seven hundred criminals in the manner which I have described; and that scarcely two out of twenty returned." . . . &c &c.—London Magazine, Dec. 1783, pp. 512-517.

The paper concludes:

"[We shall be happy to communicate any authentic papers of Mr. Foersch to the public through the London Magazine.]"

1813.—"The literary and scientific world has in few instances been more grossly imposed upon than in the account of the Pohon Upas, published in Holland about the year 1780. The history and origin of this forgery still remains a mystery. Foersch, who put his name to the publication, certainly was . . . a surgeon in the Dutch East India Company's service about the time. . . . I have been led to suppose that his literary abilities were as mean as his contempt for truth was consummate.

Having hastily picked up some vague information regarding the Opas, he carried it to Europe, where his notes were arranged, doubtless by a different hand, in such a form as by their plausibility and appearance of truth, to be generally credited. . . . But though the account just mentioned . . . has been demonstrated to be an extravagant forgery, the existence of a tree in Java, from whose sap a poison is prepared, equal in fatality, when thrown into the circulation, to the strongest animal poisons hitherto known, is a fact."—Horsfield, in Balarinn Trans. vol. vii. art. x. pp. 2-4.

One chance, indeed, a slender one, for life,
All criminals may claim.

Parbaya. Aye, I have heard Of this your cruel mercy;—'tis to seek
That tree of Java, which, for many a mile, Sheds pestilence;—for where the Upas grows
It blasts all vegetation with its own;
And, from its desert confines, e'en those

He gains a pardon,—and the pained wretch Who scaped the Upas, has escaped the 1868.—“The Church of Ireland offers to us, indeed, a great question, but even that question is but one of a group of questions. There is the Church of Ireland, there is the land of Ireland, there is the education of Ireland . . . they are all so many branches from one trunk, and that trunk is the Tree of what is called Protestant ascendancy. . . . We therefore aim at the destruction of that system of ascendancy, which, though it has been crippled and curtailed by former measures, yet still must be allowed to exist; it is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land as far as its shadow can extend; it is still there, gentlemen, and now at length the day has come when, as we hope, the axe has been laid to the root of that tree, and it nods and quivers from its top to its base. . . .”—Mr. Gladstone's Speech at Wigton, Oct. 23. In this quotation the orator indicates the Upas tree without naming it. The name was supplied by some commentators referring to this indication at a later date:

One day, having been pitchforked together and burned, they were considered disposed of: but next morning the whole of his labourers awoke, to their intense alarm, afflicted with a painful eruption. . . . It was then remembered that the smoke of the burning branches had been blown by the wind through the village. . . .” (Two Chinamen were engaged to cut down and remove the tree, and did not suffer; it was ascertained that they had smeared their bodies with coco-nut oil.)—*H. UPPER ROGER. s. This happy example of the Hobson-Jobson dialect occurs in a letter dated 1755, from Capt. Jackson at Syrian in Burma, which is given in Daltynple's Oriental Repository, i. 192. It is a corruption of the Skt. yuvā-niṣa, ‘young King,’ the Cae-ar or Heir-Apparent, a title borrowed from ancient India by most of the Indo-Chinese monarchies, and which we generally render in Siam as the ‘Second King.’

A more elaborate form is ‘arz-dāst,’ ‘memorializing.’ This is used in a very barbarous form of Hobson-Jobson below.

VARELLA, s. This is a term constantly applied by the old Portuguese writers to the pagoda of Indo-China and China. Of its origin we have no positive evidence. The most probable etymology is that it is the Malay barahd or barahd, [in Wilkinson's Diet. Bchala], 'an idol.' An idol temple is rampah-barahd, 'a house of idols,' but barahd alone may have been used elliptically by the Malays or misunderstood by the Portuguese. We have an analogy in the double use of pagoda for temple and idol.

1535.—"Their temples are very large edifices, richly wrought, which they call Valerian, and which cost a great deal. . . ."—Trevelyan of China in a Journal Letter appended to N. Moore's H. of Ethiopia, translated by Mr. Major in his Introd. to Mendoza, Hak. Soc. I. xlviii.

1592.—"Gran quantita se ne consuma ancora in quel Regno nelle lor Varelle, che sono gli suoi pagodi, de' quali ve ne gran quantita di grandi e di piccole, e sono alcune montagnuolo fatte a mano, a guisa d'ua fan di riccio, e alcune d'esse alquanto il campanello di S. Marco di Venetia. . . si consuma in queste iste, e varellone gran quantita di oro di foglia. . . ."—Ces. Federico, in Ramoza, in. 395; [in Hall, II. 595.]

1593.—" . . . nauigammo fin la mattina, che ci trouammo alla Bara giungto di Negrals, checo-dal chiamo in lor giungio il porto, che va in Pegu, oue di sopra in una banda sinistra del riuo vi pagolo, ouer varella tutta dorata, la quale si scopre di lontano di varelli, che venpono d'alto mare, et massime quando il Sol parece in quell' ora, che la fa risplendere all' intorno. . . ."—Gayoso Ballo, t. 92.

1597.—"They consume in the 6 Varellaes great quantitie of Golde; for that they be all gilded aloft."—Fitch, in Hall, II. 593; [and see quotation from same under DAGON].

1614.—"So also they have many Varellaes, which are monasteries in which dwell their Religiosos, and some of these are very sumptuous, with their roofs and pinnacles all gilded."—Costo, VI. vii. 9.

More than one prominent geographical feature on the coast-navigaton to China was known by this name. Thus in Linschoten's description of the route from Malacca to Macao, he mentions at the entrance to the 'Straits of Sincapuri,' a rock having the appearance of an obelisk, called the Varella del Chao, and again, on the eastern coast of Chantay, or Cochin China, we have frequent notice of a point (with a river also) called that of the Varella. Thus in Pinto— 1510.—The Friday following we found our-selves past against a River called by the inhabitants of the Country Tinacore, and by us (the) Varella."—Pinto (in Coyne), p. 78.

The Varella of Champa is also mentioned by Linschoten:

1596.—" . . . from this third point to the Varella the coast turneth North. . . . This Varella is a high hill reaching into the Sea, and above on the toppo it hath a verry high stonie rock like a tower or piller, which may be seen far off, therefore it is by the Portuguese called Varella."—p. 312.

VEDAS. The Sacred Books of the Brahmans, Veda being 'knowledge.' Of these books there are nominally four, viz. the Rig, Yajur, Sama and Attharva Vedas.

The earliest direct intimation of knowledge of the existence of the Vedas appears to be in the book called De Tribus Impostoribus, said to have been printed in 1698, in which they are mentioned.† Possibly this know-

* Compare this vivid description with a western notice of the same pagoda:

1835. "This median range . . . 700 miles from its origin in the Naga wilds . . . sinks in the sea level by Negrals, its last bluff crowned by the golden Pagoda of Molam, gleaming far to seaward, a Burmese Stupa."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 274. There is a small view of it in this work.

† So wrote A. B. I cannot find the book in the B. Mus. or Library.—Y. (A bibliographical account of this book will be found in "Le Traité des Trois Imposteurs, et précis d'une notice philologique et bibliographique par l'abbé Jean-Jacques Brunet," Paris and Brussels, 1867. Also see Tr. N. d. Q. viii. 449 sup.; 9 Ser. ix. 65. The passage about the Vedas seems to be the following: "Et de l'écriture des Vedas, qui est la plus ancienne collection, et de l'écriture des Vedas, qui est la plus ancienne collection, et de l'écriture des Vedas, qui est la plus ancienne collection." In, qui in angulo Europae hic delitescit, ista pagoda, negas; quam bene videtur ipse. Eminent facilitate enim sed tur ledge came through the Arabs. Though thus we do not trace back any direct allusion to the Vedas in European books, beyond the year 1600 or thereabouts, there seems good reason to believe that the Jesuit missionaries had information on the subject at a much earlier date. St. Francis Xavier had frequent discussions with Brahmans, and one went so far as to communicate to him the mantra "Om śrīndrīyapūṣṭmah." In 1559 a learned Brahman at Goa was converted by Father Belchior Carneiro, and baptized by the name of Manuel. He afterwards (with the Viceroy's sanction) went by night and robbed a Brahman on the mainland who had collected many MSS., and presented the spoil to the Fathers, with great satisfaction to himself and them (Souza, Orient. Conquist. i. 151-2).

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Roman below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated January 31, 1623, there is mention of rites called Haiteres and Tandis, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Aitareya and Tandya (see Norbert, i. 39). Lucena's allusion below to the "four parts" of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India. In course of time, however, what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about 'Beids of the Shaster' (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of the 'Four Beids' (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam or Veidam. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during the 18th century in France from Voltaire's having constituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him l'Ezour Vedam, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purāna, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de Nobili), to introduce Christian doctrines; but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Sonnerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Res. xi.). The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.). Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century write Beds, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bal. Both forms, Bal and Vedam, are known to Fleury, as we see below.

On the subject of the Vedas, see Hickes's Hist. of Indian Lit., Max Muller's Ancient Sanskrit Lit., Whitney's Oriental and Linguistic Studies, vol. i. [and Macdonell's Hist. of Sanskrit Lit., pp. 29 seqq.].

1726.—“Above all it would be a matter of general utility to the Coast that some more chaplains should be maintained there for the sole purpose of studying the Sanskrit, tongus (de Sanskrit taal), the head and mother tongue of most eastern languages, and once for all to make a translation of the Vedam, or Lawbook of the Heathen (which is followed not only by the Heathen on this Coast, but also, in whole or in part, in Ceylon, Malabar, Bengal, Sumt, and other neighbouring Kingdoms), and thereby to give such preachers further facilities for the more powerful conviction of the Heathen here and elsewhere, on their own ground, and for the disclosure of many mysteries and other matters, with which we are now unacquainted. . . . This Lawbook of the Heathen, called the Vedam, had in the very old times 4 parts, though one of these is now lost. . . . The 3 parts were named Hogyo Vedam, Sadura or Isaure Vedam, Sama Vedam, and Taravana or Adaravana Vedam.—Valentijn, Koninklyk Beschryving van Chorumandel, in his East India, v. pp. 72-73.

1735.—“Je commençais à douter si nous n'avions point été trompés par ceux qui nous avoient donné l'explication de ces cérémonies qu'ils nous avoient assurés être très-conformes à leur Vedam, c'est à dire au Livre de leur loi.”—Nobert, iii. 132.

c. 1760.—“Vedam—s.m. Hist. Suprat. C'est un livre pour qui les Brames ou Nations idolâtres de l'Indostan ont la plus grande vénération. . . . en effet, on assure que le Vedam est écrit dans une langue beaucoup plus ancienne que le Sanskrit, qui est la langue savante, connue des Bramines. Le mot Vedam signifie science.”—Encyclopédie, xxx. 32. This information was taken from a letter by Pero Calmette, S.J. (see Lett. Edif.), who anticipated Max Müller's chronological system of Vedic literature, in his statement that some parts of the Veda are at least 500 years later than others.

1765.—“If we compare the great purity and chaste manners of the Shastah (Shaster), with the great absurdities and impurities of the Vedam, we need not hesitate to pronounce the latter a corruption of the former.”—J. Z. Holwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2nd ed. i. 12. This gentleman also talks of the Bhades and the Vediam in the same line without a notion that the word was the same (see ibid. Pt. ii. 16, 1767).

c. 1770.—“The Bramin, bursting into tears, promised to pardon him on condition that he should swear never to translate the Bedas or sacred volumes. . . . From the Ganges to the Indus the Vedam is universally received as the book that contains the principles of religion.”—Rajnal, tr. 1771, i. 11-12.

c. 1774.—“Si crede poi como infallibile che dai quattro suddetto Bed, che in Malabar chiamano Vedam, Bramah medesimo ne ritirava sei Sustah, cioè scienze.”—Della Tomba, 102.

1777.—“The word Vêd, or Vêdâ, signifies Knowledge or Science. The sacred writings of the Hindoos are so distinguished, of which there are four books.”—O. Wilkins, in his Hicopides, 298.

1778.—“The natives of Bengal derive their religion from a Code called the Shaster, which they assert to be the genuine scripture of Bramah, in preference to the Vedam.”—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 6.

1778.—“Ein indischer Brahman, geboren auf der Flur, Der nichts gelesen als den Weda der Natur.”

Rückert, Weisheit der Bramanen, i. 1.

1782.—“... pour les rendre (les Pouans) plus authentiques, ils ajoutèrent qu'ils étoient tirés du Védam; ce que n'étoit pas facile à vérifier, puisque depuis très longtemps les Védams ne sont plus connus.”—Sonnrat, ii. 21.

1789.—“Then Edmund begg'd his Reverend Master T'instruct him in the Holy Shaster. No sooner does the Scholar ask, Than Goonisham begins the task, Without a book he glibly reads Four of his own invented Bedes.”

Simphon in the Second, 145.

1791.—“Toute vérité . . . est renfermée dans les quatre beths.”—St. Pierre, Chau-maire Indienne.

1791-97.—“... of Hindoo Vedas taught.” Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed. 350.

VEDDAS, n.p. An aboriginal—or at least a forest—people of Ceylon. The word is said to mean ‘hunters,’ [Tam. vidu, ‘hunting’].

1675.—“The Veddass (who call themselves Vaddass) are all original inhabitants from old time, whose descent no one is able to tell.”—Ryklus van Goen, in Valentijn, Ceylon, 208.

1681.—“In this Land are many of these wild men they call Vaddass, dwelling near no other Inhabitants. They speak the Chingalaya Language. They kill Deer, and dry the Flesh over the Fire . . . their Food being only Flesh. They are very expert with their Bows. . . . They have no Towns nor Houses, only live by the waters under a Tree.”—Linax, 61-62.

1770.—“The Bedas who were settled in the northern part of the island (Ceylon)

... go almost naked, and, upon the whole, their manners and government are the same with that of the Highlanders of Scotland." (1) —Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 90.

VELLARD, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. callado, 'a mound or embankment.' [It is generally known as 'Hornby's Vellard,' after the Governor of that name; but it seems to have been built about 1752, some 20 years before Hornby's time (see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 140).]

1809.—"At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. . . . The vellard was begun A.D. 1797, and finished in 1803, at an expense of 50,575 rupees."—Maria Graham, 8.

VELLORE, n.p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of the 18th century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1803. The etym. of the name Vellūr is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Vedur, 'the Town of the Lance'; and Col. Brauflill as 'Vēlūr, from Vēl, a benefit, benefaction.' [Cox-Stuart (Man. N. Arcot, ii. 417) and the writer of the Madras Gloss. agree in deriving it from Tam. vel, 'the babool tree, Acacia arabica,' and ūr, 'village.']

VENDU-MASTER, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind. [In the quotation given below from Owen it seems that the word was in familiar use at Johanna, and the context shows that his duty was somewhat like that of the chowdry, as he provided fowls, cattle, fruit, &c., for the expedition.]

1781.—From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears to have been an euphemism for Auctioneer; [also see Buteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. p. 109].

"Mr. Donald . . . begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendu business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams."—India Gazette, July 28.

1793.—"The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendu Master is to have the superintendence and management of all Sales at the Presidency."—In Saton-Karr, ii. 99. At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by "G. Williamson, Vendu Master."

[1823.—"One of the chiefs, a crafty old rogue, commonly known by the name of 'Lord Rodney' . . . acted as captain of the port, interpreter, Vendue-Master and master of the ceremonies. . . ."—Owen, Narrative of Voyages to explore the shores of Africa, &c., i. 179.)]

VENETIAN, s. This is sometimes in books of the 18th and preceding century used for Sequins. See under CHICK.

1512.—"At the bottom of the cargo (1 cissa), among the ballast, she carried 4 big guns (toros), and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Cojo Qafar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming."—Correa, iv. 250.

1675.—Fryer gives among coins and weights at Goa:

"The Venetian . . . 18 Tangees, 30 Rees." —p. 206.

1752.—"At this juncture a gold mohar is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 4½ Arcot Rupees."—In Long, p. 32.

VERANDA, s. An open pillared gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds equally plausible. Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has sometimes been alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar:

"Ce mot (veranda) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan beramāda, perehe, terrasse, balcon."—C. Desfrétre, in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem. p. 64.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not, however, possible that barāmāda, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Skt. Diet. (1872) gives 'varāṇḍa . . . a veranda, a portico. . . . Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. barāṇḍa, 'portico,' Bengali barāṇḍā, Hind. varāṇḍā, adding: "Most of our wise-acre literateurs (qu. littérateurs?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. bar-madakh, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit" (i. 153). Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr. Reames was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambiguous; but we shall not call him the "wise-acre grammarian."

Varanda, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Littre also gives as follows (1874): "ETYM. Verandah, mot rapporté de l'Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégrénérescence, dans les langues modernes de l'Inde, du Sansc. veranda, colonnade, de var, couvrir."

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English from India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite independently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in P. de Alcala can leave no doubt on the subject. [Prof. Skeat says: "If of native Span. origin, it may be Span. vara a rod, rail. Cf. L. varus, crooked" (Concise Dict. s.v.).]

1493.—"E vco ter comosco onde estavam lançados, em humm varanda onde estava hum grande castiçal d'acanto que nos alumeara."—Notário da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 2nd ed., 1861, p. 62, i. c. "... and came to join us where we had been put in a varanda, where there was a great candlestick of brass that gave us light. ... And Correa, speaking of the same historical passage, though writing at a later date, says: "When the Captain-Major arrived, he was conducted through many courts and verandas (muitos patos e verandas) to a dwelling opposite that in which the king was. ..."—Correa, by Stanley, 193, compared with original Lendas, I. i. 98.

1605.—In Pedro de Alcala's Spanish-Arabic Vocabulary we have:

"Varandas—Tārūṣ."

Varandas assi ṣāṛyaba, ṣārgab."

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that tārūṣ is, according to Dozy (Suppl. I. 430), darbāṣ, itself taken from darbāṣṭu (ṣpārēṣṭu), 'a stair-railing, fireguard, balcony, &c.'; whilst ṣārgab stands for ṣarjāb, a variant (Abul W., p. 735, i.) of the commoner sharjāb, 'a lattice, or anything latticed,' such as a window,—'a balcony, a balustrade.'

1510.—"This said, we entred with her into an outward court, all about invironed with Galleries (cercado a roda de duas ordens de varandas) as if it had been a Cloister of Religious persons. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxxiii.), in Cogan, 102.

1553 (but relating events of 1511).

"... assentou Affonso d'Albuquerque com olles, que primeiro que sahiessem em terra, irem no seguinte dia, quando agum estivesse estofa, dez bateis a queimar alguns bailas, que são como varandas sobre o mar."—Barros, II. vi. 3.

1563.—"R. . . . nevertheless tell me what the tree is like. O. From this varanda you can see the trees in my garden: those little ones have been planted two years, and in four they give excellent fruit. . . ."—Garcia, t. 112.

1602.—"De maneira, que quando ja Il Rey (de Pegu) chegava, tinha hums formosos Paços de muitas camaras, varandas, retretes, cozinhas, em que se recolhia com suas mulheres. . . ."—Couto, Dec. vi. Lav. vii., cap. viii.

1611.—"Varanda. Lo entreado de los corredores, por ser como varas, por otro nombre varoates quasi varafustes."—Colbarrurus.

1631.—In Haax, Malay-Latin Vocabulary, we have as a Malay word, "Baranda, Contignatio vel Solarium."

1611.—"The fort (at Cochín) has not now the form of a fortress, consisting all of houses; that in which the captain lives has a Varanda fronting the river, 15 paces long and 7 wide. . . ."—Bocarro, MS. f. 313.

1710.—"There are not wanting in Cambraya great buildings with their courts, varandas, and chambers."—De Souza, Oriente Conquist. ii. 152.

1711.—"The Building is very ancient. . . and has a paved Court, two large Verandas or Piazzas."—Lockyer, 20.

c. 1714.—"Varanda. Outra sacada do corpo do edificio, cuberta o descuberta, na qual se costuma passear, tomar o sol, o fre-co, &c. Pergula."—Bluteau, s.v.

1751.—"Ives, in describing the Cave of Elophanta, speaks twice of "the veranda or open gallery."—p. 43.

1756.—"... as soon as it was dark, we were all, without distinction, directed by the guard not over us to collect ourselves into one body, and sit down quietly under the arched Veranda, or Piazza, to the west of the Black-hole prison. . . ."—Holwell's Narr. of the Black-hole prison [p. 3]; [in Wheeler, Early Records, 229].

c. 1760.—"... Small ranges of pillars that support a pent-house or shed, forming what is called, in the Portuguese language, Verandas."—Grave, i. 53.

1781.—"On met sur le devant une petite galerie appellée varangue, et formée par le toit."—Sauvart, i. 51. There is a French nautical term, varangue, 'the ribs or floor-timbers of a ship,' which seems to have led this writer astray here.

1783.—"You are conducted by a pretty steep ascent up the side of a rock, to the door of the cave, which enters from the North. By it you are led first of all into a ferandah (?) or piazza which extends from East to West 60 feet."—Acct. of some Artificial Caves in the Neighbourhood of Bombay (Elephanta), by Mr. W. Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies. In Archæologia, vii. 237.

"The other gate leads to what in this country is called a veranda or feranda (printed varanda), which is a kind of piazza or landing-place before you enter the hall."—Letter [on Caves of Elephanta, &c.] from Hector Macneil, Esq., ibid. vii. 231.

1796.—"... Before the lowest (storey) there is generally a small hall supported by pillars of teka (Teak) wood, which is of a yellow colour and exceedingly hard. This hall is called varanda, and supplies the place of a parlour."—Fra Polino, L.T.

1809.—"In the same verandah are figures of natives of every cast and profession."—Id. Valentia, i. 421.

1810.—"The viranda keeps off the too great glare of the sun, and affords a dry walk during the rainy season."—Maria Graham, 21.

c. 1816.—"... and when Sorcant Browne bethought himself of Mary, and looked to see where she was, she was conversing up and down the verandah, though it was Sunday, with most of the rude boys and girls of the barracks."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, p. 47, ed. 1873.

VERDURE, s. This word appears to have been used in the 18th century for vegetables, adapted from the Port. verduras.

1752.—Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find:

Rs. A. P.
"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10 6."
—In Long, 35.

[VERGE, s. A term used in S. India for rice lands. It is the Port. Varzea, Varzin, Varzim, which Veyra defines as 'a plain field, or a piece of level ground, that is sowed and cultivated.'

[1749.—"... as well as vargems lands as hortas" (see OART).—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 48.

[1772.—"The estates and verges not yet assessed must be taxed at 10 per cent."—Gort. Order, ibid. i. 421.]

VETTYVER, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil vetiver, [from vetu, 'digging'; ver, 'root'].

1809.—"Europeans cool their apartments by means of wetted tatts (see TATTY) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the wattle waaroo, which, when wetted, exhale a pleasant but faint smell."—Heys's Tracts, p. 11.

VIDANA, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s.v. vidān). It is apparently from the Skt. vidāna, "... the act of speaking ... the mouth, face, countenance ... the front, point," &c. In Javanese vidana (or vidana, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank: a Javanese title" (Crawford, s.v.). The Javanese title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Athenæum, April 1, 1852, p. 413, and May 13, ibid. p. 602). The derivation given by Alwis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1681.—"The Dissauvas (see DISSAVE) by these Courli vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mulets upon them. . . . In fine this officer is the Dissauva's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Linor, 51.

1726.—"Vidanes, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes. . . ."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1766.—"Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called Vidana, trachies and Viddans. The last is derived from the word (vidāna), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 647) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."—J. de Alwis, in Ceylon Journal, 8, p. 237.

VIHARA, WIHARE, &c., s. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Skt. vihāra, a Buddhist convent, originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minster has come from monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist vihāras in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places: e.g. Bihār, and the great province which takes its name; Kuch Behār; the Vihār water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Lokhātā itself. [Numerous ruins of such buildings have been unearthed in N. India, as, for instance, that at Sarnāth near Benares, of which an account is given by Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 121). An early use of the word (probably in the sense of a monastery) is found in the Mathura Jain inscription of the 2nd century, A.D. in the reign of Huvī-lūka (ibid. iii. 33).]

1651.—“The first and highest order of priests are the Tirinnars,* who are the priests of the Dublon God. Their temples are styled Vohars. . . . These . . . only live in the Vihar, and enjoy great Revenues.”—Knorr, Ceylon, 71.

[1821.—“The Malwatto and Asgirie wihares . . . are the two heads of the Buddhistical establishment in Ceylon.”—Jay, An Account of the Interior of Ceylon, 369.]

1877.—“Twice a month, when the rules of the order are read, a monk who had broken them is to confess his crime; if it be slight, some slight penance is laid upon him, to sweep the court-yard of the wihāra, sprinkle the dust round the sacred bo-tree.”—Itihās Darśat, Buddhism, 169.

VISS, s. A weight used in S. India and in Burma; Tam. viṣai, ‘division,’ Skt. rikhita, ‘distributed.’ In Madras it was $\frac{1}{2}$ of a Madras maund, and = 3lb. 2oz. avoirdupois. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pollam, 40 pollams = 1 viss, 8 viss = 1 maund (of 25lbs.), 20 maunds = 1 rundiy. In Burma the viss = 100 tikals = 3lbs. 5 61. Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight peik-thu, probably a corruption of viṣai.

1554.—“The laar (see BAHAR) of Pegu contains 120 bigas; each biga weighs 40 ounces; the biga contains 100 ticals; the tical weighs 31 ultracs.”—J. Vives, 33.

1663.—“This Ganza goeth by weight of Byzo . . . and commonly a Byza of Ganza is worth (after our account) half a ducat.”—César Frederike, in Hall, ii. 367.

1626.—“In anno 1622 the Myro was shut up . . . the coming of the Mogull’s Embassadeur to this King’s Court, with his peremptory demand of a Vysse of the fairest diamonds, caused the cessation.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1003.

[1727.—“Vieco.” See under TICAL.]

[1807.—“Visay.” See under GARGE.]

1855.—“The King last year purchased 800,000 vias of lead, at 5 tikals (see TICAL) for 100 vies, and sold it at twenty tikals.”—Fule, Mission to Ava, 256.

VIZIER, WUZEER, s. Ar.—H. wazīr, ‘a minister,’ and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahomedan) prince. [In the Koran (cap. xx. 30) Mo-es says: “Give a wazīr of my family, Harūn (Aaron) my brother.” In the Ain we have a distinction drawn between the Vakil, or prime minister, and the Vazīr, or minister of finance (ed. Blockmann, i. 527).] In India the Nawāb of Oudh was long known as the Nawāb Wazīr, the founder of the quasi-independent dynasty having been Sa’ūdāt ‘Alī Khān, who became Subādār of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Wazīr of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawāb Wazīr merged in that of pādshāh, or King, assumed by Ghāzi-ud-din Haidar in 1820, and up to his death still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wājid ‘Alī Shāh, under surveillance in Calcutta. As most titles degenerate, Wazīr has in Spain become alguazil, ‘a constable,’ in Port. alcazil, ‘an alderman.’

[1612.—“Jeffer Basha Vizier and Viceroy of the Province.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 173.]

1614.—“Il primo visir, sopra ogni altro, che era allora Nasuh bachi, genero del Gran Signore, venne ultimo di tutti, con grandissima o ben allora cavalcata, enfin della quale andava egli solo con molta gravita.”—P. della Valle (from Constantinople), i. 13.

W

* [The first part of this word is theri, Skt. śūtrika, Harūy (G. Monachery, p. 11) says the superior priests were called śūtraminas, from Pāl thero, “an elder.”]

[WACADASH, s. Japanese waki-zashi, ‘a short sword.’]

[—"His wacadaash or little catlan."—Ibid. ii. 20.

[1808.—"There is also the wakizashi, or dirk of about nine and a half inches, with which hankari was committed."—Chambers, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 377.]

WALEB, s. A horse imported from N. South Wales, or Australia in general.

1860.—"Well, young chaver, have you seen the horses? How is the Waler's off foreleg?"—Trevelyan, Dard Bungalow, 223.

1873.—"The male, a brown Walergolding," &c.—Madras Mail, June 25.

WALI, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way.

(a). Ar. wālī. A Mahomedan title corresponding to Governor; ["the term still in use for the Governor-General of a Province as opposed to the Muḥāsib, or district-governor. In E. Arabia the Wali is the Civil Governor as opposed to the Amir or Military Commandant. Under the Caliphate the Wali acted also as Prefect of Police (the Indian Panjādar—see FOUJDAR), who is now called Zābit" (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 238)]. It became familiar some years ago in connection with Kandahar. It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the Wālī.

1298.—"Whenever he know of anyone who had a pretty daughter, certain ruffians of his would go to the father and say: 'What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Ballo Achmath' (for they call him the Ballo, or, as we should say, 'the Viceroy')."—Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498.—"... e mandon hum homem quo so chama Bale, o qual he como alquaido."—Roteiro de J. da Gama, 54.

1727.—"As I was one morning walking in the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City (Muscovy), by them called the Waal."—A. Hamilton, i. 70; [ed. 1744, i. 71.]

[1763.—In Georgia. "Wali, a viceroy descended immediately from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides."—Hanway, iii. 23.]

b. Ar. walī. This is much used in some Mahomedan countries (e.g.

Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by a transfer for the shrine of such a saint. ["This would be a separate building like our family tomb and probably domed. . . . Europeans usually call it 'a little Wālī'; or, as they write it, 'Wāly'; the contained for the container; the 'Santon' for the 'Santon's tomb'" (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 97).] See under PEER.

[c. 1590.—"The ascetics who are their repositories of learning, they style Wali, whose teaching they implicitly follow."—Alm, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1869.—"Quant au titre de pir (see PEER) . . . il signifie proprement ricillard, mais il est pris dans cette circonstance pour désigner une dignité spirituelle équivalente à celle des Gurā Hindous. . . . Beaucoup de ces pirs sont à leur mort waḥid comme saints; de là le mot pir est synonyme de Wali, et signifie Saint au-i bien que ce dernier mot."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. dans l'Inde, 23.

WALLA, s. This is a popular abridgment of Competition-walla, under which will be found remarks on the termination wāḥid, and illustrations of its use.

WANDEROO, s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Presbyter urinus). The name is, however, the generic Singhalese word for 'a monkey' (wandera, wandura), and the same with the Hind. bāndar, Skt. vānara. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox's wanderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tennent, i. 129-130.

1681.—"Monkey . . . Some so large as our English Spaniel Dogs, of a darkish gray colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just of the same bigness, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others . . . both these sorts do but little mischief. . . . This sort they call in their language Wanderow."—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 26.

[1803.—"The wanderow is remarkable for its great white beard, which stretches quite from ear to ear across its black face, while the body is of a dark grey."—Percival, Acc. of the I. of Ceylon, 290.]

1810.—"I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderows, on the top of a coco-nut tree, where he was gathering nuts. . . ."—Marin Graham, 97.

1874.—“There are just now some very remarkable monkeys. One is a Macaque . . . Another is the Wanderoo, a fellow with a great mass of hair round his face, and the most awful teeth ever seen in a monkey's mouth. This monkey has been credited with having killed two niggers before he was caught; he comes from Malabar.”—F. Buelland, in Life, 289.

WANGHEE, WHANGEE, s. The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan. We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin. (1). Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulu swangi (see in vol. iv. cap. vii. et seqq.). As buluh is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning. (2). Our friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie notes: “In the K'ang-hi tze-tien, 118, 119, the Huang-tchu is described as follows: ‘A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.’ See also Wells Williams, Syllabic Dict. of the Chinese Lang. p. 251.

[On this Professor Giles writes: “‘Whang’ clearly stands for ‘yellow,’ as in Whangpoo and like combinations. The difficulty is with et, which should stand for some word of that sound in the Cantonese dialect. There is such a word in ‘clothes, skin, sheath’; and ‘yellow skin (or sheath)’ would form just such a combination as the Chinese would be likely to employ. The suggestion of Terrien de la Couperie is not to the purpose.” So Mr. C. M. Gardner writes: “The word hwang has many meanings in Chinese according to the tone in which it is said. Hwang-chi t'ung or hwang-tee-tung might be ‘yellow-corticed cane.’ The word chuh means ‘bamboo,’ and hwang-chuh might be ‘yellow or Imperial bamboo.’ Wan means a ‘myriad,’ chi ‘utensil’; wan-chi t'ung might mean a kind of cane ‘good for all kinds of uses.’ Wan-chuh is a particular kind of bamboo from which paper is made in W. Hapei.”

Mr. Skeat writes: “‘Buluh swangi’ is correct Malay. Favre in his Malay-Fr. Dict. has ‘swangi, esprit, spectre, esprit mauvais’ ‘Buluh swangi’ does not appear in Ridley’s list as the name of a bamboo, but he does not profess to give all the Malay plant names.”]

WATER-CHESTNUT. The trapa bispinosa of Roxb.; Hind. singhāra, ‘the horned fruit.’ See SINGARA.

WEAVER-BIRD, s. See BAYA.

WEST-COAST, n.p. This expression in Dutch India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days. See SLAVE.

[1685.—“Order’d that the following goods be laden aboard the Syam Merchant for the West Coast of Sumatra. . . .”—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 130; also see 130, 138, 163, &c.]

1747.—“The Revd. Mr. Francis Fordyce being entered on the Establishment . . . and having several months’ allowance due to him for the West Coast, amounting to Page. 371. 9. . . .”—Pt. St. David’s Consn., April 30, MS. in India Office. The letter appended shows that the chaplain had been attached to Bencoolen. See also Wheeler, i. 148.

WHAMPOA, n.p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city. [The name is pronounced H'angpo (Bull, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 631).]

1770.—“Now all European ships are obliged to anchor at Houang-poa, three leagues from the city” (Canton).—Haynal, tr. 1777, ii. 258.

WHISTLING TEAL, s. This in Jerdon is given as Dendrocygna Arcsuror of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfil one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

WHITE ANTS. See ANTS, WHITE.

WHITE JACKET, s. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner; and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years obsolete. [They certainly came again into common use some 20 years ago.] But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the last century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849. [The late Mr. Bridgman of Gorakhpur, whose recollection of India dated from the earlier part of the last century told me that in his younger days the rule at Calcutta was that the guest always arrived at his host's house in the full evening-dress of the time, on which his host meeting him at the door expressed his regret that he had not chosen a cooler dress; on which the guest's Bearer always, as if by accident, appeared from round the corner with a nankeen jacket, which was then and there put on. But it would have been opposed to etiquette for the guest to appear in such a dress without express invitation.]

1603.—"It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which were well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth."—Id., Valentin, i. 240.

[c. 1818.—" . . . a white jacket being evening dress for a dinner-party. . . ."—Berncastle, Voyage to China, including a Visit to the Bombay Pres. i. 93.]

WINTER, s. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that shita in Arabic is indifferently 'winter,' or 'rain'; the winter season being the rainy season. Shita is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: "The winter (selthar) is past, the rain is over and gone."

1513.—"And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Corrate) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (pola que envernando), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two boats and other vessels, and in one of these was the gauda (rhinoceros), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa. . . ."—Correa, ii. 373.

1563.—"R. . . In what time of the year does this disease (morri, Mort-de-chien) mostly occur?

"O. . . It occurs mostly in June and July (which is the winter-time in this country). . . ."—Garcia, i. 76y.

c. 1567.—"Da Beneger a Goa sono d'estate otto giornate di viaggio: ma noi lo facevamo di mezzo l'inverno, il mese de Luglio."—Croce l'Adricci, in Ramaria, iii. 329.

1583.—"Il uerno in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio e Agosto, e il resto dell' anno è estate. Ma bene si da notare che qui la stagione non si può chiamar uerno rispetto al freddo, che non vi regna mai, ma solo per cagione de' venti, e delle gran pioggie. . . ."—Gaspard Halbi, i. 67r.

1584.—"Note that the City of Goa is the principal place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beguneth the 15 of May, with very great rain."—Barret, in Hall, ii. 413.

[1592.—See under PENANG.]

1610.—"The Winter here beganeth about the first of June and dureth till the twentieth of September, but not with continuall raines as at Goa, but for some six or seven dayes every change and fall, with much wind, thunder and rain."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 423.

c. 1610.—"L'hyver commence au mois d'Avril, et dure six mois."—L'uyard de Laval, i. 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 101, and see i. 61, ii. 31].

1613.—" . . . des Galliottes (qui sortent tous les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares . . . et celi est enuiron la May-Septembre, lors que leur hyuer est passé. . . ."—Moeyne, 317.

1653.—"Dans les Indes il y a deux Latex et deux Hyuers, ou pour mieus dire vn l'Printemps perpetuel, parce que les arbres y sont tousiours verils: Le premier Esté commence au mois de Mars, et finit au mois de May, que est la commencement de l'hyuer du playe, qui continue iusques en Septembre pleuant incessament ces quatre mois, en sorte que les Karuanoes, ny les Patmars (see PATTAMAR, a) ne vont ne viennent: l'ay esté quarante iours sans pouoir sortir de la maison. . . . Le second Esté est depuis Octobre iusques en Decembre, au quel mois il commence à faire froid . . . ce froid est le second Hyuer qui finit au mois de Mars."—De la Boullaye-le-Gonz, ed. 1657, p. 244-245.

1665.—"L'Hyver se sait sentir. El commença en Juin per quantité de pluies et de tonnerres."—Therriot, v. 311.

1678.—" . . . In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a Mumjama, or Wax Cloth to throw over it. . . ."—Fryer, 410.

1691.—"In ora Occidentali, quae Malabarorum est, hyems à mense Aprilis in Septembrem usque dominatur: in littore vero Orientali, quod Hollandi de Flasi tan Choromandel, Orani Coromandelae vocant trans illos montes, in eadem latitudinis gradibus, contrariis planè modò à Septembri usquo ad Aprilom hyemem habent."—Johi Ludolf, ad suam Historiam Commentarius, 101.

1770.—"The mere breadth of these mountains divides summer from winter, that is to say, the season of fine weather from the rainy . . . all that is meant by winter in India is the time of the year when the clouds . . . are driven violently by the winds against the mountains," &c.—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 34.

WOOD-APPLE, s. [According to the Madras Gloss, also known as Urd Fruit, Monkey Fruit, and Elephant Apple, because it is like an elephant's skin.] A wild fruit of the N.O. Aurantaceae growing in all the drier parts of India (Feronia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see BAEL) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopœia it is sometimes substituted (Moodeen Sherif, [Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 324 seqq.]. Buchanan-Hamilton calls it the Kol-bel (Kathbel), (Eastern India, ii. 787)].

1875.—"Once upon a time it was announced that the Pādshāh was about to pass through a certain remote village of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in pancheayat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazāra. One was the custard-apple, the other was the wood-apple . . . a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon or small citron converted into wood. After many pros and cons, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salaam, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive lanuago at being stopped to receive such trash, pelted the simplotons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squashed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking heaven that the offering had not been of wood-apples!"—Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geog. Mag., 1875, pp. 49-50. The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule, for whom see under TOBACCO.

WOOD-OIL, or GURJUN OIL, s. Beng.—H. garjan. A thin balsam oil drawn from a great forest tree (N.O. Dipterocarpeae) Dipterocarpus turbinatus, Gaertn., and from several other species of Dipt., which are among the finest trees of Transgangetic India. Trees of this N.O. abound also in the Malay Archipelago, whilst almost unknown in other parts of the world. The celebrated Borneo camphor is the product of one such tree, and the saul-wood of India of another. Much wood-oil is exported from the Burmese provinces, the Malay Peninsula, and Siam. It is much used in the East as a natural varnish and preservative of timber; and in Indian hospitals it is employed as a substitute for copaiva, and as a remedy for leprosy (Hanbury & Fluckiger, Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 167 seqq.). The first mention we know of is c. 1759 in Dalrymple's Or. Repertory in a list of Burma products (i. 109).

WOOLLOCK, OOLOCK, s. [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives ulāḡ, ulāk, as Turkish, meaning "a kind of small boat." Mr. Grierson (Bihar Peasant Life, 42), among the larger kinds of boats, gives ulāk, "which has a long narrow bow overhanging the water in front." Both he and Mr. Grant (Rural Life in Bengal, 25) give drawings of this boat, and the latter writes: "First we have the bulky Oolāk, or baggage boat of Bengal, sometimes as gigantic as the Putelee (see PATTELO), and used for much the same purposes. This last-named vessel is a clinker-built boat—that is having the planks overlapping each other, like those in a London wherry; whereas in the round smooth-sided oolak and most country boats, they are laid edge to edge, and fastened with iron clamps, having the appearance of being stitched."] 1679.—"Messrs. Vincent" (&c.) . . . "met the Agent (on the Hoogly R.) in Budgeroes and Oolankes."—Fort St. Geo. Consols., Sept. 14. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1871.

[1683.—". . . 10 Woollocks for Souldiers, etc."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 76.

1761.—"Then the Manjoes went after him in a woollock to look after him."—Jbid. 333.

1781.—"The same day will be sold a twenty-oar'd Woollock-built Budgerow. . . ."—India Gazette, April 14.

1799.—"We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy woollocks of Bengal."—Symes, Ara, 233.

WOON, s. Burm. uon, 'a governor or officer of administration'; literally 'a burden,' hence presumably the 'Bearer of the Burden.' Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.:

Woon-gyee, i.e. 'Hun-gui' or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hlot-dau (see LOTTOO).

Woon-donk, i.e. Hun-dauk, lit. 'the prop of the Hun'; a sort of Adlatus, or Minister of an inferior class. We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as "M. Woon-donk."

Atwon-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household.

Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May-roon of Syms).

Yo-wun, 'Water-Governor,' formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (Ray-roon of Syms).

Akaok-wun, Collector of Customs (Akoon of Syms).

WOORDY-MAJOR, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of waradi, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. waradi or urdi, 'uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,' as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology, virula, 'crying, proclaiming, a panegyric.' But there is also Ar. warid, 'a flight of birds,' and then also 'a troop or squadron,' which is perhaps as probable. [Others, again, as many military titles have come from S. India, connect it with Can. waradi, 'news, an order.'] [1781.—" . . . We made the wurdie wallah acquainted with the circumstance. . . ."—Furree, Bombay Letters, ii. 323.

[1861.—"The senior Ressaldar (native captain) and the Woordie Major (native adjutant) . . . reported that the sepoys were trying to tamper with his men."—Care-Brown, Punjab and Delhi, i. 120.]

WOOTZ, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself in books to the so-called 'natural steel' of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay. The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11, 1795, called: "Experiments and observations on investigate the nature of a kind of Steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there called Wootz . . . by George Pearson, M.D." This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for wook, representing the Canarese ukku (pron. rukku) 'steel.' Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Balfour. He states that uchcha and nicha (Hind. uchha-nicha, in reality for 'high' and 'low') are used in Canarese speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of uchcha, 'of superior quality.' The former suggestion seems to us preferable. [The Madras Gloss. gives as local names of steel, Can. ukku, Tel. ukku, Tam. and Malayāl. urukku, and derives wootz from Skt. uśā, whence comes H. uśā.]

The article was no doubt the famous 'Indian Steel,' the σίδερος Ἰνδικός καὶ σόμας of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the alhinde of old Spanish, the hundarini of the Persian traders, ondanique of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Balcā (see BATCUL) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goa Government in 1591 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, 318).

1705.—"Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and is in high esteem among the Indians."—Phil. Trans. for 1705, Pt. ii. p. 322.

[1814.—See an account of wootz, in Hugue's Tracts, 362 seq.]

1811.—"The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. . . . It may be rendered self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids . . . it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades (of Da-muscus) were made of this steel."—Williamson, Engines of War, pp. 203-206.

1861.—"Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the wootz of India."—Percy's Metallurgy, Iron and Steel, 860.

WRITER, s.

(a). The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E.I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b). A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

a.—

1673.—"The whole Mass of the Company's Servants may be comprehended in these Classes, viz., Merchants, Factors, and Writers."—Tryer, 81.

[1675-6.—See under FACTOR.]

1676.—"There are some of the Writers who by their lives are not a little scandalous."—Letter from a Chaplain, in Wheeler, i. 61.

1683.—"Mr. Richard More, one that came out a Writer on y^e Herbert, left this World for a better. Y^e Lord prepare us all to follow him!"—Melger, Diary, Aug. 22; [Hak. Soc. i. 105].

1747.—"S2. Mr. ROBERT CLIVE, Writer in the Service, being of a Martial Disposition, and having acted as a Volunteer in our late Engagements, We have granted him an Ensign's Commission, upon his Application for the same."—Letter from the Council at Ft. St. David to the Honble. Court of Directors, dd. 23. May, 1747 (MS. in India Office).

1758.—"As we are sensible that our junior servants of the rank of Writers at Bengal are not upon the whole on so good a footing as elsewhere, we do hereby direct that the future appointments to a Writer for salary, diet money, and all allowances whatever, be 400 Rupees per annum, which mark of our favour and attention, properly attended to, must prevent their reflections on what we shall further order in regard to them as having any other object or foundation than their particular interest and happiness."—Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 129. (The 'further order' is the prohibition of palanquins, &c.—see PALANKEEN.)

c. 1760.—"It was in the station of a covenant servant and writer, to the East India Company, that in the month of March, 1750, I embarked."—Grose, i. 1.

1762.—"We are well assured that one great reason of the Writers neglecting the Company's business is engaging too soon in trade. . . . We therefore positively order that none of the Writers on your establishment have the benefit or liberty of Dusticks (see DUSTUCK) until the times of their respective writerships are expired, and they commence Factors, with this exception. . . ."—Court's Letter, Dec. 17, in Long, 237.

1765.—"Having obtained the appointment of a Writer in the East India Company's service at Bombay, I embarked with 14 other passengers . . . before I had attained my sixteenth year."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 5; [2nd ed. i. 1].

1769.—"The Writers of Madras are exceedingly proud, and have the knack of forgetting their old acquaintances."—Ld. Teignmouth, Mem. i. 20.

1783.—"In the first place all the persons who go abroad in the Company's civil service, enter as clerks in the counting-house, and are called by a name to correspond with it, Writers. In that condition they are obliged to serve five years."—Burke, Speech on Hastings' Imprachment, Feb. 1783. In Works, vii. 292.

[1860.—"Following him are the krāncees (see CRANNY), or writers, on salaries varying, according to their duties and abilities, from five to thirty rupees."—Grant, Rural L. in Bengal, 133-5.]

WUG, s.

We give this Belūch word for loot on the high authority quoted.

[On this Mr. M. L. Dames writes:

"This is not, strictly speaking, a Balochi word, but Sindhi, in the form wag or waqu. The Balochi word is bag, but I cannot say for certain whether it is borrowed from Sindhi by Balochi, or vice versa. The meaning, however, is not loot, but 'a herd of camels.' It is probable that on the occasion referred to the loot consisted of a herd of camels, and this would easily give rise to the idea that the word meant loot. It is one of the commonest forms of plunder in those regions, and I have often heard Balochis, when narrating their raids, describe how they had carried off a 'bag.'"]

1815.—"In one hunt after wug, as the Beloochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places, where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C. Napier, in Life, iii. 293.

X

XERAFINE, XERAFIM, &c., s. The word in this form represents a silver coin formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1s. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 reis. But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafī (see ASHRAFEE) (or sharifī, 'noble'—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dīnār, but was also in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mohur. Ashrafī for a gold dīnār (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the '1001 Nights,' as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 333-354; [Burton, Ar. Night, v. 160, 376]). Ashrafīn, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littré also a corruption of ashrafī.

1493.—"And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if he wished to go he must give him 600 xarifes, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither."—Relato de V. da G. 79.

1510.—"When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amirra (Ameer), says to him: 'Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Damascus, and I will give you 100,000 or 200,000 teraphim of gold.'"—Vurthema, 10.

"Every Mameluke, great or little, has for his pay six sarāphī per month."—Ibid. 13.

"Our captain sent for the superior of the said mosque, to whom he said: that he should show him the body of Nabi—this Nabi means the Prophet Mahomet—that he would give him 3000 seraphim of gold."—Ibid. 29. This one eccentric traveller gives thus three different forms.

1513.—"... hunc regem Affonsus idem, urbe opulētissima et principuo emporio Armusio vi capto, quindecim milia Seraphinorū, ea est aurea moneta ducatus equivalentis annuū nobis tributū effecerat."—Epistola Emmanuelis Regis, 2b. In the preceding the word seems to apply to the gold dīnār.

1523.—"And by certain information of persons who knew the facts . . . Antonio de Saldanha . . . agreed with the said King Turuxa (Tūrān Shāh), . . . that the said King . . . should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xarafins more yearly . . . in all 25,000 xarafins"—Tombo da Índia, Subsidio, 79. This is the gold mohur.

1510.—"This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated with the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Negapitam I have often seen more than 700 sail take cargoes amounting to more than 20,000 moys (the moyo = 29.39 bushels) of rice. . . . This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of St. Thomé did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and jigra (see JAGGEEY), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be boiled down in their houses, and gave it boiled down in the water to the people to drink, all for the love of God. . . . This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Bissagar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and beneficence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an ala (—la OLLAH) of thanks to the residents of St. Thomé. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Strait, that in Aden a load (fadō) of rice fetched forty xarafins, each worth a crúzado. . . ."—Correa, iv. 131-132.

1593.—"The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardauo (Pardao) Xeraphin. It is of silver, but of small value. They strike it at Goa, and it is marked on one side with the image of St. Sebastian, on the other with 3 or 4 arrows in a sheaf. It is worth 3 testoons or 300 Reys (Reas) of Portugal, more or less."—Lincolnton (from French ed. 71); [Hak. Soc. i. 211, and compare i. 190: and see another version of the same passage under PARD-DAO].

1610.—"Inprimis de Serafins Echeri, which be ten Rupias (Rupees) a piece, there are sixtie Leches (Lacks)."—Hackins, in Purchas, i. 217. Here the gold mohur is meant.

c. 1610.—"Les pièces d'or sont cherafins à vingt-cinq sols pièce."—Pyrand du Laul, ii. 40; [Hak. Soc. ii. 63, reading cherufins].

1653.—"Monnoyes courantes d Goa.
"Sequin de Venise . . . 21 tangues (Tanga)

Reale d'Espagne	12 tangues.
Abassas de Perso	3 tangues.
Pardaux (Pardao)	5 tangues.

Roupies (Rupees) du Mogol	6 tangues.
Tangue	20 bousserouquo (Budgrook).

De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 1657, 530.

c. 1675. — "Coins . . . of Rajaporo. Imaginary Coins. The Pagod (Pagoda) is $\frac{3}{4}$ Rupees. 48 Juttal (see JEETUL) is one Pagod. 10 and $\frac{1}{2}$ Larees (Larin) is 1 Pagod. Zeraphins 25, 1 Old Dollar.

"Coins and weights of Bombaim. 3 Larees is 1 Zeraphin. 80 Raies (Reas) 1 Lares. 1 Pice is 10 Raies. The Raies are imaginary.

"Coins and weights in Goa. . . . The Cruzado of gold, 12 Zeraphins. The Zeraphin, 5 Tungo. The Tungo (Tanga), 5 Vintens. The Vintens, 15 Nasrooks (Budrooks), whereof 75 make a Tungo. And 60 Reas make a Tungo."—Fryer, 266.

1690.—
 "The Gold St. Thoma . . . dn. gr. 2 54
 The Silv. Sherepheno . . . 7 4."

Table of Coins, in Orington.

1727.—"Their Soldiers Pay (at Goa) is very small and ill paid. They have but six Xerapheens per Month, and two Suits of Calico, striped or chequered, in a Year . . . and a Xerapheen is worth about sixteen Pence half Penny Stur."—A. Hamilton, i. 219; [ed. 1741, i. 222].

1760.—"You shall coin Gold and silver of equal weight and fineness with the Ashrafees (Ashrafes) and Rupees of Moorshedabad, in the name of Calcutta."—Nawab's Perennial for Establishment of a Mint in Calcutta, in Long, 227.

c. 1811.—"Sahibs now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Lat Isk Sahib (Lord Lake) the Sahibs would give an ashraf (Ashrafes), when now they think twice before taking out a rupee."—Personal Reminiscences of an old Khurram's Conversation. Here the gold mohur is meant.

XERCANSOR, n.p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mohammedan names. Xereansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Shir Khān Sūr, the famous rival and displacer of Humāyūn, under the title of Sher Shāh.

c. 1538.—"But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him . . . and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then leaving everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great army, having with him a Patan Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Behar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more search than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333.

Cotoxa (Koto sha) appears to be Kutb Khān of the Mohammedan historians there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mohammedan king of Malacca by Barros, Xaquem Daraz (II. vi. 1), by Albuquerque Xaquendarza (Comm. Pt. III. ch. 17). This name is rendered by Lassen's ponderous lore into Skt. Salanadhara, "d. h. Besitzer kräftiger Besinnungen" (or "Possessor, of strong recollections."—Ind. Alt. iv. 516), whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sulandur Shāh (So Linschoten (Hak. Soc. ii. 183) writes Xatamas for Shāh Tamas). For other examples, see Codovaseam, Idalcian.

Y

YABOO, s. Pers. yābū, which is perhaps a corruption of Ar. yābūb, defined by Johnson as 'a swift and long horse.' A nag such as we call 'a galloway,' a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

[c. 1590.—"The fifth class (yābū horses) are bred in this country, but fall short in strength and size. Their performances also are mostly bad. They are the offspring of Turki horses with an inferior breed."—Itin, ed. Blochmann, i. 231.]

1751.—"There are in the highland country of KANDAHAR and CABUL a small kind of horses called Yabous, which are very serviceable."—Hanway, Travels, ii. 307.

[1830.—"A very strong and useful breed of ponies, called Yauboos, is however reared, especially about Baumbian. They are used to carry baggage, and can bear a great load, but do not stand a long continuance of hard work so well as mules."—Elphinstone, Caubul, ed. 1812, i. 183.]

YAK, s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunniens, L., Poephagus of Gray), belonging to the Bisontine group of Bovinae. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind. name chātorī gāo, chātorīs (see CHOWRY), having been usually called "cow-tails" in the 18th century. [The usual native name for the beast in N. India is suragā'o, which comes from Skt. surabhi, 'pleasing.'] The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow,' nor is it found in the 3rd ed. of Pennant's II. of Quad- rupes (1793), though there is a fair account of the animal as Bos grunniens of Lin., and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, its first appearance in print was, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. g'ak, Jacquet's Dict. ggug. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aelian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in mediæval times described by Rubruk. The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burden, and is much ridden. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokand to Kuku-khotan or Kwei-lwachung, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

c. A.D. 250 — "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned oxen, and cattle of two different sizes, one kind of great swiftness, and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle from the tails of which they make fly-laps. . . ."—Aelian, de Animalibus, xv. cap. 14.

Again :

"There is in India a grass-eating animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour.† The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. . . . When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket . . . and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that the tail is the great object of fancy."—Ibid., xvi. 11.

c. 515.—"This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Typha, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and ponies. They tell of this beast that if its tail catches in a tree he will not budge but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of its tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off, and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transl. in Cutney, &c., p. clixiv.

[c. 1520.—In a list of things imported from the "northern mountains" into Oadhi, we have "tails of the K'et'icow."—Am. ed. Jarrett, ii. 172; and see 240.]

1730.—"Dopo di che per circa 49 giorni di cammino non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mulo di yak, e di uno loro pelo, per fare, cavalli. . . ."—Per l'Oceano del Penant di Bili, Breve Notitia del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Journ. As. 21. ser.) p. 17.

1783.—" . . . on the opposite side saw several of the black chowry-tailed cattle. . . . This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. . . . The Yak of Tartary, called Sowa Goy in Hindo-tan. . . ."—Turner's Embassy (publ. 1809), 185-d. [Sir H. Yule identifies Sowa Goy with Ch'ori Giti; but, as will be seen above, the H. name is sewga.]

In the publication at the latter date appears the excellent plate after Stubbs, called "the Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of the animal. [Also see Turner's paper (1794) in the As. Res., London reprint of 1795, ii. 355 seq.]

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce :

1851.—"Les bœufs à long poil étaient de véritables caricatures; impossible de figurer rien de plus drôle; ils marchaient les jambes écartées, et portaient péniblement un énorme système de stalcettes, qui leur pendaient sous le ventre jusqu'à terre. Ces pauvres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glaçons qu'il semblait qu'on les eût mis confondre dans du sucre candi."—Huc et Gabet, Souvenirs d'un Voyage, &c. ii. 201; [L.T. ii. 109].

"Au moment où nous passâmes le Mourouli Oussou sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nous avions remarqué de loin . . . des objets informes et noirs rangés en file en travers de ce grand fleuve. . . . Ce fut seulement quand nous fûmes tout près, que nous pûmes reconnaître plus de 60 bœufs sauvages enroulés dans la glace. Ils avaient voulu, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la congélation des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glaçons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tête, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore à découvert; mais la reste du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on eût dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aigles et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux."—Ibid. ii. 219; [L.T. ii. 119 seq. and for a further account of the animal see ii. 81].

* Πονόδρος, whence no doubt Gray took his name for the genus.

† The tails usually brought for sale are those of the tame yak, and are white. The tail of the wild yak is black, and of much greater size.

YAM, s. This general name in English of the large edible tuber Dioscorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the W. Indies at the time of the discovery. [Mr. Platt (9 ser. N. & Q. v. 226 seq.) suggests that the original form was nyam or nyami, in the sense of 'fool,' nyami meaning 'to eat' in the Fulah language of Senegal. The cannibal Nyam-Nyame, of whom Miss Kingsley gives an account (Travels in W. Africa, 330 seq.) appear to take their name from the same word.]

ZABITA, s. Hind. from Ar. zabita. An exact rule, a canon, but in the following it seems to be used for a tariff of assessment:

1793.—"I have established the Zabeta for the shops in the Fort as fixed by Maceod. It is to be paid annually."—Wellington, i. 49.

ZAMORIN, s. The title for many centuries of the Hindu sovereign of Calicut and the country round. The word is Malayäl. Sāmūtiri, Sāmūtri, Tāmūtiri, Tāmūtri, a tadbhava (or vernacular modification) of Skt. Sāmundri, 'the Sea-King.' (See also Wilson, MacKenzie MSS. i. xvii.) [Mr. Logan (Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.) suggests that the title Samudri is a translation of the Rāja's ancient Malayäl. title of Kunnalakkon, i.e. 'King (kon) of the hills (kunnu) and waves (ala).'] The name has recently become familiar in reference to the curious custom by which the Zamorin was attacked by one of the candidates for his throne (see the account by A. Hamilton (ed. 1744, i. 309 seq. Pinkerton, viii. 374) quoted by Mr.

Frazer (Golden Bough, 2nd ed. ii. 14 seq.).]

c. 1313.—"The sultan is a Kafir called the Sāmari. . . . When the time of our departure for China came, the sultan, the Sāmari equipped for us one of the 13 junks which were lying in the port of Calicut."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 89-91.

1442.—"I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sāmari. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him."—Abderrazzil, in India in the XVth. Cent. 17.

1498.—"I first Calicut whither we went. . . . The King whom they call Camolim (for Camorim) can muster 100,000 men for war, with the contingents that he receives, his own authority extending to very few."—Rolovo de Vasco da Gama.

1510.—"Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut, because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samory, which in the Pagan language means 'God on earth.'"—Ventuma, 131.

The traveller confounds the word with tanlaran, which does mean 'Lord.' [Forbes (see below) makes the same mistake.]

1516.—"This city of Calicut is very large. . . . This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomodri, which is a point of honour above all other Kings."—Burbon, 103.

[1552.—"Samarao." See under CELEBES.]

1553.—"The most powerful Prince of this Malabar was the King of Calicut, who par excellence was called Camari, which among them is as among us the title Emperor."—Berni, i. iv. 7.

1810.—"On our way we saw one of the Zamorin's houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Panlany."—Maria Graham, 110.

[1811.—"The King of Calicut was, in the Malabar language, called Samory, or Zamorino, that is to say, God on the earth."—Forbes, Or Men, 2nd ed. i. 263. See quotation above from Varthema.]

"... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorino's complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrance vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brahmins."—Ibid. iv. 207-8; [2nd ed. ii. 477]. This was a case of Traga.

[1900.—"The Zamorin of Calicut who succeeded to the gadi (Guddy) three months ago, has died."—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

ZANZIBAR, n.p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jubb, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 16th century, as we see from the Roteiro. The Pers. Zangi-bâr, 'Region of the Blacks,' was known to the ancients in the form Zingis (Ptolemy, i. 17, 9; iv. 7, 11) and Zingium. The Arab softening of the g made the name into Zanjibar, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 545.—"And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zingium, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the incense grows, which is called Barbary."—Cosmas, in Cuthay, &c., clxvii.

c. 910.—"The land of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nile" (by this the Jubb seems meant) "and extends to the country of Sofala and of the Wakwak."—Mayâdi, Præfates d'Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190.—Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

"... I have never eaten better food than this!

Since a man of Zang is in eating so heart-attracting,

To eat any other roast meat to me is not agreeable!"

Silvadar-Nârâh of Nizâmî, by Willerforce Clarke, p. 101.

1293.—"Zanghbar is a great and noble island, with a compass of some 2000 miles. The people . . . are all black, and go stark naked, with only a little covering for decency. Their hair is as black as pepper, and so frizzly that even with water you can scarcely straighten it," &c., &c.—Marco Polo, ii. 215. Marco Polo regards the coast of Zanzibar as belonging to a great island like Madagascar.

1410.—"Kalikut is a very safe haven . . . where one finds in abundance the precious objects brought from maritime countries, especially from Habshah (see HUBSHEE, ABYSSINIA), Zirbad, and Zanzibar."—Abdurazzâl, in Not. et Ites., xii. 436.

1493.—"And when the morning came, we found we had arrived at a very great island called Jamgiber, peopled with many Moors, and standing good ten leagues from the coast."—Roteiro, 105.

1516.—"Between this island of San Lorenzo (i.e. Madagascar) and the continent, not very far from it are three islands, which are called one Manfia, another Zanzibar, and the other Penda; these are inhabited by Moors; they are very fertile islands."—Barbosa, 14.

1553.—"And from the streams of this river Quilmanco towards the west, as far as the Cape of Currents, up to which the Moors of that coast do navigate, all that region, and that still further west towards the Cape of Good Hope (as we call it), the Arabians and Persians of those parts call Zanguebar, and the inhabitants they call Zanguy."—Barro, i. viii. 4.

"A few pages later we have "Isles of Pemba, Zanzibar, Monfia, Comoro," showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguebar the continental region from Zanzibar the Island.

c. 1586.

1592.—"From hence we went for the Isle of Zanzibar on the coast of Melinde, where at we stayed and wintered until the beginning of February following."—Henry May, in Hall. iv. 53.

ZEBU, s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or Brahminy bull) of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people as an Indian word; thus Webster's Dictionary, says "Zebu, the native Indian name." The only word at all like it that we can discover is zobo (q.v.) or choba, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dsomo. In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Zo-da . . . i. hump of a camel, zebu, etc." This is curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice.

Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Acclimation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia" with a great part of Africa. [Mr. Blanford writes: "The origin of Bos indicus (sometimes called zebu by European naturalists) is unknown, but it was in all probability tropical or sub-tropical, and was regarded by Blyth as probably African. No ancestral form has been discovered among Indian fossil bovines, which . . . comprise species allied to the gaur and buffalo" (Mammalia, 483 seq.).]

c. 1772.—"We have seen this small humped ox alive. . . . It was shown at the fair in Paris in 1752 (sic), but a transcript from the French edition of 1837 gives 1772) under the name of Zebu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a species of the buffalo."—Buffon's Nat. Hist., E.T. 1807, viii. 19, 20; see also p. 33.

1861.—"Nous savons donc positivement qu'à une époque où l'occident était encore couvert de forêts, l'orient, déjà civilisé, possédait déjà le bouef et le Zebu; et par conséquent c'est de l'orient que ces animaux sont sortis, pour devenir, l'un (le bouef) cosmopolite, l'autre commun à presque toute l'Asie et à une grande partie de l'Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861).

[1898.—"I have seen a herd of Zebras (sic) or Indian humped cattle, but cannot say where they are kept."—In 9 ser. N. & Q. i. 468.]

ZEDOARY, and ZERUMBET, ss. These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The former is Arabic jadrār, the latter Pers. zarambūd. There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Moodeen Sheriff says that Zedoary (Curcuma zedoaria) is sold in most bazars under the name of anbeh-kaldi, whilst jadrār, or chadrār, is the bazar name of roots of varieties of non-poisonous aconites. There has been considerable confusion in the nomenclature of these drugs [see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 655, 670]. Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Aetius, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. A.D. 540.—"Zador (i.e. zedoaria), galangae, ligustici, esolisi, cardamomi, piporis longi, piporis albi, cinnamomi, zingiberis, seminis Smyrni, caryophylli, phylli, stachyos, myrobalani, phi, costi, scordi, silphii vel laserpitii, rhei barbarici, poconiae; alii etiam arboris nucis viscum of paliuri semen, itemque saxifragum ac casiam addunt; ex his singulis statores duos com-misceto. . . ."

c. 1400.—"Canoll and setewale of priceo."—R. of the Rose.

1516.—"In the Kingdom of Calicut there grows much pepper . . . and very much good ginger of the country, cardamoms, myrobolans of all kinds, bamboo cane, zerumba, zedoary, wild cinnamon."—Barbosa, 151.

ZEMINDAR, s. Pers. zamin-dar, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal Proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N.W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable. In the N.W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamin-dar is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of jama-dar (see JEMADAR), and the form given to zamin-dar in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal more than two centuries ago.

1683.—"We lay at Banchera, a very pleasant and delightfull Country, & Zemdar invited us shure, and showed us Store of Deer, Peacocks, &c. but it was not our good fortune to get any of them."—Hedges, Diary, April 11; [Hak. Soc. l. 77, also l.

Zemidar of the Country adjacent to us to let us have the town of De Calcutta at the purpose, he making frivolous and idle Objections, that he will not let us have any Part of the Country in the Right Honourable Company's name, but that we might have it to our use in any of the Natives Names; the Reason he gives for it is, that the Place will be wholly lost to him—that we are a Powerful People—and that he cannot be possessed of his Country again when he sees Occasion—whereas he can take it from any of the Natives that rent any Part of his Country at his Pleasure.

Jemidars have successively done, and at the same time ordering the Jemidar of the said towns to make over their Right and Title to the English upon their paying to the Jemidars One thousand Rupees for the same, it was agreed that the Money should be paid, being the best Money that ever was spent for so great a Privilege;

but the Jemidars risked a great Noise, being unwilling to part with their Country
... and finding them to continue in their averse-ness, notwithstanding the Prince had an offer upon them to bring them to a Compliance, it is agreed that 1,500 Rupees be paid them, provided they will relinquish their title to the said towns, and give it under their Hands in Writing, that they have made over the same to the Right Honourable Company."—Act of Council, at Calcutta, the 24th December (Printed for Parliament in 1758).

In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcutta is Pers. dā, 'village,' or 'township,' a common term in the language of Indian Revenue administration. An 'Explanation of Terms' furnished by W. Hastings to the Port William Council in 1759
thus explains the word:

"Deeh—the ancient limits of any village or parish. Thus, 'Deeh Calcutta' means only that part which was originally inhabited."—(In Loc. cit., p. 176.)

ZENANA, s. Pers. zandna, from zan, 'woman'; the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are secluded. This Mahomedan custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal and the Maharrattas. Zanāna is also used for the women of the family themselves. The growth of the admirable Zenana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. But we have heard of more than one instance in which the objects of this Christian enterprise have been taken to be an amiable aboriginal tribe—"the Zenanas."

ZEND, ZENDAVESTA, s. Zend is the name which has been commonly applied for more than a hundred years to that dialect of the ancient Iranian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zand when used alone in the Parsi books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Haug thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if by Zend the translator meant his own work. No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parsi books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of these scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gāthas or hymns are written; and a later one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zand, in Haug's view, may be referred to the root zan, 'to know'; Skt. jud, Gr. γινω, Lat. gno (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zannāda, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, as, according to Haug, "the Pahlavi books always style them Avistak ra Zand (Avesta and Zend)" i.e. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastā, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistūn; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Haug.) Thus, 'Avesta and Zend' signify together 'The Law and the Commentary.'

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parsi tradition is that there were twenty-one books called Nask, the greater part of which were burnt by Alexander in his conquest of Persia; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the Vendidad, a compilation of religious laws and of mythical tales; (b) the Visptad, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 5 hymns or Gāthas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year, and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771. [The Zend-Avesta has now been translated in Sacred Books of the East, by J. Darmesteter, L. H. Mills; Pahlavi Texts, by E. W. West.]

c. 1030.—"The chronology of this same past, but in a different shape, I have also found in the book of Hamza ben Alhusain Alisfahani, which he calls 'Chronology of great nations of the past and present.' He says that he has endeavoured to correct his account by means of the Abastā, which is the religious code (of the Zoroastrians). Therefore I have transferred it into this place of my book." —Al-Birānī, Chronology of Ancient Nations, by Sachau, p. 112.

"Afterwards the wife gave birth to six other children, the names of whom are known in the Avastā." —Ibid. p. 103.

1630.—"Desirous to add anything to the ingenious that the opportunities of my Travels might confer upon me, I joined myself with one of their Church men called their Daroo, and by the interpretation of a Parsee, whose long employment in the Companies Service, had brought him to mediocrity in the English tongue, and whose familiarity with me, inclined him to further my inquiries: I gained the knowledge of what hereafter I shall deliver as it was compiled in a book written in the Persian Characters containing their Scriptures, and in their own language called their ZYN-DAVASTAVV." —Lord, The Religion of the Perses, The Proem.

[c. 1630.—"Being past the Element of Fire and the highest Orbs (as saith their Zundavastato) . . ." —Sir T. Herbert, 2nd ed. 1677, p. 54.]

1653.—"Les ottomans appellent guezures une secte de Payens que nous connoissons sous le nom d'adorateurs du feu, les Per-sans sous celui d'Itchpersé, et les Indou sous celui de Parisi, terme dont ils se nommèrent eux-mêmes. . . . Ils ont leur Sainte Ecriture ou Zandavestav, en deux volumes composés par un nommé Zereto, conduit par un Ange nommé Abraham ou plus-tôt Bahman Vimshaspam. . . — De la Boultaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1651, pp. 200-201.

1700. — "Suo itaque Libro (Zerdusht) . . . alium affixit speciale Titulum Zend, seu alius Zendavestâ; vulgus vocat Zind et Zundavast, ita ut quantum illud ejus Opus variis Tomis, sub distinctis etiam nominibus, constet, tamem quidvis ex illorum Tomorum quorvis, satis propriè et legitime citari possit, sub dicto generali nomine, utpote quod, hac ratione, in opus ejus complexu esse Syntagmate contineri intelligatur. . . . Est autem Zend nomen Arabicum; et Zendavestâ constatum est ex superaddito nomino Hebræo. Chaldæo, Schta, i. e. ignis, unde Laria . . . supra dicto nomine Zend apud Arabes, significatur Ignarium seu Pœile. . . . Cum itaque nomine Zend significetur Ignarium, et Zendavestâ Ignarium et Ignis. . . . — T. Hyde, Hist. Rel. Isl. Persarum, eorumque Magorum, cap. xxv., ed. Oxon. 1760, pp. 335-336.

1771. — "Persuadé que les usages modernes de l'Asie doivent leur origine aux Peuples et aux Religions qui l'ont subjuguée, je me suis proposé d'étudier dans les sources l'ancienne Théologie des Nations habitantes dans les Contrées immenses qui sont à l'Est de l'Euphrate, et de consulter sur leur Histoire, les livres originaux. Ce plan m'a engagé à remonter aux Monuments les plus anciens. Je les ai trouvés de deux espèces: les premiers écrits en Samérian; ce sont les Vales, Livres sacrés des Pays, qui de l'Indus s'étendent aux frontières de la Chine; les seconds écrits en Zend, ancienne langue du Nord de la Perse; c'est le Zend Avesta, qui parait pour avoir été la Loi des Contrées bornées par l'Euphrate, le Caucase, l'Oxus, et la mer des Indes." — Anquetil du Perron, Zend-Avesta, Ouvrage de Zoroastre — Documents Préliminaires, p. iii.

"Dans deux cens ans, quand les langues Zend et Pehlvi (Pahlavi) seront données en Europe familières aux Savans, on pourra, en recueillant les endroits où je me serai trompé, donner une Traduction plus exacte du Zend-Avesta, et ci ce que je dis ici excitant l'émulation, avance le terme quo je viens de fixer, mes fautes n'auront conduit au but quo je me suis proposé." — Ibid. Preface, xvii.

1881. — "The supposition that some of the books were destroyed by Alexander the Great is contained in the introductory chapter of the Pehlvi Yass-Nama, a book written in the Sassanian times, about the 6th or 7th century, and in which the event is thus chronicled:—'The wicked, accursed Gunn Mino (the evil spirit), in order to make the people sceptical about their religion, instigated the accursed Alexendar (Alexander) the Ruman, the inhabitant of Egypt, to carry war and hardships to the country of Iran (Persia). He killed the monarch of Iran, and destroyed and made desolate the royal court. And this religion, that is, all the books of Avesta and Zend, written with gold ink upon prepared cow-skins, was deposited in the archives of Stakhar (Istakhar or Persepolis) of Papak. The accursed, wretched, wicked Ashumgh (destroyer of the pious), Alexendar the evil-doer, took them (the books) out and burnt them." — Doridhai Framji, H. of the Persia, ii. 168-169.

ZERBAFT, s. Gold-brocade, Pers. zar, 'gold,' bast, 'woven.'

[1900. — "Kamkwab, or kinkhwab (Kincob), also known as zar-baft (gold-woven), and mu-hajjar (shaving patterns)." — Farruk Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 86.]

ZILLAH, s. This word is properly Ar. (in Indian pron.) zila, 'a rib,' thence 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, &c., and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burma, a Deputy Commissioner.

[1772. — "With respect to the Talookdarrys and inconsiderable Zemindarrys, which formed a part of the Huzoor (Hazoor) Zillahs or Districts which paid their rents immediately to the General Cutcherry at Moorshedabad. . . . — W. Hastings, in Hunter, Annals of Bengal, 4th ed., 355.]

1817. — "In each district, that is in the language of the country, each Zillah . . . a Zillah Court was established." — Mills Hist. v. 422.

ZINGARI, n.p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zincari, zingani, zincali, chingari, ziguener, &c., to the Gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin. Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixed blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varia sankara is used for an admixture of castes and races (e.g. in Whitgarad Gita, i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor would people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands. A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. zingar, 'a saddler,' Not at all probable. In Sleeman's

Ramaseena or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find :

"Chingaree, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Nails, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjars, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandize, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the loomal in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

[These are the Chāngars of whom Mr. Ibbetson (Panjab Ethnog. 308) gives an account. A full description of them has been given by Dr. G. W. Leitner (A Sketch of the Changars and of their Dialect, Lahore, 1880), in which he shows reason to doubt any connection between them and the Zingari.] De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsies) regards that people as the Indian Zott (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first shikari (see SHIKAREE), and then Pers. changī, 'harper,' from which a plural changān actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 730, note 22. [These are the Al-Jink, male dancers (see Burton, Ar. Nights, viii. 18).]

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingari, like Gipsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ad extra on their appearing in the West, and not carried with them from Asia?

ZIRBAD, n.p. Pers. zīr-bād, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats "Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind." The islands "above the wind" were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind" Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu. The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the countries of Tohin, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad."—Abdurrazzāl, in India in the XVth Cent. 6.

1553.—" . . . Before the foundation of Malacca, in this Cingapura . . . met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Champa, Camboja, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dybanangum (di-banca-angin) and Ataz Angum (atas-angin) which are as much as to say 'below the winds' and 'above the winds,' below being West and above East."—Barros, Dec. 11. Liv. vi. cap. i. In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, bawā-angin (or di-bawak) 'below the wind,' and atas (or di-atas) angin, 'above the wind,' is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

c. 1590.—"Kalambal (see CALAMBAK) is the wood of a tree brought from Zīrbād (?)"—Asin, i. 81. A mistaken explanation is given in the foot-note from a native authority, but this is corrected by Prof. Blochmann at p. 616.

1726.—"The Malays are also commonly called Orang di Bawah Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Easterlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Atas Angin, or 'people above the wind,' and known as Westerlings."—Valentijn, v. 310.

"The land of the Peninsula, &c., was called by the geographers Zierbaad, meaning in Persian 'beneath the wind.'"—Ibid. 317.

1856.—"There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons. . . . The Malays call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind.' . . . The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayan countries the traders of India."—Gratford's Desc. Dict. 233.

ZOBO, ZHOBO, DSOMO, &c., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under ZEBU. The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jacchike's Diet. (p. 463): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of Yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzopo, a male; mdzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." [Writing of the Lower Himalaya, Mr. Atkinson says: "When the sire is a yak and the dam a hill cow, the hybrid is called jabu; when the parentage is reversed, the produce is called garjo. The jabu is found more valuable than the other hybrid or than either of the pure stocks" (Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 38). Also see Ain, ed. Jarrit, ii. 350.]

1229.—"There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with shaggy hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Marco Polo brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of them tame, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well; and at the latter they will do twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts."—Marco Polo, bk. i. ch. 57.

1551.—"The Zobo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikkim), though common in the N.W. Himalaya."—Hunter's Hist. Jorhats, 2d ed. i. 293.

[1871.—"The plough in Lahoul . . . is worked by a pair of dzos (hybrids between the cow and yak)."—Barnard, Hist. Dicts. of Kotlor, Lahoul, and Spiti, 180.

[1875.—"Ploughing is done chiefly with the hybrid of the yak bull and the common cow; this they call zo if male and zomo if female."—Jour. Jmanoo and Kachmir, 216.]

ZOUAVE, s. This modern French term is applied to certain regiments of light infantry in a quasi-Oriental costume, recruited originally in Algeria, and from various races, but now only consisting of Frenchmen. The name Zouava, Zouavna was, according to Litté, that of a Kabyle tribe of the Jurjura which furnished the first soldiers so called.

[ZUBT, ZUBTEE, adj. and s. of which the corrupted forms are JUBTEE, JUPTÉE. Ar. zabt, lit. 'keeping, guarding,' but more generally in India, in the sense of 'seizure, confiscation.' In the Ain it is used in the sense which is still in use in the N.W.P., 'cash rents on the more valuable crops, such as sugar-cane, tobacco, etc., in those districts where rents in kind are generally paid.'

[c. 1530.—"Of these Parganahs, 133 pay revenue in cash from crops charged at special rates (in orig. zabt)."—Ain, ed. Jarrit, ii. 153.

[1813.—"Zebt . . . restraint, confiscation, sequestration. Zebty. Relating to restraint or confiscation, what has been confiscated. . . . Lands resumed by Jahur Khan which had been appropriated in Jaghare (see JAGHEER)."—Glossary to Fifth Report.

[1851.—"You put down one hundred rupees. If the water of your hand does not come . . . then my money shall be confiscated to the Subh. If it does then your money shall be zupt (confiscated)."—Illustrations of a Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 278.]

ZUMBOORUCK, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zambūrak (spelt zambūrak), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle;—a falconet. [See a drawing in R. Kipling's Barot and Man in India, 255.] It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Ar. zambūr, 'a hornet'; much as 'musket' comes from mosquetta. Quatremère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge (see H. des Mongols, 285-G; see also Dary, Suppl. s.v.). This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation:

1819.—"Les Écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisés, donnent à l'arbalète, telle que l'employoit les chrétiens, le nom de zenbouroke. La première fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyr par Saladin en 1187. . . . Suivant l'historien des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le zenbouroke étoit une flèche de l'épaisseur du pouce, de la longueur d'une coudée, qui avoit quatre faces . . . il traversoit quelque fois au même coup deux hommes placés l'un derrière l'autre. . . . Les musulmans paraissent n'avoir fait usage qu'assez tard du zenbourek. Djémal - Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 643 (1245 de J.C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l'Islamisme; c'est à propos du siège d'Ascalon par le sultan d'Égypte. . . . Mais bientôt l'usage du zenbourek devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite des Turcs ottomans entretenaient dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zenbourekdjis. Maintenant . . . ce mot a tout à fait changé d'acception, et l'on donne en Perse le nom de zenbourek à une petite pièce d'artillerie légère."—Renaud, De l'Art Militaire chez les Arabes au moyen âge. Journ. As., Ser. IV., tom. xii. 211-213.

1707.—"Prince Bedâr Bakht . . . was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell. . . . His younger brother Wâliqâh was killed by a ball from a zam-bûrak."—Khâfi Khân, in Elliot, vii. 398.

c. 1764.—"Mirza Nedjef Qhan, who was preceded by some Zemberecs, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence."—Sir Mutagherin, iii. 250.

1825.—"The reign of Futeh Allée Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour. . . . He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign . . . he appeared in the field, . . . till at last one or two shots from zumboorucks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror. . . ."—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khorusân in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

[1829.—"He had no cannon; but was furnished with a description of ordnance, or swivels, called zumbooruk, which were mounted on camels; and which, though useful in action, could make no impression on the slightest walls. . . ."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, i. 419.]

1846.—"So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zambooraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it."—Sir Hugh Gough's desp. on the Battle of Sobraon, dd. Feb 13.

"The flank in question (at Sabraon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred 'zumbooraks,' or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river."—Cunningham's H. of the Sikhs, 322.
